e Appeals

R (on the application of Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions

- The claimant, Annette Carson, appealed with permission of Stanley Burnton J from his decision on 22 May 2002 ([2002] EWHC 978 (Admin), [2002] 3 All ER 994) dismissing her claim for judicial review against the defendant, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, in respect of the failure to pay her, on the grounds of her residence in South Africa, the annual inflation uprating to her United Kingdom state pension. The facts are set out in the judgment of Laws LJ.

R (on the application of Reynolds) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions

- g* The claimant, Joanne Reynolds, appealed with permission of Sedley LJ granted on 1 July 2002 from the decision of Wilson J on 7 March 2002 ([2002] EWHC 426 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 64 (Mar)) dismissing her claim for judicial review against the defendant, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, in respect of the payment to her of jobseeker's allowance calculated with reference to her age.
- h* The facts are set out in the judgment of Laws LJ.

Richard Drabble QC, Helen Mountfield and Murray Hunt (instructed by Thomas Eggar) for Ms Carson.

- j* John Howell QC and James Eadie (instructed by the Solicitor for the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Health) for the Secretary of State.

17 June 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

LAWS LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Simon Brown LJ).

INTRODUCTORY

[1] These two appeals raise important issues concerning the impact of provisions contained in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) upon our municipal legislation relating to certain state benefits. The relevant articles in the convention are arts 8, 14, and art 1 of the First Protocol (to which I will refer for convenience as 'art 1P'). The benefits in question are jobseeker's allowance and income support (Reynolds' case) and retirement pension (Carson's case). In circumstances which I shall shortly explain, the weekly rates at which jobseeker's allowance and income support are paid are higher for persons aged 25 or over than for those between 18 and 25; and United Kingdom pensioners living abroad in certain countries (mainly but not entirely, the countries of the Old Commonwealth) do not receive the annual uprate to their pensions which is paid to pensioners living here and those living in certain other foreign jurisdictions. These facts are said to give rise to violations of art 1P or art 14 read with art 1P, or (Reynolds' case) art 8 read with art 14.

[2] It is convenient at once to set out the material convention provisions. Article 8 provides:

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

Article 14:

'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.'

Article 1P:

'Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law ...'

THE OUTLINE FACTS AND THE DOMESTIC LEGISLATION

[3] What follows here is an account of the basic primary facts in each case, and the applicable domestic legislation. There are other important factual matters which it will be more convenient to set out when I have described the nature of the legal challenge in each case, and come to confront its merits.

a Reynolds' case

[4] The appeal is from the decision of Wilson J given in the Administrative Court on 7 March 2002 ([2002] EWHC 426 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 64 (Mar)), when he dismissed Ms Reynolds' claim for judicial review. Sedley LJ granted permission to appeal, limited as I shall explain to certain grounds only, on 1 July 2002.

b [5] Ms Reynolds was born on 9 November 1976. She has a son who was born on 9 June 2001. After leaving school she was in paid employment until she was made redundant on 12 October 2000, and during that period National Insurance contributions were paid by her employers on her behalf and by herself. On 24 October 2000 she applied for jobseeker's allowance, and was notified by letter of 14 November 2000 that she qualified by virtue of her class 1 National Insurance contributions. There are two kinds of jobseeker's allowance. 'JSA(C)' is contributions-based. 'JSA(IB)' is income-based. Ms Reynolds satisfied the conditions for both, but was paid JSA(C) only: in her particular circumstances she was not entitled to any greater sum by way of JSA(IB). As she was a single claimant in the age range 18 to 24, she was paid at the rate of £41.35 per week. Had she been 25 or over, she would have received £52.20 per week. It is important to notice that, as regards JSA(C), a person's contributions do not in whole or in part constitute a fund from which the benefit is later paid. It is a contributory benefit only in the sense that the payment of sufficient contributions is a condition of entitlement.

c [6] As from 12 January 2001 Ms Reynolds was considered to be incapable of working because of difficulties which she suffered relating to her pregnancy. Accordingly from that date up to the birth of her baby (as I have said on 9 June 2001) she received income support rather than jobseeker's allowance, but at the same rate. Between 24 October 2000 and 9 June 2001 Ms Reynolds received housing benefit and council tax benefit in addition to the successive payments of jobseeker's allowance and income support. She also received a maternity allowance for about the final three months of pregnancy. Her case on the facts was and is that she was subjected to severe hardship by virtue of the low rate of benefit which she got. Her evidence is that because she had to pay about £20 per week for gas and electricity and to repay a loan at the rate of £10 per week, she was constrained to borrow £4 or £5 per week from her mother and to eat twice a week at her mother's house in order to make ends meet at the most basic level.

g Moreover she suffered from an under-active thyroid gland and asthma; she had to take iron and vitamin tablets to help with her anaemic condition; when she was pregnant she discovered that she could not get free milk tokens; she was not entitled to claim social fund or other hardship payments.

h [7] In relation to JSA(C), the difference in treatment on the basis of age is authorised by s 4(1) of the Jobseekers Act 1995 and by reg 79 of the Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations 1996, SI 1996/207. Section 4 provides:

j (1) In the case of contribution-based jobseeker's allowance, the amount payable in respect of a claimant ("his personal rate") shall be calculated by—(a) determining the age-related amount applicable to him; and (b) making prescribed deductions in respect of earnings and pension payments.

(2) The age-related amount applicable to a claimant, for the purposes of subsection (1)(a), shall be determined in accordance with regulations.'

Regulation 79 provides:

(1) In the case of contribution-based jobseeker's allowance, the age-related amount applicable to a claimant for the purposes of section 4(1)(a) shall be—(a) in the case of a person who has not attained the age of 18, [£31·45] per week; (b) in the case of a person who has attained the age of 18 but not the age of 25, [£41·35] per week; (c) in the case of a person who has attained the age of 25, [£52·20] per week.' a

[8] There is like provision relating to JSA(IB) which however I need not set out. As regards income support I can summarise the position as Wilson J did ([2002] All ER (D) 64 (Mar) at [9]). Sections 124(4), 135(1) and 137(1) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 taken together provide that the amount of any income support should be such as was determined in accordance with regulations. Regulation 17(1) of and Sch 2 to the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967 provide that a single claimant to income support aged not less than 18 but less than 25 should receive (in the absence of any income) a sum which in April 2000 rose to £41·35, whereas such a claimant aged not less than 25 should receive a sum which then rose to £52·20. Ms Reynolds' essential case is that in relation to the amount of her benefit she is a victim of discrimination contrary to art 14 of the convention read with art 1P, because she is less favourably treated than a benefit claimant, otherwise in like case with herself, who is over 25. b
c

Carson's case

[9] The appeal is from the judgment of Stanley Burnton J given in the Administrative Court on 22 May 2002 ([2002] EWHC 978 (Admin), [2002] 3 All ER 994), when he dismissed Ms Carson's claim for judicial review. Permission to appeal was granted by the judge below, as I understand it without limitation to any particular issue or issues. e

[10] Ms Carson spent most of her working life in England, and while she was employed she and her employer, and while she was self-employed she alone, paid full National Insurance contributions. I should say that just as with JSA(C), the contributions do not in whole or in part constitute a specific fund from which the pension is later paid: the benefits are paid out on what has been called a 'pay as you go' basis, from a notional fund topped up as required by grants from the Exchequer. Ms Carson has been resident in South Africa since 1990. When she was working in South Africa she paid voluntary contributions to protect her right to a United Kingdom state pension. She began to draw her pension in September 2000. She receives a British retirement pension of £103·62 per week. That is made up of a basic pension of £67·50, an additional pension (under the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme, or SERPS) of £32·17, and graduated pension of £3·95. She has not received the increase in the basic retirement pension of £5 (from £67·50 to £72·50) that has been paid since 9 April 2001 to those entitled to it; nor has she received the percentage increase in the additional pension and graduated pension which has been paid since that date. It is accepted on her behalf that she is not qualified for these increases by reason of the relevant provisions of United Kingdom legislation and delegated legislation, apart from the Human Rights Act 1998. While she remains in South Africa, her total British pension will remain frozen at £103·62. Pensioners who have paid like contributions to those made by Ms Carson but who remain resident in the United Kingdom receive an annual uplift based on price inflation. Others who live abroad, but in countries with which the United Kingdom government has f
h

- a entered into certain forms of bilateral agreement, also receive this uplift. I shall give the necessary details later. Ms Carson says that she faces severe financial hardship and a very insecure retirement in which she will be forced to continue to work in order to compensate for her British pension being so much lower than she expected. Her essential case is that in relation to the amount of her pension she is a victim of discrimination contrary to art 14 of the convention read with
- b art 1P, because she is less favourably treated than those United Kingdom pensioners, whether living here or abroad, who receive the inflation uplift.

[11] The relevant domestic legislation is as follows. Section 20(1) of the 1992 Act provides so far as relevant:

- c 'Contributory benefits under this Part of this Act are of the following descriptions, namely ... (f) retirement pensions of the following categories—
(i) Category A, payable to a person by virtue of his own contributions ...'

Section 21:

- d '(1) Entitlement to any of the benefits specified in section 20(1) above ... depends on contribution conditions being satisfied ...
(2) The class or classes of contribution which, for the purposes of subsection (1) above, are relevant in relation to each of those benefits are as follows ... Category A retirement pension: Class 1, 2 or 3.'

Section 44 is important:

- e '(1) A person shall be entitled to a Category A retirement pension if—(a) he is over pensionable age; and (b) he satisfies the contribution conditions for a Category A retirement pension specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 5; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, he shall become so entitled on the day on which he attains pensionable age and his
- f entitlement shall continue throughout his life ...
(3) A Category A retirement pension shall consist of—(a) a basic pension payable at a weekly rate; and (b) an additional pension payable where there are one or more surpluses in the pensioner's earnings factors for the relevant years.
- g (4) The weekly rate of the basic pension shall be £72.50 ...'

- h The conditions stated in Sch 3, Pt I, para 5 to the 1992 Act provide that the individual must, for a requisite number of years of his working life, have paid or been credited with contributions. The requisite number of years during which contributions must have been made is calculated according to the length of the individual's working life. Section 113 of the 1992 Act contains general provisions as to disqualification from receiving benefits, and for suspending payments. Section 113(1) provides, so far as relevant:

- j 'Except where regulations otherwise provide, a person shall be disqualified for receiving any benefit under Parts II to V of this Act ... for any period during which the person—(a) is absent from Great Britain; or (b) is undergoing imprisonment or detention in legal custody.'

Section 113(3) provides:

'Regulations may provide for a person who would be entitled to any such benefit but for the operation of any provision of this Act ... to be treated as if entitled to it for the purposes of any rights or obligations ... which depend on his entitlement, other than the right to payment of the benefit.'

The general statutory disqualification from receiving Category A retirement pension by reason of being absent from Great Britain is disapplied by reg 4(1) of the Social Security Benefit (Persons Abroad) Regulations 1975, SI 1975/563, which modifies the 1992 Act in relation to, inter alia, retirement pension. It provides, so far as material:

'Subject to the provisions of this regulation and of regulation 5 below, a person shall not be disqualified for receiving ... a retirement pension of any category ... by reason of being absent from Great Britain.'

Regulation 5 of the same regulations, however, provides for the re-application of the disqualification in regulations providing for the uprating of retirement pensions:

'(1) Where regulations made in consequence of an order under section 63 of the Social Security Act 1986 (up-rating of benefits ...) provide for the application of this regulation to any additional benefit becoming payable by virtue of that order, the following provisions of this regulation shall ... have effect in relation to the entitlement to that benefit of persons absent from Great Britain ...

(3) ... where a person is not ordinarily resident in Great Britain immediately before the appointed date the provisions of these regulations (except this regulation) shall not, unless and until he becomes ordinarily resident in Great Britain, affect his disqualification while he is absent from Great Britain for receiving ... (c) ... any additional retirement pension of any category ... if that person had ... become entitled to a retirement pension ... before the appointed date.'

Regulation 3 of the Social Security Benefits Up-rating Regulations 2001, SI 2001/910 provided for the application of the disqualification to the additional benefit payable by virtue of the Social Security Benefits Up-rating (No 2) Order 2000, SI 2001/207 including the uprating of the retirement pension introduced by art 4 of the 2001 order with effect from 9 April 2001:

'3. Regulation 5 of the Social Security Benefit (Persons Abroad) Regulations 1975 (application of disqualification in respect of up-rating of benefit) shall apply to any additional benefit payable by virtue of the Up-rating Order.'

[12] In each tax year the Secretary of State is obliged by virtue of s 150 of the 1992 Act to review the sums specified (inter alia) in s 44(4) 'in order to determine whether they have retained their value in relation to the general level of prices obtaining in Great Britain' and to lay an uprating order before Parliament where it appears to him that the general level of prices is greater at the end of the review than it was at the beginning of the period. The draft order must increase the sum specified in s 44(4) by a percentage which is no less than that increase.

[13] Her Majesty is empowered by Order in Council to make provision for modifying or adapting the relevant legislation in its application to cases affected by an agreement with a country outside the United Kingdom which provides for reciprocity in matters relating to payments for purposes similar or comparable to the purposes of the 1992 Act: see s 179 of the 1992 Act. There are extant agreements allowing for payment of pension increases with a number of a countries. United Kingdom pensioners living in these countries, unlike Ms Carson and many others who live in other foreign states, receive the uprate made year by year by the Secretary of State under s 150. The part played by these agreements—‘bilaterals’ in this appeal’s vocabulary—in the debate before us was of no little importance. As I have said it will be convenient to describe the material details when I come to confront the merits of Ms Carson’s case.

b THE ISSUES IDENTIFIED

[14] As I have indicated, in Reynolds’ case Sedley LJ gave permission to appeal on a limited basis. He considered there were no arguable grounds to suggest a violation of arts 3, 8, or art 1P taken on its own; but that art 14 read with art 1P and/or the common law might support a viable case of arbitrary discrimination in the distribution of jobseeker’s allowance and income support. After the grant of permission Mr Gill QC for Ms Reynolds and his junior supplied a note to the court signifying an intention also to argue (a) violation of art 1P simpliciter and (b) violation of art 14 read with art 8. It is plain that this court’s permission would be required if these further points were to be entertained. At the hearing Mr Gill disavowed any argument based on the common law aside from the convention.

d [15] Mr Drabble QC for Ms Carson advanced two arguments to support the conclusion that withholding the retirement pension uprate from his client and others in her position was unlawful: more formally, that reg 3 of the 2001 regulations was ultra vires. He submitted first that reg 3 was repugnant to art 14 read with art 1P because it discriminated against Ms Carson on grounds of her place of residence without any objective and reasonable justification. In the alternative, the regulation constituted a violation of art 1P taken on its own. I should say that Stanley Burnton J ([2002] 3 All ER 994) raised of his own motion a further point which if good would have disposed of Ms Carson’s case in limine. This was whether, having regard to art 1 of the convention (which I will not set e out), a signatory state is only obliged to secure the convention rights for the benefit of persons residing within its territorial jurisdiction. The judge held that art 1 did not operate so as to bar Ms Carson’s claim. That conclusion has not been contested by the Secretary of State; and although there are, I am sure, nice questions as to the reach of the convention rights in light of art 1 of the convention, it is not necessary to debate them in the Carson appeal.

f [16] In both appeals the major issue is whether there was a violation of art 14 read with art 1P. Within this question there were various areas of debate which I will explain in due course. But it is convenient first to clear the other issues out of the way.

h ARTICLE I OF THE FIRST PROTOCOL TAKEN ON ITS OWN (BOTH APPEALS)

[17] One of those areas of debate which I will have to confront when I come to deal with art 14 read with art 1P for the purposes of the Reynolds appeal is whether non-contributory social security benefits such as income support may constitute ‘possessions’ within the meaning of art 1P. However in addressing (as j I now do) the case made for violations of art 1P simpliciter, it is convenient to assume in Ms Reynolds’ favour that income support indeed falls within the meaning of ‘possessions’.

[18] In my judgment the starting point for this part of the case is the proposition, vouched by the Strasbourg court’s judgment in Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, that art 1P applies only to a person’s existing possessions: it does not guarantee a right to acquire possessions. It is then submitted for the Secretary of State that domestic legislation which specifies the amount of any state benefit, as has happened here in both appeals, cannot constitute an interference with the right given by art 1P: rather it merely defines the property right in the particular case, whose security art 1P may then protect. a [19] This position taken by the Secretary of State is supported by a consistent line of Strasbourg authority, some of it dealing in terms with complaints put forward by United Kingdom pensioners resident abroad as to the government's failure or refusal to uprate their pensions. The first case is the decision of the European Commission on Human Rights (the Commission) in Müller v Austria (1975) 3 DR 25, in which the Commission held that art 1P does not guarantee a right to a pension of any particular amount. Then in X v Italy (1977) 11 DR 114 the Commission rejected as manifestly ill-founded a claim of infringement of art 1P because the applicant had not satisfied the requirements under his domestic law for the payment of a pension. Müller v Austria and X v Italy were both referred to in JW v UK (1983) 34 DR 153, which was the first case in which the Commission considered a complaint that the United Kingdom government's failure to pay an uprated pension infringed the pensioner's convention rights. There, the applicants were emigrating to Australia. The Commission rejected the complaint as inadmissible. In view of its particular relevance Stanley Burnton J ([2002] 3 All ER 994 at [41]) set out the reported extract in full. I will cite just these following passages ((1983) 34 DR 153 at 154–155): b

'3. The Commission has considered the applicants' complaint under Article 1 of the Protocol. It first recalls that it has previously held that although this provision does not as such guarantee a right to a pension, the right to benefit from a social security system to which a person has contributed may in some circumstances be a property right protected by it. However the Commission also held that Article 1 does not guarantee a right to a pension of any particular amount, but that the right safeguarded by Article 1 consists, at most, "in being entitled as a beneficiary of the social insurance scheme to any payments made by the fund" [Müller v Austria (1975) 3 DR 25 at 31]. It has further held that before the right to benefit protected by Article 1 can be established, it is necessary that the interested party should have satisfied domestic legal requirements governing the right [X v Italy (1977) 11 DR 114]. In the present case when the applicants emigrate to Australia their entitlement to benefit from the United Kingdom pension scheme will come to be regulated by different rules of domestic law, under which they will cease to qualify for payment of future pension increases contemplated by the relevant legislation. To that extent they will not satisfy domestic legal requirements to benefit from the United Kingdom pension scheme. Even if the right to benefit from a scheme will normally also apply to the regular increases this is not necessarily the case where a person leaves the country where the specific scheme operates. The Commission notes that in many countries specific restrictions as to the payment of social security benefits to foreign countries exist or have existed ... In the Commission's view such operation of domestic law does not amount to a deprivation of possessions infringing Article 1 of the Protocol and there is thus no appearance of any breach of this provision.'

The Commission in JW v UK proceeded also to reject the applicants' complaint of violation of art 14 read with art 1P.

a [20] Two years after its decision in JW v UK, the Commission considered another complaint as to the United Kingdom government's failure to pay uprated pension, this time by an applicant who had emigrated to South Africa. In Corner v UK App no 11271/84 (17 May 1985, unreported), the Commission rejected as manifestly ill-founded the applicant's complaint that the failure to pay the uprate infringed art 1P. It also held, again, that there was no violation of art 14 read with b art 1P. The Commission said this:

c 'The Commission recalls that it has previously held that, although art 1 of Protocol No 1 does not, as such, guarantee a right to a pension, the right to benefit from a social security system to which a person has contributed may, in some circumstances, be a property right protected by it ... However, the d Commission has also held that art 1 does not guarantee a right to a pension of a particular amount, but that the right safeguarded by art 1 consists, at most, "in being entitled as a beneficiary of the social insurance scheme to any payments made by the fund" ... in accordance with domestic legal requirements ... Further, the Commission has held that the "freezing" of a pension at a particular level when a person leaves the United Kingdom does not amount to a deprivation of possessions infringing art 1 of the First Protocol ...'

[21] The appellants seek between them to escape the coils of this learning by reference to other cases, namely Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364, Szrabjer v UK, Clarke v UK App nos 27004/95 and 27011/95 (23 October 1997, unreported), and Willis v UK [2002] ECHR 36042/97. But Gaygusuz v Austria and Willis v UK were cases on art 14; indeed, as I shall show, Gaygusuz v Austria is an important authority for some of the points we shall have to consider in dealing with the principal art 14 issue arising in these appeals. Szrabjer v UK was rather different.
f There, the applicants were denied the earnings-related element of their pensions while they were in prison, pursuant to s 113(1)(d) of the 1992 Act which I have set out. They claimed violations both of art 1P, and of art 14 read with art 1P. The Commission declared the complaints inadmissible. It held (referring to Gaygusuz v Austria) that the earnings-related pension amounted to a pecuniary right for the purposes of art 1P; however its being withheld from the applicants while they
g were in prison could be considered (as the government contended) as being in the public interest. Accordingly the complaint of a violation of art 1P simpliciter was manifestly ill-founded. Mr Drabble in his skeleton argument sought to build out of this a positive holding to the effect that the disqualification imposed by s 113(1)(d) operated so as to amount to a deprivation of possessions for the h purposes of art 1P. I do not believe that any such proposition can be got from the reasoning in Szrabjer v UK. All that can be said (as Mr Howell QC for the Secretary of State suggested) is that the Commission did not state, as a reason for holding the complaint inadmissible, that the disqualification could not amount to such a deprivation.

j [22] I should notice also that in Carlin v UK App no 27537/95 (3 December 1997, unreported), decided as I understand it shortly after Szrabjer v UK, the Commission dismissed as manifestly unfounded a complaint that the suspension of industrial injuries disability benefit during a person's imprisonment involved any violation of art 1P. It reiterated that 'it is still necessary, in order for such a right to be established, that the person concerned should have satisfied domestic legal requirements'.

[23] I conclude that no violation of art 1P taken on its own is disclosed on the facts in either of these appeals. The argument to the contrary involves the proposition that art 1P, at least in some circumstances, confers a right to acquire property. But that is contradicted by the plain words of the article and by the learning in Strasbourg from the case of Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 onwards.

ARTICLE 14 READ WITH ART 8 (REYNOLDS' CASE)

[24] As I have indicated, permission is in my judgment needed for this point to be raised (though Mr Gill did not distinctly accept as much). I would give permission, only because it is convenient to treat all the issues that have been canvassed on the same procedural footing. However I should say at once that there is but limited space in the appeal's geography for this point to operate: it only has independent life if (the submission on art 1P taken on its own being rejected, as I would reject it) the court were to hold, in relation to art 14 read with art 1P: (a) that payments of income support do not constitute 'possessions' for the purposes of the argument; but (b) that unjustified discrimination was none the less established. In that case Ms Reynolds could only rely on art 14 vis-à-vis the period in which she was paid income support rather than jobseeker's allowance by asserting a breach of the article read with art 8. Since for my part I am satisfied for reasons which I will explain that Ms Reynolds' complaint of discrimination should fail on its merits, if Simon Brown and Rix LJ agree it follows that this part of the case is moot. However, out of respect for the argument, I will deal with it shortly.

[25] It is common ground that art 14 confers no free-standing right, independent of the other substantive convention provisions. It requires only that the rights guaranteed by those provisions be enjoyed without discrimination of the kinds stated in the article. It may be violated though there is no violation of the substantive right (otherwise, of course, it would be otiose, or at best a rule of interpretation of the substantive rights). What has to be shown is that the act complained of: (a) falls within the 'ambit' of a substantive convention right; (b) involves discrimination against the complainant on a prohibited ground; which (c) is not objectively justified. All this is elementary and I will not take time citing authority to support it. Plainly all these propositions will have to be considered when I come to art 14 taken with art 1P.

[26] Mr Gill submits that the facts, which I have already outlined, disclose circumstances of such marked hardship suffered by Ms Reynolds that the levels of jobseeker's allowance and income support received by her fall readily within the ambit of art 8. While of course we must not lose sight of the fact that there is no complaint here of any violation of art 8 read on its own, it is in my judgment important to recognise that on the Strasbourg learning art 8 does not require the state to provide a home: see Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 72 (para 99); nor does it impose any positive obligation to provide financial assistance to support a person's family life or to ensure that individuals may enjoy family life to the full or in any particular manner: see Vaughan v UK App no 12639/87 (12 December 1987, unreported), Anderson and Kullmann v Sweden (1986) 46 DR 251, Petrovic v Austria (2001) 33 EHRR 307 at 319 (para 26).

[27] At the same time the European Court of Human Rights has accepted that there may be circumstances in which art 8 imposes a positive obligation upon states to take steps to secure or to further respect for the home or family life. In this territory, however, the states enjoy a wide margin of appreciation: see

- Abdulaziz v UK* (1985) 7 EHRR 471 at 497 (para 67). It is also true that in establishing a system or regime to comply with a convention obligation, a state may include within the system elements that are not strictly required by the convention itself, as in the case of appeal rights in the context of art 6; and where that is done, the distribution of these supererogatory rights must comply with art 14: see Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252 at 283.
- [28] In the present case I am clear that the provision of jobseeker's allowance and income support has not been made by the United Kingdom legislature and executive out of compliance with any actual or perceived positive obligation arising under art 8. Such positive obligations may arise where there is a 'direct and immediate link between the measures sought by an applicant and the latter's private and/or family life': see Botta v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 81 at 88 (para 34).
- Recognised instances include circumstances where the criminal law is required to offer protection for family life against particular dangers (see again Botta v Italy (at 88 (para 34)). But they cannot, in my judgment, extend to include whole swathes of a state's social security system without embracing that system within the general duty vouchsafed by art 8. That, however, would be contrary to the learning to which I have referred in [26], above.
- [29] Mr Gill's argument as to the ambit of art 8 cannot in my judgment be limited to the particular circumstances of Ms Reynolds' case. I do not mean to belittle her undoubted difficulties, but it is clear that like difficulties are common to many people in receipt of benefit. Mr Gill's submission, if correct, would in principle subject the general welfare provisions made by the state to the requirements of art 8 and of art 14 read with art 8. That is not the law. There is nothing in this argument.

ARTICLE 14 READ WITH ART 1 OF THE FIRST PROTOCOL

- [30] Mr Howell accepted that age (Reynolds' case) and place of residence (Carson's case) each constituted a 'status' for the purposes of art 14. But as I have foreshadowed this major issue raises a number of discrete areas of debate. (1) (Reynolds' case only.) Is a non-contributory benefit, in this case income support, within the meaning of 'possessions' in art 1P for the purpose of the art 14 argument? (2) (Carson's case only.) Was there discrimination at all? Ms Carson asserted that her situation should be viewed against two classes of comparators: pensioners living in the United Kingdom, and pensioners living in those foreign states where the uprate was paid. Stanley Burnton J held that neither class of comparator was in an analogous situation to that of the appellant, so that there was no discrimination upon which art 14 might bite. (It is not conceded that there was discrimination in Reynolds' case; but I regard the point as barren in the Reynolds appeal: see [75], below.) (3) (Both appeals, or Reynolds' case only if discrimination is not made out in Carson's case.) Was there on the facts in each case an objective and reasonable justification for the discrimination? For reasons which I will explain, questions (2) and (3) seem to me to overlap. A fourth question was raised by myself in the course of argument, which, if it possessed any force, logically would come first. This was whether art 14 was engaged in these cases at all; that is to say, whether the facts in each appeal actually touched the enjoyment of the right guaranteed by art 1P.

[31] Although with some considerable misgiving I have concluded that this last issue does not drive the case in the Secretary of State's favour, and Mr Howell was right to eschew any reliance on the suggestion that art 14 was not engaged in these appeals at all, I propose nevertheless to deal with it. The basis upon which the point ultimately falls to be rejected is closely connected with the steps towards the answer to question (1) above (is income support an art 1P 'possession?'); and some discussion of the subject may serve to clarify the scope of art 14, or at least expose its attendant difficulties. I turn to this point therefore first of all.

IS ART 14 (READ WITH ART 1P) ENGAGED AT ALL?

[32] I have already stated (see [25], above) that, as is common ground, art 14 confers no free-standing right, but requires only that the rights guaranteed by the convention's substantive provisions be enjoyed without discrimination of the kinds stated in the article. The point is put, if I may respectfully say so, with particular clarity in Petrovic v Austria (2001) 33 EHRR 307 at 319 (para 28):

'The Court has said on many occasions that Article 14 comes into play whenever "the subject-matter of the disadvantage ... constitutes one of the modalities of the exercise of a right guaranteed", or the measures complained of are "linked to the exercise of a right guaranteed".'

[33] What troubled me at the outset of the argument was that I could not see, on the facts of either appeal, how any exercise of the art 1P right was involved such as might engage art 14. The right guaranteed by art 1P is to peaceful enjoyment of one's possessions, and not to be deprived of one's possessions save on a permitted justification. As it seemed to me, art 14 would come into play only in certain limited sets of circumstances. One such would arise if there were some apparent or potential interference with a substantive convention right which could however be justified if the case were looked at in isolation (so that there would be no violation of art 1P simpliciter), but which would fall to be condemned under art 14 upon its being shown that the justification imposed, on discriminatory grounds of a kind contemplated in the article, a heavier burden on the complainant than was imposed on another person or class of persons in a comparable situation.

[34] Such a state of affairs might most easily be illustrated by reference to what are sometimes called the political rights guaranteed by arts 8–11. In each of these, para 2 of the article states considerations upon which the right may be abrogated or qualified, essentially on public interest grounds. Now, one might readily construct an example where (say) free speech in some particular area is proscribed by the state in various instances. Grounds to justify the prohibition are then put forward by the state under art 10, para 2. In the example, let it be said that in each given instance taken alone the proscription is well justified under para 2 on the grounds put forward. However the grounds of justification thus advanced are more, or less, intrusive or onerous between instances and the difference is attributable to a prohibited discriminatory ground. In that case the fact of such differential justifications between classes (or persons) will offend art 14 unless the state can justify the difference or differences.

a charge against him) be determined under art 6 at 'a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal' is not a unitary or singular standard or set of principles. In the broadest terms there will be a spectrum of standards within which the court will not interfere. It may be said that this is so by force of the Strasbourg court's doctrine of 'margin of appreciation'. I prefer to say that in the real world there are inevitably shades and degrees of every one of the variables in art 6: fairness, publicity, delay, independence, impartiality. So it is that in connection with art 6 a complaint under art 14 may arise where it is said that upon any of these variables the state has applied a different standard to one class of persons compared to another, and done so on a prohibited discriminatory ground. A crude instance of arts 6/14 discrimination would thus arise if a legal system adopted a different rule for the admission of confession evidence for members of one class of society (or for members of a particular racial group) compared with the rule adopted for another. In the courts of ancient Athens the evidence of a slave was inadmissible unless he had been tortured.

d [36] In each of these examples, and one could generate many others, the enjoyment of the substantive convention right is engaged on the facts of the case fair and square. My difficulty was in seeing how that could be so in these present appeals. In neither case was there any interruption of the appellant's peaceful enjoyment of her possessions. Nor is there any question of either appellant having been deprived—let alone unjustifiably deprived—of any of her possessions. e Each appellant has had in full measure what the domestic law entitles her to have. The complaint of each, in contrast, is that the domestic law should have given her more. It is plain that art 1P provides no such entitlement whatever; I have dealt with the argument for a violation of art 1P taken on its own. In those circumstances I was unable to see how on the facts there could be any complaint of art 14 taken with art 1P. Such a complaint might arise if the state offered differential justifications as between persons or classes for measures of deprivation of property. That would be analogous to the first example given above relating to art 10; but nothing of that sort remotely arises in these appeals. f g [37] It is, however, plain that the Strasbourg court has not confined the scope of art 14 within limits of the kind I have described. Here, I should introduce the facts of Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364, to which I have already referred in passing. The applicant was a Turkish national resident in Austria. While working there he had paid unemployment insurance contributions. At a stage when he was unemployed he applied for an advance on his pension in the form of emergency assistance. That was available under the material Austrian legislation, but h one of the conditions was that the applicant should 'possess Austrian nationality', and so the applicant was refused. The court held, unanimously, that art 14 taken with art 1P applied to the case and had been violated. It said (at 380–381):

j '36. According to the Court's established case law, Article 14 of the Convention complements the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It has no independent existence since it has effect solely in relation to "the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms" safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of Article 14 does not presuppose a breach of those provisions—and to this extent it is autonomous—there can be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fall within the ambit of one or more of them.

37. The applicant and the Turkish Government argued that Article 14 of the Convention was applicable in conjunction with Article 1 of Protocol No. 1. They referred to the reasoning of the Commission, which found that the award of emergency assistance was linked to the payment of contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. a

38. The Austrian Government, however, submitted that emergency assistance did not come within the scope of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1. Entitlement thereto did not result automatically from the payment of contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. It was an emergency payment granted by the State to people in need. Consequently, Article 14 of the Convention was not applicable either. b

39. The Court notes that at the material time emergency assistance was granted to persons who had exhausted their entitlement to unemployment benefit and satisfied the other statutory conditions laid down in ... the ... Act. Entitlement to this social benefit is therefore linked to the payment of contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, which is a precondition for the payment of unemployment benefit. It follows that there is no entitlement to emergency assistance where such contributions have not been made. c

40. In the instant case it has not been argued that the applicant did not satisfy that condition; the refusal to grant him emergency assistance was based exclusively on the finding that he did not have Austrian nationality and did not fall into any of the categories exempted from that condition. e

41. The Court considers that the right to emergency assistance—in so far as provided for in the applicable legislation—is a pecuniary right for the purposes of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1. That provision is therefore applicable without it being necessary to rely solely on the link between entitlement to emergency assistance and the obligation to pay “taxes or other contributions”. Accordingly, as the applicant was denied emergency assistance on a ground of distinction covered by Article 14, namely his nationality, that provision is also applicable. f

[38] The court concluded that there had been a violation of art 14 taken with art 1P. In doing so, as it seems to me, by necessary implication it held that although the conditions of entitlement to a state benefit under a domestic legal scheme (and an applicant’s failure to fulfil them)—as opposed to any conditions under which such a benefit might be withdrawn—could not in principle give rise to a claim under art 1P taken on its own, yet they could yield a good claim under art 14 taken with art 1P. On this footing the reach of art 14 is longer than it would be if it were confined to instances of the kind I gave in [34], [35], above. However, it is correctly submitted for the appellants that there is a consistent line of Strasbourg authority which favours the longer reach. Reference is made to Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252 (in particular at 283 (para 9)), Walden v Liechtenstein App no 33916/96 (16 March 2000, unreported), Matthews v UK App no 40302/98 (28 November 2000, unreported) and Shackell v UK App no 45851/99 (27 April 2000, unreported), whose texts with respect I need not cite, as well as Gaygusuz v Austria. g

[39] With great respect, I am driven to confess to a good deal of unease at this line of authority. It seems to me to represent an extension of the scope of art 14, forged no doubt in the cause of liberal values, beyond what the high contracting parties would by the language of the article appear plainly to have agreed. I have the greatest difficulty in seeing how the attribution of so broad a reach can be a conformed with art 14's actual words, '[t]he enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination ...' Despite the court's protestations to the contrary, the approach taken in the cases begins to give art 14 a life of its own—beyond the enjoyment of the substantive convention rights as such. Yet art 14 must surely stand in contrast to art 1 of the new Twelfth Protocol, which has been opened for signature but which the United Kingdom has not ratified. It clearly occupies much greater territory than art 14. It provides:

- c '1. The enjoyment of any right set forth by law shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.
2. No one shall be discriminated against by any public authority on any grounds such as those mentioned in paragraph 1.'

d Paragraph 1 of this provision remains adjectival, as is art 14, but now it is adjectival to 'any right set forth by law', including, presumably, any provision of municipal law. If that is right, it represents a very much bigger anti-discrimination provision than that apparently contained in art 14. And para 2 creates a true free-standing right, applicable in relation to any action by a public authority. Now, I do not of course suggest that the Strasbourg cases have gone so far as to hold that art 14 as it presently stands possesses the reach of either paragraph of art 1 of the Twelfth Protocol. But the contrast between the two sets of provisions is a focussed reminder of what must have been the intended limitations of art 14.

e [40] In all these circumstances I have considered whether it would be right to depart from the Strasbourg learning on this question of the scope of art 14, and to hold that on that measure's true interpretation it is not engaged at all on the facts of either of these appeals. Our duty under s 2(1) of the 1998 Act is to 'take into account' the Strasbourg case law. It is trite that we are not bound by it. However in R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23 at [26], [2001] 2 All ER 929 at [26], [2001] 2 WLR 1389 at [26] Lord Slynn of Hadley said:

g 'In the absence of some special circumstances it seems to me that the court should follow any clear and constant jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.'

h [41] As the argument developed it became clear that the integrity of this broad approach to the scope of art 14 was as I have already said (see [31], above) intertwined with another issue arising in the Reynolds appeal, namely, the first question which I identified earlier (see [30], above): is a non-contributory benefit, in this case income support, within the meaning of 'possessions' in art 1P for the purpose of the art 14 argument? It is thus convenient to pass on to that question, whose resolution will show why—in addition to general reasons of comity, certainty and finality of proceedings—I would not in the end depart from the Strasbourg learning on this issue of the scope of art 14.

REYNOLDS' CASE: IS A NON-CONTRIBUTORY BENEFIT (HERE INCOME SUPPORT) WITHIN THE MEANING OF 'POSSESSIONS' IN ART 1P FOR THE PURPOSE OF THE APPLICATION OF ART 14?

[42] Mr Howell submitted that not every social security benefit which a national legal system may for the time being provide constitutes a 'possession' for the purpose of art 1P. A benefit may do so, but only if there is shown to be a link between the payment of contributions and entitlement to the benefit; in the Reynolds appeal, the link is made out in the case of contribution-based jobseeker's allowance, but not in the case of income support. The payment of contributions to a fund (whether by or in respect of an individual) may in certain circumstances create a property right in a portion of the fund which art 1P may protect. Mr Howell cited a succession of cases to make the submission good: Müller v Austria (1975) 3 DR 25, JW v UK (1983) 34 DR 153, Corner v UK App no 11271/84 (17 May 1985, unreported), Carlin v UK App no 27537/95 (3 December 1997, unreported) and Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364, to all of which I have referred, and also Jankovic v Croatia App no 43440/98 (12 October 2000, unreported).

[43] There was, I think, no contest but that the Strasbourg jurisprudence pre-Gaygusuz v Austria supported Mr Howell's argument. But Mr Gill placed particular emphasis on Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364 at 380 (para 41), which I will cite again for convenience:

'The Court considers that the right to emergency assistance—in so far as provided for in the applicable legislation—is a pecuniary right for the purposes of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1. That provision is therefore applicable without it being necessary to rely solely on the link between entitlement to emergency assistance and the obligation to pay "taxes or other contributions".'

Mr Gill referred also to decisions arrived at after Gaygusuz v Austria (see Matthews v UK App no 40302/98 (28 November 2000, unreported), Willis v UK [2002] ECHR 36042/97 and Wessels-Bergervoet v Netherlands [2002] ECHR 34462/97), as showing some implicit support for the view that the making of contributions was not a necessary precondition for the treatment of a benefit as a possession, or at least that since Gaygusuz v Austria the Strasbourg court has not spoken with an entirely clear voice on the subject. Wilson J accepted Mr Howell's argument ([2002] All ER (D) 64 (Mar) at [17]). In Carson's case, however, Stanley Burnton J also discussed the Gaygusuz v Austria decision and concluded ([2002] 3 All ER 994 at [46]):

'The second sentence of para 41 of the court's judgment is framed in not untypical Delphic terms. It is unnecessary for me to decide what the court intended to lay down, but I read it as holding that a state benefit may be a pecuniary right protected by art 1 of the First Protocol even if it is not a contributory benefit entitlement to which is conditional on compulsory payment of a tax or other contribution. This is logical. There would be some logic in restricting art 1 to pecuniary rights derived from a defined investment funded by individual contributions. In such a case the right is a true right of property. Where, however, the payment of contributions is no more than a condition for entitlement to a benefit (as I assume was the position in Gaygusuz's case), it is difficult to see why entitlement to a benefit resulting from satisfaction of that condition should create a pecuniary right protected by art 1, when entitlement to benefit resulting from satisfaction of some other condition should not. In a case such as the present, the payment of benefit does not create a right of property in any real sense.'

[44] At first glance it seemed to me that this reasoning was plainly correct. If a person fulfils the conditions set by domestic law for entitlement to benefit, he is as surely entitled to receive the benefit—in theory, to sue for it—where the a conditions have not required him to make prior contributions as where they have. The entitlement is a 'possession' in both cases, or neither.

[45] It is clear, however (and uncontentious), that the term 'possessions' bears an autonomous meaning for the purposes of the convention; and in the field of social security the Strasbourg court has drawn a line, from the decision in Müller v Austria onwards, between contributory and non-contributory benefits. I do not accept Mr Gill's submission that the law of the convention took a different course in Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364 at 380 (paras 38–41). The court there had to deal with the Austrian government's submission that emergency assistance did not come within the scope of art 1P because (to summarise the argument in my own words) the payment of contributions was only a necessary, not a sufficient, condition of entitlement to the benefit (para 38). That was rejected (paras 39 and 41). The court pointed out (para 39) that entitlement to the benefit was linked to the payment of contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. As I read these paragraphs that fact was in truth regarded as a premise of the conclusion that the right to the benefit was a pecuniary right for the purposes of art 1P. The use of the adverb 'solely' in para 41, which is really the linchpin of Mr Gill's argument, is I think no more than a reflection of the court's rejection of the view that art 1P would not bite unless the payment of contributions was a sufficient condition of entitlement to the benefit in question.

[46] Mr Gill is not assisted by later Strasbourg decisions; quite the contrary. I will not take time with all the cases. In Szrabjer v UK, Clarke v UK App nos 27004/95 and 27011/95 (23 October 1997, unreported) the Commission stated:

'... the Commission recalls the case of Gaygusuz v Austria ... In that case the court noted that emergency assistance was linked to and dependent upon a payment of contributions and held that in these circumstances the right to emergency assistance was a "pecuniary right" under art [1P].'

In Azinas v Cyprus [2002] ECHR 56679/00 the European Court of Human Rights said (para 33):

'... in its judgment in the case of Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364 at 380 (paras 39–41), the court held that entitlement to a social benefit is linked to the payment of contributions ...'

There is other learning to like effect. There is nothing in the authorities to suggest that the Strasbourg court perceives itself as having taken a new line in Gaygusuz v Austria, or that it has done so in any other case.

[47] It seems to me, then, that the law of the convention is settled on this point as to the scope of 'possessions' for the purpose of art 1P. The policy of the cases is, I think, that while states are in general free to grant, amend or discontinue social security benefits and to change the conditions for entitlement to them as they please without any convention constraint, yet where contributions are exacted as a price of entitlement the contributor should be afforded a measure of protection: it has, so to speak, cost him something to acquire the benefit.

[48] This approach throws much needed light on the scope of art 14 read with art 1P, which as I have explained has caused me considerable difficulty. We can now see that the Strasbourg court has treated the payment of contributions as giving rise to a species of pecuniary right, such as to constitute a 'possession' for the purpose of art 1P. A reduction or qualification of the right to be paid the benefit thus engages art 1P, although it may not amount to a violation of the article simpliciter because the convention confers no right to receive any particular amount. However, the reduction or qualification is subject to the constraints of art 14: if it is done on discriminatory grounds, the discrimination must be justified. a

[49] I am not sure that this line of reasoning lays my difficulty with the scope of art 14 entirely to rest. But it provides a clear enough basis for setting the edge of convention protection at the point at which, it seems, the court has undoubtedly set it. In these circumstances I think it would be quite wrong to depart from the Strasbourg learning on the subject. It follows that Ms Reynolds' complaint of a violation of art 14 read with art 1P can only bite on the payments of jobseeker's allowance made to her, and not income support. Wilson J was of the same view ([2002] All ER (D) 64 (Mar) at [17]). b

[50] I should acknowledge, before leaving this part of the case, the submissions made by Mr Howell based on the 1961 European Social Charter (the 1961 charter) entered into by states members of the Council of Europe, and the revised charter which was opened for signature in May 1996 but has not been ratified by the United Kingdom. The argument is that these provisions made very substantial provision for social security, but conferred no right of individual application (and the 1961 charter contained no analogue of art 14); in those circumstances; if the scope of 'possessions' within art 1P were as wide as Mr Gill contends—as wide as provided in the 1961 charter—the latter document would actually constitute a retrograde step, since the convention regime confers rights of individual petition and of course includes art 14. A like argument, in the context of trade union rights under art 11 of the convention, found favour with the Strasbourg court in National Union of Belgian Police v Belgium (1979) 1 EHRR 578 at 590–591 (para 38). I need say only that this is grist to Mr Howell's mill. c

CARSON'S CASE: WAS THERE DISCRIMINATION WITHIN THE MEANING OF ART 14?

[51] The question here is whether there are any true 'comparators' to pensioners living abroad like Ms Carson who do not receive the annual uprate to their United Kingdom pension. There can be no discrimination unless its alleged victim can point to other persons who are in an analogous or relevantly similar situation, yet are treated more favourably. If there is no such analogous situation, any difference in treatment between X and Y has no legal significance for the purposes of art 14 (or, I would add, any rational law of discrimination). Mr Drabble names two sets of comparators: (1) United Kingdom pensioners who like Ms Carson live abroad, but in countries where the uprate is paid; (2) United Kingdom pensioners living in the United Kingdom, all of whom are paid the uprate. d

[52] I must explain rather more of the background than has so far appeared. First, it is right to say that the case has considerable implications for many pensioners and for the national finances. According to the Secretary of State, as at January 2002, of some 900,000 pensioners and widow beneficiaries who live abroad less than half (some 420,000) receive the annual uprate. The cost of extending uprating to all pensions from the time when each was awarded would cost an additional £3bn. There is some other material about the figures, but I need not set it out. This was stated in evidence filed on behalf of the Secretary of State: e

'Successive Governments have taken the view that the level of increases in retirement pensions relates to conditions in the UK and that it would not be right to impose an additional burden on contributors and taxpayers in the f

- a UK in order to pay pension increases to people who have chosen to become resident elsewhere in the world.'

A number of attempts in Parliament to require the government to pay the uprate to those in Ms Carson's position have foundered in both Houses of Parliament: a DSS Memorandum of 1996 on the uprating of state retirement pensions payable to people resident abroad, submitted to the Social Security Committee of the House of Commons, referred in particular to amendments tabled in both Houses in June and July 1995 during the passage of the Pensions Bill, calling for uprating to be paid. All were defeated by large majorities.

- b [53] Since the National Insurance Act 1946 came into force, the general position has always been that British pensioners who are not in Great Britain have not received uprated pensions. Only those in the European Economic Area and in states with which the United Kingdom has entered into bilateral agreements requiring such payments receive them. Between 1948 and 1992 the United Kingdom entered into bilateral agreements, or reciprocal social security agreements, with a number of foreign states. With one minor exception, the agreements entered into after 1979 fulfilled earlier commitments given by the United Kingdom government. Agreements with Australia, New Zealand and Canada came into force in 1953, 1956 and 1959 respectively; however they did not require payment of uprated pensions. The agreement with Australia was terminated by it with effect from 1 March 2001, because of the refusal of the United Kingdom government to pay uprated pensions to its pensioners living in Australia. Uprating has never been applied to those living in South Africa, Australia, Canada and New Zealand. The EC regulations on social security for migrant workers require uprating of benefits throughout the European Union. In practice, the entry of the United Kingdom into the European Community had little effect on the provision for uprating pensions in the member states, because there were pre-existing reciprocal agreements with all of them except Denmark providing for payment of uprate.

- f [54] There is no doubt but that the overall position as it stands today is a haphazard consequence of events, including not least the conclusion of the various bilateral agreements, happening over time. On 13 November 2000 the Minister of State (Mr Jeff Rooker) said this in the House of Commons (356 HC Official Report (6th Series) col 628):

- g 'I have already said I am not prepared to defend the logic of the present situation. It is illogical. There is no consistent pattern. It does not matter whether a country is in the Commonwealth or outside it. We have arrangements with some Commonwealth countries and not with others. Indeed, there are differences among Caribbean countries. This is an historical issue and the situation has existed for years. It would cost some £300 million to change the policy for all concerned.'

- h I should notice also what was said in the Third Report (January 1997) of the House of Commons Social Security Committee (Uprating of State Retirement Pensions Payable to People Resident Abroad; HC Paper 143): 'It is impossible to discern any pattern behind the selection of countries with whom bilateral agreements have been made providing for uprating.'

[55] Some explanation of these bilateral agreements is given in the DSS Memorandum to which I have already referred (p 41):

‘17. The main purpose of reciprocal agreements so far has been to provide a measure of social protection for workers, and the immediate members of their families, when moving from one country to the other during their working lives. In effect, they generally prevent such workers from having to contribute to both countries’ Social Security schemes at the same time while ensuring that they retain benefit cover from either one country or the other. On reaching pensionable age, such workers who have been insured in two or more countries’ schemes can receive a pension from each which reflects the amount of their insurance in each.’ a

18. Whether a reciprocal Social Security agreement with another country is entered into depends on various factors, among them the numbers of people moving from one country to the other, the benefits available under the other country’s scheme, how far reciprocity is possible and the extent to which the advantages to be gained by an agreement outweigh the additional expenditure likely to be incurred by the UK in negotiating and implementing it. Where an agreement is in place, the flow of funds may differ depending on the level of each country’s benefits and the number of people going in each direction. c

19. Since June 1996, the Government’s policy has been that future reciprocal agreements should normally be limited to resolving questions of liability for social security contributions.’ e

In the same document (para 38) observations were made which foreshadowed the Minister of State’s words on 13 November 2000: e

‘Surely no one would have deliberately designed a policy of paying pensions to people living abroad intending to end up in the position we are at today ... It is impossible to discern any pattern behind the selection of countries with whom bilateral agreements have been made providing for uprating.’ f

[56] Before turning to the question in hand, namely whether there are any true comparators in an analogous situation to that of Ms Carson, it is convenient to refer to the approach to be taken to complaints of discrimination contrary to art 14 as it was commended by Brooke LJ in Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271 at [20], [2002] 4 All ER 1136 at [20], [2003] 1 WLR 617 at [20]: g

(ii) If so, was there different treatment as respects that right between the complainant on the one hand and other persons put forward for comparison (“the chosen comparators”) on the other? (iii) Were the chosen comparators in an analogous situation to the complainant’s situation? (iv) If so, did the difference in treatment have an objective and reasonable justification: in other words, did it pursue a legitimate aim and did the differential treatment j

a bear a reasonable relationship of proportionality to the aim sought to be achieved?

(In fact, of course, the claim would only be 'likely to fail' in a case where question (iv) were reached if the answer to that question were Yes rather than No.) For reasons I have given question (i) falls to be answered affirmatively. There is no contest as to (ii). The structured approach commended by Brooke LJ plainly separates out (iii) and (iv) as distinct successive steps. However Mr Drabble submits that Stanley Burnton J confused these two steps, and I shall address that complaint first.

b [57] Stanley Burnton J noted ([2002] 3 All ER 994 at [60]) the two sets of comparators put forward: pensioners resident in the United Kingdom and those
c resident abroad but in countries where the uprate is paid. He continued:

'[61] So far as the first class of comparators is concerned, persons who live in other countries have different costs of living from those in Great Britain, and live in economies that are subject to different rates of inflation. If a comparison were appropriate, it would be justifiable to compare the cost of d living in sterling terms of a foreign pensioner with that in the United Kingdom. A pensioner resident abroad may be better off, in real terms, than a pensioner living in Great Britain, because of different local costs of living which are not fully reflected in exchange rates.

[62] While I have no evidence before me, it is notorious that the cost of e living in this country is relatively high, and certainly higher than that in South Africa, partly as a result of the equally notorious depreciation of the rand as against, in particular, sterling. The depreciation of the rand has doubtless led to inflation in South Africa in terms of the local currency, and the claimant's evidence refers to the facts that inflation and interest rates are higher there than here. However, the purchasing power of her fixed United f Kingdom pension is not fixed: it depends on the rate of inflation in South Africa and changes in the sterling/rand exchange rate. Importantly, the claimant does not state that the purchasing power in South Africa of her fixed sterling pension has declined because it has not been uprated; and as mentioned above the uprating so far refused to the claimant personally is a relatively small sum. Perhaps more fundamentally, she has not compared g the cost of living in South Africa with that in the United Kingdom. Lastly, she obviously cannot provide a prediction as to whether her cost of living in South Africa will increase in sterling terms.

[63] Similar comments apply to the comparison between the claimant h and those living in other countries.

[64] There are other differences between the circumstances of those resident here and those resident abroad, of which the most obvious in the present context are differences in local social security provision and in local taxation. The claimant is unfortunate in that South Africa has limited social security provision, or at least did so at the time of the Social Security
j Committee Report. The position of pensioners in Australia is different: some of them benefit from Australian social security provision, at significant cost to the Australian exchequer. Of the (about) 220,000 United Kingdom pensioners in Australia, 158,000 qualify for an Australian pension, which is payable to those who have been resident in Australia for at least ten years and have reached retirement age, and have less than a specified income. The position of pensioners in New Zealand, as described in the 1996 DSS

Memorandum, is different again: under the reciprocal agreement between the United Kingdom and New Zealand, periods of residence in the United Kingdom are treated as periods of residence in New Zealand. As a result, United Kingdom pensioners living in New Zealand qualify for New Zealand pensions (called superannuation), less the amount of their United Kingdom pensions, by reason of their residence here or there. Increases in their United Kingdom pensions would result in an equivalent reduction in their New Zealand pensions. a

[65] It seems to me that the comparison between the positions of persons living in different countries, in different social and economic circumstances, and under different tax and social security regimes, is complex, and cannot simply be restricted to a comparison of the sterling amounts of their United Kingdom pensions. c

[58] And so Stanley Burnton J concluded (at [67]) that Ms Carson's application must fail. Mr Drabble's argument is that all the factors which led the judge to hold that the proposed comparators were not in an analogous situation were functions or consequences of the difference in place of residence between them and Ms Carson; but place of residence was the 'impugned characteristic' for the purpose of the discrimination complaint, and so, on the authority of Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2001] 3 All ER 393, [2002] Ch 51, it should have been left out of account in dealing with question (iii) in Brooke LJ's structured approach. In the Aston Cantlow case Ferris J at first instance had held that landowners within a particular category (lay impropriators, occupying former glebe land) who were required to pay what was said to amount to a particular form of tax which other landowners were not required to pay were not in an analogous situation with the others, because all lay impropriators had to pay the tax; hence there was no discrimination. On appeal this court stated (at [50]): d
f

'The treatment complained of is not that of [the defendants] personally but that of lay impropriators generally, [the defendants] included. It is therefore necessary to compare the situation of lay impropriators with that of a larger class of which they form part—a class of persons "in an analogous or relevantly similar situation" (Stubbings v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 213 at 238 (para 70)). This class has therefore to be identified by reference to shared material characteristics other than the impugned one. The material characteristic in the present case is in our view the ownership of freehold land either in England at large or in the parish of Aston Cantlow.' (My emphasis.) g

[59] We were told there is an outstanding appeal to the House of Lords in the Aston Cantlow case. Whatever the outcome before their Lordships, the reason why this court put the matter as it did in the sentence italicised is with great respect not far to seek. The proposition that lay impropriators were not discriminated against merely because all lay impropriators were treated in the same way may be said to amount to a refusal to recognise that there might be other comparators, not lay impropriators, in a materially analogous situation; and without consideration being given to that possibility, the discrimination complaint is stillborn. It is as if, in the present case, it were suggested that Ms Carson's appropriate comparators were all other United Kingdom pensioners resident in countries where the uprate is not paid, and that would be absurd. j

a [60] Mr Howell says that this court's reasoning in the Aston Cantlow case cannot be applied in the present case. He submits that it cannot be assumed (as was the case in the Aston Cantlow case) that there will always be a class, of which the discrimination complainant is a member, all of whose members will be in a materially analogous situation to the complainant. Whether the chosen comparator is in an analogous or similar situation is a question of fact which the party alleging discrimination must establish on the facts, not by what Mr Howell referred to as 'definitional devices'. And for good measure Mr Howell submits further that in Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] 4 All ER 1136 itself the court did not ignore 'the impugned characteristic', or differences in circumstances said to be consequences of it. In Michalak's case it was contended (for the purposes of a discrimination argument) that Rent Act tenants were in a relevantly similar situation to local authority secure tenants. The Court of Appeal held (at [35]–[39], [55]) that the two were not in a relevantly similar situation 'because of the significant differences between the two types of tenancy'. Mr Howell further submits that the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court itself discloses at least one plain instance where the 'impugned characteristic' (in that case, marriage) itself disqualified a proposed group (unmarried partners) from qualifying as comparators for the purpose of a case being made under art 14: see Shackell v UK App no 45851/99 (27 April 2000, unreported). It seems to me that we would generate both conceptual and practical difficulties if a studied ignorance of the 'impugned characteristic' were elevated into a general principle for the purpose of identifying relevant comparators in an art 14 case, and I do not believe that the court in the Aston Cantlow case intended any such outcome.

e [61] But there is more to say as to the approach to be taken in such cases. Wilson J in Reynolds's case, without referring to Michalak's case, made these observations (at [25]):

f 'The defendant does not accept that a person aged 25 or more would have been in a situation analogous to that of Ms Reynolds during that period. In other words his case is that the difference in age is reflective of other significant differences. He also seeks objectively to justify the demarcation at age 25. I use the word "also" because theoretically the inquiry into whether the situations are analogous precedes the inquiry into justification. But I find the distinction elusive. I consider that it suffices for me to focus on the second inquiry and to ask whether the defendant establishes objective justification for the demarcation, as being in pursuit of a legitimate aim to which it is proportionate.'

h I have considerable sympathy with this approach expressed by Wilson J. A factor or circumstance which puts person X (the comparator) in a different case from person Y (the putative victim of discrimination) may be said to undermine any comparison or analogy between X and Y, and so promote a negative answer to Brooke LJ's question (iii); but the justification of discrimination—which only arises for consideration if question (iii) is answered affirmatively—will also often rest on the very demonstration of a factor or factors which put X in a different case from Y. There is, therefore, some fragility in the separation between (iii) and (iv) in Michalak's case, and it is to be noted that Brooke LJ himself observed ([2002] 4 All ER 1136 at [22]):

'It is important to stress that this is only a framework ... There is a potential overlap between the considerations that are relevant when determining, at any rate, the last two, and possibly the last three questions. There may sometimes, therefore, be a need for caution about treating the four questions as a series of hurdles, to be surmounted in turn. In Nasser v United Bank of Kuwait [2001] EWCA Civ 556 at [56], [2002] 1 All ER 401 at [56], [2002] 1 WLR 1868 Mance LJ observed, in effect, that questions (iii) and (iv) above tend to merge into [one] another.' a

However, it may be said that this leaves the true relation between questions (iii) and (iv) unresolved. A possible approach, as it seems to me, is to ask a compendious question in place of (iii): are the circumstances of X and Y so similar as to call (in the mind of a rational and fair-minded person) for a positive justification for the less favourable treatment of Y in comparison with X? This provides a relation between questions (iii) and (iv) and avoids any tight adherence to a rule requiring the 'impugned characteristic' to be ignored. b

[62] If one approaches this part of the case by asking this compendious question, it seems to me quite impossible to conclude that the factors addressed by Stanley Burnton J ([2002] 3 All ER 994 at [61]–[65]) ought somehow to be ignored. They are inevitably part of the picture against which a judgment must be made as to whether such difference in treatment as is relied on stands in need of a distinct justification. I should add (though perhaps it is self-evident) that in my view there is no place, in the course of asking and answering this compendious question, for the operation of any judicial deference to the legislative or executive branches of government. Though the question is obviously not limited to the ascertainment of facts, but involves an evaluation, the evaluation does no more than rule out or in the requirement of justification; that is to say, it is a test for the application of art 14, not a judgment whether the article is violated. No amount of judicial deference, even in the sphere of macro-economic policy, could rightly persuade the court to forsake its duty to decide whether or not the article applies. The scope for such deference, so far as any is due, is at the point of decision whether or not the article is breached. c

[63] In my judgment, the circumstances of Ms Carson and her chosen comparators are not so similar as to call (in the mind of a rational and fair-minded person) for a positive justification for the withholding of the pension uprate in the cases where it is withheld. I arrive at this conclusion in light of all the factors discussed by Stanley Burnton J (at [61]–[65]). And if the right question is not the compendious one which I have ventured to suggest, but (more conventionally) whether the comparators put forward by Mr Drabble are in an analogous position to that of Ms Carson, I consider that Stanley Burnton J gave the right answer. d

[64] It seems to me important to have in mind (and this well illustrates the link or overlap between the issue of true comparators and the issue of justification) that the Secretary of State's obligation under s 150 of the 1992 Act, as I have already explained (see [12], above), is to review inter alia the sum specified in s 44(4) for the weekly rate of the basic pension 'in order to determine whether [it has] retained [its] value in relation to the general level of prices obtaining in Great Britain', and to lay an uprating order before Parliament where it appears to him that the general level of prices is greater at the end of the review than it was at the beginning of the period. The draft order must increase the sum specified in s 44(4) by a percentage which is no less than that increase. Thus the scheme of the primary legislation is entirely geared to the impact on the pension of price inflation in the United Kingdom. There is simply no inherent probability that e a price inflation in other countries where expatriate United Kingdom pensioners might have made their home (or, for that matter, any other economic factors) will have a comparable effect on the value of the pension to such pensioners. They may do better, they may do worse. There will also, of course, be the impact of variable exchange rates. There will be, if I may be forgiven a jejune metaphor, swings and roundabouts. While I certainly do not suggest there are no principled arguments in favour of the annual uprate being paid to those in Ms Carson's position, it seems to me inescapable that its being awarded across the board to all such pensioners would have random effects. A refusal by government to put in place a measure which would produce such effects (which in the end is all that has happened here) cannot be said to stand in need of justification by reason if its being compared with the clear and certain effects of the uprate for United Kingdom-resident pensioners.

CARSON'S CASE: IS THERE AN OBJECTIVE AND REASONABLE JUSTIFICATION FOR THE DISCRIMINATION RELIED ON?

d [65] Like the judge below, I turn to this question lest I am wrong on the issue of comparators, whether as conventionally formulated or as I prefer to formulate it. Mr Drabble submitted that this part of the case fell inevitably to be determined against the Secretary of State, and no question of judicial deference could arise to qualify the matter, because in truth no justification was offered; it was accepted by government (see the minister's statement cited at [54], above) that the present situation is 'illogical'. But this argument involves a non sequitur: even though the overall effect of the successive bilateral agreements on the distribution of the uprate to foreign resident pensioners is not or may not be intrinsically supportable, it by no means follows that the government's refusal to date to ameliorate the position in favour of those in like case to Ms Carson is necessarily unjustifiable. Put another way, Mr Drabble's argument confuses the undoubted truth that the bilateral agreements have over time created a haphazard state of affairs with the proposition, far from undoubted, that against that background a failure to award uprate to those in Ms Carson's position necessarily constitutes a violation of art 14.

g 'the remedy of the expatriate United Kingdom pensioners who do not receive uprated pensions is political, not judicial. The decision to pay them uprated pensions must be made by Parliament.'

h Part of his reasoning towards this conclusion consisted (at [70]) in the proposition that, by virtue of the impact of the bilateral agreements, the case touched the government's conduct of relations with foreign states, and this was generally a non-justiciable area: '[t]he court will not embark on questions whether it is or is not in the public interest for such agreements to be entered into'. But the question for decision in this case does not in truth engage the government's conduct of foreign relations at all. As I understand it, it would be open to the government to uprate all or any pensions payable abroad irrespective of the bilateral agreements, because although in some instances the agreements require payment of uprate, in no case do they forbid it. The judicial taboo of foreign relations is a red herring. In fairness Stanley Burnton J went at any rate some distance (at [72]–[77]) to address the merits of the justification argument.

j [67] I would also reject Mr Howell's argument—and this is linked to the point on foreign relations—to the effect that because states possess (as they surely do) the right under international law to conclude bilateral treaties in relation to social security, the fact that, as a result, individuals obtain more favourable treatment in some cases than in others does not give rise to an issue under art 14. The conferment or withholding of the uprate is purely a matter for the Secretary of State's exercise of statutory powers conferred by domestic law in the ordinary way. For this reason Mr Howell is not in my judgment assisted by the Strasbourg decision in Moustaquim v Belgium (1991) 13 EHRR 801, which he cited in this context. I will not burden this already lengthy judgment by travelling into its details.

[68] I turn then myself to the merits. I should first make it clear that there is no question of any legitimate expectation, enjoyed by Ms Carson, that she would receive the uprate in South Africa. It is entirely plain that the literature distributed by the then Department of Social Security (and sent to her) was perfectly explicit as to the position of United Kingdom pensioners who chose to live in South Africa.

'There is no reason why a decision that resources can be found to uprate the pensions payable to those in Great Britain to maintain their value given inflation in the general level of prices obtaining in Great Britain should require the pensions payable to those not ordinarily resident in and absent from the United Kingdom to be increased by the same amount.'

The submission is, however, another demonstration of the overlap between the issues of comparators (or analogous situation) and justification. The true justification of the government's refusal to pay the uprate to Ms Carson and those in like case is that they have chosen to live in societies, more pointedly economies, outside the United Kingdom where the specific rationale for the uplift may by no means necessarily apply (see [64], above).

[70] There is no escape from the fact, implicitly demonstrated by materials which I have already cited, that a major factor in the decision of government, indeed as I understand it successive governments, not to extend the uprate to those in Ms Carson's position has been the daunting cost of doing so. Mr Drabble roundly submitted that cost could not constitute a legitimate justification. For reasons just given I consider that this decision or decisions are objectively justified without regard to cost. But Mr Drabble's submission is of some importance, not least for its reliance on the judgment of Schiemann J as he then was in R v Secretary of State for Education, ex p Schaffter [1987] IRLR 53. Ms Schaffter, a single parent who had not been married, complained (relying on the European Communities Equal Treatment Directive (EEC) 76/207 (OJ 1976 L39 p 40)) that a statutory scheme for the payment of hardship grants to single parents who were studying was discriminatory in its application because the grant was only payable to students who had been married but had lost their spouse, and was not available to lone parent students who had not been married. One of the justifications put forward (though not relied on by counsel at the hearing) was the cost of any extension of the scheme. Schiemann J said (at 57 (para 33)):

'Given a constant pool of available money the question is whether it should be distributed in a discriminatory or a non-discriminatory manner. I have found the existing manner to be, prima facie, discriminatory. The constant pool of money could undoubtedly be distributed differently a although this would, as a matter of arithmetic, inevitably mean that those who presently qualify would have (notionally) to suffer a reduction in order to leave some over for those who do not presently qualify.'

b [71] I would repudiate altogether the suggestion that this reasoning (whose force in its context I respectfully acknowledge) can have the least application in this present case. If by this court's decision the law required the Secretary of State to uprate the pensions of Ms Carson and others he could not, out of the same 'pool of money', fulfil his duty under s 150 of the 1992 Act to lay an order providing for a percentage uprate for United Kingdom resident pensioners which would compensate them for United Kingdom price inflation. New money would have to be found. Section 150, whose effect I have described at [12], above, is in c mandatory terms. Even if it were not, faced with a duty imposed by the courts to uprate Ms Carson's pension the Secretary of State would in my judgment at least be obliged, by the ordinary requirements of public law, to consider whether he should find new money so as to maintain the uprate for United Kingdom resident pensioners.

d [72] In my judgment the implications of an extended uprate for the public finances are in the context of this case a legitimate factor going in justification of the Secretary of State's position. The inevitable effect of Mr Drabble's argument is that the court would order the Secretary of State to deploy public funds in a way which would require the executive to decide, in turn, how public funds should or should not be deployed or distributed in other areas which are not e before the court to consider. I recognise, of course, that once an issue of justification under art 14 arises—the fourth question in Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] 4 All ER 1136—the public authority which carries the burden of demonstrating that its act is justified is faced with a weighty and substantial task, and 'it is simply not enough to claim that what has been done falls within the f permissible ambit of Parliament's discretion' (see Ghaidan v Mendoza [2002] EWCA Civ 1533 at [18], [2002] 4 All ER 1162 at [18], [2003] 2 WLR 478 at [18] per Buxton LJ). But I am quite unable to accept that the courts' duty under the Human Rights Act 1998 to protect and vindicate the convention rights, or the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights itself, mandates so stark a judicialisation of the political function as is implied by Mr Drabble's argument. g If the judges are to confine and circumscribe the elected government's economic policies to the tune suggested here, it could only be upon a legal imperative far more pressing than anything we have listened to in this case.

h [73] I have already referred (see [62], above) to the idea of judicial deference, a term which has found its way into the argot of the cases on convention rights. But its utility as a measure of the relation between the courts and the other branches of government may perhaps be doubted, not least given the observations of Lord Hoffmann in R (on the application of ProLife Alliance) v BBC [2003] UKHL 23 at [75], [2003] 2 All ER 977 at [75], [2003] 2 WLR 1403 at [75]:

j 'My Lords, although the word "deference" is now very popular in describing the relationship between the judicial and the other branches of government, I do not think that its overtones of servility, or perhaps gracious concession, are appropriate to describe what is happening. In a society based upon the rule of law and the separation of powers, it is necessary to decide which branch of government has in any particular instance the decision-making power and what the legal limits of that power are. That is a question of law and must therefore be decided by the courts.'

I hope it is consistent with this exposition to say that the powers of the courts and the powers of the other branches of government, if they do not overlap, at least may operate in the same field; they are not marked off by walls without windows; they are in constellation with each other, so that what government may settle as policy may be qualified by the constraint of law, settled by the judges. The teaching which Lord Hoffmann's observation provides, if I may say so, is that in any particular area the decision-making power of this or that branch of government may be greater or smaller, and where the power is possessed by the legislature or executive, the role of the courts to constrain its exercise may correspondingly be smaller or greater. In the field of what may be called macro-economic policy, certainly including the distribution of public funds upon retirement pensions, the decision-making power of the elected arms of government is all but at its greatest, and the constraining role of the courts, absent a florid violation by government of established legal principles, is correspondingly modest. I conceive this approach to be wholly in line with our responsibilities under the Human Rights Act 1998. In general terms I think it reflects a recurrent theme of the Strasbourg jurisprudence, the search for a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the protection of individual rights: see Sporrong v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35. More particularly, it chimes with what the court said in James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 at 142 (para 46), in which a challenge brought on behalf of the Duke of Westminster to certain aspects of the leasehold enfranchisement legislation was rejected:

'... the decision to enact laws expropriating property will commonly involve consideration of political, economic and social issues on which opinions within a democratic society may reasonably differ widely. The Court, finding it natural that the margin of appreciation available to the legislature in implementing social and economic policies should be a wide one, will respect the legislature's judgment as to what is "in the public interest" unless that judgment be manifestly without reasonable foundation.'

Lastly in this context it is helpful to recall this well-known passage in the speech of Lord Hope of Craighead in R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801 at 844, [2000] 2 AC 326 at 381:

'In some circumstances it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of the elected body or person whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the convention ... [T]he area in which these choices may arise is conveniently and appropriately described as the "discretionary area of judgment". It will be easier for such an area of judgment to be recognised where the convention itself requires a balance to be struck, much less so where the right is stated in terms which are unqualified. It will be easier for it to be recognised where the issues involve questions of social or economic policy, much less so where the rights are of high constitutional importance or are of a kind where the courts are especially well placed to assess the need for protection.'

[74] Addressing the case in the light of all these matters, I conclude that there is no consideration which remotely constitutes so powerful a legal imperative as to deny the justifications I have discussed for the government's refusal to uprate the pensions of Ms Carson and those in like case. As I read the cases, this a conclusion is entirely in line with a consistent series of decisions in Strasbourg. I have already said (see [19], above) that the Commission in JW v UK (1983) 34 DR 153 rejected the applicants' complaint of violation of art 14 read with art 1P. I will at this stage do no more than set out a passage from Cornier v UK App no 11271/84 (17 May 1985, unreported), which I have already cited (see [20], above). In that case the Commission rejected as manifestly ill-founded an argument that the failure to pay uprate amounted to a breach of art 14 read with art 1P:

b '... the Commission has held that the "freezing" of a pension at a particular level when a person leaves the United Kingdom does not amount to a deprivation of possessions infringing Article 1 of the Protocol. Moreover, the different treatment of persons entitled to pensions who remain in the country of payment compared with those who emigrate is justified on the grounds that the applicant will only lose the benefit of future increases in the pension, whose purpose broadly speaking is to compensate for rises in the cost of living in the United Kingdom and which the applicant will not have to endure. The Commission also considers that the economic state of third countries is not a matter which domestic pension authorities should be obliged to consider.'

REYNOLDS' CASE: IS THERE AN OBJECTIVE AND REASONABLE JUSTIFICATION FOR THE DISCRIMINATION RELIED ON?

[75] Although Mr Gill has referred to and relied upon a considerable body of evidence, I can without injustice to his client deal with this question rather more shortly, having already set out the substance of the relevant learning. By way of preliminary I should say that although in his skeleton argument Mr Howell for the Secretary of State did not accept that recipients of benefit under age 25 were in an analogous position to those of 25 and over for the purposes of art 14, it seems to me to be plain that the real issue here is justification. In this appeal I would answer my compendious question—are the circumstances of X (over 25) and Y (under 25) so similar as to call (in the mind of a rational and fair-minded person) for a positive justification for the less favourable treatment of Y in comparison with X?—in the affirmative, in contrast to my answer in Carson's case. The selection, for the purpose of settling differential levels of payment of state benefit, of any particular break point in terms of age is in a sense (and not a pejorative sense) bound to be arbitrary, if only because there will be claimants either side of the line whose circumstances do not perceptibly differ. However the depth of the justification required, the reach of the court's scrutiny of what is advanced by way of justification, is quite another matter.

[76] It should be recalled that the justification question only arises in relation to the payment of jobseeker's allowance to Ms Reynolds and not income support, if Simon Brown and Rix LJ concur with my conclusion (at [49], above) as to the scope of 'possessions' for the purposes of art 1P. However it is necessary to say a little about the history of income support, because the payment of a higher amount at age 25 was first introduced in relation to that benefit, and then applied to jobseeker's allowance, which came later.

[77] Income support replaced supplementary benefit, following proposals contained in a Green Paper entitled Reform of Social Security (Cmnd 9517-9519) published in June 1985. It contained these passages (Cmnd 9518 (p 23)):

'2.72 There will be a standard personal allowance for all claimants, varied only by age and marital status. That will end the present householder/

non-householder distinction and the structural distinction between ordinary and long-term rates. [These were features of the supplementary benefit scheme.] These will be replaced by age-related rates.

2.73 There is no one age dividing line relevant to all claimants. But it is clear that at the age of 18 the majority of claimants are not fully independent and that the great majority of claimants above age 25 are. This is already in practice reflected in the present scheme. In 1983 nearly 90 per cent of all claimants over 25 were getting the higher householder rate. By contrast the clear majority of claimants under 25 were living in someone else's household. This is particularly marked for single claimants, the great majority of whom aged between 18 and 24 presently get a lower rate of help. The Government have concluded that an appropriate dividing line is age 25. There will therefore be different rates for adult claimants above and below age 25, although, as explained below, account will be taken of claimants' family responsibilities.'

The break point at age 25 was almost immediately the subject of criticism, and indeed in its Fourth Report the government's own Social Security Advisory Committee stated (para 3.10): 'If an age split is thought preferable for administrative reasons, then 25 is certainly too high.' The government accepted that all couples aged 18 and over should receive the same rate, but declined to change its position as regards single claimants. A White Paper was published in December 1985 in which it was stated:

'3.13 All age-dividing lines are of course open to argument at the margin. Nonetheless, the fact is that the great majority of single claimants without children under 25 now live in other people's households and they already receive a lower rate of help. Overall, four-fifths of single claimants without children in the 18 to 24 age group get the non-householder rate. It is also reasonable to recognise that earnings levels are generally lower for this group than for those in older age groups. The abolition of the householder distinction and the introduction of the 25 age point have enabled the Government to concentrate more resources on older people—including pensioners and disabled persons living in other people's households.'

[78] Jobseeker's allowance was heralded by a White Paper published in October 1994 (Cm 2687). There was no mention of age-related bands in the White Paper but when in due course the relevant legislation was presented to Parliament, it became clear that the government intended to import into the structure of both types of jobseeker's allowance the same break point for differential payments as applied to income support.

[79] In a statement of 5 September 2001 made in these proceedings Mr Taylor, section head of the Working Age Financial Support Change Branch of the Department of Work and Pensions, has set out the Secretary of State's explanation for the change of payment rates at age 25 (para 17):

'(1) People in the 18–24 age-group in general earn less than those 25 or over, and may legitimately be regarded as having lower earnings expectations.

(2) The majority of those 18–24 do not live independently and may legitimately be regarded as having lower living costs than the group of claimants aged 25 or over.'

a (3) The payment of lower rates of JSA and IS to those between 18–24 may be expected to have the effect of discouraging them from living independently, and encouraging them to live together with others, notably parents or other family members, which may be seen to have wider social benefits.

b (4) Other aspects of the social security system serve to prevent any resultant hardship to the minority of persons in the position which was that of the Claimant who are aged between 18–24 and do not live independently.

(5) It is important from the point of view of good administration for the social security system to be based upon clear, easily applicable rules, rather than attempting to cater for the individual situation of every claimant.'

c [80] Mr Gill has sought to mount a comprehensive attack upon every one of these propositions, largely through the medium of evidence from Professor Smith, Emeritus Professor of Statistics at the University of Southampton. Professor Smith sets out the five propositions, asserts that they involve 'two key concepts: (i) earnings expectations, and (ii) living independently', and then produces a wealth of statistical detail to assault, in particular, the attachment of d any special significance to age 25 as a break point in terms of either of his 'key concepts'.

[81] In my judgment Professor Smith's arguments and materials do not demonstrate that the selection of age 25 as the break point for an increase in the level of benefit was not an available option to a reasonable Secretary of State.
e Their highly specific focus might lead the theorist to this or that conclusion, but is quite inapt to compel any particular view of what the broad policy should be. It is obvious (and of itself, uncontentious) that at least within limits different reasonable views might be taken as to the age at which (if any) the payable benefit should increase. No less obviously, what may be called the demographic facts—levels of earnings related to age, living alone or with parents or f others—differ from place to place and time to time. And it seems to me in particular that Mr Taylor's third proposition (which I assume to be of no little importance as an engine of the policy) is not really capable of being demonstrated or disproved by statistical material.

[82] Beyond these brief observations I would decline altogether to enter into
g the minutiae of the points put forward by Mr Gill to support his case that the age break point at 25 for the purposes of the levels of payment of jobseeker's allowance is unjustified. That is not out of any disrespect for the quality of his evidence. It is because the exercise would, in my judgment, be fundamentally misconceived. Wilson J observed ([2002] All ER (D) 64 (Mar) at [28]):

h '... I regard it as unnecessary, indeed inappropriate, for me to address the arguments presented by the defendant by way of justification for the demarcation with the degree of detail into which, drawing upon a statement of an eminent statistician as well as a host of other material, Mr Gill would have me descend. Indeed, as his enthusiastic argument proceeded, I j increasingly sensed the incongruity that such a debate was proceeding in court instead of in Parliament.'

I entirely agree. I have already referred (at [73], above) to James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 and to R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326. The reasoning in the passages there cited seems to me if anything to apply with greater force here than in the Carson appeal. The consequence of Mr Gill's argument would be to require the Secretary of State to re-order the social security budget in a way whose effects, both for claimants and for the public purse, would be quite beyond the purview of this court to predict or control, and in any event the court has no business controlling them. The case is even farther distant from Schiemann J's 'constant pool of available money' than is Carson's case.

[83] I have referred also (see [72], above) to the judicialisation of the political function. As I see this case, Mr Gill has for all the world invited this court to make government policy under the pretence—for that is what I think it is—of the vindication of convention rights. The decision of the question, in Lord Hoffmann's language, which branch of government has in any particular instance the decision-making power and what the legal limits of that power are, may sometimes call up a profound constitutional challenge which the courts must be alert to confront. But not in this case. Mr Gill's argument allots a false role to the judge and I for one would repudiate it altogether.

[85] I would dismiss both appeals.

[86] I agree.

SIMON BROWN LJ.

[87] I also agree.

Bagnall v Official Receiver

EVANS-LOMBE J

Bankruptcy – Discharge – Automatic discharge – Application for suspension of automatic discharge – Appeal from dismissal of bankrupt’s application to strike out application to suspend automatic discharge – Power of court to make interim ex parte order suspending automatic discharge – Insolvency Act 1986, s 279(3) – Insolvency Rules 1986, rr 6.215(4), 7.4(6).

A bankrupt would have obtained an automatic discharge from his bankruptcy, pursuant to the provisions of s 279^a of the Insolvency Act 1986, on 6 August 2002, which was three years from the date of his bankruptcy order. However, on 23 July, at the request of the trustee in bankruptcy, the Official Receiver applied for a suspension of the automatic discharge pursuant to s 279(3) on the grounds that the bankrupt had failed to fulfil his statutory obligations to give certain information to his trustee. The Official Receiver was unable to give the bankrupt 21 days’ notice of the application as required by r 6.215(4)^b of the Insolvency Rules 1986 and he applied to the district judge ex parte on 2 August for suspension of the discharge. An application under s 279(3) was governed by Ch 1 of Pt 7 of the Rules. Rule 7.4(6)^c provided that where the case was one of urgency, the court might hear the application immediately, either with or without notice, to the other parties. The district judge ordered that the application be adjourned until 11 September 2002 to allow for service on the debtor and the trustee as prescribed by the Rules and that the automatic discharge be suspended until the substantive hearing of the application. The bankrupt’s application to strike out the proceedings was dismissed. The bankrupt appealed on the ground, inter alia, that the district judge had no power to make the order of 2 August ex parte since r 6.215 had not been complied with and it contained no provision for the making of interim ex parte orders of suspension before such compliance had taken place.

Held – An application for an order was urgent within r 7.4(6) of the 1986 Rules in circumstances where, if the order were not made, the situation of the relevant parties or one of them, would irretrievably alter. The provisions of r 7.4(6) conferred power on the court to make an interim order suspending a bankrupt’s automatic discharge, ex parte and before the provisions of r 6.215 had been complied with, in a case where the court could properly regard the making of such an order as urgent and where, on the balance of convenience, it was appropriate that such an order should be made. Accordingly, the district judge had power to make the order of 2 August and there was material before him upon which he could conclude that it was appropriate to do so. The prejudice to the bankrupt in the prolongation of his status as a bankrupt was outweighed by the prejudice to the creditors in irretrievably losing the coercive effect of the continuation of the bankruptcy, without being able, through the Official Receiver's application, to justify and so obtain an order of suspension. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see [19], [20], [24], [29], below).

Appeal

Kenneth Reginald Bagnall QC, a bankrupt, appealed from the order of Deputy District Judge Robinson in the Eastbourne County Court made pursuant to his judgment on 30 January 2003 dismissing the bankrupt's application to strike out the Official Receiver's application under s 279(1)(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986 to suspend his automatic discharge from bankruptcy on the date three years from the date of the order making him bankrupt. The facts are set out in the judgment.

The bankrupt appeared in person.

Richard Ritchie (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Official Receiver.

EVANS-LOMBE J.

[1] This is an appeal from the order of District Judge Robinson in the Eastbourne County Court made pursuant to a judgment given on 30 January 2003 whereby he dismissed the appellant's application to strike out the Official Receiver's proceedings to suspend his automatic discharge from bankruptcy which otherwise would have taken effect on 6 August 2002. In effect the application sought the discharge of interim orders made by Deputy District Judge Radcliffe in his bankruptcy pursuant to s 279(3) of the Insolvency Act 1986, suspending his automatic discharge pending a full hearing of the Official Receiver's application to suspend that discharge until the bankrupt had co-operated more fully in the disclosure of his affairs.

[2] The procedural history of the case may be summarised as follows. In February 1999 a bankruptcy petition was served on the bankrupt based on a judgment for £705,000 obtained against him by a company of which he was the controlling director, the cause of action being his misfeasance in that capacity. In May 1999 the bankrupt initiated proceedings to obtain an individual voluntary arrangement with his creditors. Pursuant to those proceedings an interim order was made on 10 June 1999 but the proceedings failed in July. A bankruptcy order was made on 6 August 1999. Thereafter the trustee undertook inquiries into the a extent of the assets comprised in the bankrupt's estate including examination of the bankrupt under s 366 of the 1986 Act. That examination concluded on 12 December 2000.

b [3] The bankrupt would have obtained an automatic discharge pursuant to the provisions of s 279(1) and (2) of the 1986 Act on 6 August 2002, namely three years from the date of the bankruptcy order. On 23 July 2002 the Official Receiver applied for a suspension of the automatic discharge pursuant to sub-s (3) on grounds set out in a report of the same date filed with the court. In that report the Official Receiver stated that he was—

c 'of the opinion that the bankrupt has failed to fulfil his obligations under section 333 of the Insolvency Act 1986 and that the period until his automatic discharge should be suspended until such time that the bankrupt has complied with the requirements of the trustee in bankruptcy.'

d The report stated that the Official Receiver had been asked to make this application by the trustee for reasons set out in a letter dated 19 July 2002 from the trustee to the Official Receiver. That letter set out a number of complaints by the trustee as to information relating to his estate provided by the bankrupt and inconsistencies between the various descriptions of his estate produced by him.

[4] Before continuing with the procedural history it is convenient at this point to set out the relevant statutory provisions. They are:

e '279. Duration.—(1) Subject as follows, a bankrupt is discharged from bankruptcy ... (b) in any other case, by the expiration of the relevant period under this section.

(2) That period is as follows ... (b) in any other case the period of three years beginning with the commencement of the bankruptcy.

f (3) Where the court is satisfied on the application of the official receiver that an undischarged bankrupt in relation to whom subsection (1)(b) applies has failed or is failing to comply with any of his obligations under this Part the court may order that the relevant period under this section shall cease to run for such period, or until the fulfilment of such conditions (including a condition requiring the court to be satisfied as to any matter), as may be specified in the order.'

g [5] It is common ground that in order to be effective to suspend an automatic discharge the court's order must be made before that automatic discharge takes place, in this case 6 August 2002. Once an automatic discharge has been obtained that discharge cannot be revoked so as to reimpose the bankruptcy (see the passage quoted at [21], below from the judgment of Robert Walker J in Hardy v Focus Insurance Co Ltd [1997] BPIR 77 at 81).

h [6] Proceedings under s 279(3) of the 1986 Act are governed by r 6.215 of the Insolvency Rules 1986, SI 1986/1925, which provides as follows:

j 'Application for suspension of discharge.—(1) The following applies where the official receiver applies to the court for an order under section 279(3) (suspension of automatic discharge) ...

(2) The official receiver shall with his application file a report setting out the reasons why it appears to him such an order should be made.

(3) The court shall fix a venue for the hearing of the application and give notice of it to the official receiver, the trustee and the bankrupt.

(4) Copies of the official receiver's report under this Rule shall be sent by him to the trustee and the bankrupt, so as to reach them at least 21 days before the date fixed for the hearing.

(5) The bankrupt may, not later than 7 days before the date of the hearing, file in court a notice specifying any statements in the official receiver's report which he intends to deny or dispute. If he gives notice under this paragraph, he shall send copies of it, not less than 4 days before the date of the hearing, to the official receiver and the trustee.

(6) If on the hearing the court makes an order suspending the bankrupt's discharge, copies of the order shall be sent by the court to the official receiver, the trustee and the bankrupt.'

[7] It will be apparent from these provisions that by 23 July the Official Receiver was not able to give the bankrupt the necessary 21 days' notice under r 6.215(4) before 6 August. The Official Receiver therefore applied, ex parte, to the Eastbourne County Court and obtained an order from Deputy District Judge Radcliffe on 2 August. On that application the deputy district judge ordered that the application to suspend the discharge be adjourned until 11 September 2002 (to allow for service on the debtor and the trustee as prescribed by the 1986 rules). He further ordered that 'the debtor's automatic discharge be suspended until the substantive hearing of the application'.

[8] Subsequently the Official Receiver became aware that the debtor had written a letter with enclosures seeking to rebut the suggestion that he had failed to co-operate with his trustee. He was concerned, therefore, that the order of 2 August had been obtained without the court being aware of the bankrupt's case. Accordingly on 7 August he wrote to the Eastbourne County Court asking that Deputy District Judge Radcliffe review his order of 2 August in the light of the contents of that letter. The Official Receiver's letter concludes with the following postscript:

'I have since spoken to Edwin Coe solicitors to Mr Bagnall appraised ed (sic) them of the above course of action and they have requested (and to which I would have no objection) that the review of the order be conducted by District Judge Griggs if not possible by Deputy District Judge Radcliffe as the former dealt with the Private Examination of the debtor in December 2000.'

[9] On 8 August, Deputy District Judge Radcliffe without the attendance of any of the parties reviewed his order and made the following further order:

'IT IS ORDERED THAT:

(1) Order to stand;

(2) Substantive application to be heard at adjourned hearing on 11 September 2002.'

[10] On 27 August 2002 the bankrupt made an application under s 303 of the 1986 Act with which I am not concerned. On 28 August District Judge Robinson ordered—

'that: The Official Receiver's application to suspend discharge and Edwin Coe's application filed on 27 August 2002 be adjourned to 11 October 2002 at 11 am at Eastbourne County Court ...'

[11] On 11 October, to which date all the outstanding applications had been adjourned, they were further adjourned. On this occasion the bankrupt attended a and no objection was taken to the fact that his automatic discharge had been suspended.

[12] The bankrupt's application to strike out came on for hearing on 30 January 2003 when that application was dismissed. I have a brief note of District Judge Robinson's judgment but no copy of the order that he made. It is difficult to discern from the note the basis upon which the district judge decided the case.

b The Official Receiver's application to suspend the discharge was heard by District Judge Robinson on 7 March 2003 and he handed down a written judgment on 16 May. I have a copy of that judgment but again I have not seen a copy of any order that he made and I am told that none has been drawn up. The concluding paragraphs of the judgment indicate that the district judge had decided to make an order for suspension but had left for further argument the exact form that that order should take.

c [13] It is the bankrupt's submission that Deputy District Judge Radcliffe had no power to make the order of 2 August 2002, ex parte without giving him an opportunity to be heard. Rule 6.215 of the 1986 rules governs applications under s 279(3) of the 1986 Act. That rule had not been complied with at the time the order was made and it contains no provision for the making of interim ex parte orders of suspension before such compliance has taken place. If this submission is correct then the further order of Deputy District Judge Radcliffe on 8 August reviewing and confirming the order of 2 August was otiose as were all subsequent proceedings on the Official Receiver's application to suspend.

e [14] The bankrupt further submits in the alternative that if there was a power in the court to make the order of 2 August then that power and its exercise constituted a breach of his right to a fair trial under art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[15] I will deal with those submissions in order.

f [16] It is clear that an application under s 279(3) of the 1986 Act is governed by Ch 1 of Pt 7 of the 1986 rules. Rules 7.4(6) and 7.5 provide:

g '7.4 ... (6) Where the case is one of urgency, the court may (without prejudice to its general power to extend or abridge time limits)—(a) hear the application immediately, either with or without notice to, or the attendance of, other parties ...

7.5 Other hearings ex parte.—(1) Where the relevant provisions of the Act or Rules do not require service of the application on, or notice of it to be given to, any person, the court may hear the application ex parte.

h (2) Where the application is properly made ex parte, the court may hear it forthwith, without fixing a venue as required by Rule 7.4(2) ...'

j [17] Rule 7.5(1) appears to have a limited operative effect, if any. It would seem to follow that where relevant provisions do not require service of an application or notice of that application to be given to a party the court is able to deal with it without that party being present. Its effect however may be, when read with r 7.51, to exclude any inherent power or power under the CPR for the court to hear applications ex parte other than as provided for in the 1986 rules. In any event it seems to me that r 7.5(1) is a 'sweeping up' provision supplemental to the powers conferred on the court by r 7.4(6).

[18] There does not appear to be any authority on the operation of r 7.4(6) and in particular on what constitutes a case of 'urgency' within that rule. The obtaining of a particular order may appear urgent to the applicant but not urgent at all to persons affected by the order when made. a

[19] It seems to me that whether a particular order is to be treated as urgent within r 7.4(6) is a matter for the court in deciding whether or not to make the order. An application for an order is urgent within the rule in circumstances where, if the order is not made, the situation of the relevant parties or one of them will irretrievably alter. The court will then go on to consider whether in fact to make the order on familiar principles of balance of convenience. b

[20] The decision of Mr Michael Burton QC in Jacobs v Official Receiver [1998] 3 All ER 250, [1999] 1 WLR 619 is authority for the proposition that a court considering an application under s 279(3) of the 1986 Act may make an interim order suspending a bankrupt's automatic discharge pending a full hearing of the Official Receiver's application for such suspension. In that case, however, the order appealed from, which was upheld, was made after there had been full compliance with r 6.215 of the 1986 rules and inter partes in the sense that it was made at a preliminary hearing where the bankrupt was present and able to argue against the making of the interim order in circumstances where he had not been able to put his own evidence before the court or to challenge that of the Official Receiver. It does not appear from the report that the court considered the provisions of rr 7.4(6) or 7.5(1). c

[21] In Hardy v Focus Insurance Co Ltd [1997] BPIR 77 Robert Walker J was dealing with a case where it was being contended that a creditor was able to bring before the court an application under s 279(3). In the course of his judgment rejecting that contention he said (at 81): d

'I must now go back to consider s 279(3). It refers to the court being satisfied in relation to an undischarged bankrupt. The well-known and reliable practitioner's book Muir Hunter on Personal Insolvency notes at 3/129: "There seems to be no power to undo this mode of discharge, once the relevant period has expired." It seems to me that that is plainly right in a case where no application under s 279(3) has been made before the expiry of the 3-year period. If an application has been made by the official receiver, I would be very doubtful whether a bankrupt could, simply by managing to obtain an adjournment for any reason, good or bad, defeat the court's power to adjudicate on an application which had been properly launched. I am, therefore, rather doubtful about the official receiver's suggestion in his official report that, in practice, it is impossible to make an application under s 279(3) within the last 21 days before the expiration of the 3-year period because of the requirement of notice under r 6.215. I should, however, note that that view obtains at least slight support from a comment by Sir Mervyn Davies made in his judgment in Official Receiver v Murjani (1 March 1995, unreported), although I do not regard that expression of view as a considered part of the decision.' e

[23] In Re First Express Ltd [1992] BCLC 824, Hoffman J was considering an application by a liquidator to discharge an order that had been made against him under s 234 of the 1986 Act, ex parte, requiring him to hand over books and records of the company in his possession to administrative receivers. He is shown as saying (at 828): g a 'I am firmly of the view that it was wrong for the application to be made ex parte. It is a basic principle of justice that an order should not be made against a party without giving him an opportunity to be heard. The only exception is when two conditions are satisfied. First, that giving him such an b opportunity appears likely to cause injustice to the applicant, by reason either of the delay involved or the action which it appears likely that the respondent or others would take before the order can be made. Secondly, when the court is satisfied that any damage which the respondent may suffer through having to comply with the order is compensatable under the cross-undertaking or that the risk of uncompensatable loss is clearly outweighed by the risk of injustice to the applicant if the order is not made.

c There is, I think, a tendency among applicants to think that a calculation of the balance of advantage and disadvantage in accordance with the second condition is sufficient to justify an ex parte order. In my view, this attitude should be discouraged. One does not reach any balancing of advantage and disadvantage unless the first condition has been satisfied. The principle audi alterem partem does not yield to a mere utilitarian calculation. It can be d displaced only by invoking the overriding principle of justice which enables the court to act at once when it appears likely that otherwise injustice will be caused.'

[24] In my judgment the provisions of r 7.4(6) of the 1986 rules confer power on the court to make an interim order suspending a bankrupt's automatic e discharge, ex parte and before the provisions of r 6.215 have been complied with in a case where the court can properly regard the making of such an order as urgent and has concluded that, on the balance of convenience between the Official Receiver, as representing the interests of the creditors, and the bankrupt, it is appropriate that such an order should be made. I am satisfied that when f Deputy District Judge Radcliffe made the order of suspension of 2 August 2002 he had the power to make such an order and, subject to questions arising under art 6 of the convention, there was material before him upon which he could conclude that it was appropriate for him to do so. Suspension of discharge is one of the weapons available to those administering insolvent estates to coerce a bankrupt into duly performing his duty to co-operate with the trustee in bankruptcy in g realising his assets for the benefit of his creditors. Had the order of 2 August not been made this weapon would have been removed before proper consideration could take place at a full hearing of whether the Official Receiver was justified in seeking an order of suspension. The prejudice to the bankrupt in the prolongation of his status as a bankrupt in the interim was outweighed by the h prejudice to the creditors in irretrievably losing the coercive effect of the continuation of the bankruptcy, without being able, through the Official Receiver's application, to justify and so obtain an order of suspension.

[25] In the present case Deputy District Judge Radcliffe had before him on 2 August the Official Receiver's application with appended to it the trustee's j letter of 19 July. That presented a strong prima facie case that the bankrupt had failed to co-operate properly with his trustee. The bankrupt would have achieved an irreversible discharge from bankruptcy within four days. I have no evidence of whether or not it was a practical proposition to convene an interlocutory hearing which the bankrupt could attend before 6 August but I am willing to assume that it was in fact impossible to do so. It seems to me that it would have been reasonable for the district judge to assume that the interim suspension of the discharge would not be of particularly long duration. In fact the time between the 2 August order and the delivery of the written judgment of District Judge Robinson on 23 May 2003 was approximately nine months, of which two-and-a-half months was the period between the hearing of the Official Receiver's application and the handing down of the written judgment. To some extent at least, that delay was within the control of the bankrupt in pressing for speedy preparation and an early hearing date for the Official Receiver's application. a

[26] The bankrupt's alternative argument is that the making of the 2 August order by Deputy District Judge Radcliffe constituted a breach of his rights under art 6 of the convention guaranteeing a right to fair trial. If this submission were correct it would require the court to construe the relevant statutory provisions so as to find that the court had no power to grant an interim order of suspension of discharges in bankruptcy ex parte. Since it is clearly established by authority that interlocutory orders of the court, pending a full hearing at which the rights of the complainant are to be determined finally, do not result in a breach of art 6, even if originally made ex parte, it seems to me that this alternative submission fails. Even though the original order was made ex parte it was open to the bankrupt to apply at any time subsequently to discharge it which is what in effect he has done. b

The interim order had the effect of depriving the bankrupt of his right to be discharged on 6 August 2002. In that sense it was determinative of a right of the bankrupt. However, at that date, that right to be discharged was already under challenge by the Official Receiver and defeasible if, as turned out to be the case, the Official Receiver made good his case for suspension. In my view the fact that the ex parte hearing of 2 August resulted in an order affecting the status of the bankrupt does not make any difference to the applicability of art 6. c

[27] The bankrupt pursued a second separate appeal based on a construction of the two orders of 2 and 8 August 2002. The bankrupt contends that the effect of the order of 8 August is to make the suspension of the discharge until a substantive hearing of the Official Receiver's application a suspension only until the date fixed by the 8 August order for that hearing, namely 11 September 2002. Thus, if correct, the bankrupt achieved his discharge on that date. d

[28] I need only to say that it seems to me these contentions are misconceived. The terms of the 8 August order cannot be read as altering the final paragraphs of the order of 2 August, indeed it confirms them. e

[29] For these reasons these appeals must be dismissed. f

Appeal dismissed.

Air traffic – Aircraft – Damage caused by aircraft – Statutory provision imposing strict liability for ‘material loss or damage’ caused by aircraft to person on land ‘as if the loss or damage had been caused by the wilful act, neglect, or default’ of aircraft owner – Whether ‘material loss or damage’ limited to physical loss or damage – Whether recovery under statute subject to common law rules as to category of persons entitled to recover – Civil Aviation Act 1982, ss 76(2), 105.

An aircraft of the defendant airline crashed at a site near to where the claimants lived. They issued proceedings to recover damages for psychiatric injury allegedly caused by seeing or hearing the crash and the events following it. The claimants relied on s 76(2)^a of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 which provided, inter alia, that where ‘material loss or damage’ was caused to any person on land by an aircraft while in flight, taking off or landing, damages in respect of the ‘loss or damage’ were recoverable without proof of negligence or intention ‘as if the loss or damage had been caused by the wilful act, neglect or default of the owner of the aircraft’. Section 76(2) was a re-enactment of a provision found in earlier statutes going back to the Air Navigation Act 1920, save that the 1920 Act had referred to ‘material damage or loss’ rather than ‘material loss or damage’. The words ‘damage or loss’ had not been defined in the 1920 Act, but s 105^b of the 1982 Act defined ‘loss or damage’ as including ‘personal injury’. In its defence, the airline contended that claims for psychiatric injury were not recoverable under s 76(2) and that, if they were recoverable, they were limited to those categories of primary or secondary victims who would be entitled to recover damages in negligence for such injuries. The master ordered a trial of three preliminary issues, namely (i) whether ‘material loss or damage’ in s 76(2) was limited to physical loss or damage; (ii) whether ‘personal injury’ for the purposes of s 105 included mental injury where that injury was evidence of structural changes to the brain and/or central nervous system; and (iii) whether, if damages were otherwise recoverable under s 76(2), such recovery was subject to the common law rules as to categories of person who could recover damages.

Held – The words ‘loss or damage’ in s 76(2) of the 1982 Act, as interpreted by s 105 of the Act, were wide enough to permit recovery for psychiatric or mental loss or damage. Psychiatric injury was a recognised form of personal injury in 1982, and the word ‘material’ would have been an inapt choice of word if there had been an intention to limit recovery to physical or bodily loss or damage. Even if the words ‘material damage or loss’ in the 1920 Act had been restricted to physical or bodily damage or loss, that meaning had not remained fixed in all subsequent enactments. Rather, the 1982 Act and its predecessors were ‘always speaking’ statutes, and the 1982 Act should be construed in the light of contemporary circumstances. It followed that 'personal injury' in s 105 was not to be treated as bodily injury, and that the 'loss or damage' referred to in s 76(2) was not limited to physical loss or damage. However, the words 'as if the loss or damage had been caused by the wilful act, neglect or default of the owner of the aircraft' limited the categories of person that were entitled to recover under s 76(2) to those who would be able to recover at common law. The effect of s 76(2) was that the claimant was absolved from having to show either a deliberate act or carelessness. In that context, 'wilful act' meant a deliberate act and not 'intentional wrongdoing'. On that basis, there was no reason why the normal rules of remoteness and foreseeability should not apply. Accordingly, the questions set out in the preliminary issues would be answered as follows: issue (i) No; issue (ii) Yes; and issue (iii) Yes (see [14], [16], [18], [20], [33]–[35], [37], [39], [40], below).

Preliminary issues

- a By order of Master Whitaker made on 25 November 2002, the court was required to determine three preliminary issues, summarised at [4], below, in proceedings for recovery of damages for psychiatric injury brought by the claimants, Leonard James Glen, Nicholas Glen, Sarah Glen, Marc William Glen, Philippa Anne Glen, Carole Morris, Amanda Jane Spruce, Remy Amanda Spruce, Rhea Dawn Miller,
- b Alison Howard-McLennan, Brian Howard-McLennan, Philippa Howard-McLennan and Daniel Patching, against the defendant, Korean Airlines Co Ltd. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Philip Shepherd (instructed by Leigh Day & Co, Manchester) for the claimants.

- c Charles Pugh and Ben Cooper (instructed by Beaumont and Son) for the defendant.

28 March 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

SIMON J.BACKGROUND

[1] In this action the claimants claim damages for personal injury, loss and damage arising out of the crash of the defendant's Boeing 747-2B5F aircraft, registration HL-7451 (the aircraft) on 22 December 1999.

- e [2] The aircraft had arrived at Stansted Airport at 15.05 hrs from Tashkent. At 18.36 hrs it took off from runway 23/05 bound for Malpensa Airport, Milan, as Flight KAL 8509. According to the load sheet, the aircraft's weight for take-off was 548,352 lbs, which included 68,300 lbs of fuel. After take-off the aircraft maintained a track close to the extended runway line before turning left.
- f According to the Stansted Watchman radar it reached a maximum altitude of 2,460 ft amsl (above mean sea level) and a maximum speed calculated as 228 knots. The aircraft then descended, flying low until, at 18.38 hrs, it crashed into the Hatfield Forest at a position 1.9 nautical miles from the centre point of the runway on a bearing of 204° (the crash site).

- g [3] The claimants all lived near the crash site at Great Hallingbury in Hertfordshire. On 21 December 2001 they began the present action. The claimants rely on s 76(2) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. This section provides (in broad summary) that, where an aircraft crashes causing loss or damage to those on the ground, they may recover without the need to prove negligence. It is common ground that s 76(2) creates a statutory tort. However, in paras 5–6 of its
- h defence, the defendant contends that the right to recover under s 76(2) is limited in two ways. First, claims for psychiatric injury are not recoverable and, secondly, if they are recoverable they are limited to those categories of primary or secondary victims who would be entitled to recover damages in negligence for such injuries.

j [4] On 25 November 2002 Master Whitaker ordered the trial of three preliminary issues in relation to s 76(2) of the 1982 Act. These issues can conveniently be expressed as follows: (1) whether 'material loss or damage', referred to in s 76(2), is limited to 'physical loss or damage'; (2) whether 'personal injury', in s 105 of the 1982 Act, includes mental injury where the mental injury is evidence of structural changes to the brain and/or central nervous system;

(3) whether, if damages are otherwise recoverable under s 76(2), such recovery is subject to the common law rules as to categories of people who may recover damages? a

[5] For the purposes of the preliminary issue it is assumed that the crash occurred, that all the claimants witnessed the crash and the events following the crash either seeing them or hearing them and that, as a result of such experiences the claimants suffered sustained psychiatric injury. b

[6] Section 76 of the 1982 Act is in the following terms:

'(1) No action shall lie in respect of trespass or in respect of nuisance, by reason only of the flight of an aircraft over any property at a height above the ground which, having regard to wind, weather and all the circumstances of the case is reasonable, or the ordinary incidents of such flight, so long as the provisions of any Air Navigation Order and of any orders under section 62 above have been duly complied with and there has been no breach of section 81 below. c

(2) Subject to subsection (3) below, where material loss or damage is caused to any person or property on land or water by, or by a person in, or an article, animal or person falling from, an aircraft while in flight, taking off or landing, then unless the loss or damage was caused or contributed to by the negligence of the person by whom it was suffered, damages in respect of the loss or damage shall be recoverable without proof of negligence or intention or other cause of action, as if the loss or damage had been caused by the wilful act, neglect, or default of the owner of the aircraft.' d

[7] The general interpretation provisions of the 1982 Act are set out in s 105(1). This provides: 'In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires ... "loss or damage" includes, in relation to persons, loss of life and personal injury ...' f

[8] The broad intent of s 76 is that: (1) provided aircraft comply with certain specified criteria, they will not be susceptible to claims for trespass and nuisance when they over-fly property; and (2) a freestanding right to claim damages arises where loss and damage has been caused to persons or property by the crash of an aircraft or by objects propelled from an aircraft in flight. g

THE STATUTORY HISTORY

[9] The words of s 76(1) and (2) of the 1982 Act were originally enacted as s 9 of the Air Navigation Act 1920. The 1920 Act was described as: 'An Act to enable effect to be given to a Convention for regulating Air Navigation, and to make further provision for the control and regulation of aviation.' As this description suggests, there were two parts to the 1920 Act. Pt I created the power to apply the 1919 Paris Convention Relating to the Regulation of Air Navigation (Paris, 13 October 1919; UK TS 2 (1922); Cmd 1609), which had determined uniform rules with respect to air navigation. Pt II (in which s 9 appeared) was intended in the words of the preamble to control and regulate the navigation of aircraft within the jurisdiction. h

[10] The relevant words in the 1920 Act were 'material damage or loss' and there was no definition of the words 'damage or loss'. A definition of those words was introduced by s 34(3) of the Air Navigation Act 1936. This provided, that the j a expression 'damage or loss' in s 9 of the 1920 Act included 'in relation to persons, loss of life and personal injury'.

[11] The words 'damage' and 'loss' were transposed to 'loss or damage' in the Civil Aviation Act 1949, which repealed and replaced the 1920 Act. The words 'loss or damage' were defined in s 63(3) of the 1949 Act. 'For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that in this Act the expression "loss or damage" includes in relation to persons, loss of life and personal injury.'

b [12] The 1982 Act, to which I have already referred, was expressed to be 'An Act to consolidate certain enactments relating to civil aviation'.

[13] Two points arise from the statutory history. First, since the 1982 Act was a consolidation act, on normal principles of statutory construction, the words of the 1982 Act are to be treated as having the same meaning as they had in earlier enactments. Secondly, the words of s 76(2) do not derive from an international convention. It follows that the court is not searching for 'a common construction' or an interpretation that is required to be consistent with the interpretation in the jurisdictions of other countries. The court's task in the present case is in contrast to the task faced by the House of Lords in Morris v KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, King v Bristow Helicopters Ltd [2002] UKHL 7, [2002] 2 All ER 565, [2002] 2 AC 628 where the House was construing a provision of an international convention: art 17 of the Warsaw Convention 1929, incorporated into English law as Sch 1 to the Carriage by Air Act 1961.

e [14] If one is looking at the words 'loss or damage' in s 76(2), as interpreted by s 105 of the 1982 Act, it is my view that the words are wide enough to include psychiatric injury. First, psychiatric injury was a recognised form of personal injury in 1982. Secondly, the parties have not been able to find any statutes where 'personal injury' is defined as excluding mental impairment. Thirdly, it is difficult to see why Parliament should have intended to exclude psychiatric injury from recoverable loss in a 1982 statute.

f [15] In Morris v KLM [2002] 2 All ER 565 at [17] Lord Steyn drew a distinction between the restrictive words 'bodily injury' and the wider usage 'personal injury':

g 'In this context it is reasonable to expect that if it had been intended to cover mental injury or illness, it would have been provided for expressly. In the absence of such an express reference it is reasonable to interpret "bodily injury" and "lésion corporelle" as words of restriction, ie as referring to non-fatal injury which is physical rather than mental: contrast the wide term "personal injury" in the Guatemala Protocol which never came into force ...' (My emphasis.)

h The context that Lord Steyn was referring to was, (1) the fact that mental injury was not the subject of compensation in many of the contracting states at the time of the Warsaw Convention, and (2) the large number of circumstances implicit in air travel which might give rise to claims by passengers for mental injury: from in-flight turbulence to delayed gate departure due to mechanical problems with aircraft. So far as the second point is concerned, the circumstances giving rise to a claim under s 76(2) are, fortunately, uncommon. I was told that this is the first case in which it has been necessary to decide the present point.

j [16] Mr Pugh (counsel for the defendant) submits that the determination of this issue depends on the proper construction of the word 'material'. He submits that, in its 1920 context, the word means 'physical or bodily' damage or loss to the exclusion of mental or physical damage or loss. He accepts that, looking at the matter in 1982, the word 'material' would not be used to mean 'physical' damage; but he submits that, once the word acquired that meaning, it was preserved in succeeding statutes, subject to one qualification. The qualification is that, if the 1982 Act and its legislative predecessors were 'always speaking' statutes, then the 1982 Act should be construed in the light of contemporary circumstances. a

[18] Looking at the terms of ss 76 and 105 of the 1982 Act as a whole, it is my view that the statutory tort in s 76(2) is drawn in sufficiently wide terms to permit the recovery of psychiatric or mental loss or damage. The word 'material' would have been an inapt choice of word to use if the intention had been to limit recovery to physical or bodily loss or damage. c

[19] The proper interpretation of the 1920 Act is more problematic. There was no definition of 'damage or loss' until 1936. 'Material' in its context might mean 'legally significant' or 'relevant'; but, if this were so, it would be necessary to identify the contrast that is being drawn. If no contrast is being drawn then it seems to me that Mr Pugh is correct in his submission that the word 'material' would be superfluous. It may be that the draftsman was seeking to exclude disturbance and inconvenience damage from s 76(2). However, if that was the intention then it was clumsily executed since, as Mr Pugh submitted, s 76(1) and (2) of the 1982 Act are dealing with discrete issues. Section 76(1) is dealing with a limitation on a common law right to sue in nuisance and trespass, whereas s 76(2) is dealing with a self-standing statutory tort. d

[20] Despite this uncertainty, I am prepared to assume for the purposes of the defendant's argument that they are right in their submission that the 'material damage or loss' in the 1920 Act meant physical or bodily damage or loss. The issue then is whether that meaning remained fixed in all subsequent enactments so as to provide the key to the proper construction of the 1982 Act. e

[21] The defendant's submit that, since the statutory words in s 76(2) of the 1982 Act date back in substantially identical form to the 1920 Act, they should be taken to have retained the same meaning as they had in the 1920 Act. In advancing this submission Mr Pugh drew a distinction between statutes whose meaning is fixed and statutes that are, to use the infelicitous but well-established phrase, 'always speaking'. f

[22] It is common ground that it is a principle of statutory construction that the meaning of statutes is not immutable and fixed, and that Acts must be construed in the light of contemporary circumstances, see Morris v KLM [2002] 2 All ER 565 at [25] per Lord Steyn and Bennion on Statutory Interpretation (4th edn, 2002) p 762. This principle is subject to an exception where the court concludes that, on proper analysis, the words of the Act were intended to be of unchanging effect. g

[23] The general principle was described in the speech of Lord Steyn in R v Ireland, R v Burstow [1997] 4 All ER 225 at 233, [1998] AC 147 at 158: h

'Bearing in mind that statutes are usually intended to operate for many years it would be most inconvenient if courts could never rely in difficult cases on the current meaning of statutes. Recognising the problem Lord Thring, the great Victorian draftsman of the second half of the last century, exhorted draftsmen to draft so that "An Act of Parliament should be deemed a to be always speaking" (see Practical Legislation (1902) p 83; see also Cross Statutory Interpretation (3rd edn, 1995) p 51 and Pearce and Geddes Statutory Interpretation in Australia (4th edn, 1996) pp 90–93).'

Lord Steyn (with whom the other members of the House of Lords agreed) set out how a court approaches the question as to whether a particular statute is within b the general principle or the exception:

'In cases where the problem arises it is a matter of interpretation whether a court must search for the historical or original meaning of a statute or whether it is free to apply the current meaning of the statute to present day conditions. Statutes dealing with a particular grievance or problem may c sometimes require to be historically interpreted. But the drafting technique of Lord Thring and his successors has brought about the situation that statutes will generally be found to be of the "always speaking" variety (see Royal College of Nursing of the UK v Dept of Health and Social Security [1981] 1 All ER 545, [1981] AC 800 for an example of an "always speaking" construction in the House of Lords).'

d [24] In R v Ireland, the House of Lords treated the Offences against the Person Act 1861 as an 'always speaking' statute, and held that the words 'bodily harm' covered recognised psychiatric injury. As Lord Steyn said:

e 'The proposition that the Victorian legislator when enacting ss 18, 20 and 47 of the 1861 Act, would not have had in mind psychiatric illness is no doubt correct. Psychiatry was in its infancy in 1861. But the subjective intention of the draftsman is immaterial. The only relevant inquiry is as to the sense of the words in the context in which they are used. Moreover the 1861 Act is a statute of the "always speaking" type: the statute must be interpreted in the f light of the best current scientific appreciation of the link between the body and psychiatric injury.' (See [1997] 4 All ER 225 at 233, [1998] AC 147 at 158–159.)

Developments in scientific understanding are not the only criteria for interpreting 'always speaking' statutes. Other changes in social conditions, technology, medical knowledge and in the meaning of particular words, may all g affect the interpretation.

[25] Lord Steyn identified statutes dealing with a particular grievance or problem as requiring a fixed or 'historical interpretation'; but there are other types of statute that may call for this 'historical interpretation': for example, where the statute is in the nature of a contract or implements an international h convention, see Bennion pp 779–780.

[26] In the present case, the defendant submits: (1) that the 1982 Act and its predecessors represented 'a trade-off between landowners and air carriers';
(2) such a trade-off was in the nature of a contract; and (3) the court should adopt an historical interpretation and should not adopt a construction which opens up j an entirely new area of liability which cannot have been intended in 1920.

[27] In support of the first and second submission, the defendant relied on ministerial speeches reported in Hansard in the debate on the second reading of the bill; and submitted that these speeches were admissible as an aid to construction on the principle established by Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593. That case relaxed the rule that excluded reference to parliamentary history as an aid to statutory construction. However,

Lord Oliver of Aylmerton ([1993] 1 All ER 42 at 52, [1993] AC 593 at 620) made clear that the relaxation of the rule was to be confined:

‘It is, however, important to stress the limits within which such a relaxation is permissible ... It can apply only where the expression of the legislative intention is genuinely ambiguous or obscure or where a literal or prima facie construction leads to a manifest absurdity and where the difficulty can be resolved by a clear statement directed to the matter in issue. Ingenuity can sometimes suggest ambiguity or obscurity where none exists in fact, and, if the instant case were to be thought to justify the exercise of combing through reports of parliamentary proceedings in the hope of unearthing some perhaps incautious expression of opinion in support of an improbable secondary meaning, the relaxation of the rule might indeed lead to the fruitless expense and labour which has been prayed in aid in the past as one of the reasons justifying its maintenance.’

On this basis reference to the parliamentary history can only be made where there is genuine ambiguity, obscurity or potential absurdity; but, even in such cases, only if parliamentary proceedings clearly disclose the legislative intention behind the ambiguous or obscure words (see also Lord Browne-Wilkinson [1993] 1 All ER 42 at 64, [1993] AC 593 at 634).

[28] Mr Pugh recognised that his reason for referring to the parliamentary history was not to resolve ambiguity or obscurity; but rather to demonstrate that the 1920 Act was in the nature of a bargain or contract so that its interpretation was to be treated as fixed as at 1920. I am doubtful whether references to parliamentary proceedings is permissible for this purpose; but, in any event, references to the debates on the 1920 Act do not support his submissions.

[29] The Secretary of State for Air (Mr WS Churchill MP) and the Under-Secretary (Lord Londonderry) described the intention of the relevant part of the bill as being the reconciliation of the rights of landowners in the super-incumbent air with the practical necessities of civil aviation. The reconciliation was to be achieved by laying down the principle that no action would lie for aerial trespass or nuisance simply by reason of the aerial flight through the column of air; but that, where damage was done to any persons on the ground, the owner of the offending aircraft would be liable without forcing the injured person to prove negligence.

[30] Two points should be noticed. First, a close examination of the ministerial speeches shows that they were not giving particularly close attention to the language they used; and what they said amounted to little more than a summary of s 9 of the 1920 Act. No ambiguity or obscurity is resolved by reference to these debates. Secondly and importantly, the parliamentary history does not establish a ‘trade-off’ or contract between landowners and air carriers. The ministers told Parliament that the legislative intent was to reconcile potentially conflicting rights. This is a commonplace legislative intent. In the modern world there will frequently be a need to reconcile potentially conflicting interests; but this broad legislative intent cannot bring a statute outside the general category of ‘always speaking’ Acts.

[31] Before leaving this point it is necessary to refer to an authority and a textbook which the defendant relies on in support of this part of its argument. In Steel-Maitland v British Airways Board 1981 SLT 110, the pursuer brought a claim against various air carriers for physical damage allegedly caused to Gogar Castle from over-flying aircraft. The case came before the Lord Ordinary (Lord Jauncey)

a on an application to dismiss the pursuer's pleas. Those pleas included the plea that, in view of s 40(1) of the 1949 Act (the equivalent of s 76(1) of the 1982 Act), the pursuer could only have a claim under s 40(2) (the equivalent of s 76(2) of the 1982 Act); and that a claim under s 40(2) only applied to single instances of damage and not to cumulative damage. The Lord Ordinary rejected that contention and, in doing so, observed:

b 'In McNair's Law of the Air (3rd ed.), p 107, it is stated with reference to the two sub-sections of s 40 that "they represent a compromise or bargain which can be summed up as establishing no liability for technical legal injury (if any), but absolute liability for actual material injury". This statement in my view accurately summarises the effect of the two subsections. What the section intended to achieve was the removal of certain activities from the realm of common law nuisance or trespass if they only resulted in disturbance or inconvenience but to afford to an aggrieved person a remedy, at least as effective as his abolished common law remedy in respect of the same activities if they caused material damage to him or his property.'

d The 3rd edition of McNair on the Law of the Air was edited by Mr Michael Kerr QC and Mr Anthony Evans (as then they were).

e [32] It is to be noted that, although reference is made to 'a compromise or bargain', the contrast which is drawn is between aerial activities that caused 'technical legal injury' or 'disturbance and inconvenience' on the one hand, and 'actual material injury' on the other. Although these sources support the view that disturbance and inconvenience damages are irrecoverable, they do not directly assist the defendant in its contention that there was a bargain or contract which precluded an award of damages in respect of psychiatric injury. There is also a further and more general point that militates against treating statutes as requiring a fixed or historical interpretation. Although the court may feel f confident in construing statutory language according to current meanings of the words used, the search for historical or original meanings may prove more elusive and require rather more than a dictionary based on historical principles.

g [33] I have therefore concluded that the 'loss or damage' referred to in s 76(2) of the 1982 Act is not limited to 'physical loss or damage' and (subject to my conclusions on issue 3) includes psychiatric injury.

ISSUE 2: THE MEANING OF 'PERSONAL INJURY' IN SECTION 105 OF THE 1982 ACT

h [34] This matter is largely covered by my conclusions on issue 1, since I have (implicitly) rejected the defendant's submission that 'personal injury' in s 105 of the 1982 Act is to be treated as 'bodily injury'. But in any event, the defendant very properly accepted that, in the light of the majority opinion in Morris v KLM, a person can recover on the basis of a bodily injury if that person can establish that the mental injury is evidence of structural change to the brain or central nervous system.

j ISSUE 3: WHETHER THE LOSS AND DAMAGE RECOVERABLE UNDER SECTION 76(2) IS LIMITED TO DAMAGES RECOVERABLE AT COMMON LAW?

[35] The defendant submits: (1) that, if personal injury in s 76(2) of the 1982 Act covers psychiatric injury, the words 'as if the loss and damage had been caused by the wilful act, neglect, or default of the owner of the aircraft' (my emphasis) limits the categories of people who can recover damages in respect of such injuries; (2) that, if negligence were proved, the law would restrict the categories of persons who can recover damages in respect of psychiatric injury, see for example White v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1999] 1 All ER 1 at 41, 43, [1999] 2 AC 455 at 502, 504–505; (3) on this approach, the claimants can only recover damages for psychiatric injury if they are primary victims or secondary victims with sufficient proximity and ties of love and affection.

[36] The claimants submit that: (1) this approach places too much emphasis on the word ‘neglect’ and ignores the other words in the phrase, in particular ‘wilful act’; (2) there is no reason to restrict the right to recover damages for this statutory tort on the basis of rules relating to the recovery of damages for negligence; and (3) by referring to ‘wilful act’ the 1982 Act treats the defendant’s act as if it were the deliberate infliction of injury, see Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267.

[37] I accept the defendant’s submissions on this issue. Where there is damage to land and an action for trespass the claimant would have to show an intentional or wilful act of trespass. Where there is injury to a person, there might be an action in negligence; and the claimant would have to show carelessness. In my view, the effect of s 76(2) is that the claimant is absolved from having to show either a deliberate act or carelessness. In this context, ‘wilful act’ means a deliberate act and not ‘intentional wrongdoing’. On this basis I can see no reason why the normal rules as to foreseeability and remoteness should not apply.

[38] I am reinforced in this conclusion by three further points. First, as the defendant points out, if the claimants’ construction were correct, then there would be potentially two different approaches to the recoverability of damages (one arising from a ‘wilful act’, and the other from ‘neglect or default’) without any statutory indication as to which approach applies in any particular case. This is an inherently unlikely legislative intention. Secondly, the conclusion I have reached is more easy to reconcile with the reference to contributory negligence. Thirdly, if claimants can always proceed on the basis that there has been an intentional wrongdoing as if there had been a deliberate assault, then they could recover damages for injury to feelings, see McGregor on Damages (16th edn, 1997) para 1844. This too seems an inherently unlikely legislative intention.

[39] It follows that I find that the answer to issue 3 is that loss or damage is only recoverable under s 76(2) if such loss or damage would be recoverable at common law.

CONCLUSION

[40] I therefore answer the questions set out in the preliminary issue as follows:

Issue 1: No

Issue 2: Yes

Issue 3: Yes.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

MUMMERY, BUXTON AND LONGMORE LJ

c 5, 6, 21 DECEMBER 2001

Costs – Order for costs – Cost-sharing order – Multi-party actions – Amendment of order – Whether cost-sharing order should provide for costs of common issues to follow determination of common issues – Whether cost-sharing order should provide for liability for common costs for discontinuing or settling claimants to be determined at trial of common issues – CPR 48.6A.

In three separate multi-party actions, cost-sharing orders were made under CPR 48.6A, a provision which related to costs where group litigation orders had been made. Each order, inter alia, defined ‘individual costs’ as those incurred in respect of any individual claimant in relation to matters which were personal to that claimant, excluding any costs incurred in respect of claims selected as lead cases; defined ‘common costs’ as all costs other than individual costs; and provided: (i) that common costs incurred in any quarter by claimants and defendants were to be divided by the number of claimants pursuing their claims on the first day of the quarter; (ii) that a claimant compromising his claim in any quarter on terms which provided for a defendant to pay his costs would be entitled to recover his individual costs and his share of the common costs incurred by the claimants up to the last day of that quarter; and (iii) that a claimant discontinuing his claim in any quarter (or where his claim was dismissed by order of the court under which the claimant was ordered to pay a defendant’s costs) would be liable for his individual costs and his share of the common costs incurred by the defendant up to the last day of that quarter. The claimants appealed against each cost-sharing order and requested: (i) the insertion of a provision that the order for payment of common costs between the parties following any trial of the common issues whether by trial of the lead actions or otherwise should follow the event and not depend upon the outcome of individual cases or of issues individual to the lead actions; and (ii) the substitution of the provisions for costs in the case of compromise or discontinuance by a provision that in the event of any claimant discontinuing or settling his action any liability for common costs should be determined at the trial of the common issues in the lead actions.

g

j Held – (1) While it was likely that, if common issues were directed to be tried, the costs of those issues would be ordered to follow the determination of those issues rather than await the individual fate of each claimant’s action, it would be wrong to say at the outset that that should be the presumptive position. The court should be free to make whatever appeared to be the appropriate order in the circumstances. Accordingly, in so far as they sought a costs order by reference to the determination of common issues, the claimants' appeals would be dismissed (see [15], below). a

(2) Claimants who settled their cases did not usually need any presumptive order as to the incidence of costs since costs would be part of the discussion leading to settlement in any event. If there were an agreement that any defendant was to pay any claimant's costs, then the existing terms of the order were entirely appropriate. Accordingly, there was no reason to interfere with that part of the order (see [16], below). b

(3) In group actions certain common or generic issues would be tried on their own, before it was possible or sensible to apply the results to individual claimants. There were many different reasons why claimants might decide to leave the group once the action had started. To have a prima facie rule that any discontinuing claimant should have a crystallised inability to recover common costs and a potential liability for the common costs of defendants as at the end of the quarter in which he discontinued was too blunt an instrument and was unnecessarily favourable to defendants at a time when it would be unknown whether the claimants as a whole would be successful in the common issues which were to be tried. It was more sensible and more consonant with justice that both the recoverability of common costs and the liability (if any) of discontinuing claimants for costs of common issues should be determined at the same time as orders for common costs were made in respect of those common issues. The court then would have a full picture and could make whatever order was just in all the circumstances. Accordingly, in so far as they related to discontinuing claimants, the orders would be amended as sought by the claimants. To that extent, the appeals would be allowed (see [19], [20], [28], below). c

LONGMORE LJ.

[1] Multi-party actions are a comparatively novel feature of English litigation and the courts have attempted over recent years to fashion new types of order to enable viable actions to be brought in situations where a single individual would find it prohibitively expensive to bring proceedings on his or her own. The present appeals arise in three separate multi-party actions: the first is what is known as the MMR/MR litigation in which claims are made for injuries allegedly suffered by children as a result of the administration of vaccine against measles, mumps and rubella (or just measles and rubella); the second action is the oral contraceptive litigation (OCP) in which claimants seek damages for injuries sustained by the taking of oral contraceptives; the third action (Afrika) is brought by workers in South Africa against the English holding company of the South African subsidiary, which employed them, for injuries suffered as a result of exposure to asbestos. Typically defendants are drug manufacturers, health trusts on whose behalf drugs are prescribed, or other large corporations some of whom (or whose insurers) have deep pockets. Claimants are typically individuals who could not contemplate financing litigation themselves and obtain assistance for that purpose from the Legal Service Commission or, perhaps, under a conditional fee agreement. d

[2] These actions are difficult, as well as expensive, to run and impose great burdens on the practitioners who conduct them and judges who try them. They can, however, be a service to many who suffer severe injuries and it is the policy of the courts to facilitate such actions in appropriate cases and adapt traditional procedures accordingly. These appeals arise only in relation to the details of cost-sharing orders made in the actions but it is right that the court should be guided by the considerations set out in the Woolf Report on Access to Justice published in July 1996. In ch 17 of his report Lord Woolf said this in relation to multi-party actions (para 2): e f

‘It is now generally recognised, by judges, practitioners and consumer representatives, that there is a need for a new approach both in relation to court procedures and legal aid. The new procedures should achieve the following objectives: (a) provide access to justice where large numbers of people have been affected by another’s conduct, but individual loss is so small that it makes an individual action economically unviable; (b) provide expeditious, effective and proportionate methods of resolving cases, where individual damages are large enough to justify individual action but where the number of claimants and the nature of the issues involved mean that the cases cannot be managed satisfactorily in accordance with normal procedure; (c) achieve a balance between the normal rights of claimants and defendants, to pursue and defend cases individually, and the interests of a group of parties to litigate the action as a whole in an effective manner.’ g h j

‘57. If the treatment of costs is not examined from the outset, the result is either subsidiary litigation or protracted problems when the matter comes to taxation. My general proposals for information on costs to be made available at every stage when the managing judge is involved are all the more important in relation to multi-party actions, where many claimants will be legally aided and have no direct control over costs and where costs can escalate dramatically. At every stage in the management of the MPS [multi-party situation] the judge should consider, with the help of the parties, the potential impact on costs of the directions that are contemplated, and whether these are justified in relation to what is at issue. Parties and their legal representatives, as in other cases on the multi-track, should provide information on costs already incurred and be prepared to estimate the cost of proposed further work. It has been suggested that such examination should occur at intervals of three months. That must be for the managing judge to determine in each individual case.'

[3] As a result of the Woolf report CPR 19.3 makes provision for group litigation pursuant to a group litigation order and CPR 48.6A provides for costs where such an order has been made. We were told that each of the group actions (as we shall now call them) with which we are concerned is now being run in accordance with these rules. Pursuant to the rules cost-sharing orders have been made; since the same points arise in each appeal it is sufficient to set out the order of Master Ungley as approved by Bell J in the MMR/MR litigation.

'15. Save as otherwise ordered: (a) The liability of each party for and each party's entitlement to recover costs shall be several and not joint. (b) Individual costs are those costs and disbursements incurred for and/or in respect of any individual claimant in relation to matters which are personal to each such claimant, excluding costs and disbursements incurred for and/or in respect of any claims which may hereafter be selected as lead cases. (c) Common costs are all costs and disbursements other than individual costs. (d) The common costs incurred in any quarter by the claimants and each of the defendants are to be divided by the number of claimants pursuing their claims on the first day of the quarter. (e) If in any quarter a claimant compromises his/her claim with any one or more of the defendants on terms which provide for such defendants to pay that claimant his/her costs then that claimant shall be entitled to recover his/her individual costs and his/her several share of the common costs incurred by the claimants up to the last day of that quarter. (f) If in any quarter a claimant discontinues his/her claim against any one or more of the defendants or it is dismissed by an order of the court whereby that claimant is ordered to pay such defendants' costs, then he/she will be liable for his/her individual costs together with his/her several share of the common costs incurred by such defendants up to the last day of that quarter. (g) The first quarter under this costs-sharing order shall run from 14 April 1999. (h) Each of the claimants shall for the purposes of this order be treated as if he/she had been a claimant in the actions as from 14 April 1999.'

It will be seen that the provision for quarterly costings mirrors the recommendations of para 57 of Lord Woolf's report.

[5] The claimants appeal against this order and ask for a provision in the following form to be inserted (between (c) and (d) in the order above):

'The order for payment of common costs and disbursements between the parties following any trial of the common issues whether by trial of the lead actions or otherwise shall follow the event and not depend upon the outcome of individual cases or of issues individual to the lead actions unless otherwise ordered.’— a and for a provision in the following form to be substituted for (e) and (f):

‘In the event of any claimant discontinuing his/her action or settling his/her action any liability for common costs and disbursements of or in respect of such a claimant shall be determined at the trial of the common issues in the lead actions with permission to apply if such trial does not take place.’ b

We shall call them the ‘costs by common issues order’ and ‘the discontinuers and settlers order’ respectively. c

[6] While the issues raised in this appeal are comparatively narrow ones, they are of importance to the parties and this is the first time that the detailed provisions of cost-sharing orders, commonly made at first instance, have been considered by this court. We had the advantage of assistance from witness statements of Mr Colin Stutt of the Legal Services Commission and of three solicitors, who have conducted group actions, as well as the assistance of submissions from no less than six leading counsel experienced in this type of litigation. d

APPROACH OF THIS COURT

[7] Costs orders made at the end of a case are very much a matter for the discretion of the judge who has heard that case. It is only recently that such orders could be appealed at all without the permission of the judge himself. Such orders are now appealable provided that permission is obtained from either the judge or the Court of Appeal but this court is still notoriously reluctant to interfere with the judge’s discretion (see Johnsey Estates (1990) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] EWCA Civ 535 at [21], [22], [2001] 2 EGLR 128 at [21], [22] per Chadwick LJ). e

[8] Despite a submission from the defendants to the contrary we look at the present appeals in a different way. The orders under appeal have been inaccurately called ‘pre-emptive’ orders. They are not pre-emptive since they allow for the judge to make a special order in a particular case or a different more general order, if circumstances change. Nevertheless they are orders that are intended to cater for (at least the generality of) future events. If it can be shown that some different order from that which the judge has made would be more appropriate, it would not be right for this court to attach any particular sanctity to the judge’s order. That is all the more the case in a jurisdiction which is still a developing jurisdiction, as group litigation is. It is important that any general order as to cost-sharing should be the best available in the circumstances. That is not, of course, to say that the appellant should not bear the normal burden of persuading this court that the judge’s order is wrong or, at least, inappropriate for the future conduct of the cases. f

[9] We are, moreover, not persuaded that merely because in traditional litigation a discontinuing claimant will be required to pay a defendant’s costs that that is, of itself, sufficient to justify the judge’s order in these group actions. An action which has many claimants is inherently somewhat different from an action in which there is only one claimant, since the action will continue in the same form as currently constituted even after a claimant, for whatever reason, decides to settle or discontinue. g a [10] The courts have been developing the concept of cost-sharing orders since Joseph Owen Davies v Eli Lilly & Co (8 May 1987, unreported) (the Opren litigation). In that case Hirst J requested the appointment of an amicus to help the court; Mr George Pulman was instructed and he, together with the assistance of counsel for other parties, drafted a form of order which provided for all plaintiffs to bear costs proportionately among themselves. This resolved an important practical difficulty that, if there was to be one or more legal actions, the claimants in those lead actions would otherwise have had to bear all the costs themselves. Even if such claimants won, the burden of irrecoverable costs would be too great for any claimant, who did not have legal aid, to bear them; moreover, even any legally aided claimant would be liable to find his damages wiped out by the Law Society's charge for costs. The Court of Appeal upheld the order made by Hirst J as being within the provisions of the then rules of court (see [1987] 3 All ER 94, [1987] 1 WLR 1136). The order was further refined in Ward v Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd, Koppel v Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd, Evans v Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd [1996] 4 All ER 112, [1996] 1 WLR 894 where the concept of several liability on the part of the claimants was confirmed and applied to the liability which claimants might have for costs of defendants.

d [11] It was May J in Foster v Roussel Laboratories (29 October 1997, unreported) who developed the concept of the cost-sharing order so as to require quarterly rests for the calculation of costs for the purpose of application to settlers and discontinuers; in that case at the instance of the defendants he made an order in essentially the same form as that made by Master Ungley in the MMR/MR litigation in relation to settlers and discontinuers. In explaining it, he said:

'Cost Sharing

f In principle the plaintiffs, individually and as a group, and the defendants need to know the basis upon which costs liabilities would be spread if an order for costs were made or came into force. The underlying principle should be that costs which it is appropriate to apportion between or for the benefit of plaintiffs should be divided by the total number of relevant plaintiffs. Costs which it is appropriate to apportion could include (a) the defendants' costs, if one or more of the plaintiffs becomes liable to pay them, and (b) plaintiffs' central administration costs and other plaintiffs' costs which are incurred for the benefit of plaintiffs as a whole, rather than for individual plaintiffs. Any plaintiff who joins the group in the future will acquire the benefit of work done in the past and should become potentially liable for apportionable costs liabilities going back to the beginning. Thus the defendant should be potentially liable to each individual plaintiff for that plaintiff's proper individual costs and for a fraction of the plaintiffs' central costs whose denominator is the number of plaintiffs in the group. Each plaintiff should be potentially liable for a fraction of the defendants' costs whose denominator is the number of plaintiffs in the group. If plaintiffs leave the group by settlement or discontinuance before the conclusion of the litigation when a general costs order is made, a calculation should be made to withdraw from the plaintiffs' central costs and from the defendants' costs a fraction of each of the then totals whose denominator is the number of plaintiffs then in the group before the departing plaintiff leaves. If the departing plaintiff is to pay the defendants' costs, the amount will be the amount of the defendants' costs so withdrawn. If the defendant is to pay the departing plaintiff's costs, the amount will be the amount withdrawn from the plaintiffs' central costs plus the departing plaintiff's proper individual costs. All this would be subject to taxation. This means that costs calculations will need to be made on a quarterly basis, and both the plaintiffs centrally and the defendants need to keep records appropriately.'

[12] With this brief introduction to the background of cost-sharing orders, we can examine the submissions made by Lord Brennan QC on behalf of all the claimants in these appeals.

COSTS BY COMMON ISSUES ORDER

[13] Lord Brennan submitted that since the CPR have come into force, the courts were encouraged to make orders for costs in relation to individual issues and commonly did so. He referred us to dicta of Lord Woolf MR in Phonographic Performance v AEI Rediffusion Music Ltd [1999] 2 All ER 299, [1999] 1 WLR 1507 and said that this new approach should now be reflected in costs-sharing orders made in group actions.

[14] Mr Leggatt QC making the relevant submissions on behalf of the defendants on this aspect of the case submitted that the point of the costs-sharing order was not to say what order for costs should be made but to legislate for how costs should be apportioned once a costs order was made. Echoing Lord Brennan's own submissions on the discontinuers and settlers order, he submitted that it would be wrong now to make a presumptive order as to costs at the end of a trial of common issues (even if it was likely that the court would make an issue-based order after the trial of such common issues) since the circumstances at the end of a trial will be various and unpredictable.

[15] We agree with the submissions of Mr Leggatt. However likely it may be that, if common issues are directed to be tried, the costs of those issues will be ordered to follow the determination of those issues rather than await the individual fate of each claimant's action, it would, in our judgment, be wrong to say now that that should be the presumptive position. If, after all, the resolution of a common issue were to turn out to be entirely or largely academic the court should be free to make whatever appears to be the appropriate order in the circumstances. We therefore dismiss the claimants' appeal in so far as it seeks a costs order by reference to the determination of common issues.

DISCONTINUERS AND SETTLERS ORDER

(1) Settlers

[16] We consider that discontinuers and settlers cannot be considered together. As far as those that settle their cases are concerned, they do not usually need any presumptive order as to the incidence of costs since costs will be part of the discussion leading to settlement in any event. If there is an agreement that any defendant is to pay any claimant's costs, para (e) of Master Ungley's order is entirely appropriate and we see no reason to interfere with that part of the order.

(2) Discontinuers

[17] It is discontinuers that give rise to the more difficult problem and it was about them that most of the argument took place. In relation to them Lord Brennan submitted: (1) that group actions were almost inevitably issue-driven in the sense that the court would decide to try in the first instance common issues of fact and/or law as the only practicable way of achieving a fair outcome; (2) that orders for costs after the trial of common issues would usually (or often) follow a the event of such issues; (3) that it was more consonant with overall justice that orders for costs in relation to common issues should await the determination of such issues rather than being prescribed in advance in the case of discontinuing claimants who might have any number of reasons for discontinuing; (4) that if the traditional form of order in relation to discontinuing claimants were to be the usual order, even though it was capable of being varied to meet a particular objection, it was an unfair advantage to defendants, who might lose on such common issues, that they should collect orders exempting them from paying costs of those who had discontinued (and indeed orders entitling them to costs in their favour) on the way to that defeat; (5) that the traditional order was also unfair to claimants, if the class of claimants was enlarged by late joiners, since the discontinuer would be paying a larger proportion of costs as calculated at the end of the relevant quarter than he would if the calculation was made when the trial was completed or the case were settled.

[18] The defendants submitted: (1) that the provisions for discontinuing claimants made in Master Ungley's order was in a standard form and had been approved by judges experienced in the field of personal injuries for many years; (2) that costs orders were always a matter for the judge's discretion and should not be reversed unless the judge had misdirected himself in law or was clearly wrong; (3) the fact that these actions were group actions was no reason for departing from the normal rule that a discontinuer should pay the appropriate costs of the action to date; (4) that claimants would, in any event, want to know the extent of their liability if they proposed to discontinue and should be able to leave the action, pay the costs incurred and forget about it; (5) that, if no decision as to the discontinuers' liability for common costs was made until common issues had been determined, there was no incentive on the claimants or their funders to weed out weak cases for early disposal; (6) that there would be a considerable risk of satellite litigation at the time when costs of common issues came to be determined; if for example it was negligent to market or prescribe a drug or to expose workers to asbestos products only after a certain date, it might be necessary for further issues (eg the degree to which the drug was taken or the workers were exposed before and after the date) to be resolved only for the purpose of determining the incidence of costs.

[19] We have already stated our negative reaction to the defendants' first three arguments. We have, further, concluded in the light of the parties' submissions that an inherent injustice to claimants and an inappropriate advantage to defendants is indeed liable to occur if the current form of order in relation to discontinuing claimants remains the norm. This is because a group action of the kind with which we are concerned in the present case is essentially different from the typical action where a single claimant (or a limited number of claimants) brings an action. Usually in such typical actions all issues of liability will be tried together whereas it is likely that in group actions certain common or generic issues will be tried on their own, before it is possible or sensible to apply the results to individual claimants. Meanwhile there may be many different reasons why claimants may decide to leave the group once the action has started. Of course, one reason may be that an individual claimant realises that his case is hopeless. But to have a prima facie rule that any discontinuing claimant should have a crystallised inability to recover common costs and a potential liability for the common costs of defendants at the end of the quarter in which he discontinues is too blunt an instrument and is unnecessarily favourable to defendants, when it is as yet unknown whether the claimants as a whole are to be successful in the common issues which are to be tried.

[20] A prima facie rule tends to become the accepted rule, especially if it is necessary to incur the expense of going to the judge and asking, against opposition, for a different order. It is therefore not merely more sensible but also more consonant with justice that both the recoverability of common costs and the liability (if any) of discontinuing claimants for costs of common issues should be determined at the same time as orders for common costs are made in respect of those common issues. The court then has a full picture and can make whatever order is just in all the circumstances. We were given a number of worked examples which we need not set out, but the striking feature of the order in its current form is that defendants who lose on general issues will never pay that proportion of common costs attributable to discontinuing claimants. Whereas that may, in the event, be a correct order, it is not right now to decide that it is, or even to say that it will be the right order unless the judge decides otherwise.

[21] It is also noteworthy that, in one of the few examples of group litigation which progressed to a final decision, Re British Coal Respiratory Disease Litigation (23 January 1998, unreported), Turner J ordered the defendants to pay the costs of claimants, who had not discontinued and persevered to the end of litigation, but lost their cases on their own individual facts. No doubt any such order as that would be highly exceptional but it shows the wisdom of not having any a priori rule for discontinuing claimants in group actions which takes effect before the outcome of common issues is known.

[22] Bell J recorded that, as at the date of his judgment (3 November 2000), there were only 16 discontinuers out of a total of 269 claimants who had sued the first defendants. The number in relation to the other defendants is much the same. It looks therefore that, at any rate in the MMR/MR litigation, the problem of discontinuers is not an enormous one. But we bear in mind Mr Stutt's written statement in which he says that it may be difficult for the Legal Services Commission to fulfil its statutory duty to obtain the best value for money if a significant proportion of costs expended will be irrecoverable regardless of success on common issues. We think Bell J (whose judgment was followed in the judgments in the other cases under appeal) was right to regard the problem as a matter of principle. He summed up his views in para 41 of his judgment, dealing with both discontinuers and settlers:

'In my view, with all these factors in mind, effective case management requires that the parties have, at this early stage, a clear idea of the costs that they will be liable for, subject to any later order, and that provision is made for those persons likely to discontinue or settle early. Master Ungley's costs order achieves this. Moreover it promotes discipline in the scrutiny and early abandonment of any weak claims. The order proposed on behalf of the claimants, on the other hand, would leave the liability of any claimant who discontinued or settled his action at large in respect of his liability (if any) for common costs and disbursements in respect of his claim. It would remain at large until trial of common issues, with liberty to apply if such a trial did not take place. In the circumstances of this case it might remain at large for a considerable period. Like Master Ungley, I regard that as highly undesirable.'

a [23] The views of Bell J are entitled to great respect and, if we thought that the problems raised by discontinuers were just a matter of case management, we would not interfere. As it seems to us, however, the possible injustice to discontinuers and correspondingly premature advantage to defendants of the relevant paragraphs of Master Ungley's order go beyond mere case management considerations and should be addressed as a matter of principle. The judge says

b that it is important that the parties have 'a clear idea of the costs that they will be liable for'. In the context of discontinuers, he is referring here to claimants who discontinue, but his concern is somewhat difficult to follow in the case of a legally aided claimant who is not himself going to be responsible for the defendants' costs at all. The judge's concern is more apt for a non-legally aided claimant (none of whom apparently exist in the MMR/MR litigation), but such a claimant

c can always, if he wishes, offer to pay his appropriate proportion of common costs if he wants to leave the litigation and pay costs at once. The judge also says that it is highly undesirable that a claimant's potential liability for common costs should remain at large for a considerable period but this is just a more emphatic way of making the same point.

d [24] More generally, the respondents argued that it was detrimental to the discontinuing claimants themselves to have their potential liability left unresolved and in doubt until the end of the trial, perhaps some years distant. To that, Lord Brennan reasonably replied that it was for claimants and their advisers to decide what was best for them. Whilst the court should of course withhold a e solution sought by the claimants if it would be unfair to the defendants or contrary to the requirements of public policy, it could hardly do so simply because it thought that the claimants were not acting in their own best interests. And so far as defendants are concerned, in practical terms an order for immediate payment obtained against legally aided claimants, who form the vast majority of those with whom we are concerned, will not in fact be immediately enforced.

f [25] The judge also refers to a matter much emphasised by Mr Prynne QC and Mr Fenwick QC for the defendants that an immediate order for costs in respect of discontinuing claimants will promote 'discipline in the scrutiny and early abandonment of any weak claims'. We are not persuaded by this argument, attractive as counsel made it sound. To begin with, counsel and solicitors have

g no business advising that claimants with weak cases should join the register of the relevant group in the first place. And as Lord Brennan reminded us, serious professional obligations rest on both solicitors and counsel who act in legally aided cases to ensure that the Legal Services Commission is kept informed of the state of the case, and that unmeritorious cases do not continue to receive support. But secondly no one suggests that a notice of discontinuance will have no

h attraction for a claimant with a weak case. The proposed alteration to Master Ungley's order relates only to common costs. Claimants will still wish to discontinue in order to cease incurring individual costs which will not be recoverable from defendants and indeed to stop defendants continuing to incur costs in relation to individual issues, for which the claimant will or may be liable

j at the end of the day. Moreover, service of notice of discontinuance will operate to draw a line at the end of the quarter in relation to common costs even if no decision is then made as to the liability for such costs. There will thus still be an incentive for claimants to discontinue weak cases in any event.

[26] The 'discipline' argument is, therefore, not persuasive as a matter of fact. We should, however, also add that, even if the argument were more convincing in itself, we would have needed also to be convinced of its real necessity before acting on it. When an order is unfair to claimants, as we believe the order of Bell J to be, strong reasons of policy or case management would be required before that order is none the less maintained. a

[27] Lastly, we consider Mr Prynne's concern about satellite litigation arising on questions of costs to be exaggerated. If costs cannot be determined after trial of common issues, that will usually be because the issues themselves need refining and not because costs need to be resolved. b

[28] For these reasons we consider that para 15(f) of Master Ungley's order, in so far as it relates to discontinuers, needs amending by the deletion of the words 'together with his/her several share of the common costs' and the addition at the end of the paragraph of the words after a semi-colon:

'liability for common costs and disbursements to be determined following the trial of common issues, with permission to apply if such trial does not take place.' c

To this extent the claimants' appeal will be allowed. The orders similar to Master Ungley's that were appealed in the Afrika and OCP claims need amending in like form. We make no decision about claims which are dismissed by order of the court and there is no reason why Master Ungley's order should not remain as it is in order to deal with such cases. d

CLAIMANTS' ALTERNATIVE PROPOSAL

[29] At a very late date Lord Brennan put forward a suggestion to the effect that there should be an order that the claimants' solicitors in the lead actions (rather than all the claimants severally) should be entitled to recover the common costs of common issues incurred when such costs were ordered to be paid by the defendants. Whatever merits any such order might have, it seems to us that it offends against the indemnity principle whereby a party awarded costs of litigation cannot recover more than he is himself obliged to pay in respect of the costs of the litigation. This principle has been subject to criticism; indeed we understand that at the costs conference which took place on 30 November/1 December 2001 organised by the Civil Justice Council it was the almost unanimous view of those taking part (who included Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR and May LJ) that the indemnity principle should be abolished, provided that at the same time positive statutory provisions can be enacted identifying the basis upon which an award of costs can be made. It was also their view, with which we respectfully agree, that this can only be done by primary legislation. In these circumstances we do not think it right to give Lord Brennan's alternative proposal any further consideration. e

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

WARD, MAY AND RIX LJJ

3 OCTOBER, 3 DECEMBER 2001

c Disclosure – Production of documents – Production before commencement of proceedings – Whether persons likely to be party to subsequent proceedings – Whether disclosure to be ordered when criteria of desirability met – Supreme Court Act 1981, s 33(2) – CPR 31.16.

d B and his companies (the prospective claimants), were prospective claimants in proceedings against the prospective defendant companies for unlawful conspiracy to manipulate markets and/or anti-competitive behaviour. The potential proceedings arose out of the unauthorised trading activities of the chief copper trader and general manager of the non-ferrous metals division of one of the prospective defendant companies. B was a metal dealer and copper trader, who complained that after the manager's dismissal there had been a conspiracy

e involving, inter alia, the prospective defendants to manipulate the copper market by continuing with the strategy employed by the manager. The prospective claim was for failure to secure speculative profits. They sought pre-action disclosure under s 33(2)^a of the Supreme Court Act 1981 which applied to persons who were 'likely' to be party to subsequent proceedings and CPR 31.16. The judge addressed himself to, inter alia, the following questions: (i) whether proceedings

f between the parties were likely; (ii) whether pre-action disclosure was within any of the three reasons set out in CPR 31.16(3)(d) which were that it was desirable in order to dispose fairly of the anticipated proceedings; assist the dispute to be resolved within proceedings; or save costs; and (iii) whether the court should order disclosure in the exercise of its discretion under CPR 31.16(3). He concluded that the test of proceedings being 'likely' was that the prospective claimant had a 'reasonable basis' for making the claim against the prospective defendant, and that in the instant case that test had been met. The judge

g apparently considered that each of the reasons in CPR 31.16(3)(d) had been met, giving him jurisdiction to order disclosure. He then decided to exercise his discretion in favour of disclosure, on the basis that once the test of desirability had

h been met, it was unlikely that an order for disclosure would be refused altogether. The prospective defendants appealed. The prospective claimants' contentions were based in part on documents and information obtained under United States freedom of information legislation.

j Held – Section 33(2) of the 1981 Act meant no more than that the persons concerned were likely to be parties in proceedings if those proceedings were issued, and 'likely' meant no more than 'might well'. The jurisdictional and discretionary aspects of CPR 31.16(3) should not be confused. There was a two-stage process involved. For jurisdictional purposes the court was only

permitted to consider the granting of pre-action disclosure where there was a real prospect in principle of such an order being fair to the parties if litigation were commenced, or of assisting the parties to avoid litigation, or of saving costs in any event. If there were such a real prospect, then the court should go on to consider the question of discretion, which had to be considered on all the facts in detail. Whilst it was perhaps not vital to keep the two stages of the process separate, the danger was that a court might be misled by the ease with which the jurisdictional threshold could be passed into thinking that it had thereby decided the question of discretion, when in truth it had not. In the instant case the judge had not, in effect, stood back, having dealt with the jurisdictional thresholds, and asked himself whether the case was one in which his discretion should be exercised in favour of disclosure. The court was, therefore, entitled to exercise its discretion anew. In the circumstances of the instant case the expressed determination of the prospective claimants to litigate and the avenues open to them to obtain documentation or information from other sources militated against them. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed and the judge's order set aside (see [71], [72], [81], [82], [85]–[87], [97], [101]–[103], below).

Appeal

Sumitomo Corporation, Sumitomo Corporation (UK) plc and Sumitomo Corporation of America, the prospective defendants, appealed with permission granted by Brooke LJ on 10 September 2001 from the decision of Michael Brindle QC, sitting as a deputy high court judge, ordering pre-action disclosure against the prospective defendants on an application by Hebert Black, American Iron & Metal Company Inc and Lito Trade Inc concerning a possible claim for unlawful conspiring to manipulate markets and/or breach of arts 81, 82 EC.

Geoffrey Vos QC, Joe Smouha and Andrew Twigger (instructed by Teacher Stern Selby) for Mr Black.

a 3 December 2001. The following judgments were delivered.

RIX LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Ward LJ).

[1] This is an appeal about pre-action disclosure. It arises in the context of heavy prospective litigation in the Commercial Court concerning a possible claim for unlawful conspiracy to manipulate markets and/or breach of arts 81, 82 EC (formerly arts 85, 86 of the EC Treaty). The prospective claimants, Mr Herbert Black and his companies (Mr Black), say that they have suffered losses amounting to at least $126m.

[2] In the court below Michael Brindle QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, ordered nine categories of pre-action disclosure against prospective defendants Sumitomo Corporation and other companies in the Sumitomo group (Sumitomo). Sumitomo appeals.

[3] The power to order pre-action disclosure arises out of s 33(2) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, as amended by the Civil Procedure (Modification of Enactments) Order 1998, SI 1998/2940 pursuant to the Civil Procedure Act 1997 so as to extend the power from cases in respect of personal injury or death to all cases. The extension was recommended by Lord Woolf's Access to Justice: Final Report to the Lord Chancellor on the Civil Justice System of England and Wales (July 1996) (Access to Justice) pp 127–128 (paras 47–52) and came into force at the same time as the CPR regime in general on 26 April 1999. The procedure is now governed by CPR 31.16.

f ‘On the application, in accordance with rules of court, of a person who appears to the High Court to be likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings in that court ... the High Court shall, in such circumstances as may be specified in the rules, have power to order a person who appears to the court to be likely to be a party to the proceedings and to be likely to have or to have had in his possession, custody or power any documents which are relevant to an issue arising or likely to arise out of that claim—(a) to disclose whether those documents are in his possession, custody or power; and (b) to produce such of those documents as are in his possession, custody or power to the applicant ...’

[5] CPR 31.16 provides as follows:

h ‘(1) This rule applies where an application is made to the court under any Act for disclosure before proceedings have started.

(2) The application must be supported by evidence.

j (3) The court may make an order under this rule only where—(a) the respondent is likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings; (b) the applicant is also likely to be a party to those proceedings; (c) if proceedings had started, the respondent's duty by way of standard disclosure, set out in rule 31.6, would extend to the documents or classes of documents of which the applicant seeks disclosure; and (d) disclosure before proceedings have started is desirable in order to—(i) dispose fairly of the anticipated proceedings; (ii) assist the dispute to be resolved without proceedings; or (iii) save costs.’

THE HAMANAKA AFFAIR

[6] The background to these proceedings is the Hamanaka affair. On 13 June 1996 Sumitomo, the world's largest copper trader and a major user of copper in its own operations, announced that it had dismissed its chief copper trader, Mr Yasuo Hamanaka, the general manager of its non-ferrous metals division, on the ground of his unauthorised trading activities. Sumitomo said that over the previous ten years such activities had lost it $1.8bn. It is not clear whether that figure represented only liquidated losses to date or included an estimate of the cost of unwinding Sumitomo's current copper positions, but probably the latter.

[7] Those positions were huge. Mr Hamanaka had in effect attempted to corner the world's copper market. There is evidence that as of that time Sumitomo was 'long' (ie was the net purchaser) of about one million tonnes (40,000 lots) of copper futures and warrants and had also sold put options for a further one million tonnes. The sale of a put option gives its buyer the right but not the obligation to sell copper at the strike price. These totals, albeit they represented obligations running into the future, dwarfed the amount of physical stocks held in the warehouses of the world's leading copper markets such as the London Metal Exchange (LME). A subsequent report by the United States Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) dated 11 May 1998 put the matter like this:

'Sumitomo through its agent or agents intentionally acquired and maintained a dominant and controlling position in both the physical supply of deliverable LME warehouse stocks and in maturing LME futures positions. At various times within the period in question Sumitomo owned virtually all deliverable LME copper stocks. These positions were not intended to meet Sumitomo's legitimate commercial needs. The intent motivating the acquisition and control of both the cash market positions and the futures market positions was expressly to create artificially high absolute prices. Sumitomo deliberately exploited its market dominance in order to profit when market prices became artificially high as Sumitomo had foreseen and planned.'

[8] Although Mr Hamanaka's dismissal was announced on 13 June 1996, the regulatory authorities, the CFTC and in the United Kingdom the Securities and Investment Board (SIB), had begun to investigate the manipulation of copper prices in October 1995. Those investigations led to Sumitomo's suspension of Mr Hamanaka on 8 or 9 May 1996. In early June he confessed to his ten-year rogue trading scheme and revealed the positions which he had hidden from his management. On 13 June there was a meeting, convened at Sumitomo's request, in Washington DC with representatives of CFTC and SIB. Sumitomo's evidence is that at that meeting Sumitomo explained 'the three pillars' of its policy: full co-operation with government authorities; the maintenance of orderly markets; and reduction of Sumitomo's positions without severe market disruption. The regulators were equally concerned to maintain orderly markets. The regulators recommended Sumitomo to seek professional guidance about liquidating its positions. The press announcement of that day was agreed. It spoke of Sumitomo's intention to co-operate with the authorities and to help to ensure 'a stable and orderly copper market in consultation with the [LME]'. In a further press release made the same day Sumitomo confirmed, at CFTC's request, that it would honour all Mr Hamanaka's dealings, regardless of whether they were authorised. Sumitomo retained Goldman Sachs to assist in the liquidation

a process, and on 18–20 June transferred the majority of its open positions to a special Goldman Sachs account. At the regulators' further request, an open and direct line of communication was authorised between the regulators and LME on the one hand and Goldman Sachs on the other, so as to permit the former to monitor the liquidation process.

b [9]^f On 11 May 1998 Sumitomo and the Financial Services Authority (FSA), as SIB had by then become, entered into an agreement under which the FSA agreed not to proceed further against Sumitomo and Sumitomo agreed voluntarily to pay £5m 'towards the FSA's time, effort and expense'. The agreement annexed an agreed press statement which contained the following passage:

c 'In reaching today's agreement, the FSA recognises that Sumitomo has given prompt, valuable and extensive co-operation following Hamanaka's confession in June 1996. Sumitomo agrees to assist the FSA in the finalisation of its investigations. The FSA has also received substantial co-operation in investigating and dealing with the Hamanaka affair from relevant authorities on a world-wide basis, in particular from the [CFTC] in the USA and from the Tokyo District Public Prosecutor's Office in Japan; and in the UK from the Securities and Futures Authority ("SFA") and the [LME].'

d [10] Also on 11 May 1998 the CFTC published its findings in relation to the Hamanaka affair in the form of an order. The order recorded that Sumitomo's conduct had satisfied all the requisite elements of the offence of price manipulation, and while acknowledging Mr Hamanaka's acts of deception and the losses suffered by Sumitomo amounting by then to $2.6bn, agreed with the Japanese court which had sentenced Mr Hamanaka to eight years' imprisonment that Sumitomo's inadequate management control had been one of the causes of the debacle. Sumitomo offered to pay and was ordered to pay a civil monetary penalty of $125m plus a further $25m to be available as restitution of damages caused to private claimants prior to 30 June 1996. The order also commended Sumitomo's substantial co-operation and provision of information.

e [11] In a further order dated 20 May 1999 the CFTC made allegations concerning co-conspirators in the manipulation. They included a company based in New York called Global Minerals and Metals Corp (Global) and its principal f Mr David Campbell. The order charged that the conspirators were knowingly assisted in their scheme by Merrill Lynch. The order set out detailed allegations as to the mechanisms of the manipulation. By an order dated 30 June 1999 Merrill Lynch settled the proceedings against it, without admission or denial, on payment of $15m.

g [12] The Hamanaka affair has led to many private suits against Sumitomo, numbering something more than 20. Sumitomo has also been a claimant in still further proceedings, eg in this country in Sumitomo Corp v Credit Lyonnais Rouse Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1152, [2002] 4 All ER 68, [2002] 1 WLR 479. A passage in this court's judgment in that case describes the state of Sumitomo's documentation and thus is relevant to the present appeal:

j '[6] From late December 1995 to mid-June 1996 PW [Sumitomo's United States attorneys] assembled a large amount of documentation to assist Sumitomo and its United States subsidiary in responding to the CFTC subpoena. This process continued following Mr Hamanaka's confession. It included what was described in evidence as "a comprehensive document collection exercise" at Sumitomo's offices in Tokyo and at its subsidiaries' offices in New York, Hong Kong and London. This exercise resulted in the assembling of some 6.9m pages of documentation, mostly in Japanese. The next step was for a team of about 30 lawyers from PW, assisted by translators, to carry out a review of each document in this collection to determine whether and to what extent it was or might become relevant to the current, or any future, investigations and proceedings arising out of Mr Hamanaka's unauthorised activities. Based upon this review, PW lawyers selected certain documents for inclusion in a computerised litigation database (the PW database). About 4% of the totality of the documentation was imaged onto the PW database.

[7] As part of this review process, which continued until 1998, PW commissioned English translations of some 5,000 selected documents (about 30,000 pages, representing some 0.4% of the totality of the documentation).'

MR BLACK'S PROSPECTIVE CLAIM

[13] Mr Black is a Canadian metal dealer and copper trader and in this court is the respondent. He controls one of the largest scrap metal recycling businesses in Canada (his co-applicant, American Iron & Metal Company Inc). In 1996 he was an active trader in the LME and COMEX copper markets. In early July 1996 he appears to have given an interview which is reported in Toronto's Financial Post for 6 July and the Dallas Morning News for 7 July. He is said there to have sold copper in December 1995 and March 1996 and to have suffered losses as the price continued to rise. Then in May 1996 he sold again with greater success. It will be recalled that Mr Hamanaka was suspended about 8 May. The spot price of copper was then $2,840. Mr Black is reported to have made sales about 17 May. After the announcement of 13 June he made further sales. 'I just felt copper was heading for a fall. I've closed my positions now and I did well.' His profit was 'many millions'. (A report in The Independent for 29 June 1996 illustrates the volatility at this time, stating that the price had collapsed to a 30-month low of $1,745 on 25 June but had recovered to $1,943 by 28 June.) He is also reported as saying that his belief was that the bulk of copper's decline was over for the present and that he expected three-month copper to trade between $1,800 and $2,200 through to the end of 1996. In early October Mr Black was in London for its annual 'Metals Week', where he addressed a trade lunch, reported in The Guardian for 8 October. The price on 7 October was around $1,920. He is said to have claimed to have made $30m selling copper following the announcement of Mr Hamanaka's unauthorised trading in June and to have predicted that the price of copper would continue to fall to around $1,600 in 1997 and $1,400 in 1998. I bear in mind that such reporting is not necessarily accurate.

[14] If it is true that Mr Black was an unsuccessful short seller of copper in December 1995 and March 1996, he has so far as I am aware brought no claim against Sumitomo for such losses. His evidence is that following the emergence of the Hamanaka affair he offered to buy copper from Sumitomo in June 1996, but that it refused to deal with him. The court has no details of that allegation. At any rate it gave rise to no claim against Sumitomo at that time.

[15] Over four years later on 21 December 2000 his solicitors wrote a long letter out of the blue to Sumitomo. It has been referred to as a letter before action. It refers to the Hamanaka affair and then complains that in the period of June to September 1996 ('the relevant period'), by which I think is meant during that period following the appointment of Goldman Sachs in mid-June, six named individuals at Sumitomo and a further six named individuals at Goldman Sachs

- a conspired together to devise and implement a 'Plan' amounting to a serious manipulation of the copper market. In brief what is said is that Sumitomo and Goldman Sachs continued with the Hamanaka strategy for controlling the market; by taking delivery of Sumitomo's near-term purchases so as to keep the market short of supply, and by withholding the vast majority of its positions and being prepared to lend to the market only distantly dated goods, it was able to
- b maintain the market price at artificially high and manipulated levels, to Sumitomo's profit and the loss of others in the market such as Mr Black who had adopted a strategy based on short selling. The letter said that Goldman Sachs itself made $40m on its own account, plus its fees of $25m. It was 'a conspiracy intentionally to injure the business interests of all market participants who had short positions during the period'. The conspiracy was unlawful because it
- c employed unlawful means in breach of s 47(2) of the Financial Services Act 1986 (which makes it a criminal offence to engage in 'any course of conduct which creates a false or misleading impression as to the market ... for the purpose of creating that impression and of thereby inducing another' to act in the market in some way). In addition there were breaches of arts 81 and 82 EC (formerly arts 85 and 85 of the EC Treaty) because of abuse of the conspirators' dominant position and collusion to distort competition within the European Union. The letter then stated Mr Black's financial claim to damages in a sum of at least $126m. This was premised on the allegation that in the absence of manipulation the price of copper would have fallen to at least $1,400 by September 1996. The $126m was made up in the main of the loss of the profits of $130m which Mr Black would
- e have made if the price had fallen to $1,400. In addition there was a claim of nearly $14m in respect of the losses actually made; but Mr Black was prepared to allow a credit of over $18m in respect of losses on 'option trading' which it is said that Mr Black would have incurred if the price had fallen to $1,400.

- f [16] It follows that the claim is essentially for the failure to secure speculative profits rather than for realised losses. The reference to an unmanipulated price of $1,400 by September 1996 does not sit very easily with what is reported to have been Mr Black's public predictions as of early July and again as of early October 1996 (see [13], above).

- g [17] The letter ended with a request for discovery under CPR 31.16 for 'all documents' under various headings. One of those headings related to the so-called 'China Deal', a reference to an allegedly sham contract between Sumitomo and China for 'sale' to China of 90,000 tonnes ex LME warehouses but in reality for storage out of the way in Sumitomo's name in China. The requests in effect covered documentation relating to all Sumitomo's positions and dealings from 1 June to 30 September 1996. I shall have to refer to the China deal in further detail
- h below, because it is put forward as Mr Black's best evidence of the continuation of market manipulation into the post-Hamanaka period.

- [18] The last paragraph of the letter, headed 'Time Limit', requested a response by 31 January 2001 'failing which Mr Black will, without further notice, issue either an application for disclosure under Rule 31.16 ... or a claim form'.

- j [19] The question has arisen as to why it took Mr Black over four years to raise this complaint. It is said on his behalf that it was only in 2000 that he was able to obtain by means of the United States Freedom of Information Act (the United States Act) documents which have enabled him to formulate his case against Sumitomo. On its part, Sumitomo is concerned lest the timing of Mr Black's complaint has anything to do with the recruitment of Mr Dennis O'Keefe into Mr Black's employment as of about 12 December 2000 as general counsel of an affiliate of American Iron & Metal. Up to that date Mr O'Keefe had been employed as an attorney by CFTC, where he had been its lead investigator into the Hamanaka affair. He was the main contact of Sumitomo's United States lawyers throughout the period from June 1996 to late November 2000 pursuant to Sumitomo's commitment to co-operate with the regulatory authorities. Sumitomo and its lawyers are concerned about the possibility that Mr O'Keefe has violated United States law or his obligations of confidentiality as a lawyer. Mr O'Keefe has stated that he is well aware of his obligations and that the concern raised is absolutely baseless. On the other hand the evidence filed on behalf of Mr Black also confirms that Mr O'Keefe has been assisting in relation to potential claims and that he 'is likely to be reliable and well informed'.

THE CHINA DEAL

[20] Deputy Judge Brindle said that he had detected a coyness on the part of Sumitomo in giving any worthwhile details about the China deal; and that there were non-fanciful grounds to suspect that the transaction may not have been a genuine sale at the time it was entered into nor when subsequently adopted by Sumitomo and Goldman Sachs. He said it seemed most peculiar and called for explanation.

[22] It is not clear to me on the basis of this document why it was suggested in the evidence adduced on Mr Black's behalf that the China deal there contemplated had actually gone ahead. Presumably Mr Black had some further information. At any rate, the response of Sumitomo's evidence came from Mr Vigrass, a partner in its London solicitors. He said that the deal had its origin in March 1996 when China had expressed an interest in purchasing a large volume of refined copper in the form of LME warrants. There were market rumours that in April 1995 China had sold 85,000 tonnes of copper to LME

a warehouses out of its stockpiles and that China therefore had a real need for copper. A sale had been concluded for 90,000 tonnes and physical delivery had been taken by China for the whole of that quantity.

[23] In response to Mr Vigrass' witness statement there was complaint that Sumitomo had not disclosed any documents to support his evidence that physical delivery had been taken by China. It was suggested that disclosure of such documents was desirable to save costs 'since, if the applicants' contentions in relation to the China deal are incorrect, that issue will not be pursued any further'. Moreover, China's need for copper was questioned on the basis of a fax dated 29 May 1996 (obtained through the United States Act) written to Global by a senior manager of Sumitomo: this referred to a forthcoming meeting with the Chinese set for 31 May and to the fact that 'we do not have a firm commitment from CNIEC [the Chinese entity involved] to take copper'. I am not sure that I follow the point being made: perhaps the inference intended was that the sale was a sham, or possibly that there was no sale.

[24] Among the documents put into evidence at this stage on behalf of Mr Black was a lengthy note of 22 pages of a meeting of 30 May 1996 held at the offices of SIB. The note was prepared by representatives of SIB present at the meeting. Also present was Mr O'Keefe. Among the items discussed was 'a projected sale of approximately 90,000 metric tons to China'. It is described as 'brought to Sumitomo' by Global. The note continues:

e 'Sumitomo is hoping (to) acquire from Global, for onward sale to the Chinese. However, [Martin London, a partner of Paul Weiss Rifkind Wharton & Garrison, Sumitomo's United States attorneys] stressed that Sumitomo was not guaranteeing any part of this deal. Rather, it is purely a purchaser and seller of the copper.'

[25] The note was briefly referred to in Mr Black's evidence. An additional request was made for disclosure of any documents disclosing the China deal to the regulatory authorities.

[26] In a second witness statement Mr Vigrass returned to the subject of the China deal. He said that it was entered into before June 1996, I suppose thereby indicating that it fell outside the 'relevant period'. He also said that, whether profitable or not, it was an important transaction for Sumitomo since it was eager to establish and develop a relationship with China and to gain an insight into its overall trading strategy. He repeated that China had taken physical delivery of all 90,000 tonnes.

[28] There has been a further round of evidence concerning the China deal, starting on this occasion with Sumitomo, in the period between Deputy Judge Brindle's decision and the hearing of this appeal. Mr Kameoka, who on 9 May 1996 had replaced Mr Hamanaka as general manager of Sumitomo's non-ferrous products and metals division and who had also been the author of the fax dated 29 May 1996 referred to in [23], above, made a detailed witness statement. He said that the deal had been under negotiation from March 1996, that although Sumitomo would not make a profit from it, it was a highly coveted opportunity to make a customer of China and to benefit from a broader relationship with it in the future. It was concluded in response to CNIEC's request to purchase copper, to replenish its strategic reserves. It was a legitimate business transaction and not an attempt to manipulate prices. The contract was executed on 22 May 1996 and a copy of it was exhibited. Ninety-one thousand tonnes were actually delivered under it. The copper was shipped to Shanghai, where it was stored and called off by CNIEC in ten instalments between August and December 1996. The instalments were priced by reference to the LME price on various settlement dates (plus fixed premiums by reference to the source of the copper) varying between $1,959 and $2,235. Documents evidencing the calling off of these instalments were exhibited, and also documents evidencing the reconciliation of accounts between Sumitomo and Global.

[29] The China deal sales contract exhibited was for a quantity of 'approximately' 90,000 tonnes of LME grade and registered brand copper to be delivered in a Shanghai warehouse between 1 June and 31 December 1996 provided that CNIEC had first priced the quantity to be delivered (in quantities of any multiple of 25 tonnes) by reference to the LME cash settlement price (presumably on a specified day) plus the premium and had obtained customs clearance. The contract was subject to the prior receipt of CNIEC's letter of credit. Sumitomo was to bear the warehouse rent until the tenth day after presentation of negotiable documents and CNIEC was to bear such rent from 1 January 1997 in any event. There was an addendum also dated 22 May 1996 dealing with terms which it is not relevant to mention here.

[30] Mr Kameoka's evidence led to a further witness statement from Mr Rabinowicz, a partner in Mr Black's London solicitors. The main purpose of this evidence was to annex a further document obtained by Mr Black by means of the United States Act. This was a fax dated 16 June 1996 from CNIEC to Sumitomo headed 'Draft Text of Addendum' and annexing the draft in question. The draft, which was headed with the contract number and date (22 May 1996) of the China deal contract exhibited by Mr Kameoka, began with the following clauses:

'(1) Buyer must accept and pay for all tonnage delivered into bonded warehouse Shanghai and/or Bayuquan by no later than December 31, 1996, provided that the LME Grade A copper three month selling price averages US$2500.00 m/t or lower for any consecutive thirty (30) days period after August 1, 1996.

(2) In the event of a major, unforeseen disruption of supply that results in higher LME prices for Grade A copper, Buyer and Seller will discuss in good faith, but without any obligation, an adjustment in the price at which buyer must accept and pay for the actual quantity delivered into bonded warehouse in China by no later than December 31, 1996.'

[31] The covering fax from CNIEC proposed altered language for the draft, and indicates that critical elements of the contract were still under negotiation. That was also indicated by Mr Kameoka's fax to Global of 29 May 1996 which had pointed out that 'we do not have firm commitment from CNIEC to take copper' and from the SIB note of the meeting of 30 May 1996 which had referred to a 'projected sale' to China. Mr Rabinowicz made such points in his witness statement, and also referred the $2,500 price condition back to the manuscript note about the structure of the deal passing between Sumitomo and Global shortly before Mr Hamanaka's suspension. Mr Rabinowicz complained that Mr Kameoka had not produced 'proof' that the copper was in fact paid for by the

- a Chinese, and submitted that it raised 'yet further suspicions' and had failed to establish that the China deal had had a legitimate commercial purpose.

[32] This further evidence since the hearing below has been admitted in this court by common consent of the parties.

- b [33] I would mention in passing that documents exhibited at various stages in the evidence produced on behalf of Mr Black as having been obtained by means of the United States Act bear on them a legend beginning 'CFTC-FOIA-DOCS'. Examples are the note of the SIB meeting of 30 May 1996 and the CNIEC fax of 16 June 1996. I would infer that such documents have been in the possession of the CFTC.

- c [34] I have referred to the evidence relating to the China deal in some detail because the China deal appears to have been at the root of Deputy Judge Brindle's decision to order disclosure, because on appeal it has been at the core of Mr Vos QC's submissions on behalf of Mr Black, and because there has been further evidence on the subject since the hearing below.

MR BLACK'S EVIDENCE

- d [35] At the time of the opening of the hearing below Mr Black had not personally submitted any evidence to the court. Evidence had been produced on his behalf by his solicitor, Mr Rabinowicz. At the hearing Deputy Judge Brindle had required Mr Black to verify the letter before action and a witness statement was produced to which the deputy judge referred in his judgment. In it Mr Black verified both the letter of 21 December 1996 and Mr Rabinowicz's first two witness statements. He also stated that had the market not been manipulated following Mr Hamanaka's dismissal in June 1996 then the price of copper would have fallen significantly; and that at the time everyone had believed that the manipulations of the Hamanaka period were no longer in the system.

f THE JUDGMENT BELOW

[36] Deputy Judge Brindle addressed himself to four questions in turn. (1) Are proceedings (between the parties) likely? (2) Do the documents sought fall within the scope of standard disclosure? (3) Is pre-action disclosure 'desirable' for any of the three reasons set out in CPR 31.16(3)(d)? (4) Should the court order disclosure in the exercise of its discretion?

- g [37] CPR 31.16(3) begins: 'The court may make an order under this rule only where ...'. What follows sets out the jurisdictional thresholds to an order under the rule, and when those thresholds have been crossed, there remains an exercise of discretion: see Bermuda International Securities Ltd v KPMG (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 269, [2001] Lloyd's Rep PN 392, a decision of this court cited by Deputy Judge Brindle. Thus these four questions were intended to address the three jurisdictional thresholds mentioned (1) in CPR 31.16(3)(a) and (b), (2) in CPR 31.16(3)(c), and (3) in CPR 31.16(3)(d) respectively; and finally to address (4) the ultimate issue of discretion.

- j [38] Deputy Judge Brindle spent most of his judgment addressing the first question. He concluded, on the guidance of authorities on s 33(2) of the 1981 Act in its pre-amended form, at the time when it was dealing with pre-action disclosure only in the case of personal injury claims, that the test of proceedings being 'likely' was that the prospective claimant has a 'reasonable basis' for making a claim against the prospective defendant: but that in this context such a claim meant not a prima facie claim nor even one that could resist being struck out, but rather a claim which was not merely based on irresponsible allegation or speculation or hope, which was not a merely fishing claim. This much appears to have been common ground below. He appears to have also accepted in the light of the earlier authorities, that a claim might have a reasonable basis in the sense required if—

‘in cases where a prima facie cause of action does not yet exist ... there is a reasonable basis for believing that it might do if disclosure could first be ordered.’

[39] In this context he dealt with conflicting submissions on whether a case of fraud fell to be considered any differently from any other case. For these purposes he was treating a case of fraud as extending to any case in which allegations of dishonest or criminal conduct were being made, such as the case being advanced by Mr Black before him. He concluded that there was no essential difference: a case of fraud might fall foul of the disapproval of speculative or ill-founded allegations or of mere fishing, but if there was a reasonable basis for the allegations, then the court should be cautious about letting possible fraudsters escape down the ‘black hole’ of the absence of documentation which made it impossible for the claimant to plead his case. Indeed, it might be said that ‘the inhibitions on pleading fraud in English law and practice militate in favour of allowing pre-action disclosure ...’.

[40] He therefore turned to the facts to consider ‘whether or not there is a reasonable basis for an allegation of ... conspiratorial or anti-competitive behaviour’ and concluded that there was, but only because of the evidence relating to the China deal. Thus he said:

‘Plainly Sumitomo were dealing with very large copper positions in futures and options, almost any trading in which was bound to affect the market in some way or another ... I think that Mr Vos and his clients face real difficulties in framing an arguable claim against Sumitomo arising out of these activities ... Most of the facts and matters relied upon by Mr Vos seem to me at this stage to be at least capable of reasonable explanation by Sumitomo. When, however, the evidence relating to the “China deal” is added, it seems to me that a different picture is suggested.’

[41] As to that, he thought that Sumitomo was being coy, and that there were—

‘non-fanciful grounds to suspect that the transaction may not have been a genuine sale ... The deal seems most peculiar and calls for explanation ... I therefore conclude that it is “likely” that Mr Black and his companies on the one hand and Sumitomo on the other will both become parties to litigation, which litigation will have a reasonable basis along the lines of the authorities cited to me.’

It is to be observed that at this stage Deputy Judge Brindle had merely answered the first question as to his jurisdiction, and had decided, on a narrow basis, that litigation between the parties was ‘likely’. He had not as yet undertaken an exercise of discretion.

[42] Deputy Judge Brindle then proceeded to the second question, as to standard disclosure. That was effectively dealt with by an agreement between the parties that, if disclosure was ordered, it would simply be limited in the order itself to standard disclosure. Therefore there was no consideration of the issues which were likely to arise in any proceedings and whether standard disclosure a would extend to the documents demanded. It may be noted that Deputy Judge Brindle stated: 'The order will be limited accordingly'. Of course, he had not yet determined that an order for disclosure would be made.

[43] Deputy Judge Brindle considered the third question and concluded that it would be desirable to order disclosure not only in relation to the China deal but also generally. 'I have also been persuaded that disclosure should not be limited to the China deal.' He appears to have thought that that each of the three limbs of CPR 31.16(3)(d) had been met. There was 'a real possibility' that early disclosure would dispose fairly of the anticipated proceedings or assist the dispute to be resolved without proceedings; as for the saving of costs, he was 'not convinced', but there was a very real prospect that it would occur in one way or another—either by Mr Black withdrawing without commencing proceedings, or by the resolution of such proceedings by agreement, or by Sumitomo being inclined not to contest the claim. This hurdle was dealt with in a single paragraph, without, it was submitted on behalf of Sumitomo, much if anything in the way of reasoning, and without any reasons for extending disclosure beyond the China deal.

d [44] Deputy Judge Brindle then dealt with the fourth and final stage, the ultimate exercise of his discretion. He covered this in a few lines:

e 'Once the test of desirability is met, it is unlikely (although possible) for an order to be refused altogether. It is clear from what I have said above that an order should be made and I exercise my discretion to do so, subject to issues of oppression.'

[45] Under the heading of oppression, Deputy Judge Brindle found that a real case had been made on behalf of Sumitomo, based on the enormous number of documents, not chronologically ordered, which would have to be looked through if an order were granted in the terms sought. He thought, however, that f he could overcome this danger by limiting the disclosure that he was prepared to order even beyond concessions that had been made by Mr Vos in the course of the hearing.

THE ORDER MADE

g [46] Ultimately Deputy Judge Brindle made an order in the following terms:

h '1. Statements showing copper warrants held by or on behalf of the respondents (or any of them) throughout or at any time during the period 1 June–1 October 1996.

h 2. Daily trading statements showing copper futures positions, copper options, or any other copper positions, held, granted, purchased and/or sold by or on behalf of the respondents (or any of them) throughout or at any time during the period from 1 June–1 October 1996 on or through the LME and/or COMEX.

j 3. Documents containing or evidencing any agreement between the respondents or any of them and Goldman Sachs (or any part of Goldman Sachs) relating to the advice given or action taken by Goldman Sachs (or any part of Goldman Sachs) in relation to Sumitomo's copper positions on the LME and/or COMEX during the period 1 June–1 October 1996.

4. Documents evidencing the China deal (referred to in Mr Vigrass' first statement) and made between Global, CNIEC and/or the respondents (or any of them).

5. Documents disclosing the China deal (referred to in para 4, above) to the regulatory authorities. a
6. Documents evidencing the physical delivery of copper to CNIEC as referred to in Mr Vigrass' first statement.
7. Judgments or pleadings in civil or regulatory actions brought since June 1996 by or against the respondents (or any of them) relating to or involving allegations in respect of the China deal (referred to in para 4, above) and/or to manipulation of the copper market between 1 June 1996 and 1 October 1996. b
8. Written communications from the respondents (or any of them or any person on their behalf) to CFTC, SIB, SFA or LME and/or notes of meetings between the respondents (or any of them or any person on their behalf) and CFTC, SIB, SFA or LME between 1 June 1996 and 1 October 1996 relating to the disclosure of Sumitomo's intentions and activities in relation to the unwinding of its copper positions. c
9. Any transcripts and/or minutes of the meeting of 28 June 1996 referred to in Mr London's statement. d

THE SUBMISSIONS e

[47] Detailed written and oral submissions were made on all aspects of the evidence, on the pre-CPR authorities which had influenced Deputy Judge Brindle, on the background to CPR 31.16, on the role of disclosure in the CPR era, and as to the breadth or narrowness of the disclosure ordered. In particular, Mr Vos continued to emphasise the loose ends in the evidence concerning the China deal. As to the circumstances of the case, the position remained what it had been before Deputy Judge Brindle, with Mr Hollander QC (who appeared for Sumitomo) describing this as an archetypal fishing exercise, and Mr Vos calling it a paradigm case for disclosure. Ultimately, the essential difference between the parties on this appeal was that Mr Hollander submitted that Deputy Judge Brindle had never really stood back to take account of the circumstances of the case for the purpose of an exercise of discretion, whereas Mr Vos submitted that Deputy Judge Brindle had taken everything into account and that his decision on what in the end was a matter for his discretion was unassailable. f

[48] Mr Hollander also drew attention to a feature of the appeal which he submitted was in stark contrast to the position below. As appears from Deputy Judge Brindle's judgment, Mr Black's case had been regarded primarily as one about a dishonest conspiracy to manipulate markets, a case akin to fraud (with anti-competitive behaviour under arts 81, 82 EC as an alternative). I will also use 'fraud' as the handle for such a primary case. Moreover, Mr Black was determined to sue, unless perhaps pre-action disclosure satisfied him that he had no case. Deputy Judge Brindle said that he had 'a clear settled intention to sue', a description of which Mr Vos made some complaint, but in my judgment it reflects the evidence and I have no reason to think that it did not accurately reflect the way in which the matter was put before the deputy judge. On appeal, however, Mr Vos went a long way to suggest a very different scenario. He put anti-competitive behaviour under arts 81, 82 EC (formerly arts 85, 86 of the EC Treaty) rather than fraud at the forefront of his argument. He also suggested that, whatever his client's wishes, Mr Black might find it hard to obtain counsel's signature to a pleading of fraud on the current material available to Mr Black and in the absence of something more revealing emerging out of pre-action disclosure. g a [49] In Access to Justice, Lord Woolf made his proposals on the subject of disclosure of documents. He recommended that the process of disclosure within litigation should be curtailed, save in the exceptional case, to what he called 'standard disclosure', a term which has been adopted in the CPR. That recommendation was made because (p 124 (para 37)) 'the process had become disproportionate, especially in larger cases where large numbers of documents b may have to be searched for and disclosed, though only a small number turn out to be significant'. On the other hand, in the context of pre-action disclosure, he recommended that the court's power to make such orders should no longer be confined to potential claims in respect of personal injury or death but should extend to all cases. He wrote (pp 127–128):

c '49. There may be some apprehension about the unforeseen consequences of such an extension. In relation to claims for injury or death, it was fairly clear against which categories of potential defendants such applications were likely to be made. When the jurisdiction to make pre-action orders was first d introduced, applications for medical records tended to be hard-fought and often acrimonious. I understand that it is now rarely necessary even to make such applications, since documents are usually provided directly in response to a reasonable request. I have no doubt that the recent protocol prepared by the Civil Litigation Committee of the Law Society for use in this context will have helped further to simplify the process. This involves the use of e standard forms of request and response, and has been approved by the NHS Management Executive.

f 50. Opening up the range of cases in which pre-action applications may be made obviously widens the range of potential defendants who might be subject to such applications. But it must be remembered, first, that any such application would have to be in respect of specific documents, which will have to be shown to be in the possession of the respondent; secondly, that there is a likelihood that the respondent would indeed be a defendant if g proceedings were initiated; and, thirdly, that the documents sought are relevant to a potential claim ... [T]he court would apply a rigorous cost-benefit analysis ... I believe that its effect would be that the court would invariably not allow disclosure [beyond standard disclosure] at a stage when issues had not been fully elaborated between the parties.'

[50] In the event, CPR 31.16 is not limited to applications in respect of 'specific documents', because CPR 31.16(3)(c) speaks of 'documents or classes of documents'. Otherwise, Lord Woolf's recommendations are reflected in the h new rule.

PROTOCOLS AND FRAUD

j [51] In the passage quoted above from Access to Justice, Lord Woolf referred to the protocol then recently prepared for use in personal injury litigation. The existence of a protocol is not without relevance to the question of pre-action disclosure: it may indicate that documents of a certain class, such as the paradigm case of medical records in clinical disputes, should as a matter of course be disclosed before service of a claim form. But protocols have, at any rate so far, been developed in areas of litigation, such as personal injury claims, clinical disputes, construction and engineering disputes, and professional negligence disputes, where familiarity with the nature of such disputes and/or the interrelationship of the parties indicate the way forward: see the discussion of such protocols in Bermuda International Securities Ltd v KPMG (a firm) [2001] Lloyd's Rep PN 392, since when the professional negligence protocol has been formally published and has come into force in July 2001. Outside those areas and CPR 31.16 itself the guiding principle of practice is that set out in the Practice Direction—Protocols, White Book (Civil Procedure (2001)) vol 1, pp 1983–1987 (paras C1-001–C1-005), p 1984 (para C1-003) which reads as follows:

‘4.1 In cases not covered by any approved protocol, the court will expect the parties, in accordance with the overriding objective and the matters referred to in CPR 1.1(2)(a), (b) and (c), to act reasonably in exchanging information and documents relevant to the claim and generally in trying to avoid the necessity for the start of proceedings.’

[52] In this context it is necessary to stand back for a moment and ask oneself what, if anything, the nature of the current dispute and the interrelationship of its parties indicate as to the proper role of pre-action exchange of information and documents. Mr Black's claim does not arise out of any contractual dispute or any professional relationship. It does not arise out of the relationship inherent in a situation where one party owes a duty of care to another (his ‘neighbour’, in Lord Atkin's formula) breach of which has resulted in personal injury or death. If there has been any fraud or manipulation, it has not been between parties to a contract but affects Mr Black only in as much as he was part of a worldwide market. I would accept Mr Hollander's submission that in terms of the current dispute Mr Black and Sumitomo are in essence strangers. Mr Vos's response is that they are not total strangers in that Mr Black is well known in the world of copper trading; and he also relies on the unparticularised allegation that Sumitomo refused to sell to Mr Black in the aftermath of the Hamanaka affair. Nevertheless, for over four years Mr Black remained silent. His public utterances spoke only of his gains and of anticipated price levels which are inconsistent with his present claim. Thus unlike a personal injury claimant who has suffered some undoubted misfortune, but needs disclosure to investigate the mechanism of his misfortune, Mr Black's losses are themselves a matter of uncertainty and dispute. No complaint was made to the regulatory authorities which he knew were investigating the situation.

[53] Mr Black says that until his recent acquisition of documents by means of the United States Act, he was unable to proceed. That raises the question of the extent of material in or potentially in the public domain and available to Mr Black. Mr Vos has submitted that pre-action disclosure is necessary in this case to ensure that dishonesty is brought to light. But Mr Black's case is based on documents which he has himself obtained from public sources. Mr Black, perhaps for understandable tactical reasons, has not disclosed in one go all such documents as he currently possesses. Thus he has responded to Sumitomo's first round of evidence on the China deal by putting forward the fax dated 29 May 1996 from Sumitomo to Global and the note of the SIB meeting of 30 May 1996; and he has responded to Sumitomo's post-judgment disclosure by putting in evidence the fax dated 16 June 1996 from CNIEC to Sumitomo. Deputy Judge Brindle thought that Sumitomo was being coy about the China deal; but this is not a case in which Mr Black has started by putting all his cards on the table either. In this connection Mr O'Keefe's role is uncertain: on the one hand he has been faithful to his obligations, but on the other hand that has not prevented him from a assisting in relation to potential claims in respect of information where he is 'likely to be reliable and well informed'.

[54] Mr Vos has sought to play down the case of fraud raised in Mr Black's letter before action and in his evidence and to emphasise instead the case of anti-competitive behaviour under arts 81 and 82 EC. On the other hand Deputy Judge Brindle and this court were pressed by him with the problems which an allegation of fraud presents at the pre-action stage. At a general level, there are clearly concerns that allegations of dishonesty are not lightly made, that a defendant to an allegation of dishonesty knows plainly what it is that is alleged against him, and also that dishonesty does not spread its cloak over the means by which it can be detected and revealed. It is not plain how these concerns are to be reconciled in any particular case in the context of pre-action disclosure, but it would seem to me that a court which is asked to grant such disclosure should be careful to pay proper regard to each of them. In any event it cannot be right that an allegation of fraud should assist the potential claimant to obtain pre-action disclosure, unless his allegations carry both some specificity and some conviction and his request for disclosure is appropriately focused.

d [55] Traditionally at any rate, English law has been cautious about the allegation of dishonesty. Thus Mr Hollander relied in this context on Hytrac Conveyors Ltd v Conveyors International Ltd [1982] 3 All ER 415, [1983] 1 WLR 44, where the plaintiffs, who wished to advance a case of conspiracy to infringe their copyright, applied for an extension of time to serve their statement of claim pending the obtaining of interlocutory injunctions. This court, in refusing the application, said this ([1982] 3 All ER 415 at 418, [1983] 1 WLR 44 at 47 per Lawton LJ):

f 'It has to be remembered by all concerned that we do not have in this country an inquisitorial procedure for civil litigation. Our procedure is accusatorial. Those who make charges must state right at the beginning what they are and what facts they are based on. They must not use Anton Piller orders as a means of finding out what sort of charges they can make.'

[56] In RHM Foods Ltd v Bovril Ltd [1982] 1 All ER 673, [1982] 1 WLR 661 the plaintiffs, in a passing-off action, sought disclosure in advance of pleading their statement of claim. They alleged a deliberate intent to deceive the public. The judge acceded to the application. This court acknowledged the jurisdiction to make such an order, but considered that the exercise of that jurisdiction would require an exceptional case and that it would be unfair to the defendants to order disclosure against them before the plaintiffs had pleaded their serious allegations. Oliver LJ said ([1982] 1 All ER 673 at 680, [1982] 1 WLR 661 at 668-669):

h 'I do not say that there cannot be such a case, for the court has a wide power to order discovery where the justice of the case demands it, but it must be very rare. Like Lawton LJ, I remain, despite the powerful advocacy of counsel for the plaintiffs, wholly unconvinced that this case, on the unparticularised allegations of his deponents' individual beliefs, is a case where the discovery sought at this stage is necessary for fairly disposing of the matter and I too, therefore, would allow the appeal.'

[57] Those cases were decided under the former regime of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1965 and I do not consider them to be formally binding in the context of the CPR, a new code with its overriding objective, its greater flexibility, its statements of truth, and its new principles of disclosure, favouring both more limited disclosure and earlier disclosure. Nevertheless, in my judgment it is not to be supposed that in the modern context allegations of fraud have become just like any other allegations. There is still the obligation on counsel pleading fraud to satisfy himself that he can properly do so: Mr Vos has himself relied on that obligation, to hint that without the pre-action disclosure which his client seeks, he might find himself unable to sign a statement of case which pleads fraud. There is still the obligation (see CPR PD 16, para 8.2) to 'specifically set out' any allegation of fraud. a b

[58] Moreover, if the opportunity provided by CPR 31.16 is set against the background of the prospective parties' obligation in any case not covered by a protocol 'to act reasonably in exchanging information and documents relevant to the claim' (see White Book (Civil Procedure (2001)) vol 1, p 1984 (para C1-003) and if consideration is given to the question of what the extent of that obligation is in a case of alleged fraud, it is hard to think that a prospective claimant could easily say that his allegedly fraudulent prospective defendant had failed to co-operate by refusing widespread disclosure in response to unspecific and unverified (because unpleaded) allegations. c

[59] Although Deputy Judge Brindle did not regard those authorities as binding, he did nevertheless derive assistance from them on the question of the application of the jurisdictional test that the applicant and the respondent were 'likely' to be parties to subsequent litigation. Mr Vos, who had relied on them before Deputy Judge Brindle (without, it may be said, much opposition) to support his submissions as to the meaning of 'likely', in the end himself accepted that they were of doubtful value since they turned on the meaning of a phrase ('likely to be made') which has now dropped out of the subsection. e

[60] In the circumstances it is unnecessary to consider those authorities on the basis that they are binding precedents: but, since they provided support for Deputy Judge Brindle's approach and also because they illustrate a point of real difficulty about the way in which the opportunity for pre-action disclosure is to be applied, I will deal with them to see what if any value they have in the present circumstances. f

'On the application, in accordance with rules of court, of a person who appears to the High Court to be likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings in that court in which a claim in respect of personal injuries to a person or in respect of a person's death is likely to be made, the High Court shall ...' h

The words in italics were removed by the amendment. It will be observed that the deleted phrase ends with the words 'likely to be made'. Those are the words which the previous authorities had to construe.

[62] The first case on the meaning of those words was Dunning v Board of Governors of the United Liverpool Hospitals [1973] 2 All ER 454, [1973] 1 WLR 586. Mrs Dunning was admitted to hospital with a cough for investigation but was otherwise in good health, but while there became gravely ill. The hospital refused to release the hospital case notes. Mrs Dunning obtained legal aid to bring proceedings against the hospital, despite her medical expert's report to the effect that, while assessment had been hampered by the absence of the notes, the hospital was probably not at fault. However, he also said that the failure to release j a the notes had unreasonably prolonged the litigation and he urged their release so that he could determine whether or not they confirmed his opinion. The difficulty in the case was that because more than six years had passed since Mrs Dunning's stay in hospital, leave was needed to bring the proceedings for which legal aid had been granted. The application for leave was adjourned, for in the light of the expert's opinion and the hospital's continuing refusal to disclose b the notes there was no basis for an action at a time when there was no provision for pre-action disclosure. Section 31 of the 1970 Act then came into force and Mrs Dunning applied under it for pre-action disclosure of the notes. The question was whether a claim was 'likely to be made': if it was, then of course Mrs Dunning and the hospital were likely to be parties. Stamp LJ dissented ([1973] 2 All ER 454 at 458, 459, [1973] 1 WLR 586 at 591, 592) on the ground that c in the light of the expert's opinion proceedings were unlikely, since disclosure was unlikely to produce anything to justify it. Lord Denning MR, however, thought ([1973] 2 All ER 454 at 457, [1973] 1 WLR 586 at 590) that 'likely' merely meant 'may' or 'may well be made' dependent on the outcome of the disclosure. The object of the statute would be defeated if the applicant had to show in d advance that he already had a good cause of action. James LJ thought ([1973] 2 All ER 454 at 460, [1973] 1 WLR 586 at 593–594) that a claim was 'likely' if there was a 'reasonable prospect' of one: and on the facts he pointed out the evidence of the sudden dramatic change in Mrs Dunning's health and the expert's report with its express need to see the hospital records.

e [63] In the next case, Shaw v Vauxhall Motors Ltd [1974] 2 All ER 1185, [1974] 1 WLR 1035, the applicant was injured driving a truck at work. There was a dispute with his employers about whether the truck was defective. The applicant wanted disclosure of the maintenance records of the truck to see whether the braking system was defective. The application was made on the advice of counsel to enable him to advise the legal aid committee: it was made clear that if the f records supported the complaint that the system was defective, litigation would ensue, otherwise it would not. The judge refused disclosure, but it was ordered by this court. The judgments make it clear that it was common ground that there was jurisdiction under s 31 of the 1970 Act to make the order sought, and the argument was whether it should be made as a matter of discretion. All three judgments were agreed that it should be. The rule of court in question was g RSC Ord 24, r 8, which put on the respondent the burden of showing that discovery was 'not necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs'. Lord Denning MR thought ([1974] 2 All ER 1185 at 1188, [1974] 1 WLR 1035 at 1039) that in such a case it should be the general practice to order disclosure as it enabled each side to know the strength or weakness of the case
h before embarking on litigation: 'It is particularly useful in a legal aid case ...'. Buckley LJ said ([1974] 2 All ER 1185 at 1188, [1974] 1 WLR 1035 at 1040) that the power to order pre-trial disclosure 'is certainly not one which should be used to encourage fishing expeditions to enable a prospective plaintiff to discover whether he has in fact got a case at all', but that there were two special grounds j in favour of the order in that case (see [1974] 2 All ER 1185 at 1189, [1974] 1 WLR 1035 at 1040–1041): one was that it was in the public interest that advisers of legally aided parties should have early information on matters which may affect the parties' position in the litigation; and the other was that the applicant had conceded that if the records showed that the truck was not defective, the claim would be dropped. Ormrod LJ agreed with both those factors ([1974] 2 All ER 1185 at 1189, 1190, [1974] 1 WLR 1035 at 1041, 1042), and also stressed the importance of a letter before action in which the applicant should commit himself as to how the accident happened or else state that he did not know. a

[64] Although Shaw's case was a case on discretion, Lord Denning MR repeated his view in Dunning's case that the words 'likely to be made' mean 'may' or 'may well be made' dependent on the outcome of the discovery and said ([1974] 2 All ER 1185 at 1187, [1974] 1 WLR 1035 at 1039) that that was what Dunning's case had decided. b

[65] The third case considered below and cited to this court was Burns v Shuttlehurst Ltd [1999] 2 All ER 27, [1999] 1 WLR 1449. This was still concerned with the unamended s 33(2) of the 1981 Act. The underlying facts were similar to those in Shaw's case, that is to say the applicant had been injured while driving his employers' vehicle. He had already obtained judgment against his employers, but now wanted to recover against their insurers under the Third Parties (Rights against Insurers) Act 1930: he therefore sought pre-action disclosure against the insurers of the employers' insurance policies. It was held that a claim under the 1930 Act against insurers was not a claim for personal injuries within s 33(2) of the 1981 Act; but also that in any event the applicant had no cause of action until his claim against the employers had been quantified and therefore a claim against the insurers was both premature and not 'likely'. The only reasoned judgment was given by Stuart-Smith LJ. He interpreted Dunning's case somewhat differently. Having pointed out that Lord Denning MR had interpreted 'likely to be made' as meaning 'may' or 'may well be made' dependent on the outcome of the discovery, he went on to say ([1999] 2 All ER 27 at 35–36, [1999] 1 WLR 1449 at 1457 (paras 32–33)) that both James LJ and Stamp LJ had formulated the same test 'namely, at the time of the application there must be shown to be a worthwhile action or a reasonable basis for the intended action', albeit they had differed on what the facts had shown. He then said ([1999] 2 All ER 27 at 36, [1999] 1 WLR 1449 at 1458 (para 34)) that in Burns' case there was probably just enough to show a reasonable basis for an intended action, if the applicant otherwise had a complete cause of action; but he did not. He went on to accept that, once the applicant's judgment against the employers had been quantified the documents would clearly be discoverable (see [1999] 2 All ER 27 at 38, [1999] 1 WLR 1449 at 1459 (para 39)), but that in the meantime there was no cause of action and thus ([1999] 2 All ER 27 at 37, [1999] 1 WLR 1449 at 1459 (para 37)) 'I do not see how it can be said that a claim is likely'. It would seem, therefore, that the temporary absence of any legal basis for a claim (Post Office v Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Ltd [1967] 1 All ER 577, [1967] 2 QB 363 had made that established law) prevented it being said that a claim was 'likely'. c

[66] The phrase 'a claim ... is likely to be made' is no longer part of the amended s 33(2) of the 1981 Act and therefore on any view these authorities are no longer binding. If, however, it matters, my own interpretation of these authorities is as follows. In Dunning v Board of Governors of the United Liverpool Hospitals [1973] 2 All ER 454, [1973] 1 WLR 586 both Lord Denning MR and James LJ agreed that the word 'likely' in that phrase did not mean 'more likely on the balance of probability than not' in the absence of disclosure but meant 'may' or 'may well' or 'reasonable prospect' if disclosure was granted. It is harder to say what Stamp LJ thought 'likely' meant, for he did not gloss its meaning: but he too agreed ([1973] 2 All ER 454 at 458, [1973] 1 WLR 586 at 591) that in deciding whether a claim was likely it was permissible for the court to consider, on the evidence before it, whether disclosure was likely to produce 'a worthwhile and catchable fish'. He added: h

a ‘The word “likely” must in my view be read as connoting that the respondent to the application is likely to be a party to a worthwhile action by a litigant not acting irresponsibly’.

I do not myself believe that Stamp LJ was there construing the section—and certainly not the word ‘likely’ which is repeated in that sentence without being
b glossed—so much as laying down a principle as to the exercise of discretion. If, however, he was construing the section, then in my respectful opinion, he was alone in doing so in this way. James LJ, in a passage picked up and cited by Stuart-Smith LJ in Burns’ case, said ([1973] 2 All ER 454 at 460, [1973] 1 WLR 586 at 593):

c ‘In order to take advantage of the section the applicant for relief must disclose the nature of the claim he intends to make and show not only the intention of making it but also that there is a reasonable basis for making it. Ill-founded, irresponsible and speculative allegations or allegations based merely on hope would not provide a reasonable basis for an intended claim in subsequent proceedings.’

d That, however, as it seems to me, is clearly not an attempt to construe the section but a statement of principle as to the exercise of its discretion. That is shown by a similar discussion in Shaw’s case, which was a case entirely about discretion, for jurisdiction was there common ground. As to construction, which was therefore e not in issue, Lord Denning MR there stated his view that in Dunning’s case this court had held that the phrase meant ‘may’ or ‘may well be made’ dependent on the outcome of the disclosure. That was an obiter dictum, but it seems to me that it was entirely correct.

[67] As for Burns’ case, it is possible that Stuart-Smith LJ (with the approval of the other members of the court) did intend to adopt, on his reading of Dunning’s f case, the test of ‘a worthwhile action or a reasonable basis for the intended action’ as having been laid down by James and Stamp LJ as the test for deciding whether a claim was ‘likely to be made’: but if so, it follows from what I have said above that I would respectfully disagree with that interpretation. If that was his intention, the question might arise, although the amendment to s 33(2) of the g 1981 Act makes the possibility a theoretical one, whether the interpretation of Dunning’s case found in Burns’ case is part of the ratio of the latter case and binding on this court, whatever Dunning’s case said. Happily, however, that question need not trouble the determination of the present appeal.

[68] What, however, these authorities on the unamended section in my
h judgment reveal, and usefully so, is as follows. First, that at any rate in its origin the power to grant pre-trial disclosure was not intended to assist only those who could already plead a cause of action to improve their pleadings, but also those who needed disclosure as a vital step in deciding whether to litigate at all or as a vital ingredient in the pleading of their case. Secondly, however, that (as what I would call a matter of discretion) it was highly relevant in those cases that the j injury was clear and called for examination of the documents in question, the disclosure requested was narrowly focused and bore directly on the injury complained of and responsibility for it, and the documents would be decisive on the conduct or even the existence of the litigation. Thirdly, that on the question of discretion, it was material that a prospective claimant in need of legal aid might be unable even to commence proceedings without the help of pre-action disclosure.

THE AMENDED s 33(2) OF THE 1981 ACT AND THE CURRENT RULE OF COURT

[69] I now turn to the amended s 33(2) of the 1981 Act and the current rule of court, and will consider first of all the jurisdictional thresholds which have to be passed ('only where' (see CPR 31.16(3))) in order to vest a court with discretion to make an order for pre-trial disclosure. a

CPR 31.16(3)(A) AND (B): 'LIKELY TO BE A PARTY'

[70] The application has to be made by 'a person ... likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings' against 'a person ... likely to be a party to the proceedings' (s 33(2) of the 1981 Act) and those requirements are reflected (in reverse order) in CPR 31.16(3)(a) and (b). There is no longer any statutory requirement that 'a claim ... is likely to be made'. b

[71] Of course, in one sense it might be said that a person is hardly likely to be a party to subsequent proceedings whether as a claimant or otherwise unless some form of proceedings is itself likely to be issued. Two questions, however, arise. One is whether the statute requires that it be likely that proceedings are issued, or only that the persons concerned are likely to be parties if subsequent proceedings are issued. The other is whether 'likely' means 'more probably than not' or 'may well'. As to the first question, in my judgment the amended statute means no more than that the persons concerned are likely to be parties in proceedings if those proceedings are issued. That was what Lord Woolf had in mind when he wrote of the requirement that 'there is a likelihood that the respondent would indeed be a defendant if proceedings were initiated' (Access to Justice p 127 (para 50) (see [46], above)). The omission of any language which expressly requires that the initiation of proceedings itself be likely, which could have been included in the amended section, appears to me to reflect the difficulties which the earlier authorities had explored in the sort of circumstances found in Dunning v Board of Governors of the United Liverpool Hospitals [1973] 2 All ER 454, [1973] 1 WLR 586. What the current language of the section appears to me to emphasise, as does the rule of court, is that the parties concerned in an application are parties who would be likely to be involved if proceedings ensued. The concern is that pre-action disclosure would be sought against a stranger to any possible proceedings, or by a party who would himself be unlikely to be involved. If the statute and rule are understood in this sense, then all difficulties, which might arise where the issue of proceedings might depend crucially on the nature of the disclosure sought and where it is impossible at the time of making the application to say whether the disclosure would critically support or undermine the prospective claim, disappear. c
f

[72] As to the second question, it is not uncommon for 'likely' to mean something less than probable in its strict sense. It seems to me that if I am wrong about the first question, then it is plain that 'likely' must be given its more extended and open meaning (see Lord Denning MR in Dunning's case), because otherwise one of the fundamental purposes of the statute will have been undermined. If, however, I am right about the first question, the second question is of less moment. Even so, however, I am inclined to answer it by saying that 'likely' here means no more than 'may well'. Where the future has to be predicted, but on an application which is not merely pre-trial but pre-action, a high test requiring proof on the balance of probability will be both undesirable and unnecessary: undesirable, because it does not respond to the nature and timing of the application; and unnecessary, because the court has all the power it needs in the overall exercise of its discretion to balance the possible uncertainties h

a of the situation against the specificity or otherwise of the disclosure requested. Clearly, the narrower the disclosure requested and the more determinative it may be of the dispute in issue between the parties to the application, the easier it is for the court to find the request well founded; and vice versa.

b [73] On this basis, I think that Deputy Judge Brindle was led into error by the fact that before him there had been a large degree of common ground about seeking to derive from the earlier cases a complicated formula as to the meaning of 'likely'. In my view, apart from the two issues of principle which present themselves and which I have sought to answer in this section of my judgment, the word itself presents no difficulties. Temptations to gloss the statutory language should be resisted. The jurisdictional threshold is not, I think, intended to be a high one. The real question is likely to be one of discretion, and answering c the jurisdictional question in the affirmative is unlikely in itself to give the judge much of a steer as to the correct exercise of his power.

CPR 31.16(3)(c): 'DUTY BY WAY OF STANDARD DISCLOSURE ... WOULD EXTEND TO THE DOCUMENTS'

d [74] Any dispute before Deputy Judge Brindle as to whether the duty of standard disclosure in any proceedings between Mr Black and Sumitomo would extend to the documents which ultimately might become the subject matter of Deputy Judge Brindle's order was surmounted by the agreement that disclosure of such documents would be limited to standard disclosure. That agreement tended to obscure and perhaps to obliterate any argument as to whether any of e the categories of documents requested were inherently outside the regime of standard disclosure.

f [76] In general, however, it should in my judgment be remembered that the extent of standard disclosure cannot easily be discerned without clarity as to the issues which would arise once pleadings in the prospective litigation had been formulated. This court touched on the question in Bermuda International Securities Ltd v KPMG (a firm) [2001] Lloyd's Rep PN 392 when Waller LJ there said (at [26]):

g 'The circumstances spelt out by the rule show that it will "only" be ordered where the court can say that the documents asked for will be documents that will have to be produced at the standard disclosure stage. It follows from that, that the court must be clear what the issues in the litigation are likely to be ie what case the claimant is likely to be making and what defence is likely to be being run so as to make sure the documents being asked for are ones h which will adversely affect the case of one side or the other, or support the case of one side or the other.'

[77] It also seems to me to follow that if there would be considerable doubt as to whether the disclosure stage would ever be reached, that is a matter which the court can and should take into account as a matter of its discretion.

j [78] In any event, all issues of discretion remain. The fact that the jurisdictional threshold under CPR 31.16(3)(c) was dealt with by agreement tended, in my judgment, to obscure the necessity for clarity as to the issues in the prospective litigation. The importance of such clarity was illustrated in this appeal when the focus of submissions were turned from fraud onto anti-competitive conduct.

CPR 31.16(3)(D); 'DESIRABLE'

[79] This is a difficult test to interpret, for it is framed both in terms of a jurisdictional threshold ('only where') and in terms of the exercise of a discretionary judgment ('desirable').

[80] Three considerations are mentioned in CPR 31.16(3)(d): disposing fairly of the anticipated proceedings; assisting the dispute to be resolved without proceedings; and saving costs. The first of this trio obviously contemplates the disposal of proceedings once they have been commenced—in that context the phrase 'dispose fairly' is a familiar one (see eg RSC Ord 24, r 8); the second as clearly contemplates the possibility of avoiding the initiation of litigation altogether; the third is neutral between both of these possibilities.

[81] It is plain not only that the test of 'desirable' is one that easily merges into an exercise of discretion, but that the test of 'dispose fairly' does so too. In the circumstances, it seems to me that it is necessary not to confuse the jurisdictional and the discretionary aspects of the sub-rule as a whole. In the Bermuda International case Waller LJ contemplated (at [26]) that CPR 31.16(3)(d) may involve a two-stage process. I think that is correct. In my judgment, for jurisdictional purposes the court is only permitted to consider the granting of pre-action disclosure where there is a real prospect in principle of such an order being fair to the parties if litigation is commenced, or of assisting the parties to avoid litigation, or of saving costs in any event. If there is such a real prospect, then the court should go on to consider the question of discretion, which has to be considered on all the facts and not merely in principle but in detail.

[82] Of course, since the questions of principle and of detail can merge into one another, it is not easy to keep the two stages of the process separate. Nor is it perhaps vital to do so, provided however that the court is aware of the need for both stages to be carried out. The danger, however, is that a court may be misled by the ease with which the jurisdictional threshold can be passed into thinking that it has thereby decided the question of discretion, when in truth it has not. This is a real danger because first, in very many if not most cases it will be possible to make a case for achieving one or other of the three purposes, and secondly, each of the three possibilities is in itself inherently desirable.

[83] The point can be illustrated in a number of ways. For instance, suppose the jurisdictional test is met by the prospect that costs will be saved. That may well happen whenever there are reasonable hopes either that litigation can be avoided or that pre-action disclosure will assist in avoiding the need for pleadings to be amended after disclosure in the ordinary way. That alternative will occur in a very large number of cases. However, the crossing of the jurisdictional threshold on that basis tells you practically nothing about the broader and more particular discretionary aspects of the individual case or the ultimate exercise of discretion. For that, you need to know much more: if the case is a personal injury claim and the request is for medical records, it is easy to conclude that pre-action disclosure ought to be made; but if the action is a speculative commercial action and the disclosure sought is broad, a fortiori if it is ill-defined, it might be much harder.

[84] In the present case, I think with respect that Deputy Judge Brindle fell into this error. Thus he dealt with CPR 31.16(3)(d) in a single paragraph in which he decided that disclosure relating to the China deal and generally was desirable and should be made. He said that his reasoning or much of it was already dealt with under the heading of the 'likelihood of proceedings'. There, however, he had in turn applied the wrong test; and even though in doing so he had considered

- a matters which properly belonged to the question of discretion, by dealing with them for the different purpose of asking himself whether proceedings were likely, he was led into thinking that having decided that proceedings were likely, therefore pre-action disclosure should be made. That is demonstrated by his very next paragraph (headed 'Discretion') where he simply says that 'It is clear from what I have said above that an order should be made ...'
- b '[85] In effect, Deputy Judge Brindle never stood back, having dealt with the jurisdictional thresholds, and asked himself whether this was a case where his discretion should be exercised in favour of disclosure. It cannot be right to think that, wherever proceedings are likely between the parties to such an application and there is a real prospect of one of the purposes under CPR 31.16(3)(d) being met, an order for disclosure should be made of documents which would in due course fall within standard disclosure. Otherwise an order for pre-action disclosure should be made in almost every dispute of any seriousness, irrespective of its context and detail. Whereas outside obvious examples such as medical records or their equivalent (as indicated by pre-action protocols) in certain other kinds of disputes, by and large the concept of disclosure being ordered at other than the normal time is presented as something differing from the normal, at any rate where the parties at the pre-action stage have been acting reasonably.
- d [86] It is to be observed that because of the way in which he proceeded, Deputy Judge Brindle decided the question of discretion even before considering the breadth of the discovery requested or the allegation of oppression.

- [87] Therefore it seems to me that this court is entitled to exercise its discretion anew.
- [88] That discretion is not confined and will depend on all the facts of the case. Among the important considerations, however, as it seems to me, are the nature of the injury or loss complained of; the clarity and identification of the issues raised by the complaint; the nature of the documents requested; the relevance of any protocol or pre-action inquiries; and the opportunity which the complainant has to make his case without pre-action disclosure.
- f

- [89] In the present case, the loss complained of is a speculative market loss of $126m. Apart from one element in the claim which is put as costs of $14m actually incurred, almost the entire claim is made up of a lost opportunity for gain calculated at $130m. As a claim, it was unknown for four years during which Mr Black made no complaint about Sumitomo. When the letter before action of 21 December 2000 was written, it came out of the blue. This was despite the fact that throughout those years it was well known that Sumitomo was having to deal with its ongoing responsibility for Mr Hamanaka's market manipulation. Indeed the publicity regarding the Hamanaka affair was the very catalyst for Mr Black's copper speculations. The quantification of the loss is entirely dependent on Mr Black and his own documents. Prima facie its calculation is inconsistent with public expressions of Mr Black's own market predictions back in 1996.
- g
- h

- j [90] That is the injury or loss for which Mr Black seeks a remedy. I am far from saying that there is no basis for a complaint that Mr Black has suffered such a loss, which remains to be seen. That, however, is not the question save in the sense that if it could be said that there was no real prospect of such a loss having been suffered then this application would fail at the very outset. This, therefore, is not a case where the prospective claimant has suffered some reasonably plain injury or loss, at any rate on the face of things—such as following medical treatment, or following an accident at work or on the roads, or because of the sale of unfit goods, or non-delivery, or some other breach of contract.

[91] The loss complained of is one thing; the cause or causes of action by which Mr Black seeks a remedy and the clarity with which the legal issues are raised by such a cause of action are the next matters for consideration. The complaint is one of dishonest market manipulation and/or anti-competitive behaviour in breach of arts 81, 82 EC. Again, the question is not whether such causes of action exist in the legal repertoire, for they do, nor whether there is a reasonable basis for the complaint, for Deputy Judge Brindle found that there was and I am prepared to assume for present purposes that he is right. Mr Black can point to the established and admitted background of the Hamanaka affair and to the possibility that in its immediate aftermath Sumitomo, although newly advised by Goldman Sachs, was unable or perhaps even unwilling to avoid doing things with its inherited market positions which might call for censure. That, however, with the possible exception of the China deal to which I will come below, is the essential limit of the complaint. The matter can be tested by considering the recitation of the issues allegedly 'made clear' in Mr Black's letter before action and application: see Mr Vos' skeleton argument before Deputy Judge Brindle. Eight questions are there raised, the essence of which is whether there was any legitimate commercial motivation for Sumitomo's market dealings in the relevant period, whether there was a conspiracy between Sumitomo and Goldman Sachs to injure market participants, whether that conspiracy used unlawful means, and whether such market dealings were in breach of arts 81 or 82 EC. There is no draft pleading. That is, it seems to me, an utterly jejune identification of the issues which might arise in any litigation. Again with the possible exception of the China deal, an exception if only because it is a specific transaction which has been identified and condemned by Mr Black, it seems to me that the complaint, its factual and legal basis, and the issues which it raises, are speculative in the extreme.

[92] In such circumstances, unless there is some real evidence of dishonesty or abuse which only early disclosure can properly reveal and which may, in the absence of such disclosure, escape the probing eye of the litigation process and thus possibly all detection, I think that the court should be slow to allow a merely prospective litigant to conduct a review of the documents of another party, replacing focused allegation by a roving inquisition.

[93] This then is the importance of the China deal, for it is Mr Black's attempt to make a focused attack on Sumitomo's honesty or anti-competitive conduct during the relevant period. Moreover the China deal appears to have been in very large part the sole basis of Deputy Judge Brindle's decision to order any disclosure at all. To a certain extent the position has moved on from what it was below, since in the meantime Sumitomo has given disclosure of the contract with CNIEC and of the delivery orders which CNIEC gave to Sumitomo pursuant to that contract. Those delivery orders appear prima facie to show that the contract was not a sham, and that the copper was delivered to CNIEC in the six months during which the contract allowed CNIEC to call the copper off. Further evidence on behalf of Mr Black and Mr Vos's submissions have since been devoted to raising further questions about this disclosure in the light of new material which Mr Black has obtained by means of the United States Act: but I am not particularly impressed by this. If Mr Black had such information or could obtain such information, it throws into doubt his need for disclosure from Sumitomo. It is wholly unclear to me to what extent Mr Black already has a documentation, or could obtain documentation, or could legitimately obtain information from Mr O'Keefe, which would enable him either to plead his case that the China deal was dishonest manipulation or to recognise that the contract was genuine. Mr Black now complains that he has no Sumitomo documentation to prove that CNIEC paid for the copper: but he did not request and Deputy Judge Brindle did not order such disclosure. What Deputy Judge Brindle ordered b was: '5. Documents evidencing the physical delivery of copper to CNIEC ...'; and that is what Sumitomo has disclosed. In any event, documents disclosed by Sumitomo relating to the reconciliation of payments as between Global and itself would seem to evidence the payment by CNIEC for the copper delivered.

[94] I come next to the nature of the documents requested. Mr Black's request for disclosure went extremely wide. It was not confined to documents, such as c medical reports, or the maintenance reports of an item of equipment, or some other category of internal reports, which could be said at one and the same time to be reasonably narrowly focused and to relate directly to a loss or injury plainly sustained. It was not confined, as in Bermuda International Securities Ltd v KPMG (a firm) [2001] Lloyd's Rep PN 392, to documents which were directly related to d professional work alleged to have been negligently performed by a prospective defendant for a prospective claimant. It was not confined to documents which a protocol had identified as the sort of material one party should be disclosing at an early stage to another. Even after Deputy Judge Brindle had limited the disclosure which he was willing to entertain, the categories stated in his order e indicate the width of the disclosure required. Thus he ordered 'statements showing copper warrants held' by Sumitomo throughout the relevant period, as well as 'daily trading statements showing copper future positions, copper options or any other copper positions' throughout the same period. He also ordered disclosure of any documents containing or evidencing any agreement between Sumitomo and Goldman Sachs relating to the advice given or action taken by f Goldman Sachs during the relevant period; any judgments or pleadings in any civil litigation brought against Sumitomo relating to or involving any allegations in respect of the China deal or to manipulation of the copper market during the relevant period; and any documents relating to the disclosure to the regulatory authorities of Sumitomo's intentions and activities in relation to the unwinding of its copper positions. Mr Vos submitted that such disclosure was not wide and g represented the least that was necessary to police the allegations made. In my judgment, however, such disclosure was very wide indeed. I am sceptical that the disclosure of daily trading statements throughout the period fell within standard disclosure in any event: they seem to me to be in effect 'train of inquiry' or at any rate merely background documents. It would in any event be difficult h to assess this question without a pleaded statement of case. Or, to put the matter another way: if such documents were to fall within standard disclosure, that fact would itself indicate the width of the allegations made.

[95] In my judgment, the more focused the complaint and the more limited the disclosure sought in that connection, the easier it is for the court to exercise j its discretion in favour of pre-action disclosure, even where the complaint might seem somewhat speculative or the request might be argued to constitute a mere fishing exercise. In appropriate circumstances, where the jurisdictional thresholds have been crossed, the court might be entitled to take the view that transparency was what the interests of justice and proportionality most required.
The more diffuse the allegations, however, and the wider the disclosure sought, the more sceptical the court is entitled to be about the merit of the exercise.

[96] In this connection, the difficulties which the retrieval of the documentation requested would cause to Sumitomo is also a relevant factor. Deputy Judge Brindle accepted that a 'real case' of oppression had been made on Sumitomo's evidence. However, he thought that the tailoring of his order would avoid the danger of anything oppressive or unreasonable. It is of course relevant that the cost of such disclosure falls, as a general rule, upon the party requesting it (CPR 48.1(2)). Even so, it is evident that it is only because Deputy Judge Brindle had already determined that in principle he would order disclosure that he was not deterred from doing so, at any rate to the extent that he did so, by the difficulties of the exercise. I can understand that conclusion. If, however, the court is yet to be persuaded of the justice of disclosure, a 'real case' of oppression hardly makes it any easier to order it. It is after all the applicant who bears the burden of persuasion, even if, once he has shouldered that successfully, he must also bear the burden of the costs of disclosure. The burden of disclosure still rests on the respondent. a

[97] In the present circumstances, the expressed determination of Mr Black to commence proceedings, and the avenues open to him to obtain documentation or (as it seems) information from other sources, militate against him. d

[98] In this connection, as this case demonstrates, there is considerable danger of a request for pre-action disclosure leading to what must be expensive satellite litigation in connection with proceedings which have not yet been initiated.

[99] It is possible that Sumitomo's reaction to Mr Black's request for disclosure could be criticised. In effect, having indicated in answer to the 21 December 2000 letter before action (which demanded a response by 31 January 2001) that a considered answer would be forthcoming by 16 March 2001, it failed to meet that date. A letter dated 21 March 2001 from Mr Black's solicitors indicates that in a telephone conversation with Sumitomo's London solicitors it was said that Sumitomo was very busily involved in litigation in the United States and that Mr Black's request had not yet made it on to an agenda for discussion. The result was Mr Black's almost immediate issue of this application, which is dated 30 March 2001. In subsequent evidence on behalf of Sumitomo, Mr London, a partner of Paul Weiss, Sumitomo's United States attorneys, explains that an additional difficulty is Sumitomo's concern over the role of Mr O'Keefe. It is difficult to evaluate these matters and this court has yet to be addressed on them in relation to a question of costs. In the circumstances I would revert to the underlying situation: which is that Mr Black's claim emerged out of the blue after a period of four years; that he claimed damages of at least $126m based on lost opportunities for speculative profits; that Mr Black and Sumitomo are essentially 'strangers', not contract partners, nor 'neighbours'; that the claim was originally premised on a dishonest conspiracy with Goldman Sachs, who had not previously been involved with Sumitomo during the Hamanaka affair; that the alleged conspiracy occurred in a period when Sumitomo was co-operating with the regulatory authorities in the full glare of the exposure and admission of Mr Hamanaka's manipulations; that in this court the focus on fraud has switched to a focus on anti-competitive behaviour, despite Mr Black's evidence verifying the complaint of fraud and despite the complete baldness (and width) of the anti-competitive behaviour alleged; and that I am not persuaded that Mr Black will be deterred by the absence of pre-action disclosure from putting his claim to the test of the courts. e
g
h

[100] If the matter had stood where it did before Deputy Judge Brindle, it is possible that a pre-action disclosure order limited to the China deal alone would

- a have been justified. That would have been to take the China deal as representing Mr Black's 'best case' for testing the theory of unlawful market manipulation. Deputy Judge Brindle in fact ordered documents evidencing the China deal, documents evidencing physical delivery of copper to CNIEC pursuant to it, and documents disclosing it to the regulatory authorities. Of course, Deputy Judge Brindle also went well beyond that point in his overall order for disclosure.
- b In the light of Sumitomo's disclosure of at any rate part of what Deputy Judge Brindle ordered in respect of the China deal, and in the light of Mr Black's evident ability to obtain documents relating to the China deal for himself without Sumitomo's assistance, I can see no virtue in maintaining a small part of the deputy judge's original order. Mr Black's evidence was that if disclosure showed that his contentions about the China deal being a sham were incorrect, the issue
- c 'will not be pursued any further' (see [23], above). Disclosure has shown, prima facie, that the copper under the China deal was sold and delivered to the Chinese and was not a sham. It may well be that the documents at present before the court raise new questions which have yet to be answered. I suspect that more documents would raise more questions. I would prefer at this stage to know
- d clearly what Mr Black is saying about the China deal: whether it was a sham; whether delivery never took place; or whether, despite being a genuine transaction (as it appears prima facie to be), it was nevertheless used in some way dishonestly or anti-competitively or otherwise unlawfully to manipulate the market, and if so, how.
- e [101] In the circumstances, I would allow this appeal and set aside Deputy Judge Brindle's order for pre-action disclosure.

MAURICE KAY J

Mental health – Patient – Nearest relative – Removal or change of nearest relative – Compatibility with right to respect for private life – Mental Health Act 1983, ss 26, 29 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8.

Section 26 of the Mental Health Act 1983 specifies the 'nearest relative' of a patient detained under s 2 or s 3 of the Act by listing classes of relatives in order and providing that the person who is first described in the list should be appointed the nearest relative. The role accorded to the nearest relative is one of the safeguards provided for by the 1983 Act since ss 2 and 3 involve the restriction of personal liberty. Section 29 of the 1983 Act provides for the removal or change of the nearest relative by the court but a patient cannot apply for such removal or change. In proceedings for judicial review brought by M, who had been detained pursuant to s 3 and released on leave but remained liable to detention, MAURICE KAY J declared pursuant to s 4 of the Human Rights Act 1998 that ss 26(1) and 29 of the 1983 Act were incompatible with M's right to respect for her private life under art 8(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) in so far as she had no choice over the appointment, nor any legal means to change the appointment, of her nearest relative.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, MANTELL AND RIX LJJ

7–10 OCTOBER, 19 DECEMBER 2002, 14 MARCH, 18 JUNE 2003

Social security – Benefits – Widows' benefits – Widows' benefits not available to widowers – Prohibition of discrimination – Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, ss 36–38 – Human Rights Act 1998, ss 3, 6, 8, Sch 1, Pt I, arts 8, 14, Pt II, art 1.

The appeal involved four individual appellants, each of whom was a widower whose wife had died at a time when, under ss 36–38^a of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, widows received certain benefits in circumstances in which widowers did not. Widow's payment was a lump sum payment of £1,000. Widowed mother's allowance was payable to widows with dependent children. Widow's pension was payable to widows, not entitled to widowed mother's allowance, over 45 and under 65. Article 14^b of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) prohibited discrimination on inter alia grounds of sex. Article 8^c secured the right to respect for private and family life and art 1^d of the First Protocol provided for the protection of property. The 1998 Act came into force on 2 October 2000. On 9 April 2001 the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 came into force, amending the 1992 Act and introducing a system of survivor's benefits payable to both men and women. The appellants claimed that between 2 October 2000 and 9 April 2001 they should have received the same benefits that were available to widows under the previous regime. Three appellants with dependent children had claims for the equivalent of widowed mother's allowance, M claimed the equivalent of widow's payment and N claimed the equivalent of widow's pension. A number of similar claims had been brought before the European Court of Human Rights and it was the policy of the Secretary of State to settle those claims declared to be admissible. The court identified, inter alia, the following issues: (i) whether s 3^e of the 1998 Act, which provided for legislation to be read and given effect in a way compatible with convention rights, required ss 36–38 of the 1992 Act to be interpreted in such a way as to confer on widowers as well as widows the right to receive the benefits in issue; (ii) whether there had been objective justification for the entitlement of women but not men to widow's pension until 9 April 2001; (iii) whether the state had been entitled to a reasonable period within which rectify discriminatory law; (iv) whether discrimination between widowers who brought proceedings at the European Court of Human Rights and had their claims settled and the appellants was a violation of art 14 of the convention read with art 8 or art 1 of the First Protocol or of the principles of domestic public law; (v) whether extra-statutory payments preventing discrimination could be made lawfully; and (vi) whether it was necessary to make payments of compensation to the appellants in order to afford them just satisfaction within s 8^f of the 1998 Act.

(1) It was not possible, pursuant to s 3 of the 1998 Act, to read references to the feminine gender in ss 36–38 of the 1992 Act as including the masculine. Those sections drew a distinction between men and women and husbands and wives (see [28], below).

(2) The difference in economic activity between men and women no longer justified discriminating between them by paying, indiscriminately, pensions to widows aged between 45 and 65. There had been therefore no objective justification for not taking steps to remove the discrimination involved in paying pensions under s 38 of the 1992 Act (see [64], [69], below).

(3) The state was entitled not merely to a wide margin of appreciation when considering whether and when a change was required to domestic law in order to ensure that it remained convention compliant in changing circumstances, but also, having so decided, to such time as was reasonable to make the necessary change. No criticism had been, or could be, made of the period taken to consult on and then introduce the 1999 Act. The criticism, which was well-founded, had been of the delay in deciding that a change in the law was necessary (see [78], below); Walden v Liechtenstein (App No 33916/96) (16 March 2000, unreported) considered.

(4) The policy under which any pre-1998 Act victim who had brought a claim before the European Court of Human Rights and had had that claim ruled admissible would receive a friendly settlement did not constitute discrimination such as to constitute an independent violation of art 14 of the convention read with art 8 or art 1 of the First Protocol between those widowers with claims similar to the appellants and the appellants themselves. The policy did not create two classes of victims, one of which was treated more favourably than the other. The reason why the appellants were not able to benefit from the policy was because they had not advanced a claim before the European Court of Human Rights, and not because the policy discriminated between one class and another (see [101], below); Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471 considered.

(5) There was nothing demonstrably perverse, irrational or unfair about the state's course of conduct which had brought about the result that the issues which were concerned in the instant case had been preserved for litigation in the domestic forum before contesting them at the European Court of Human Rights (see [108], below).

(6) It was plainly implicit that Parliament had intended the express statutory provisions for payment of benefits to widows to occupy the entire field of entitlement to payment of benefits as a result of the death of a spouse. After the 1998 Act came into effect there was a presumption that Parliament did not intend legislation to infringe the convention. In so far as the 1998 Act placed upon the Secretary of State an obligation to make extra-statutory payments, no constitutional impropriety or illegality could be involved in his putting in place a scheme to give effect to that obligation. It followed that neither s 6(2)(a) nor (b) of the 1998 Act afforded the Secretary of State a defence to the claim that by failing to make a extra-statutory payments to the appellants he had infringed art 14 (see [135]–[137], below).

(7) By failing to make extra-statutory payments the Secretary of State had acted in a way incompatible with the appellants' convention rights. However, although the making of extra-statutory payments would have prevented discrimination, it was not irrational for the Secretary of State to have declined to adopt that course.

b If Parliament conferred on one class a benefit for which there was no rational justification, it might make more sense to leave those who did not receive that benefit to seek such remedy as the law allowed rather than to make to them also payments for which there was no rational justification (see [144], below).

c (8) The discrimination that existed during the relevant transitional period from 2 October 2000 to 9 April 2001 resulted in the failure of widowers to receive lump sum payments to which in justice they should have been entitled. M and any others in his position should receive damages of £1,000 and interest by way of just satisfaction. The appellants who claimed payments equivalent to widowed mother's allowance had not demonstrated that the discrimination complained of had caused them any pecuniary loss so the principle of just satisfaction did not require any award in that respect. In relation to widow's pension there was no justification for making equivalent payments to widowers. Accordingly, the principle of just satisfaction did not entitle N to extra-statutory payments equivalent to widow's pension (see [155], [158], [162], [163], below); Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503 considered.

Thomas Hooper, Leslie Withey, Andrew Martin and Frank Naylor appealed from the decision of Moses J on 14 February 2002 ([2002] EWHC 191 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 193 (Feb)) granting a declaration of incompatibility with the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) in relation to ss 36 and 37 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 but otherwise dismissing their claims for judicial review of the refusal of the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions to allow their claims, following the death of their wives, for payments equivalent to widow's payment, widowed mother's allowance and widow's pension. The hearing of the appeal began on 7 October 2002, but the court found it necessary to invite the parties to return for further argument, so that the hearing was not concluded until 14 March 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. e

18 June 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered. j

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

INTRODUCTION

[1] There are before the court two conjoined appeals involving five individual appellants. Each is a widower. The wife of each died at a time when a statutory a regime prevailed under which widows received benefits or tax allowances in circumstances in which widowers did not. This regime reflected a bygone era in which the husband was the breadwinner of the family and the wife did not usually go out to work. That regime has changed, and the state now recognises that to provide such benefits to widows alone would constitute discrimination based on gender which would infringe art 14, together with art 8, or, in the case of tax allowances, art 1 of the First Protocol, of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (the convention). On 2 October 2000, the convention was incorporated into English law by, and subject to the provisions of, the Human Rights Act 1998.

b [2] The appellants claim that they should have received the same benefits that were available to widows under the old regime. They contend that they are the victims of discrimination which violates the convention. In advancing their claims they rely upon the provisions of the 1998 Act. They do not, however, all do so in the same manner. Some of the issues that their claims raise are novel and far-reaching. These cases have been treated as test cases and many other cases will turn on the result of these appeals.

c THE APPELLANTS AND THE LEGISLATION UNDER WHICH THEY CLAIM

[3] Four of the appellants, Messrs Hooper, Withey, Martin and Naylor, complain of discrimination in the matter of widow's benefits paid pursuant to ss 36–38 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, and the fifth, Mr Wilkinson, complains of discrimination in the matter of the widow's bereavement allowance granted under s 262(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. The respondent in the case of the 1992 Act is the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, and the respondents in the case of the 1988 Act are the IRC.

e [4] Although similar issues arise in both appeals, we propose to deal with the appeals one at a time.

f HOOPER, WITHEY, MARTIN AND NAYLOR'S APPEAL

The legislation

[5] We propose at this point to summarise the relevant statutory provisions that relate to benefits, which we set out in full as an Annex.

g [6] Section 36 of the 1992 Act provided for a widow's payment, a lump sum payment of £1,000, subject to conditions which included restriction to widows under pensionable age whose late husbands had made national insurance contributions. Section 37 provided for a widowed mother's allowance (WMA) payable weekly, subject to similar conditions, to widows with dependent children. h Section 38 provided for a widow's pension, payable weekly, subject to similar conditions, to widows not entitled to a WMA over 45 and under 65 at the date of their husband's death or at the date when they ceased to be entitled to a WMA. Under applicable regulations (the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1968) such benefits had to be applied for 'in writing on a form approved by the Secretary of State ... or in such other manner, being in writing, as the Secretary of State ... may accept as sufficient in the circumstances of any particular case' (reg 4(1)); and within three months 'beginning with any day on which, apart from satisfying the condition of making a claim, the claimant is entitled to the benefit concerned' (reg 19(2)). There were special forms for making claim to widow's benefits, which not surprisingly were drafted in terms which would not be appropriate for a claim by a widower. The effect of the three-month time limitation was (i) that if the widow's payment was not claimed in time, it was wholly lost, and (ii) that arrears of the WMA and the widow's pension could not be recovered for more than three months prior to the date on which a valid claim for these was made. a

[7] On 9 April 2001 the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 came fully into force, amending the 1992 Act. Its provisions introduced a system of survivor's benefits payable to both men and women, but at the price that these were more limited forms of benefit, targeted most on those in need. For those already in receipt of widow's benefits under the 1992 Act, however, the 1999 Act preserved the distinction between widows and widowers, for existing rights were preserved. Section 54 substituted a new s 36 into the 1992 Act and replaced the widow's payment with a new bereavement payment, set at £2,000 (thus recognising an increase in expenses arising directly from bereavement) and payable to widows and widowers alike, whose spouses had died after 9 April 2001. Section 55 introduced a number of new sections into the 1992 Act: a new s 39A replaced the WMA with a new widowed parent's allowance (WPA) for widows or widowers with dependent children; and a new s 39B replaced the widow's pension with a bereavement allowance payable for only 52 weeks to those over 45 but under pensionable age. Existing rights to the WMA and the widow's pension were preserved by a new s 36A, and by s 36A(2) the new WPA was extended after 9 April 2001 to widowers whose wives had died before 9 April 2001 and who had dependent children as at 9 April 2001. b

[8] Article 8 of the convention provides that 'Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence'.

[9] Article 14 provides: f

'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.' g

'If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party.' h

(2) This section—(a) applies to primary legislation and subordinate legislation whenever enacted; (b) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation; and (c) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible subordinate legislation if (disregarding any possibility of revocation) primary legislation prevents removal of the incompatibility.’

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to an act if—(a) as the result of one or more provisions of primary legislation, the authority could not have acted differently; or (b) in the case of one or more provisions of, or made under, primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights, the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions’

‘(1) A person who claims that a public authority has acted (or proposes to act) in a way which is made unlawful by section 6(1) may—(a) bring proceedings against the authority under this Act in the appropriate court or tribunal, or (b) rely on the Convention right or rights concerned in any legal proceedings, but only if he is (or would be) a victim of the unlawful act ...

(7) For the purposes of this section, a person is a victim of an unlawful act only if he would be a victim for the purposes of Article 34 of the Convention if proceedings were brought in the European Court of Human Rights in respect of that act.’

‘(1) In relation to any act (or proposed act) of a public authority which the court finds is (or would be) unlawful, it may grant such relief or remedy, or make such order, within its powers as it considers just and appropriate.

(2) But damages may be awarded only by a court which has power to award damages, or to order the payment of compensation, in civil proceedings.

(3) No award of damages is to be made unless, taking account of all the circumstances of the case, including—(a) any other relief or remedy granted, or order made, in relation to the act in question (by that or any other court), and (b) the consequences of any decision (of that or any other court) in respect of that act, the court is satisfied that the award is necessary to afford just satisfaction to the person in whose favour it is made.

(4) In determining—(a) whether to award damages, or (b) the amount of an award, the court must take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the award of compensation under Article 41 of the Convention ...

“damages” means damages for an unlawful act of a public authority; and

“unlawful” means unlawful under section 6(1).’

The relief claimed and the issues raised

[15] Messrs Hooper, Withey and Martin’s claims are founded on the fact that, had they been women, they would have received a widow’s payment and a WMA upon the deaths of their spouses. Mr Naylor’s claim is founded on the fact that, had he been a woman, he would have received a widow’s payment and a widow’s pension on the death of his spouse. Each appellant contends that he was the victim of discrimination which violated art 14, when read with art 8, of the convention. a

[16] Before Moses J, Messrs Withey, Martin and Naylor argued that, although, if given their natural meaning, the relevant statutory provisions appeared to discriminate against men, it was possible to interpret them in such a way as to confer on widowers as well as widows the right to receive the benefits in issue. They contended that s 3 of the 1998 Act required the provisions in question to be so interpreted, with the result that they were entitled to receive the benefits in question under the statute. Mr Hooper did not adopt this argument and Moses J did not accept it. It has not been actively pursued before us, but it has been 'kept open' for us to decide, as it is a point that has been taken in a number of other cases. We shall deal with this as the first issue. b

[17] On the assumption that they do not succeed on the first issue, the three appellants who have espoused it join with Hooper in contending that the effect of the legislation is to discriminate against them contrary to art 14, when read with art 8, of the convention. In relation to some, an issue arises as to whether, or when, they became 'victims' of the alleged discrimination so as to be in a position to rely upon a breach of the convention. We shall deal with this as the second issue. c d

[18] The Secretary of State has now accepted that, in the period with which the claims are concerned, the statutory provisions which entitled women, but not men, to a widow's payment and a WMA constituted discrimination which violated art 14, when read with art 8. The Secretary of State has accepted the reasoning of Moses J on this point, and we consider that he was right to do so subject to the Walden point discussed below (see Walden v Liechtenstein (App No 33916/96) (16 March 2000, unreported)). Nor has the Secretary of State sought to contend that there was any objective justification for this discrimination. The same is not true of the entitlement of women, but not men, to a widow's pension. The Secretary of State contends that there was objective justification for this up to the moment that the law was changed. Whether this contention is well founded constitutes the third issue that we shall address. e f

[19] The Secretary of State accepts that, by November 1999, when the 1999 Act was enacted, wrongful discrimination in relation to a widow's payment, a WMA and, if he loses on the third issue, a widow's pension had been identified. The Secretary of State contends, however, that Strasbourg jurisprudence demonstrates that the state was entitled to a reasonable period within which to rectify the law, during which period no individual could found a claim on wrongful discrimination. This contention is founded on decisions of the Strasbourg court which include that of 16 March 2000 in Walden's case, and has been described as the Walden point. We shall deal with this point as the fourth issue. g h

[20] Thus far, the claims that we have been describing have founded on discrimination between women and men. We now turn to an allegation of wrongful discrimination that has a different basis. A number of claims have been brought in Strasbourg by claimants founding on the same breaches of the convention as are relied upon in the four appeals before us. Amicable settlements have been reached in the case of some of these, and, in the case of benefit claimants, it was at all material times the policy of the Secretary of State to settle claims declared to be admissible at Strasbourg. The appellants contend that discrimination between those widowers who have brought proceedings at Strasbourg, who have had their claims settled, and the appellants themselves, whose claims under the 1998 Act are being resisted in these proceedings, j

a constitutes an independent violation of art 14, when read with art 8, or with art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. We shall deal with the validity of this contention as the fifth issue.

b [21] By way of alternative to the fifth issue, all four appellants contend that discrimination between those who bring claims at Strasbourg and those who have not yet done so violates principles of our domestic public law. Whether this contention is well-founded will constitute the sixth issue that we shall consider.

c [22] The four appellants join in pursuing what is the most important issue raised by this appeal. They contend that the discrimination which has occurred could and should have been avoided. It was and is open to the Secretary of State to make extra-statutory payments to the claimants thereby putting them on an equal footing both with widows and with widowers whose claims have been settled at Strasbourg. Such action would have prevented the discrimination which was bound otherwise to occur as a result of making the payments to which widows were statutorily entitled under the 1992 Act and as a result of settling claims brought at Strasbourg. Section 6(1) of the 1998 Act made it unlawful for the Secretary of State to decline to make such payments. The court should make

e [23] Moses J held that this basis for claiming payments was unsound. Section 6(1) had no application because the case fell within the provisions of s 6(2)(b). He went on to make a declaration of incompatibility in relation to ss 36 and 37 of the 1992 Act. Whether the four appellants' claims to extra-statutory payments were unsound is the seventh issue that we shall address.

[24] Questions arise as to whether any appellant can complain of the effects of discrimination insofar as these impacted prior to 2 October 2000. These we shall consider as the eighth issue.

f [25] Finally, an issue arises as to whether it is necessary to make payments of compensation to the appellants in order to afford them 'just satisfaction'. This is the ninth issue.

g [26] We agree with Moses J that the principles to be applied when considering the effect of s 3 of the 1998 Act are encapsulated in the following statements. In R v A (No 2) [2001] UKHL 25 at [44], [2001] 3 All ER 1 at [44], [2002] 1 AC 45 Lord Steyn said:

h 'In accordance with the will of Parliament as reflected in s 3, it will sometimes be necessary to adopt an interpretation which linguistically may appear strained. The techniques to be used will not only involve the reading down of express language in the statute, but also the implication of provisions. A declaration of incompatibility is a measure of last resort. It must be avoided unless it is plainly impossible to do so. If a clear limitation on convention rights is stated in terms, such an impossibility will arise.'

j However, in R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37 at [79], [2001] 3 All ER 577 at [79], [2002] 2 AC 545, decided about one-and-a-half months after R v A, Lord Hope observed that s 3(1) preserves the sovereignty of Parliament: 'It does not give power to the judges to overrule decisions, which the language of the statute shows have been taken on the very point at issue by the legislature.' Later he observed (at [81]):

'But the interpretation of the statute by reading words in to give effect to the presumed intention must always be distinguished carefully from amendment. Amendment is a legislative act. It is an exercise which must be reserved to Parliament.’ a

‘In any Act, unless the contrary intention appears,—(a) words importing the masculine gender include the feminine; (b) words importing the feminine gender include the masculine ...’ b

[28] In our judgment ‘the contrary intention’ appears emphatically from the provisions of ss 36–38 of the 1992 Act. As Moses J observed, the sections draw a distinction between men and women and husbands and wives. This distinction is particularly marked in s 37, which includes, in the conditions entitling a woman to a WMA, pregnancy by her late husband and artificial insemination with the semen of some person other than her husband. It is quite impossible to read references to the feminine gender in these sections as including the masculine. Moses J so held, and we agree with him. c

[29] Section 7(1) of the 1998 Act, which we have set out above, provides that only a ‘victim’ can make a claim under s 6(1). Under s 7(7) the test of a ‘victim’ is that applied by the Strasbourg court. In the present context identification of the test is assisted by the fact that the Strasbourg court has made a number of decisions on admissibility of claims which are close to carbon copies of those before us. Those decisions have greatly reduced the area of controversy between the parties. While they identify the relevant principles they have not, however, applied these in a manner which we find satisfactory. d

[30] We have drawn attention to the regulations which require a widow to make her claim within three months of becoming entitled to a payment. Because a widow who has not made a claim has no entitlement to benefits, the Strasbourg court does not consider that a widower who has made no claim is in a position to complain of discrimination. Only when he has made a claim is he in a position to complain that he is not being treated in the same way as a woman. e

[31] This approach was first manifested in Cornwell v UK (2000) 27 EHRR CD 62. Mr Cornwell’s wife had died on 24 October 1989, leaving a dependent child. On 7 February 1997 his representative had ‘contacted’ the Benefits Agency to enquire about widow’s benefits. On 14 February 1997 the agency ‘answered’ to say that legislation provided only for widows and not widowers. On 28 March 1997 the agency confirmed that if Mrs Cornwell’s record had been that of a man, her survivor would have been entitled to a widow’s payment and a WMA. The position of the government was set out in the decision as follows ((2000) 27 EHRR CD 62 at 65): f

‘The Government contests the admissibility of the application in so far as it relates to the period 24 October 1989 to 7 February 1996. It points out that the applicant did not attempt to claim widows’ benefits until 7 February 1997 and that it was only from this date onwards that the legislation was applied to him. Had a woman claimed widows’ benefits on 7 February 1997 in respect of the death of her husband in October 1989, she would have been told that she was out of time for claiming a widow’s payment and that she could only claim widowed mothers’ allowance with effect from 8 February 1996.’ g a [32] The court went on to deal with the government's objection in the following passage:

b 'The Court recalls that under Article 34 of the Convention it may receive applications from individuals and others "claiming to be the victim of a violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in the Convention or the protocols thereto". In order to claim to be a victim of a violation, a person must be directly affected by the impugned measure (see, for example, the Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 at 125 (paras 56–59) and Valmont v UK App no 36385/97 (23 March 1999, unreported)). In the present case, during the period between his wife's death on 24 October 1989 and his claim for benefits on 7 February 1997, the applicant cannot be said to have been directly affected by the discrimination of which he complains, since a woman in the same position who had made no claim would have had no entitlement to widows' benefits under domestic law. It follows that for the period 24 October 1989 to 7 February 1997 the applicant cannot claim to have been a victim of a violation of his rights under the Convention and First Protocol, and that the application, in so far as it relates to this period, is incompatible ratione personae with the provisions of the Convention and must be declared inadmissible in accordance with Article 35(3) and (4) of the Convention.'

e [33] The court then recited, incorrectly, that the government did not contest the admissibility of the application insofar as it related to the period after 7 February 1997 and declared the application inadmissible up to that date, but admissible thereafter.

f [34] It is clear that the application should have been declared admissible in respect of the period beginning on 7 February 1996. The important point to note, however, is that the court required 'an attempt to claim' benefit as a precondition to becoming a victim. No point was taken in that case as to the manner of the attempt to claim benefit, but evidence was placed before us which satisfied us that the attempt had been made in writing.

g [35] In White v UK App No 53134/99 (7 June 2001, unreported) the United Kingdom government took the far from attractive point that the claimant, who had advanced a claim in writing for benefit, had not done so on the official form, notwithstanding that this was designed specifically for widows. The court gave this short shrift:

h 'The court notes that in the present case the applicant made clear in the form notifying the social security office of the death of his wife that he wished to claim "widowers' benefits". The court further notes that on two occasions a minister of the Department of Social Security wrote to the applicant's Member of Parliament confirming that, as a man, the applicant was not entitled under the current law to claim widows' benefits.

j The government contend that the applicant never made a claim for any benefits "in the proper form" and that, applying the court's reasoning in Cornwell v UK, the applicant cannot claim to be a victim of discrimination in violation of the Convention. The court is unable to accept this argument. As appears from Cornwell v UK itself, the precise form in which an applicant indicates his intention to claim benefits is not of importance, the central question being whether the applicant has made clear his wish to claim benefits. The court finds that in the present case the applicant made clear

[36] We have been asked to resolve one issue that remains unclear. Will it suffice as a precondition to becoming a 'victim' for a widower to make clear orally to the relevant authority that he is seeking benefit or must the claim be made in writing? As to this question, Moses J concluded as follows ([2002] All ER (D) 193 (Feb) at [63]): 'In my view, and I suspect in the view of the European Court of Human Rights, the claimant must make his claim to benefits clear in writing.'

[37] We do not agree with this conclusion. While it is plainly desirable that a claim should be made in writing, we cannot see why, if it is clear that a claim has been made orally to the appropriate authority, this should not suffice. Normally, such a claim is likely to be recorded in writing. If it is not, then it may be difficult to prove. But, subject to proof, we can see no reason in principle why an oral claim, made and rejected, should not suffice to constitute the claimant a victim. Let us take an extreme example. Imagine that an illiterate widower had arranged a meeting with a social security officer to claim benefit and had been told that he was entitled to none. It seems to us that discrimination would have begun at that moment. We note that in Fielding v UK App No 36940/97 (8 June 1999, unreported) the transcript shows that the government conceded victim status on the basis of a telephone enquiry to the Benefits Agency. This concession was appropriate. If an authority informs an oral claimant that he has no entitlement to claim, the authority should not be entitled, thereafter, to contend that a claim should have been advanced in writing.

[38] We turn to consider the position in relation to each of the four appellants who were denied benefits. It is important to distinguish between a number of different questions. (i) When, if at all, did the appellant make the claim that was necessary to render him a victim? (ii) In respect of what period of deprivation of benefits is the appellant entitled to found a claim under the 1998 Act? (iii) When did time start to run for the purpose of the three-month period for claiming judicial review? The second question is one that we shall consider as the eighth issue. No point has been taken that any application for judicial review was out of time. Thus, at this stage, we shall limit our consideration to the question of victim status.

Mr Hooper

[39] Mr Hooper has been widowed on two occasions. His claim relates to the second of these. Mr Hooper's (second) wife died on 27 March 1997, leaving three dependent children. In April 1997 he wrote to a local Department of Social Security (DSS) office asking that he be awarded benefits in the same way that a widow would have been. In May the DSS replied, refusing his claim on the ground that such benefits were only available to widows. On 1 June 1997 he wrote to the Prime Minister complaining about the rejection of his claim. His letter was referred to the DSS. As a result, he was visited by an employee of the Benefits Agency in August 1997, who again explained to him that he was not entitled to widow's benefits. Nearly three years later, on 10 May 2000, after hearing about payments being made to complainants in Strasbourg, he wrote to the DSS again, to pursue his claim. On 26 May 2000 the DSS replied declining his claim in terms that we shall have to consider when we come to consider the fifth and sixth issues.

a [40] On the same day the Benefits Agency also replied to Mr Hooper, refusing his renewed claim on the ground that there was currently no legislation which entitled a widower to widow's benefits. Mr Hooper pursued his correspondence, and a DSS letter dated 10 August 2000 informed him that 'It is, of course, a decision for those widowers concerned as to whether they follow their claims through to the European Court for a ruling on admissibility'.

b [41] A letter from Mr Hooper's solicitors dated 16 August 2000 informed the Benefits Agency that Mr Hooper intended to seek redress either by way of judicial review or by the seeking of an admissibility ruling in Strasbourg, and asked for confirmation that he would have met all the required conditions for benefit, had his wife been a husband and had he been a widow. It was subsequent to this stage, that the 1998 Act came into effect on 2 October 2000.

c [42] Moses J found:

d 'Letters, which he asserts he sent, have not been discovered. But I see no reason for doubting his assertions. It is plain that he was making written claims at least by July 1997 but it is not clear to me that he made a written claim within three months of the death of his second wife on 27 March 1997. He is a victim in respect of Widowed Mother's Allowance from three months prior to the date of his first written claim to benefits, subject to the arguments as to the retrospectivity of the 1998 Act.'

e [43] On the basis that he accepted Mr Hooper's evidence about his correspondence, the judge appears to have overlooked the letters to the DSS of April 1997 and to the Prime Minister of 1 June 1997, both within three months of Mr Hooper's wife's death. Thus, so far as the convention is concerned, Mr Hooper became a 'victim' in respect of both his claim in relation to widow's payment and his claim in relation to a WMA, for he had claimed, in writing, in respect of both within three months of the death of his wife. The extent to which his claims are f defeated by reason of the fact that the 1998 Act did not come into force until 2 October 2000 we shall consider when we come to deal with the eighth issue.

g [44] Mr Withey's wife died on 26 November 1996, leaving two dependent children. His evidence was that in January or February 1997 he made a telephone inquiry of his local Benefits Agency to ask how he should go about applying for widow's benefits. He was told that he had no entitlement. The judge found that this did not suffice to make him a 'victim'; he should have made a claim in writing. This demonstrates the injustice of imposing a requirement for a claim in writing, h Mr Withey can hardly be criticised for not making such a claim after having been authoritatively informed that he had no entitlement to benefit. We hold that his telephone inquiry was enough to constitute him a 'victim'. Moses J held that, while he failed to make a timely claim in respect of widow's payment, his letter before action on 29 August 2000 sufficed to constitute him a victim in respect of WMA, with effect from three months before the date of that letter. On either
j footing, we shall have to consider the effect of the fact that the 1998 Act was not in force on these dates when we come to address the eighth issue.

[45] Mr Martin's wife died on 11 September 2000 leaving two dependent children. He made an oral claim in September 2000. This constituted him a victim in relation to both the widow's payment and the WMA. Once again a question arises as to whether his claim can relate back to the period before 2 October 2000, which will fall for consideration in the context of the eighth issue. a

Mr Naylor

[46] Mr Naylor's wife died on 2 July 1995, leaving no dependent children. He made no claim within three months of her death, and thus is not in a position to contend that he is a victim in relation to the widow's payment. On 14 September 2000, however, he made a formal written claim on form BW1. This rendered him a victim in relation to the widow's pension. Once again there is a short period prior to 2 October 2000 to which we shall have to give consideration in the context of the eighth issue. b

[47] The third issue arises only in the context of a widow's pension and, on this, Mr Naylor's is the test case. The point can be stated simply. With effect from 9 April 2001, women whose husbands died ceased to be entitled to a widow's pension. As from this date it is common ground that there was insufficient justification for continuing to grant these pensions. Widows already in receipt of pensions were to continue to receive them. Mr Naylor's wife died in 1995. He suffered discrimination in that he received no pension in consequence of his loss, though if he had died his wife would have received a pension. Because he did not make a claim until 14 September 2000, his claim relates to the period beginning three months before that date. His submission is that, by the year 2000, the discrimination between widows and widowers could not be justified. d

[48] A widow's pension was and, for those still entitled to it, is paid weekly to widows under 65 who were aged over 45 when their husband died (or when they ceased to be entitled to a WMA). The justification for singling out this large cohort for this benefit was that, as a general proposition, those who comprised it had special financial needs. Widows in this age bracket were likely to have been unemployed, dependent upon the earnings of their husbands for subsistence and not readily able to obtain employment. The justification for ceasing to grant pensions to widows is that this is no longer the position. Over the years married women have increasingly gone out to work and, if widowed, have continued to work or have obtained employment if they were not then in employment. f
Although statistics show that there is still some disparity between widows aged between 45 and 65 and men within the same age bracket so far as the benefits of employment are concerned, this does not justify the indiscriminate payment of widow's pensions. The change in the legislation grants to widows and widowers alike a bereavement allowance. This is, however, limited to a period of 52 weeks. g
It is not a substitute for a 20-year pension. h

[49] It follows that if, as Mr Naylor contends, the state has dragged its feet in legislating to bring the grant of a widow's pension to an end, the state has not thereby inflicted hardship on widowers in the same age bracket. What they complain of is not discrimination against men, but discrimination in favour of women, and there is a difference. j

[50] The legislature has now adopted means to remove this discrimination. The complaint is that it has not done so fast enough. In due course we shall have to consider what will constitute appropriate 'just satisfaction' if this complaint is made good. At this point we would simply observe that the nature of the discrimination complained of—excessive generosity to widows rather than oppressive deprivation of widowers—seems to us to be a relevant factor when

a. scrutinising the speed with which the state has moved to remedy the disparity of treatment.

b. 'The essential question seems to me to be not so much whether the position of women in the work-place had converged with that of men but, rather, when that position had been reached and when the government should have acted to recognise that convergence.'

Mr Cox submitted that the judge had correctly identified the issue, and we agree.

c. [52] It should occasion no surprise that the matrix of facts to which the state has had regard when taking decisions about widows' benefits is complex. Carol Freer, the Head of Work Rules 3 Section of the Working Age Group in the Department of Social Security had, in March 2001, responsibility for policy in relation to widows' benefits. In a witness statement made in that month she traces the history of widows' benefits from 1925. She exhibits statistical tables, showing how the position of women in society, and more pertinently in the work place, has changed over the years. A short summary of these gives some d. indication of the nature of these changes:

e. '11. Table 3 shows that in 2000, 84.3% of men were economically active, compared to 72.9% of women. By contrast, the figures for 1985 were 88.1% and 67% respectively. Table 5 sets out the percentage of inactive men and women with family responsibilities. In 2000, 0.9% of men and 12.7% of women fell within this category, whereas in 1985 the figures were 0.4% and 16.4% respectively. These figures show that even during the past 15 years, there has been a marked rise in the number of economically active women, and a corresponding (but smaller) fall in the number of women with family responsibilities who are economically inactive.

f. 12. Table 4 demonstrates that women still perform overwhelmingly more part-time work than men and this figure remains the same for women throughout the period 1985 to 2000 at 44%, whilst the figure for men has risen from 4% in 1985 to 9% in 2000. Tables 3 and 4 taken together therefore indicate that 84.3% of men are economically active and of these 91% work full-time, whereas 72.9% of women are economically active and of those g. 44% work part-time (or 56% work full-time). Table 7 sets out the comparison of economic activity of mothers by age of child, and shows that the most marked change has occurred in relation to those with children aged 0-4 years (48.2% economically active in 1990 compared with 58.2% economically active ten years later in 2000).

h. 13. Statistics regarding income levels are exhibited at "CEF1", p.200. These show that over time women have been closing the income gap, although the change is less marked for women working part time than for women working full time. In 1972 women working full time earned 64 pence for every £1 that a man earned, whereas by 1999 a woman was earning 84 pence for every £1 earned by men ...

j. 14. The fact that substantially more married women return to work quickly after having children now than in the 1970s and 80s also points to younger married women's greater involvement in the labour market, with them combining work and caring. Reference is made to Table 7 in this regard. Overall, these statistics show that there has been a marked change in the position of younger married women compared with older women within society and the workforce over the past 15 years.'

'27. Furthermore, this change has taken place only gradually over time. Amongst existing widows there will still be a significant number of women who were wholly dependent on their late husband's income, and that group will include a particularly high proportion of those older widows whose expectation on marrying was that their husband would provide a significant part if not all of the income of the household whilst they concentrated on bringing up any children and/or looked after the home. Some statistics which illustrate this point ... show that: b

(1) 44% of working women of all ages work part time, whereas 51% of women aged between 55 and 59 work part time; c

(2) there is a larger rise of 8% in the number of women aged between 55 and 59 working part time compared to those aged 45 to 49;

(3) there is a significant drop of 21% in women's economic activity for those aged between 55 and 59 as compared to those aged between 45 and 49; d

(4) men are more economically active than women across all the age ranges; however, the % difference ranges from 11% in the 45 to 49 age group up to 17% in the 55 to 59 age group.

Accordingly older women are less likely to work than both younger women and older men, and when they do work older women are more likely than the average woman to work part time.' e

'The Special Position of Older Women

22. A significant number of older widows, particularly those who stayed at home to care for children, will until now quite reasonably have expected to rely on their husband's income throughout their life. For very many older women, their and their husband's expectation on marrying was that their husband would provide a significant part, if not all, of the income of the household, whilst the wife concentrated on bringing up any children and/or looked after the home. For older women a return to the job market and the likelihood of finding full-time employment, although not impossible, would have been more difficult in even the recent past than it is now, since there is today a greater propensity for women of all ages to work at least part-time. So although society's expectations relating to the role of men and women has been changing during the past 15–20 years, the shift has been a gradual one, and it was therefore reasonable and proportionate for the legislation to continue to provide support by way of widows' pension to widows during this period of social change.' f

[55] We have incorporated these rather lengthy passages from Carol Freer's evidence because they illustrate the difficulty of the task that the court faces when evaluating an argument that the granting of widow's pensions should have been discontinued by 2000, rather than April 2001. Moses J grappled with the figures which demonstrated, so he found, that there ought to have been a growing appreciation that affording benefits only to women was having a disproportionate impact on the allocation of resources. At the end of the day, however, he accepted the Secretary of State's contention that there was objective justification for continuing to pay widow's pensions until April 2001. He held that the j

- a. government was entitled to wait until 1998 to produce a consultation paper on the subject and thereafter to wait until April 2001 before introducing measures designed to achieve equality. In so holding he applied the following principles: (i) it was appropriate for the court to scrutinise the evidence advanced by Carol Freer to see whether justification for discrimination was made out; (ii) the court should adopt a restrained approach to submissions that there were preferable alternative methods of meeting the needs for which widows' pensions were designed; such submissions directly engaged questions of social and economic policy with which the court was ill-equipped to deal; (iii) the government was entitled to a period for considering the effect of the increasing part that women had to play within the labour market; (iv) the government was entitled to a period to correct the effects of discrimination which was no longer justified; (v) in determining how to target resources to those in need, the legislature was entitled to impose 'bright line' rules which were easy to apply and which might not focus with precision on the merits of individual cases.

- [56] Mr Cox challenged the judge's approach in a number of respects. He submitted that it was not appropriate to accord the government a wide margin of discretion or to pay considerable deference to the legislature having regard to the fact that discrimination on account of gender is in issue. Equality between the sexes was a fundamental principle of democracy and of European Community law. Only compelling reasons supported by convincing evidence would suffice to justify a distinction based on sex. Even if there were reasons for the discrimination, they would not suffice unless the discrimination was reasonably proportionate to the object that it was intended to achieve. It would not be reasonably proportionate unless it represented the minimum difference of treatment necessary to achieve that object. On all of these matters the burden of proof lay on the Secretary of State.
- d.
- e.

- [57] Both the judge's approach and Mr Cox's attack upon it find support in the Strasbourg jurisprudence. The judge relied on Mellacher v Austria (1989) 12 EHRR 391. That case concerned restrictions on the rent that a property owner could charge, which brought into play the second paragraph of art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. The court observed (at 408–409 (para 45)):
- f.

- 'The second paragraph reserves to States the right to enact such laws as they deem necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest. Such laws are especially called for and usual in the field of housing, which in our modern societies is a central concern of social and economic policies. In order to implement such policies, the legislature must have a wide margin of appreciation both with regard to the existence of a problem of public concern warranting measures of control and as to the choice of the detailed rules for the implementation of such measures. The Court will respect the legislature's judgement as to what is in the general interest unless that judgement be manifestly without reasonable foundation.'
- g.
- h.

- [58] Mr Cox argued that, while this principle applied to dealings with property, it did not extend to a situation that involved discrimination on the ground of gender. He relied on Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471; Burghartz v Switzerland (1994) 18 EHRR 101 and Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503.
- j.

[59] Abdulaziz v UK involved discrimination in the field of immigration. Non-national wives were permitted entry into the United Kingdom to join their husbands, more readily than husbands were permitted entry to join their wives. The government sought to justify this on the ground that it was necessary to protect the labour market at a time of high unemployment, because men were more likely to seek work than women. The court held that the impact on the labour market was insufficiently significant to justify the discrimination. It is also worth recording the court's reaction to another argument, which has some relevance in the present context ((1985) 7 EHRR 471 at 503):

'82. There remains a more general argument advanced by the Government, namely that the United Kingdom was not in violation of Article 14 by reason of the fact that it acted more generously in some respects—that is, as regards the admission of non-national wives and fiancées of men settled in the country—than the Convention required. The Court cannot accept this argument. It would point out that Article 14 is concerned with the avoidance of discrimination in the enjoyment of the Convention rights in so far as the requirements of the Convention as to those rights can be complied with in different ways. The notion of discrimination within the meaning of Article 14 includes in general cases where a person or group is treated, without proper justification, less favourably than another, even though the more favourable treatment is not called for by the Convention.'

[60] Burghartz's case involved discrimination between husband and wife in relation to the entitlement to use family names. No substantive justification was put forward for this other than tradition. In these circumstances, the court commented ((1994) 18 EHRR 101 at 116 (para 27)):

'The Court reiterates that the advancement of the equality of the sexes is today a major goal in the Member States of the Council of Europe; this means that very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before a difference of treatment on the sole ground of sex could be regarded as compatible with the Convention.'

[61] In Van Raalte's case Dutch law provided for an exemption for unmarried childless women over the age of 45 from the obligation to pay contributions under the General Child Benefits Act. The applicant was an unmarried childless man who objected that his obligation to pay such contributions from 1985 to 1988 was discriminatory and violated art 14 when read with art 1 of the First Protocol. The exemption had been enacted in 1962 and abolished in 1989. The Commission concluded that the principal reason for this discrimination was sympathy for the plight of childless women whose condition would be exacerbated if they had to contribute to child benefit. The Commission considered that such considerations had become outmoded. They conceded ((1997) 24 EHRR 503 at 514 (para 44)) that—

'it is difficult to establish exactly at what moment developments have attained a durability and general acceptance which require them to be incorporated into legislation.'

They concluded, however, that on the facts the continuation of the discrimination until 1989 could not be justified as being the inevitably belated reaction to developments in society. The court concurred.

[62] This decision comes closest to the facts with which we are concerned. There are, however, significant differences. In Van Raalte's case there was, on analysis, no significant distinction between the position of women and men. On the facts before us there has, at all times, been a significantly larger proportion of widows between the ages of 45 and 65 without employment than of widowers in a the same age group. The contrast between the two cohorts has, however, been steadily shrinking. At what point did the distinction between the two cohorts reduce to such an extent that art 14 required the state to take action to remove the favourable treatment accorded to widows?

[63] Despite Mr Cox’s submissions, we consider that in answering this question a very considerable margin of discretion must be accorded to the Secretary of State. Difficult questions of economic and social policy were involved, the resolution of which fell within the province of the executive and the legislature rather than the courts. In this context we revert to the fact that the issue was the point in time at which benefits which had long been enjoyed by widows should be withdrawn. No statistical formula or calculation could provide a precise answer to this question. At the end of the day, however, the burden must lie on the Secretary of State to provide objective justification for what was, without question, discrimination in favour of women.

[64] We have concluded, contrary to the conclusion of Moses J, that the Secretary of State has failed to discharge this burden. Different strands of the evidence all lead to the same conclusion. By 1995, if not earlier, the difference in economic activity between women and men no longer justified discriminating between them by paying, indiscriminately, pensions to widows aged between 45 and 65.

[65] The starting point must be the statistics. We have quoted above the passage from Carol Freer’s statement in which she compares the economic activity of women in 1985 with that in 2000. It is informative to compare, in the tables to which she refers, the position in 2000 with the position in 1995. We have extracted the relevant data:

Table 1—Older women compared to younger women

Age 18–24	69.8%	70.8%
Age 25–34	71.6%	75.3%
Age 35–39	76.6%	77.7%
Age 50–59	63.2%	65.9%

Table 2—Older men compared to older women
% of older men and women economically active

Men aged 50–54	71.5%	72.5%
Women aged 50–59	63.2%	65.9%

Table 3—% of men and women economically active

Men	84.7%	84.3%
Women	70.9%	72.9%

Table 4—Part time working by men and women

Women	44%	44%

Table 5—Comparison of economically inactive men and women looking after family/home

Men	0.7%	0.9%
Women	15.4%	12.7%

Table 7—Comparison of economic activity of mothers by age of child

Age of child	1995	2000
0–4 years	51.9%	58.2%
5–10 years	71%	73.6%
11–15 years	77%	78.3%
16–18 years	81.8%	80%

[66] The change between 1995 and 2000 can be seen to be relatively modest. This, of course, would be nothing to the point if the figures spanned a watershed, but it does not seem to us that they do. The economic activity of women in 1995, including older women, makes it difficult to accept that there was still justification for the payment of pensions to all older widows as a class. By 1995, in 22.7% of all households where the woman was in some form of paid employment, she was also the main breadwinner.

[67] Our impression that 1995 to 2000 was not a watershed period receives support from comments made by those who had the conduct of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill on behalf of the government in Parliament. The Consultation Paper published by the government in November 1998, after stating that the current scheme was unfair because, among other reasons, ‘It gives most help to people who do not need widows’ benefits all their lives when they are earning a decent living or have large occupational pensions or life insurance’, went on to describe the case for reform as ‘overwhelming’. ‘Equal treatment’, it commented, ‘can no longer be ignored’. In committee, Mr Stephen Timms MP described the benefits system as ‘hugely out of date as regards bereavement’ and ‘woefully out of date’. Mr Stephen Bayley MP, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, said:

‘The current system is both unfair and outdated. It does not reflect today’s society with 70% of married women now working and it openly discriminates against married men. We agree that widowers have been poorly treated by the system in the past and we want to change that for the

[68] Looking at the position in Europe, the following countries had established equal entitlement to survivors’ benefits by 1995: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Russia and Turkey. Moses J commented that it was difficult to accord overriding weight to this factor. The brief description of the position in other countries did not enable the court to assess the overall economic impact of the measures taken. As a general proposition we agree, but the overall picture cuts the ground from the submission, largely ‘ex cathedra’, that there were good reasons for the government to take no steps to bring this country into line with our neighbours until 1998.

[69] For these reasons we find that the Secretary of State has failed to establish that, after 1995, there was objective justification for not taking steps to remove the discrimination involved in paying pensions to widows aged between 45 and 65, when widowers had no similar entitlement.

The fourth issue

[70] The best way of explaining this issue is to quote the paragraphs of the skeleton argument submitted on behalf of the state in which the Walden point is advanced:

‘It is an established principle in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights that where there is a potential breach of the Convention, the relevant domestic legal authorities are afforded a reasonable period within which to change clear statutory provisions for the future, and are not be treated as having been in breach of the Convention in other cases, retrospectively: see Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 at para 58; Walden v Liechtenstein (App No 33916/96) (16 March 2000, unreported) at pp 6–7; JR v Germany App No 22651/93 (18 October 1995, unreported). The starting point for this reasonable period may be an authoritative ruling by the European Court of Human Rights or by a national constitutional court on the critical point.

The essence of this doctrine is that in circumstances where the legal position has been unclear and it is then authoritatively clarified, and where an entire administrative system (eg for the payment of welfare benefits) will have to be adjusted as a result to take account of the law as clarified, it is reasonable to afford a state a reasonable period to adjust—while in the meantime maintaining the application of the established rules in respect of persons affected. This is in the interests of promoting legal certainty, ensuring that changes can be properly funded, and ensuring that the system can continue to be properly administered without invidious or difficult choices having to be made by state officials responsible for administering the system (which would carry the risk of unjustified differential treatment of similar cases).’

[71] The Secretary of State submitted in his skeleton argument that the earliest point at which the state could be required to take action ‘under the domestic regime’ was 2 October 2000, when the 1998 Act came into force. By that time Parliament had already recognised, by passing the 1999 Act, that the differential treatment between widows and widowers needed to be corrected. The complexity of the changes required a reasonable period of delay before they were implemented. The 1999 Act, in fact, came into force only six months after 2 October 2000. This period of delay was no more than reasonable. Thus it followed, so the state submitted, that no complaint could be made of breach of the convention during this period, or earlier. This submission received a degree of refinement in the course of oral argument, but remained the same in principle. We propose to look at the principle before relating it to the facts. a [72] In Marckx's case the Strasbourg court was concerned with a provision of Belgian law that restricted the capacity of a mother to give or bequeath property to her illegitimate child. The court held that this provision infringed art 8 and art 14, when taken in conjunction with both art 8 and art 1 of the First Protocol of the convention. The question was raised of the effect that the court's judgment might have on the many distributions of estates within Belgium shown to have been effected according to law which infringed the convention. In a ruling which was without precedent at Strasbourg, but which drew on the jurisprudence of the Luxembourg court, the court held: b

'Having regard to all these circumstances, the principle of legal certainty, which is necessarily inherent in the law of the Convention as in Community Law, dispenses the Belgian State from re-opening legal acts or situations that antedate the delivery of the present Judgment. Moreover, a similar solution is found in certain Contracting States having a constitutional court: their public law limits the retroactive effects of those decisions of that court that annul legislation.'c

[73] Walden's case was a case concerned with a Liechtenstein pension law that discriminated against women. After protracted civil litigation, in which the applicant was unsuccessful at all levels, including the Supreme Court, he obtained a ruling from the state court, sitting as a Constitutional Court, that the relevant legislation was unconstitutional as being contrary to the principle of non-discrimination on the ground of gender. Legislative procedures were already in train to reform the legislation in a manner which would make it convention-compliant. The legislation was, however, complex and the proposed changes might take time. In these circumstances, the state court decided not to set aside the legislation or to quash the decision of the Supreme Court. d

[74] The Strasbourg court noted that the parties' submissions concentrated on the question of whether the state court should have set the contested legislative provisions aside. The applicant contended that it should have done so, with retroactive effect. The government contended that it was prevented from doing so for reasons of legal certainty. In fact, the amending legislation was introduced within about seven months of the state court's decision. The Strasbourg court ruled as follows: e

'Taking all these circumstances into account, the court finds that the present case does not differ substantially from the case in which a Constitutional Court annuls an unconstitutional provision and sets a time limit for enacting new legislation. It, therefore, considers that the state court's decision, which had the effect that unconstitutional legislation remained applicable to the applicant for a limited period, served the interests of legal certainty. Given the brevity of this period which ended about seven months after the state court's decision, namely on 1 January 1997 when new legislation entered into force, the continued application of the pension provisions at issue can also be regarded as proportionate.'f a [75] Two related principles are to be derived from the two cases that we have just considered. (1) Where the Strasbourg court rules that a state's legislation violates the convention, the court can, in the interests of legal certainty, direct that its decision shall not have retrospective effect. (2) Where the Constitutional Court of a state rules that a law of that state is unconstitutional in a respect which violates the convention, that court will not itself infringe the convention if it refrains from annulling the legislation in order to permit its orderly amendment within a reasonable time.

b [76] We cannot see how either of these principles impacts on the present case. As to the first principle, we understand that the Strasbourg court has only applied this once—in Marckx's case itself. The complaint made against the Secretary of State is that he delayed too long in initiating reform, to which it can be no answer that it takes time to implement reform.

c [77] So far as the second principle is concerned, this country has no Constitutional Court. The manner in which we have given effect to the convention preserves the supremacy of Parliament. The court can do no more than declare legislation incompatible with the convention, leaving it to d Parliament to address the offending legislation. The Walden principle can have no direct application in this jurisdiction.

e [78] Having said this, we consider that the Walden principle reflects the fact that the state is entitled not merely to a wide margin of appreciation when considering whether and when a change is required to the law in order to ensure that it remains convention compliant in changing circumstances, but that, having so decided, it is entitled to such time as is reasonable to make the necessary change. No criticism has been, or in our view could be, made of the period taken to consult on and then introduce the 1999 Act. The criticism, which we have held to be well founded, has been of the delay in deciding that a change in the law was necessary.

[79] The submissions in relation to this issue were made by Mr Goudie QC on behalf of Mr Hooper and adopted by Mr Cox on behalf of Messrs Withey and Martin. It could not be advanced on behalf of Mr Naylor because no claim in g respect of a widow's pension has been the subject of a settlement at Strasbourg.

[80] The submissions can be summarised as follows. Claimants have brought claims in Strasbourg which mirror those of the appellants. The state has followed a policy of settling Strasbourg claims as soon as they have been held to be admissible. The state has declined to settle the claims of the appellants. This, so h it is alleged, constitutes discrimination in favour of the Strasbourg claimants which infringes art 14, in combination with art 8 and with art 1 of the First Protocol.

i [81] We have had difficulty in identifying the precise nature of this issue. On reflecting on Mr Goudie's submissions after the October hearing it seemed to us that the case which he had advanced differed from that which Moses J had addressed. We sought clarification of his case at the March hearing and this made it clear that it does indeed differ from the case addressed in the judgment of Moses J. It is not clear to us whether this is because Moses J did not fully appreciate the nature of the appellants' case or because Mr Goudie has refined his case since the hearing at first instance. Certainly no objection was raised on behalf of the Secretary of State that Mr Goudie had changed his ground. We propose first to make some general comments about the nature of claims of breach of art 14, then to consider the manner in which Moses J dealt with the issue and finally to address the issue as it was presented before us. a

Article 14 claims

[82] Article 14 forbids discrimination in securing convention rights and obligations. The article makes plain the grounds of discrimination against which it is primarily addressed, namely 'any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status'. Thus, typically, the article addresses the situation where a state discriminates against a readily identifiable class in the manner in which it respects, or fails to respect, convention rights. The discrimination need not go so far as infringing the convention rights of the party discriminated against—were that the case art 14 would be superfluous. More generous treatment in securing the enjoyment of a convention right by one class rather than the other can suffice to engage art 14, in conjunction with the right in question. We repeat the principle stated by the Strasbourg court in Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471 at 503 (para 82): b

'The notion of discrimination within the meaning of Article 14 includes, in general, cases where a person or group is treated, without proper justification, less favourably than another, even though the more favourable treatment is not called for by the Convention.' d

The nature of this nexus between art 14 and some other convention right is usually described, not very helpfully, by the proposition that the facts must fall 'within the ambit' of a substantive convention right. e

[83] Where it is alleged that art 14 has been infringed it is first necessary to consider whether the claimant has been treated less favourably in relation to the enjoyment of a convention right than others. If he has, the next task is to identify why this is—on what grounds has he suffered discrimination? If there is no rational explanation for the discrimination, art 14 will not be engaged. Equally, if the discrimination has been for some idiosyncratic reason, such as a personal dislike of the claimant on the part of a state official, art 14 will not be engaged. The terms of art 14 suggest that what has to be demonstrated is that the claimant is one of a class or group who share a distinguishing characteristic and that this characteristic is the ground upon which the state distinguishes against the members of the class or group. Racial discrimination is the paradigm example. f

[84] It follows that the reason for the discrimination will be the touchstone of the identification of the class. The identification of a common factor which results in discrimination will at the same time result in the identification of the class or group discriminated against. Care has to be taken to make sure that the common factor is, indeed, the ground for discrimination. This will not be so if there are other factors which explain treating the claimants differently from others. Thus it is necessary to be sure that, apart from the alleged ground for discrimination, the claimants are in an analogous situation to those who are more favourably treated. Consideration of an art 14 claim usually involves comparing the class into which the claimant falls with a comparator class that is treated more favourably. An issue can arise, and does arise in this case, as to whether the distinction between the two classes has to be a personal characteristic or status, such as one of the examples listed in art 14. h

[85] In the leading judgment in Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136 Brooke LJ recommended the following structured approach to consideration of an art 14 claim. The court should ask, a sequentially, four questions. If any one is answered in the negative it will normally follow that the claim is ill-founded. The questions (at [20]) are:

(i) Do the facts fall within the ambit of one or more of the substantive Convention provisions (for the relevant Convention rights see s 1(1) of the 1998 Act)? (ii) If so, was there different treatment as respects that right between the complainant on the one hand and other persons put forward for comparison ("the chosen comparators") on the other? (iii) Were the chosen comparators in an analogous situation to the complainant's situation? (iv) If so, did the difference in treatment have an objective and reasonable justification: in other words, did it pursue a legitimate aim and did the differential treatment bear a reasonable relationship of proportionality to the aim sought to be achieved?

c We agree with Brooke LJ that this structured approach is helpful. It is one that was followed by Moses J.

The treatment of art 14 by Moses J

d [86] The foundation of the claim before Moses J was a policy followed by the Secretary of State which the claimants alleged infringed art 14. The policy was stated in a letter written on behalf of the Secretary of State to Mr Hooper on 26 May 2000 in the following terms:

e 'As you know, the Government has secured friendly settlement in two [Strasbourg] cases recently. Nevertheless there is no statutory basis to make payments of Widow's Benefits to men and the Government's obligation, following the European Court of Human Rights' finding that the cases are admissible, is to future widowers. There are no plans to make extra-statutory payments before the new bereavement benefits are introduced other than to those widowed fathers who take cases to the European Court of Human Rights and obtain an admissibility ruling.'

g [87] As Moses J understood the position, the claimants identified themselves as belonging to a class of claimants in domestic proceedings and identified as the comparator and more favoured class, claimants before the Strasbourg Court. The discriminatory treatment complained of consisted of reaching friendly settlements with Strasbourg claimants whose claims had been ruled admissible but refusing to conclude similar settlements with domestic claimants.

h [88] Moses J first considered whether the facts fell 'within the ambit' of art 8. He decided, very shortly, that they did. Before us the Secretary of State challenged that conclusion. We consider that Moses J was correct for the following simple reason.

i [89] It is common ground that discrimination between widows who receive benefits and widowers who do not engages art 8. It seems to us to follow that discrimination between Strasbourg claimants whose art 8 claims are settled and domestic claimants whose art 8 claims are not settled must also engage art 8. Counsel for the Secretary of State sought to dissuade us from this conclusion by submitting that the Strasbourg claimants were claiming compensation in respect of breaches of their art 8 rights whereas the domestic claimants were seeking to enforce such rights. We failed to follow why this should make any difference.

[90] Moses J took it as read that there was different treatment in settling Strasbourg claims but not settling domestic claims. He then turned to the third question identified by Brooke LJ, namely whether Strasbourg claimants and domestic claimants were in an analogous situation. In order to answer this question Moses J considered two matters, although not in this order: (1) would discrimination in favour of claimants on the ground that they were claiming in Strasbourg, rather than in England, engage art 14; and (2) were there grounds for distinguishing between Strasbourg claimants and English claimants other than simply the venue in which the claims were being pursued?

[91] Moses J answered the first question in the negative. The Secretary of State submitted to Moses J, and submits to us, that the difference in treatment of Strasbourg claimants and domestic claimants does not fall within art 14 because art 14 only applies to discrimination on the ground of 'a personal characteristic (status) by which persons or groups of persons are distinguishable from each other' (see Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711). Moses J accepted this submission. Mr Goudie submitted to us that Kjeldsen's case was outdated jurisprudence and referred us to the very recent decision of this court in Michalak's case in support of this submission. We share the view expressed by Brooke LJ in that case ([2002] 4 All ER 1136 at [34]) that Kjeldsen's case appears to have been superseded by more recent Strasbourg authority. We can see no reason in principle why litigants in the English court should not be entitled to complain under art 14 if, on the ground of their status as litigants in that court, they are treated less favourably than litigants before the Strasbourg court in a manner which engages one of the other convention rights.

[92] Accordingly, we do not agree with the reasoning of Moses J in relation to this first question. It is, however, no longer relevant (if it ever was) for Mr Goudie has made it plain that he does not rely upon the venue of litigation as being the characteristic which distinguishes between the claimants and the Strasbourg litigants, or as the ground upon which the adverse treatment of the claimants is based.

[93] In dealing with the second question, Moses J concluded that it was not simply the venue in which the claims were brought that was the ground for distinguishing between Strasbourg and domestic litigants. There were substantive differences between the relief available in the two jurisdictions. He cited Stubbings v UK (1996) 1 BHRC 316 and National and Provincial Building Society v UK (1998) 25 EHRR 127 as establishing that the forum in which the claimants litigate may afford a valid ground for distinction between groups of litigants. It does not seem to us that either of these decisions establishes that proposition, but we think that the facts of this case are demonstration enough that the proposition is true. To succeed in the domestic forum the claimants have to surmount the barriers posed by s 22(4) of the 1998 Act. That section precludes a claimant from basing a claim under the Act on any act that took place before 2 October 2000 when the 1998 Act came into force. Most of the claimants became 'victims' before 2 October 2000. Those who claim in Strasbourg will not be affected by the fact that their claims relate to decisions taken before 2 October 2000. In this jurisdiction the Secretary of State contends that the relevant decisions, or at least some of them, were taken before 2 October 2000 and is invoking s 22(4) of the 1998 Act in answer to the claims—see the eighth issue below. There are thus substantive grounds for resisting the claims in this jurisdiction which are not available at Strasbourg. Litigants in this jurisdiction are patently not in an analogous situation to litigants before the court in Strasbourg. Moses J was correct so to conclude.

[94] Moses J held that, because claimants at Strasbourg were not in an analogous position to claimants before the English court, it was unnecessary to consider whether there was an objective justification for treating them differently. He went on to do so none the less, because he held that a similar

- a question arose under the plea that the differentiation of treatment was irrational and therefore unlawful under principles of domestic public law. He held that because claims brought in the English court raised 'major constitutional points in domestic law' it was rational and legitimate for the state to settle claims in Strasbourg but to leave itself free to pursue the issues that arose in domestic law.
- b [95] The issues of objective justification and rationality considered by Moses J are similar to issues raised by the 'Strasbourg discrimination' issue as formulated, or re-formulated, before us. We propose to consider them in that context.

- c [96] The clue to the fact that the Strasbourg discrimination point was to be put before us on a different basis to that considered by Moses J was to be found in a passage in Mr Goudie's skeleton argument. This contended that the justification accepted by Moses J was directed at the wrong target in that it addressed the issue of why the state had not settled the present proceedings but did not address Mr Hooper's actual complaint that 'he should have received an extra-statutory payment without having to commence any litigation at all'. At the October
- d hearing neither we, nor we believe counsel for the Secretary of State, fully appreciated the nature of the case being advanced. This was clarified by Mr Goudie at the resumed hearing in March. His argument on behalf of Mr Hooper runs as follows. The unlawful discrimination is between two classes of those who became 'victims' of discrimination by making claims for benefit.
- e One class consists of those seeking compensation by bringing claims at Strasbourg whose claims have been ruled admissible. The other class consists of those who have not made claims at Strasbourg. The policy favours the former, by settling their claims, whereas no such accommodation is offered to the latter. Before 2 October 2000 the latter had no right to claim that this discrimination infringed art 14. That right arose when the state failed to change its policy on
- f 2 October 2000. At that point Mr Hooper and those in like position acquired a right to complain that this continuing discrimination infringed art 14. Claimants at Strasbourg have been granted settlements which compensate them both for their failure to receive benefits before 2 October 2000 and for their failure to receive benefits during the period from 2 October 2000 to 9 April 2001, when the new regime came into force. In order to avoid discrimination the state is bound
- g to make ex gratia payments of like amounts to victims who have not brought claims at Strasbourg.

- h [97] In this way Mr Goudie seeks to get on its feet a claim that will compensate Mr Hooper for failure to receive benefits during the period before the 1998 Act came into effect, thereby finessing the effect of s 22(4)(b) of the 1998 Act. Messrs Withey and Naylor are in the same position in relation to discrimination that they allege occurred before 2 October 2000.

- i [98] At the March hearing Mr Sales clarified the Secretary of State's policy. It applied only to claims commenced at Strasbourg before 2 October 2000, which claims necessarily covered a period before the 1998 Act came into force. In relation to those claims it was at all material times the policy of the state to reach a friendly settlement with the claimant once the claim had been ruled admissible by the Strasbourg court. This policy did not extend to claims commenced after 2 October 2000. As far as such claims are concerned, it has been the practice of the state to contend that they are inadmissible because the claimant has not exhausted the remedies that are, or may be, now available in this country under s 6(1) of the 1998 Act.

[99] It seems to us that, while Mr Hooper, Mr Withey and Mr Naylor are all in a position to contend that, as pre-2 October 2000 victims, they are in comparable positions to those whose cases have been the subject of friendly settlements at Strasbourg, Mr Martin is not in the same position as he did not become a victim until 2 October 2000.

[100] Before us Mr Sales understandably sought to rely upon a recent 'partial decision as to admissibility' by the Strasbourg court in relation to 26 applicants who have advanced claims similar to those with which we are concerned. Two applicants advanced claims similar to that of Mr Wilkinson, described as claims in respect of 'Bereavement Tax Allowance'. They contended that they had been discriminated against as compared with other widowers who had received payments under friendly settlements of their claims. The court ruled that this discrimination claim was 'manifestly ill-founded', remarking:

'The court notes that the men concerned have received those payments in friendly settlement of applications which have been communicated to the government by this court. The court considers that the applicants in the present cases are not in an analogous situation to those men ...'

[101] While this decision is plainly in point, we have been unable to follow the precise reasoning of the court. Quite apart from this decision, however, it seems to us that there is a fatal flaw in the Strasbourg discrimination claim as now formulated. The policy alleged to be discriminatory is one under which any pre-1998 Act victim who brought a claim at Strasbourg before 2 October 2000 and has that claim ruled admissible, will receive a friendly settlement. That policy does not create two classes of victims, one of which is treated more favourably than the other. It applies a single condition precedent to receipt of a friendly settlement by a member of a single class—namely pre-1998 Act victims. The reason why Mr Hooper and those in a like position are not able to benefit from this policy is because they have not advanced a claim at Strasbourg, not because there is a policy which discriminates between one class and another.

[102] For this reason, we consider that the fifth issue falls to be decided against the appellants. The issue of objective justification does not arise. However, a similar issue remains alive under domestic public law, and we now turn to consider it.

[103] The irrationality challenge can be simply stated. Mr Goudie contended that the state's policy of declining to pay victims of discrimination unless and until a claim had been brought at Strasbourg and declared admissible was a policy of attrition that had no justification and was irrational and unfair. There could be no justification for requiring claimants to follow a course which involved treading a road which was 'long and hard' and which now included exhausting domestic remedies under the 1998 Act before finally settling at Strasbourg a claim which was certain to succeed. He contended that the state should have treated the friendly settlement reached in the Strasbourg proceedings in Cornwell v UK as if it were the determination of a test case, so that other claimants in the same position as Mr Cornwell should be treated in similar fashion. He relied, by analogy, on the approach of this court in R v Hertfordshire CC, ex p Cheung (1986) Times, 26 March.

[104] Cheung's case was not a test case. We do not consider that the suggested analogy is a fair one, or that a settlement without admission of liability, whether at Strasbourg or in any other proceedings, requires the state to make equivalent

- a payments to all in a like position to the claimant whose claim has been settled. A well-recognised motive for settling a case is to avoid the risk of an adverse decision and a settlement cannot be considered as carrying the same consequences as such a decision.

[105] Article 38 of the convention provides as follows:

- b '1. If the Court declares the application admissible, it shall ... (b) place itself at the disposal of the parties concerned with a view to securing a friendly settlement of the matter on the basis of respect for human rights as defined in the Convention and the protocols thereto.'

- c [106] Rule 62 of the Rules of the Strasbourg court make the following provisions in relation to friendly settlements:

d '1. Once an application has been declared admissible, the Registrar, acting on the instructions of the Chamber or its President, shall enter into contact with the parties with a view to securing a friendly settlement of the matter in accordance with Article 38(1)(b) of the Convention. The Chamber shall take any steps that appear appropriate to facilitate such a settlement.

e '2. In accordance with Article 38(2) of the Convention, the friendly-settlement negotiations shall be confidential and without prejudice to the parties' argument in the contentious proceedings. No written or oral communication and no offer or concession made in the framework of the attempt to secure a friendly settlement may be referred to or relied on in the contentious proceedings.

f '3. If the Chamber is informed by the Registrar that the parties have agreed to a friendly settlement, it shall, after verifying that the settlement has been reached on the basis of respect for human rights as defined in the Convention and the protocols thereto, strike the case out of the Court's list in accordance with Rule 44(2).'

- g [107] We can see no basis for spelling out of these provisions a principle whereby a friendly settlement of a claim requires a state to treat all others in the same position as the claimant in the same way. No precedent has been cited to us to support such a proposition, whether in the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court, or in our domestic jurisprudence.

- h [108] Moses J accepted the contention of Mr Sales that it was legitimate and rational for the state to settle cases at Strasbourg in order, in effect, to keep its powder dry to fight the first battle before the domestic court once the 1998 Act had come into force. Mr Goudie complained that this assertion was unsupported by any evidence and was unconvincing. In a footnote to its skeleton argument for the resumed hearing, the Secretary of State provided details of the battle that the United Kingdom is currently fighting before the Strasbourg court to ensure that, at the present time, no claim of the type with which we are concerned should be admitted until a remedy has first been sought in domestic proceedings under the 1998 Act. We consider that this lends some support to the contention that the government's strategy has been all along to preserve for litigation in the domestic forum issues with which we are concerned before contesting these at Strasbourg. At the end of the day, however, we do not consider that this is something which the Secretary of State has to prove. It suffices that we can see nothing demonstrably perverse, irrational or unfair about a course of conduct which has brought about that result.

[109] Moses J held that payment of a widow's payment and a WMA to widows, but not to widowers, involved infringement of art 14, in conjunction with art 8, which could not be justified. That finding has not been challenged before us. He held that the Secretary of State had objective justification for paying a widow's pension to widows but not to widowers. We have allowed the appeal against that finding. Moses J held that the appellants were entitled to a declaration that ss 36 and 37 of the 1992 Act were incompatible with their convention rights, but not to any monetary compensation. This was because he ruled that s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act provided the Secretary of State with a defence to the allegation that he had acted unlawfully. The appellants challenge that conclusion.

[110] The manner in which the appellants put their claim is as follows. (i) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right—s 6(1) of the 1998 Act. (ii) 'Act' includes 'failure to act'—s 6(6) of the 1998 Act. (iii) Paying benefits to widows who had claimed payment, but not to widowers who had claimed payment, was discrimination which was incompatible with convention rights. (iv) Had the state made extra-statutory payments to widowers equivalent to the benefits paid to widows, there would have been no discrimination and therefore no violation of the convention. (v) It follows that it was and is unlawful for the state to refrain from making those extra-statutory payments. (vi) A mandatory order should be made requiring the state to make the extra-statutory payments in question. (vii) Alternatively, the appellants are entitled to damages for the breach of the Secretary of State's duty to make extra-statutory payments.

'Mr Sales accepts that s 6(2)(a) has no application in the instant case. He makes the important concession that ss 36 and 37 [of the 1992 Act] do not expressly, or by implication, exclude the power of the Crown to make an extra-statutory payment. The source of such power ... was not made clear to me.'

[112] At the October hearing we sought clarification from Mr Garnham as to the basis of the Secretary of State's concession. This led him to place before us a paper on Parliamentary control over expenditure to the effect that any payment to widowers on an extra-statutory basis would need to be accounted for within estimates presented to Parliament. This did not wholly answer our question—indeed it seemed to us, and we suspect to Mr Garnham, that this suggested, at the least, that parliamentary approval would be needed before the Secretary of State could make payments to widowers. Right at the end of the October hearing, however, Mr Garnham informed us, on instructions but without explanation, that the Secretary of State enjoyed extra-statutory power to make payments to all widowers of sums equivalent to the benefits received by widows.

[113] We have not been prepared to accept this concession without question and, at the resumed hearing, we asked the parties to present argument on the predicate that it was unsound. At that hearing Mr Sales provided, in a lengthy section of his skeleton argument, an explanation of the concession. He also emphasised that, while in the context of the present case, this was correctly described as a concession, the Secretary of State was concerned at the wider

- a implications of a possible finding by this court that he enjoyed no common law power to make the payments in question.

[114] The issue of whether the Secretary of State enjoys the common law power in question need not be addressed if Moses J was correct to conclude, on the premise that he enjoyed such a power, that he committed no breach of duty in deciding not to exercise it. We turn first to that question.

- b [115] The appellants' argument is a simple one. If the Secretary of State has a power to make extra-statutory payments, s 6(1) obliges him to exercise that power for, by so doing, he will avoid the breach of the appellants' convention rights which will otherwise occur. Moses J rejected this argument. He held:

- c [183] In the instant case, it seems to me that the fatal flaw in the claimants' argument is that its effect is to convert the power to make an extra-statutory payment into a duty. It destroys the power altogether. There are no circumstances in which the defendant could exercise a power not to give a benefit.

- d [184] For that reason I conclude that the primary legislation is incompatible with the convention. Whatever the nature of the power, at least it can be said that the legislation imposes no duty to give benefits to widowers and cannot be read in a way which has that effect. The Secretary of State's refusal gives effect to those provisions and the power to make statutory allowances is irrelevant. He can rely upon s 6(2)(b).'

- e [116] At the October hearing we had difficulty in understanding this passage from the judgment below and following the argument advanced on behalf of the Secretary of State to support it. With the benefit of further submissions made at the March hearing, we now believe that we understand this argument. We shall set out, in stages, the argument as we understand it. (i) Section 6(2)(a) provides an authority with a defence when a statute requires the authority to Act in a way
f which is incompatible with a convention right; s 6(2)(b) provides an authority with a defence where a statute confers on an authority a power which, if exercised, will necessarily involve infringement of a convention right. (ii) The 1992 and 1999 Acts, on their true construction, leave unfettered the Secretary of State's common law power to pay benefits to widowers if he chooses so to do. (iii) Each g Act might, for the avoidance of doubt, have provided 'this Act is without prejudice to the Secretary of State's common law power to pay benefits to widowers, if he chooses so to do'. The position would still have been precisely the same as (ii). (iv) Each Act might have stated: '(i) The Secretary of State may pay benefits to widowers if he chooses so to do; (ii) The Secretary of State may h refrain from making payments to widowers if he chooses so to do ...'. The position would still have been precisely the same as in (ii) and (iii). (v) Had the Acts expressly authorised the Secretary of State to refrain from paying benefits to widowers, the exercise of that statutory power would necessarily have involved infringing their convention rights. In such circumstances s 6(2)(b) would have provided him with a defence. (vi) Parliament cannot have intended that, by j leaving implicit what could have been expressed, the Secretary of State's discretion should be fettered by the 1998 Act.

[117] We accept the starting point of this argument. If a statute confers an express power which can only be exercised in a manner which infringes a convention right, then Parliament has expressly authorised a breach of the convention. Section 6(2)(b) preserves the supremacy of Parliament by permitting an authority to exercise the power granted by Parliament.

[118] The chain of reasoning that follows is, however, fallacious. If the 1992 and 1999 Acts do not restrict a common law power enjoyed by the Secretary of States to make payments to whomsoever he pleases, it does not follow that Parliament has thereby authorised the Secretary of State to ignore the requirements of the 1998 Act when deciding whether or not to exercise that power. A duty in certain circumstances to make payments to widowers is in no way incompatible with a general common law power to make payments to anybody. a

[119] The 1992 and 1999 Acts expressly require the Secretary of State to pay benefits to widows in accordance with their terms. If he retains a common law power to make payments to widowers, we cannot see how a decision not to exercise that power can be said to be necessary in order to give effect to the provisions, express or implied, of either Act. The decision of Moses J on this point was in error. c

Does the Secretary of State have a common law power to pay benefits to widowers?

[120] The Secretary of State's primary case, albeit contrary to his interests in this litigation, has been that the 1992 and the 1999 Acts left him free, if he thought fit, to introduce an extra-statutory regime under which widowers would receive benefits commensurate to those to which widows were entitled under the two Acts. Alternatively he submitted that, if the two Acts preclude his common law power to make payments to widowers, they do so comprehensively, so that he has acted beyond his powers in settling with Strasbourg claimants and will not even have power to honour any judgments that may be given in favour of the litigants in these proceedings. d

[121] Paradoxically, while the Secretary of State has been prepared to concede that he has common law powers that would enable him to make payments to all widowers, Mr Goudie, on behalf of Mr Hooper, has been prepared to concede that he has not. Mr Goudie has accepted that it would be inconsistent with the scheme of the legislation for the Secretary of State to pay to all widowers' benefits equivalent to those received by widows. He has argued that the Secretary of State none the less retains common law powers to make payments to those who have brought these proceedings and to those other claimants who are in the same position as the appellants. f

[122] If the appellants are to succeed in their claims to monetary payments we think that they must demonstrate that the 1992 and 1999 Acts left the Secretary of State free to make extra-statutory payments to all widowers. If they did, then it can be argued that the Secretary of State should be ordered to exercise that power in favour of the appellants, or pay damages in lieu. If they did not, the Secretary of State will have a defence under s 6(2)(a) of the 1998 Act on the basis that the Acts required him to make payments to widows in circumstances where he had no power to make equivalent payments to widowers. h

[123] It is unfortunate that we approach this important issue of the powers of the Secretary of State in circumstances where the two parties have made conflicting concessions against interest. The result is that the issue has not been fully explored in argument. j

[124] The appellants' claim to an order for money payment is founded on the contention that the Secretary of State had and has the power to make ex gratia payments that will place widowers in the same position as widows. While the Secretary of State has purported to accept that this is indeed the position, much of the argument advanced on his behalf has been to the effect that it would be a contrary to the will of Parliament to exercise that power in the manner suggested. Thus, in the skeleton argument for the October hearing, prepared by Mr Sales and Miss Stratford, the following contention is advanced:

b 'To seek an order from the court in relation to an extra-statutory, discretionary payment is, the respondent respectfully submits, misconceived. In substance, the appellants are attempting to mount a collateral attack on Parliament's failure to legislate in a particular way in the 1992 and/or 1999 Acts, and its deliberate choice to confine widow's benefits to widows (with no entitlement for widowers). The necessary implication of the appellants' argument in this respect is that the Secretary of State is required under the 1998 Act to set up the very scheme for payment of benefits to widowers which Parliament chose not to set up when it legislated by way of primary legislation in this field; according to the appellants the Secretary of State must treat himself as bound to make such payments, whereas Parliament specifically decided that he should not be so bound. Such a collateral attack upon Parliament's failure to legislate in this regard would be directly contrary to the provisions of the 1998 Act, to the scheme of that Act, and to parliamentary sovereignty which the 1998 Act is careful to preserve.'

e [125] After referring to the constitutional principle that there be full Parliamentary control over taxation and expenditure—see Dicey Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th edn, 1959) pp 315–318—the skeleton argument continues:

'It would not (with respect) be constitutionally legitimate for the courts, even with the benefit of the 1998 Act, to impose requirements as to extra-statutory payments to be made by the Crown to fill in a gap deliberately left by Parliament in legislation.'

f [126] These submissions are echoed by Moses J's observation ([2002] All ER (D) 193 (Feb) at [185]) that Mr Goudie's argument in relation to s 6 came 'perilously close to a submission that the court should impose a duty to grant benefits where Parliament has chosen not to do so'.

g [127] Mr Sales accepted that where Parliament has legislated in such a way as to occupy an entire field, any prerogative or common law right of the Crown to act within that field will be displaced. He contended, however, (against his interest in this appeal) that the 1992 and 1999 Acts did not occupy the field in relation to bereavement benefits so as to preclude the common law power of the Crown to pay these to widowers. We had difficulty in reconciling that submission with the passages of argument that we have set out above and so, it seems, did h Mr Goudie. We turn to consider the authorities to which Mr Sales referred us.

j [128] The starting point is A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd [1920] AC 508, [1920] All ER Rep 80. In that case the House of Lords held that a statutory power to requisition property displaced the prerogative power to do this that the Crown would otherwise have enjoyed. Lord Dunedin observed ([1920] AC 508 at 526, [1920] All ER Rep 80 at 86) 'if the whole ground of something which could be done by the prerogative is covered by the statute, it is the statute that rules'. Lord Atkinson said 'after the statute has been passed, and while it is in force, the thing it empowers the Crown to do can thenceforth only be done under the statute' (see [1920] AC 508 at 540, [1920] All ER Rep 80 at 92–93).

[129] Mr Sales submitted, however, that this principle had no application on the facts of the present case. Statutes should not be treated as binding the Crown, or fettering the powers of the Crown, unless they did so expressly or by necessary implication—see Lord Advocate v Dumbarton DC [1990] 1 All ER 1, [1990] 2 AC 580; R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Northumbria Police Authority [1988] 1 All ER 556, [1989] QB 26. The general principle advanced by Mr Sales is not in doubt. But we are here dealing with a suggestion that the court can grant relief against the Crown on the basis that the Crown has both the power under common law and the duty under s 6(1) of the 1998 Act, to put in place an ex gratia regime of paying bereavement benefits to widowers when Parliament has made express statutory provision as to the circumstances in which such benefits should be paid to widows and, under the 1992 Act as amended by the 1999 Act, to widowers. In this context it is necessary to have regard to this injunction of Lord Bridge in Steele Ford & Newton (a firm) v CPS [1993] 2 All ER 769 at 774, [1994] 1 AC 22 at 33:

‘But still more important, in the present context, is the special constitutional convention which jealously safeguards the exclusive control exercised by Parliament over both the levying and the expenditure of the public revenue. It is trite law that nothing less than clear, express and unambiguous language is effective to levy a tax. Scarcely less stringent is the requirement of clear statutory authority for public expenditure. As it was put by Viscount Haldane in Auckland Harbour Board v R [1924] AC 318 at 326: “It has been a principle of the British Constitution now for more than two centuries ... that no money can be taken out of the Consolidated Fund into which the revenues of the state have been paid, excepting under a distinct authorisation from Parliament itself.”’

[130] The rules governing the circumstances in which ministers can properly make payment out of public funds are rules of constitutional law of some complexity. We shall try to provide a summary, simplified so far as is possible to meet the needs of this judgment.

[131] The fundamental principle is that any expenditure of public funds must be authorised by statute: 8(2) Halsbury’s Laws (4th edn reissue) para 230; Auckland Harbour Board v R [1924] AC 318; R v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, ex p World Development Movement Ltd [1995] 1 All ER 611, [1995] 1 WLR 386—the Pergau Dam case. The complication arises out of the fact that Parliament authorises expenditure of public funds by two different types of statute. Statutes dealing with a particular area of government make provision for specific expenditure for a defined purpose. We shall here describe these as ‘specific statutes’. The 1992 and the 1999 Acts are examples of such legislation. Such statutes do not, however, of themselves provide ministers with access to the public funds. Revenues raised by taxation or otherwise are, in general, paid into the Exchequer Account at the Bank of England, where they constitute the Consolidated Fund. Parliamentary authorisation is required for issues from the Consolidated Fund and this is provided each year by the second type of statute. A series of Consolidated Fund Bills are brought before Parliament founded upon supply resolutions. The final such Bill is the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill, which becomes the Appropriation Act. We shall describe this type of legislation as appropriation legislation. Such legislation authorises the issue to government departments of the funds that they have demonstrated that they require to perform their executive functions. In some instances the funds will be required to make the payments already authorised by specific statutes. In other instances the funds will be required to enable the government departments to make payments pursuant to prerogative or common law powers which are not the

a subject of any specific statute. Whether expenditure should be authorised by specific statutes, or merely by appropriation statutes is a question of constitutional law on which the views of the Treasury and the Public Accounts Committee have differed. Footnote 4 to the paragraph of Halsbury's Laws to which we have already referred (8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 230) records the following exchange:

b 'In 1932 the Committee of Public Accounts (as to which see para 719 post) and the Treasury reached a concordat concerning the requirement to obtain specific legislative authority for expenditure. The Committee of Public Accounts stated that "where it is desired that continuing functions should be exercised by a government department, particularly where such functions
c may involve financial liabilities extending beyond a given financial year, it is proper, subject to certain recognised exceptions, that the powers and duties to be exercised should be defined by specific statute." The Treasury said that "while they think the Executive government must continue to be allowed a certain measure of discretion in asking Parliament to exercise a power which undoubtedly belongs to it, they agree that practice should normally accord
d with the view expressed by the Committee [see supra]. The Treasury will, for their part, continue to aim at observance of this principle." Later in 1932 the Treasury restated their view that "while it is competent to Parliament, by means of an annual vote embodied in the Appropriation Acts, in effect to extend powers specifically limited by statute, constitutional propriety e requires that such extensions should be regularised at the earliest possible date by amending legislation, unless they are of a purely emergency or non-continuing character".'

[132] On 2 November 1945 Mr Granville Ram, First Parliamentary Counsel, produced a memorandum setting out what has become known as "The Ram f Doctrine" and which is, we understand, still treated by ministers as setting out the position in respect of the question of 'how far legislation is necessary to authorise any extension of the existing powers of a Government Department'? Mr Ram commented that it was necessary to draw a sharp distinction between what was legally possible and what was permissible having regard to established practice. He referred to the exchange of views in 1932, to which we have referred above.
g He reached the following conclusions:

'a. Legislation is not legally necessary to authorise an extension of the existing powers of a Government Department except where such an extension is precluded by a previous statute either expressly or by necessary h implication.

b. If the extended powers involve an annual charge extended over a period of years legislation though not required by law, is required by established practice formally recorded in the transactions between the Public Accounts Committee and the Treasury.'

j [133] Where a minister proposes to make a payment that has been authorised by a specific statute the court can properly review his decision to see whether, on true interpretation of the statute, the payment falls within its authorisation. If it does not, the decision to make the payment will be unlawful—see the Pergau Dam case.

[134] Where a minister proposes to make payments in circumstances where this conflicts with the intention of Parliament, as manifested in a specific statute, the decision will be unlawful as an abuse of power, even, it seems, if Parliament has authorised the issue of funds for that purpose in an appropriation statute—see R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Fire Brigades Union [1995] 2 All ER 244 at 256, [1995] 2 AC 513 at 554. a

[135] We turn to consider whether it would conflict with the intention of Parliament, as expressed in the 1992 and 1999 Acts to introduce a scheme of making extra statutory payments to widowers to match those payable to widows. Before the 1998 Act came into force we are in no doubt that it would have done. As we have shown it has been, at the least, an established practice for more than half a century that the exercise of powers requiring an annual charge over a period of years should receive specific statutory authorisation. The 1992 and 1999 Acts constituted such authorisation in relation to bereavement benefits. It seems to us plainly implicit that Parliament intended the express statutory provisions for payment of benefits to widows to occupy the entire field of entitlement to payment of benefits as a result of the death of a spouse. We endorse the submission made in Mr Sales' skeleton argument that Parliament made 'a deliberate choice to confine widow's benefits to widows (with no entitlement to widowers)'. In these circumstances, prior to 2 October 2000, it would have been an abuse of power for the minister to introduce a scheme of making matching extra-statutory payments to widowers. b

[136] Does the introduction of the 1998 Act make a difference? In our judgment it does. Section 3 of the Act requires that 'so far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation ... must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights'. This statutory requirement enforces the conclusion that we would have reached, even had the Act not contained this provision. Once the 1998 Act came into effect it seems to us that its requirements altered the restraint upon the Secretary of State which resulted from the principle in A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd. There is a presumption that Parliament does not intend legislation to infringe the convention. Acts of Parliament should be read, in so far as possible, as not precluding common law or prerogative powers of the Crown to take any action that may be necessary to prevent infringement of convention rights. In so far as the 1998 Act placed upon the Secretary of State an obligation to make extra statutory payments, no constitutional impropriety or illegality could be involved in his putting in place a scheme to give effect to that obligation and, if necessary, seeking from Parliament appropriation of funds to implement the scheme. c

[137] It follows that neither s 6(2)(a) nor s 6(2)(b) affords the Secretary of State a defence to the claim that by failing to make extra-statutory payments to the claimants he infringed art 14 of the convention. It remains to consider whether the 1998 Act required the Secretary of State to make the payments claimed by the appellants and, if it did, the relief that should be accorded by this court. This turns upon the answers to be given to the last two issues. d

[138] The discrimination between the appellants and widows occurred, in large measure, prior to 2 October 2000, when the 1998 Act came into force. Mr Hooper was denied payments equivalent to a widow's payment and a WMA in 1997. Mr Withey was denied payments in respect of a widow's payment and a WMA in 1997, and again denied payments equivalent to WMA in August 2000. Mr Martin was denied payments equivalent to a widow's payment and a WMA after 2 October 2000, but his claims relate back to his wife's death on 11 September 2000. Mr Naylor claimed payments equivalent to a widow's e a pension on 14 September 2000, and thus the relevant period in respect of which he claims extends back three months before that date.

[139] No claim can be founded on the 1998 Act in respect of those incidents of discrimination, which occurred before the Act came into force. This is because s 22(4) of the Act provides that no proceedings may be brought under s 7(1)(a) of the Act in relation to any act or failure to act which occurred before the Act came into force.

b [140] Before Moses J, counsel for Mr Hooper argued that Mr Hooper's Strasbourg discrimination claim could properly embrace failure to settle that part of his claim which related to discrimination before 2 October 2000. Moses J rejected this contention on the ground that the decision not to extend a friendly settlement to Mr Hooper was taken before 2 October 2000. We question c whether he was correct to do so. Had the Strasbourg discrimination claim been well founded, the duty under the 1998 Act not to discriminate between Strasbourg claimants and others would have arisen when that Act came into force on 2 October 2000. We do not see how a refusal before that date by the Secretary of State to settle Mr Hooper's claim could have precluded a duty on the d part of the Secretary of State not to discriminate against Mr Hooper once the 1998 Act came into force, nor Mr Hooper's right to bring proceedings in relation to breach of that duty. The fact that the discrimination complained of related, in part, to events before 2 October 2000 would not have invalidated the claim in whole or in part. We have, however, as did Moses J, ruled the Strasbourg discrimination claim invalid. It is for this reason that no claims lie in relation to e discrimination which occurred prior to 2 October 2000.

[141] This leaves for consideration those incidents of discrimination which have occurred since 2 October 2000. Mr Goudie submitted, in our view correctly, that claimants, who had constituted themselves 'victims' under the convention by claiming before the 1998 Act came into force, were in a position f to bring proceedings under the Act in respect of continuing discrimination without the need to repeat their claims. We identify these as follows. (i) Failure to accept Mr Martin's demand for payment equivalent to a widow's payment. (ii) Failure to make payments equivalent to a WMA to Hooper, Withey and Martin. (iii) Failure to make payments equivalent to a widow's pension to Mr Naylor.

[142] If and in so far as making these payments would have prevented g breaches of art 14 coupled with art 8 of the convention, we have held that the Secretary of State had power to make the payments. By failing to make such payments the Secretary of State acted in a way incompatible with the appellants' convention rights. By reason of the provisions of s 6(1) of the 1998 Act we see no escape from the conclusion that he acted unlawfully in failing to make these h payments. We put the matter in this way because, although extra-statutory payments would have prevented discrimination against widowers, we do not consider that it was irrational for the Secretary of State to decline to adopt this course. If Parliament confers on one class a benefit for which there is no rational justification it may make more sense to leave those who do not receive that benefit to seek such remedy as the law allows rather than to make to them also j payments for which there is no rational justification. This is a matter to which we shall return when we consider the ninth issue.

[143] The appellants seek a mandatory order that the Secretary of State make to them the extra-statutory payments which he has so far declined to make. Alternatively they claim damages for his breach of s 6(1) of the 1998 Act in failing to make those payments. Widows who were entitled to pensions prior to 9 April 2001 remain entitled to receive these. Thus Mr Naylor has a continuing claim; the claims of the other appellants all relate to periods prior to 9 April 2001, when the new regime came into effect. We consider that, if the appellants have claims to monetary compensation in respect of their failure to receive payments during these periods, this should be by way of damages for breach of the 1998 Act. Section 8 (1) of the 1998 Act entitles us to grant such relief or remedy or make such order, within our powers, as we consider just and appropriate. We would not consider it just or appropriate to make a mandatory order that the Secretary of State make the payments sought in circumstances where his failure to do so would not sound in damages under the Act. Thus the issue at this stage is the extent to which, if at all, the appellants are entitled to damages.

[144] Section 8(3) of the Act precludes this court from awarding damages to the appellants unless we are satisfied that such awards are necessary in order to afford them just satisfaction. In considering this question we are required to take into account the principles applied by the Strasbourg court. This was an area of the case in respect of which we had to seek assistance from counsel on the second hearing, as they had made scarcely any submissions in relation to 'just satisfaction' at the first hearing.

[145] The appellants' case has a beguiling simplicity. The breaches of the 1998 Act of which they complain lie in failing to make payments to them equivalent to the payments received by widows. They have thus suffered pecuniary loss in the amount of the payments that they should have received. Just satisfaction requires that they be paid these sums. In addition they claim a modest sum of compensation for the distress that they have been caused by the discrimination itself.

[146] Mr Sales challenged this approach. He submitted that the Strasbourg court does not always award compensation, even where the applicant has suffered damage which is in principle compensatable. Where the appropriate response to discrimination is to 'level down' rather than 'level up', it is not appropriate to award compensation on the basis of levelling up.

[147] It is notoriously difficult to deduce clear principles in relation to 'just satisfaction' from the Strasbourg jurisprudence—see the comments of the Report of the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission Damages under the Human Rights Act 1998 (Law Com No 266) (Cm 4853) paras 3.4 to 3.15. As that report states at para 3.19, the general approach is to restore the applicant to the position that he or she would have been in had there not been a breach of convention rights. Where the breach has caused pecuniary loss, an award of pecuniary compensation is the norm—see paras 3.23 to 3.25 of the Report. The Strasbourg court has also made awards for non-pecuniary loss in respect of a wide range of intangible injuries—see paras 3.26 and 3.27 of the Report. Particular difficulties arise where the complaint is of breach of art 14, and decisions on this situation are particularly sparse.

[148] Mr Goudie submitted that we should follow the approach of the Strasbourg court in Willis v UK [2002] 2 FCR 743. Mr Willis' wife died on 7 June 1996. On 4 November 1996 he applied for benefits equivalent to a widow's payment and a WMA. His application was refused. He complained of violation of art 14, taken in conjunction with art 8 and art 1 of the First Protocol. The government did not resist the claim (under arts 14 and 8). The court found that a violation of art 14 and art 1 of the First Protocol had occurred. Mr Willis

a claimed in relation to pecuniary damage a total of £21,804.07 plus interest in respect of loss of a widow's payment and a WMA, after giving credit for receipt of invalid care allowance and one parent benefit that had been paid to him. The government did not challenge these calculations but resisted the claim for interest. The court awarded £25,000, inclusive of interest, 'on an equitable basis'.

b [149] For the other three appellants, Mr Cox submitted that the Strasbourg court adopts the general aim of restoring the applicant to the position that he would have been in had there not been a breach of his convention rights: Papamichalopoulos v Greece (1996) 21 EHRR 439 at 451 (para 34); Kingsley v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 177 at 190 (para 40); R (on the application of KB) v Mental Health Review Tribunal [2003] EWHC 193 (Admin) at [28], [2003] 2 All ER 209 at [28] per Stanley Burnton J. He further submitted that in cases where there has been an actual pecuniary loss, which has been clearly caused by the violation, the court will invariably award damages to compensate for the loss: Kingsley v UK; Law Commission Report Damages under the Human Rights Act (Law Com No 266) para 3.43. An award may be made for future and ongoing loss: Lustig-Prean and Beckett v UK (1999) 7 BHRC 65 and Smith v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493.

d [150] Mr Sales relied particularly on two decisions of the Strasbourg court. In Goodwin v UK [2002] 2 FCR 577 the court found that the United Kingdom was in breach of the rights of the applicant (who was a post-operative transsexual) under arts 8, 12 and 14 in failing to arrange its laws to recognise the applicant's acquired sexual identity in a range of areas. The applicant had claimed pecuniary damage including a sum of £31,200 in respect of the pension which she had been unable to claim at age 60, as a woman in her acquired sexual identity. The court recognized that the government would have to introduce changes in legislation 'in due course' to take account of its judgment, and held in relation to art 41 of the convention that the finding of violation, with the changes in legislation for the future, could in the circumstances of the case be regarded as constituting just satisfaction.

e [151] The circumstances in question included (1) a finding by the court that the degree of financial detriment suffered, if any, was not clear cut and (2) a finding by the court that the lack of legal recognition of the gender re-assignment of post-operative transsexuals lay at the heart of the complaint. Having regard to these factors, we do not find this decision of assistance in resolving the issue of just satisfaction in the present case.

g [152] More pertinent is the other decision relied upon by Mr Sales. In Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503 the applicant was an unmarried childless man over the age of 45. Dutch legislation provided for an exemption for unmarried childless women over the age of 45 from the obligation to pay contributions under the General Child Benefits Act. There was no similar exemption for men. The court held that art 14 of the convention taken together with art 1 of the First Protocol had been violated. However, the court rejected the applicant's request that he should be awarded compensation for pecuniary damage in the amount of the contribution which he had paid between 1985 and 1988. The Dutch government stated that 'had there not been the difference in treatment complained of, men and women would have been equally liable to pay contributions under the General Child Benefits Act, so that the applicant would have had to pay them in any case' (at 520 (para 48)). The court held (at 520-521 (para 50)):

'... the finding of a violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken together with Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 does not entitle the applicant to retrospective exemption from contributions under the scheme in question. Accordingly the applicant's claim for pecuniary damage has not been substantiated.' a

[153] Under the relevant legislation everyone had to contribute to the cost of providing child benefits, whether or not they had children, with the exception of childless women over 45. Part of the rationale of this was that to make such women contribute to the cost of providing child benefits would rub salt in the wound of being childless. The court indicated its doubts about whether a desire to spare the feelings of such women could be a legitimate aim. We read the passage of its judgment quoted above as indicating the court's acceptance that the breach of art 14 consisted in granting the allowance to women rather than in not also granting it to men so that it was not appropriate to award pecuniary compensation. b

[154] With the benefit of these authorities, we have reached the following conclusions. This appeal is concerned with the fruits of national insurance contributions. It is concerned with payments designed to mitigate particular adverse financial consequences to widows of the death of the husband who paid the contributions. Where those adverse financial consequences are also suffered by widowers who have lost wives who paid national insurance contributions, it is manifestly discriminatory and unfair that the widowers should not also receive similar payments to mitigate those consequences. c

[155] This is the position as far as a widow's payment is concerned. The payment of a lump sum had and has rational justification, having regard to the additional financial demands attendant on that event. The justification applies, however, equally in the case of the death of a wife. This is now recognised by the payment of bereavement payments to widows and widowers alike. The discrimination that existed during the relevant transitional period—2 October 2000 to 9 April 2001—can properly be said to have resulted in the failure of widowers to receive payments to which, in justice, they should have been entitled. For this reason we consider that Mr Martin, and any others in his position, should receive damages of £1,000, together with interest, by way of just satisfaction. d

[156] WMA was paid in recognition of the burden shouldered by a widow, who had to bring up children without the support of a husband. That, however, is a burden which falls upon a parent whose spouse dies, be the parent husband or wife. That fact is now recognised by the entitlement of both widows and widowers with dependent children to a WPA. On the face of it, the discrimination in the transitional period which saw a WPA being paid to widows but not to widowers can properly be said to have resulted in a failure on the part of widowers to receive payments to which, in justice, they should have been entitled. The picture is not, however, as simple as this so far as the appellants before us are concerned. e

[157] For widows who were earning little or nothing, entitlement to a WMA and, indeed to a widow's pension was an irrelevance. This was because other social security benefits were provided—in particular income support—to the extent necessary to raise the widow's total income to a pre-calculated minimum, which exceeded both a WMA and a widow's pension. Receipt of a WMA simply reduced the amount which would otherwise have been received by way of income support, so that the widow's income remained the same. f a have affected their total income. We understand that these assertions are accepted. In these circumstances, those three appellants have not demonstrated that the discrimination of which they complain in respect of a WMA has caused them any pecuniary loss, so the principle of just satisfaction does not require any award in respect of pecuniary loss. Indeed it might have led the Secretary of State to question whether, in truth, they have been discriminated against by the refusal b to pay them a WMA. They have received the same amount of social security benefits that they would have received had they been widows in the same situation. It is only the form in which they have received those benefits that differs.

[159] Mr Cox, on behalf of Messrs Withey, Naylor and Martin, argued that receipt of WMA is more advantageous than receipt of income support in that a c WMA is paid regardless of income, whereas if a person in receipt of income support works, Income Support is reduced by the amount that is earned. None of these three appellants has established that he was worse off as a result of receiving income support in place of a WMA and, accordingly, we see no basis for an award of pecuniary compensation. Had the claimants demonstrated that d they were worse off as a result of failure to receive the equivalent of a WMA we would, to that extent, have held them entitled to damages.

[160] We turn to the question of whether the principle of just satisfaction entitles Mr Naylor to an award for failing to receive the equivalent of a widow's pension. Had he been a widow he would have been entitled to this until reaching the age of 65, so he claims not merely in respect of past receipt but in respect of e his failure to receive payments in the future. As we understand the position Mr Naylor has been receiving income support in a sum exceeding the equivalent of a widow's pension, but, for the moment, we shall put that fact to one side and consider this question as one of principle.

[161] We have held that the justification for paying pensions to widows had f ceased and should have been discontinued by 2000. It was not, in fact, discontinued until 9 April 2001. Furthermore, those who became entitled to a widow's pension before that date remained entitled to them thereafter. Mr Naylor argues that he should have been treated in the same way and should, under the principle of just satisfaction, be compensated for the fact that he has not been.

g [162] In 1999, before the 1998 Act came into force, Parliament had passed an Act which would abolish a widow's pension with effect from 9 April 2001 but, as from that date, grant a bereavement allowance for a period of 52 weeks to widows and widowers alike. This reflected the fact that there had ceased to be justification for paying pensions to widows. It also reflected the fact that there h was no justification for paying a similar pension to widowers either. The fact that widows over 45 enjoyed a right to a pension until reaching the age of 65 was recognised as an anomaly. Parliament decided to allow a transitional period until 9 April 2001 before bringing in the new regime and to allow those in receipt of a widow's pension to continue to receive it, but it does not follow from this that there was any justification for making equivalent payments to widowers. To j have done so would merely have increased the size of those to whom anomalous payments were being made. This would not have achieved any legitimate aim.

[163] For these reasons we do not consider that the principle of just satisfaction entitles Mr Naylor to extra-statutory payments equivalent to a widow's pension either in respect of the period from 2 October 2000 to 9 April 2001 or thereafter. The appropriate course in this case is that adopted by the Strasbourg court in Van Raalte's case.

[164] We have considered whether Mr Naylor is none the less entitled, by way of just satisfaction, to payment equivalent to bereavement payment, on the ground that this was introduced for widows and widowers alike in place of a widow's pension. We have decided that he is not. We do not consider that this payment to both sexes for a maximum of 52 weeks, can properly be considered as similar in nature to pension rights that were previously enjoyed by widows until reaching the age of 65. They are part of a new, and very different regime. Furthermore, had such payment been made to Mr Naylor, it would simply have reduced, by the same amount, the income support that he received, so that he is not out of pocket as a result of not receiving such payment.

[165] We do not consider that the decision in Willis v UK requires us to reach a decision to the contrary. Section 2 of the 1998 Act requires us to take this decision into account, but it carries little weight. In the first place that case did not concern a widow's pension. In the second place the United Kingdom did not challenge its obligation to pay pecuniary compensation in that case, other than interest, so that the principle of just satisfaction was not in issue. We have been required by the 1998 Act to give consideration to that principle.

[166] All the claimants argued that they should be awarded by way of damages additional sums in respect of injury to their feelings caused by the obduracy of the Secretary of State in discriminating against them, relying on a number of cases in which Strasbourg had made such awards in cases of sex discrimination. These claims were parasitic on the other claims for damages and, in particular, the Strasbourg discrimination claims. For this reason alone they fail in all cases save that of Mr Martin. Quite apart from that there is no comparison between the nature of the discrimination complained of in this case and that which had occurred in the cases of sex discrimination relied upon. We do not consider that the principle of just satisfaction requires any award to Mr Martin under this head.

[168] We invite submissions from counsel as to the form of order that should follow from our judgment.

Appeal allowed in part.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

ANNEX

Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 c 4:

'Benefits for widows and widowers

36. Widow's payment.—(1) A woman who has been widowed shall be entitled to a widow's payment of the amount specified in Schedule 4, Part II if—(a) she was under pensionable age at the time when her late husband died, or he was then not entitled to a Category A retirement pension under section 44 below; and (b) her late husband satisfied the contribution condition for a widow's payment specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 4.

(2) The payment shall not be payable to a widow if she and a man to whom she is not married are living together as husband and wife at the time of her husband's death.

a (3) A widow's payment is payable only in cases where the husband dies on or after 11 April 1988 (the coming into force of section 36(1) of the 1986 Act, which introduced the widow's payment by making provision corresponding to this section).

b 37. Widowed mother's allowance.—(1) A woman who has been widowed shall be entitled to a widowed mother's allowance at the rate determined in accordance with section 39 below if her late husband satisfied the contribution conditions for a widowed mother's allowance specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 5 and either—(a) the woman is entitled to child benefit in respect of a child falling within subsection (2) below; or (b) the woman is pregnant by her late husband; or (c) if the woman and her late husband were residing together immediately before the time of his death, the woman is pregnant as the result of being artificially inseminated before that time with the semen of some person other than her husband, or as the result of the placing in her before that time of an embryo, of an egg in the process of fertilisation, or of sperm and eggs.

d (2) A child falls within this subsection if one of the conditions specified in section 81(2) below is for the time being satisfied with respect to the child and the child is either—(a) a son or daughter of the woman and her late husband; or (b) a child in respect of whom her late husband was immediately before his death entitled to child benefit; or (c) if the woman and her late husband were residing together immediately before his death, a child in respect of whom she was then entitled to child benefit.

e (3) The widow shall not be entitled to the allowance for any period after she remarries, but, subject to that, she shall continue to be entitled to it for any period throughout which she satisfies the requirements of subsection (1)(a), (b) or (c) above.

f (4) A widowed mother's allowance shall not be payable—(a) for any period falling before the day on which the widow's entitlement is to be regarded as commencing for that purpose by virtue of section 5(1)(k) of the Administration Act; or (b) for any period during which she and a man to whom she is not married are living together as husband and wife.

g 38. Widow's pension.—(1) A woman who has been widowed shall be entitled to a widow's pension at the rate determined in accordance with section 39 below if her late husband satisfied the contribution conditions for a widow's pension specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 5 and either—(a) she was, at the husband's death, over the age of 45 but under the age of 65; or (b) she ceased to be entitled to a widowed mother's allowance at a time when she was over the age of 45 but under the age of 65.

h (2) The widow shall not be entitled to the pension for any period after she remarries, but, subject to that, she shall continue to be entitled to it until she attains the age of 65.

i (3) A widow's pension shall not be payable—(a) for any period falling before the day on which the widow's entitlement is to be regarded as commencing for that purpose by virtue of section 5(1)(k) of the Administration Act; (b) for any period for which she is entitled to a widowed mother's allowance; or (c) for any period during which she and a man to whom she is not married are living together as husband and wife.

(4) In the case of a widow whose late husband died before 11 April 1988 and who either—(a) was over the age of 40 but under the age of 55 at the time of her husband's death; or (b) is over the age of 40 but under the age of 55 at the time when she ceases to be entitled to a widowed mother's allowance, subsection (1) above shall have effect as if for "45" there were substituted "40". a

39. Rate of widowed mother's allowance and widow's pension.—(1) The weekly rate of—(a) a widowed mother's allowance, (b) a widow's pension, shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of sections 44 and 45 below as they apply in the case of a Category A retirement pension, but subject, in particular, to the following provisions of this section and section 46(2) below. b

(2) In the application of sections 44 and 45 below by virtue of subsection (1) above—(a) where the woman's husband was over pensionable age when he died, references in those sections to the pensioner shall be taken as references to the husband, and (b) where the husband was under pensionable age when he died, references in those sections to the pensioner and the tax year in which he attained pensionable age shall be taken as references to the husband and the tax year in which he died. c

(4) Where a widow's pension is payable to a woman who was under the age of 55 at the time when the applicable qualifying condition was fulfilled, the weekly rate of the pension shall be reduced by 7% of what it would be apart from this subsection multiplied by the number of years by which her age at that time was less than 55 (any fraction of a year being counted as a year). e

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) above, the time when the applicable qualifying condition was fulfilled is the time when the woman's late husband died or, as the case may be, the time when she ceased to be entitled to a widowed mother's allowance. f

(6) In the case of a widow whose late husband died before 11 April 1988 and who either—(a) was over the age of 40 but under the age of 55 at the time of her husband's death; or (b) is over the age of 40 but under the age of 55 at the time when she ceases to be entitled to a widowed mother's allowance, subsection (4) above shall have effect as if for "55" there were substituted "50", in both places where it occurs. g

Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 c 30:

'Benefits for widows and widowers

54. Bereavement payment.—(1) For section 36 of the Contributions and Benefits Act there shall be substituted— h

36.—(1) A person whose spouse dies on or after the appointed day shall be entitled to a bereavement payment if—(a) either that person was under pensionable age at the time when the spouse died or the spouse was then not entitled to a Category A retirement pension under section 44 below; and (b) the spouse satisfied the contribution condition for a bereavement payment specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 4. j

(2) A bereavement payment shall not be payable to a person if that person and a person of the opposite sex to whom that person was not married were living together as husband and wife at the time of the spouse's death.

a (3) In this section ‘the appointed day’ means the day appointed for the coming into force of sections 54 to 56 of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999.”

(2) In Schedule 4 to the Contributions and Benefits Act (rates of benefits etc), for Part II there shall be substituted—

b “Part II

c 55.—(1) After section 36 of the Contributions and Benefits Act there shall be inserted—“36A. Cases in which sections 37 to 41 apply.—(1) Sections 37 to 39 and section 40 below apply only in cases where a woman’s husband has died before the appointed day, and section 41 below applies only in cases where a man’s wife has died before that day.

d (2) Sections 39A to 39C below apply in cases where a person’s spouse dies on or after the appointed day, but section 39A also applies (in accordance with subsection (1)(b) of that section) in cases where a man’s wife has died before that day.

e (3) In this section, and in sections 39A and 39B below, ‘the appointed day’ means the day appointed for the coming into force of sections 54 to 56 of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999.”

(2) After section 39 of the Contributions and Benefits Act there shall be inserted—

f “39A. Widowed parent’s allowance.—(1) This section applies where—(a) a person whose spouse dies on or after the appointed day is under pensionable age at the time of the spouse’s death, or (b) a man whose wife died before the appointed day—(i) has not remarried before that day, and (ii) is under pensionable age on that day.

g (2) The surviving spouse shall be entitled to a widowed parent’s allowance at the rate determined in accordance with section 39C below if the deceased spouse satisfied the contribution conditions for a widowed parent’s allowance specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 5 and—(a) the surviving spouse is entitled to child benefit in respect of a child falling within subsection (3) below; or (b) the surviving spouse is a woman who either— (i) is pregnant by her late husband, or (ii) if she and he were residing together immediately before the time of his death, is pregnant in circumstances falling within section 37(1)(c) above.

h (3) A child falls within this subsection if one of the conditions specified in section 81(2) below is for the time being satisfied with respect to the child and the child is either—(a) a son or daughter of the surviving spouse and the deceased spouse; or (b) a child in respect of whom the deceased spouse was immediately before his or her death entitled to child benefit; or (c) if the surviving spouse and the deceased spouse were residing together immediately before his or her death, a child in respect of whom the surviving spouse was then entitled to child benefit.

j (4) The surviving spouse shall not be entitled to the allowance for any period after she or he remarries, but, subject to that, the surviving spouse shall continue to be entitled to it for any period throughout which she or he—(a) satisfies the requirements of subsection (2)(a) or (b) above; and (b) is under pensionable age. a

(5) A widowed parent's allowance shall not be payable—(a) for any period falling before the day on which the surviving spouse's entitlement is to be regarded as commencing by virtue of section 5(1)(k) of the Administration Act; or (b) for any period during which the surviving spouse and a person of the opposite sex to whom she or he is not married are living together as husband and wife. b

39B. Bereavement allowance where no dependent children.—(1) This section applies where a person whose spouse dies on or after the appointed day is over the age of 45 but under pensionable age at the spouse's death.

(2) The surviving spouse shall be entitled to a bereavement allowance at the rate determined in accordance with section 39C below if the deceased spouse satisfied the contribution conditions for a bereavement allowance specified in Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 5. c

(3) A bereavement allowance shall be payable for not more than 52 weeks beginning with the date of the spouse's death or (if later) the day on which the surviving spouse's entitlement is to be regarded as commencing by virtue of section 5(1)(k) of the Administration Act. d

(4) The surviving spouse shall not be entitled to the allowance for any period after she or he remarries, but, subject to that, the surviving spouse shall continue to be entitled to it until—(a) she or he attains pensionable age, or (b) the period of 52 weeks mentioned in subsection (3) above expires, whichever happens first. e

(5) The allowance shall not be payable—(a) for any period for which the surviving spouse is entitled to a widowed parent's allowance; or (b) for any period during which the surviving spouse and a person of the opposite sex to whom she or he is not married are living together as husband and wife. f

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, MANTELL AND RIX LJJ

7–10 OCTOBER, 19 DECEMBER 2002, 14 MARCH, 18 JUNE 2003

Income tax – Allowances – Widow's bereavement allowance – Allowance not available to widowers – Statutory provision discriminating against widowers – Taxes Management Act 1970, s 1 – Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, s 262 – Human Rights Act 1998, ss 6(2)(b), 8, Sch 1, Pt I, art 14, Pt II, art 1.

The appellant was a widower, whose wife had died in June 1999. After his wife's death, he became aware of the case of another widower who had made a claim in the European Court of Human Rights, alleging that the lack of any provision for a bereavement allowance for widowers under United Kingdom law, equivalent to the income tax reduction for widows under s 262^a of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 known as widow's bereavement allowance, discriminated against him on the grounds of his sex, in breach of art 14^b of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) read with art 8^c and art 1^d of the First Protocol to the convention. That claim was declared admissible, and the United Kingdom government thereafter reached a friendly settlement with the widower. The appellant wrote to the Revenue claiming the equivalent of widow's bereavement allowance, and referring to the European Court of Human Rights case. His claim was refused; the Revenue stated that they considered that their care and management powers under s 1(1)^e of the Taxes Management Act 1970 did not permit them to contradict unambiguous, primary legislation such as s 262 of the 1988 Act, and that their refusal to grant the appellant an allowance or to make him an equivalent extra-statutory payment was not therefore unlawful by reason of s 6(2)^f of the 1998 Act which provided that it was not unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which was incompatible with a convention right if the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce provisions of primary legislation which could not be read or given effect in a way which was compatible with convention rights. The claimant applied for judicial review of that decision. The judge granted a declaration that

^c Article 8, so far as material, provides: '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of ... the economic well-being of the country ...'

^f Section 6, so far as material, provides: '(1) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. (2) Subsection (1) does not apply to an act if—... (b) in the case of one or more provisions of ... primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights, the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions ...'

s 262 of the 1988 Act was incompatible, but otherwise dismissed the application. The appellant appealed. By s 34 of the Finance Act 1999, s 262 of the 1988 Act ceased to have effect in relation to deaths occurring on or after 6 April 2000. The issues for determination by the court were: (i) the extent of the Revenue's powers under s 1(1) of the 1970 Act; (ii) the correct application of s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act; and (iii) whether the Revenue had acted unfairly. The Revenue submitted that, given that widow's bereavement allowance had been abolished prospectively before the 1998 Act came into force on 2 October 2000, under the principle in s 8^g of the 1998 Act, which provided inter alia that no award of damages might be made unless the court was satisfied that the award was necessary to afford just satisfaction to the person in whose favour it was made, they were not required to make the appellant any payment.

(1) It was not possible to interpret s 1 as permitting the Revenue to grant concessions to taxpayers if they were necessary in order to prevent discrimination in the imposition of taxes which violated art 14. There was no doubt that, when enacting s 262 of the 1988 Act and s 34 of the 1999 Act, Parliament had intended widow's bereavement allowance, for so long as it continued in existence, to be restricted to women. The Revenue had no power to make similar allowances to men. For that reason it was right to make a declaration of incompatibility (see [45], [48], [49], below).

(2) Section 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act addressed the grant by Parliament of a statutory power which, regardless of the circumstances in which it was exercised, would inevitably be incompatible with convention rights. In such circumstances the power could not be given effect in a way which was compatible with the convention, and thus s 6(2)(b) enabled the exercise of the power without breach of s 6(1). Section 1 of the 1970 Act was a wide general power. In most circumstances either exercising it, or failing to exercise it, would involve no incompatibility with the convention. If circumstances arose under which it was necessary to exercise the power in order to avoid a breach of convention rights, there was no basis on which the Revenue could rely on s 6(2)(b) to justify a refusal to exercise the power (see [52], [53], below).

(3) The fact that the commissioners had chosen to settle the claim made to the Court of Human Rights did not preclude them from challenging similar claims in the domestic forum, now that the 1998 Act permitted convention issues to be raised in that forum. Before the 1998 Act had come into force, steps had been taken to remove the anomaly of awarding widow's bereavement allowance to women only by abolishing it prospectively with effect from 6 April 2000. To award the appellant, or other taxpayers in his position, an equivalent payment would be to swell the numbers of those who had received tax allowances for which there was no legitimate justification. The principle of just satisfaction did not require any such payment (see [59], [63], [65], [66], below).

^g Section 8, so far as material, provides: '(1) In relation to any act ... of a public authority which the court finds is ... unlawful, it may grant such relief or remedy ... within its powers as it considers just and appropriate ... (3) No award of damages is to be made unless, taking into account all the circumstances of the case ... the court is satisfied that the award is necessary to afford just satisfaction to the person in whose favour it is made.'

Adrian John Wilkinson appealed with permission from the judgment of Moses J on 14 February 2002 ([2002] EWHC 182 (Admin), [2002] STC 347) granting a declaration of incompatibility with the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) in relation to s 262 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 but otherwise dismissing his claim for judicial review of the Revenue's refusal to allow his claim, following the death of his wife, for a sum equivalent to widow's bereavement allowance under s 262 or an equivalent allowance granted by extra-statutory concession. The Revenue cross-appealed against the finding that s 1(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970 gave the Revenue power to grant concessions to taxpayers which derogated from their obligation to pay tax. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Dinah Rose (instructed by Liberty) for Mr Wilkinson.

Timothy Brennan QC and Ingrid Simler (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the Revenue.

18 June 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR. This is the judgment of the court.

[1] This is an appeal against the second judgment delivered by Moses J on 14 February 2002 ([2002] EWHC Admin 182, [2002] STC 347). The issues raised are, to a degree, similar to some of the issues that we have addressed in the appeal of R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2003] EWCA Civ 813, [2003] 3 All ER 673. They arise in the context of taxation. They concern a legislative provision that granted to widows a tax allowance that was not granted to widowers. The respondents, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, now concede and contend that this provision infringed art 14, when read in conjunction with art 1 of the First Protocol of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). Moses J so found and made a 'declaration of incompatibility' pursuant to s 4 of the 1998 Act. Mr Wilkinson, who is supported in this litigation by Liberty, contends that the legislation was not incompatible with convention rights in as much as it lay within the statutory powers of the commissioners to apply the legislation in a manner which would not involve any discrimination. He claims that the commissioners are obliged by s 6(1) of the 1998 Act to exercise those powers in his favour by making a money payment to him which will place him in the same position as if he had been granted the tax allowance made to widows.

[2] Mr Wilkinson has been represented by Miss Dinah Rose. Her skeleton argument sets out the background facts and the legislative framework with admirable lucidity and we shall draw upon it in our judgment.

THE BACKGROUND FACTS

[3] By s 262 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 an income tax reduction known as widow's bereavement allowance (WBA) was available to a a widow for the year of assessment in which her husband died and the following year. The 1988 Act makes no express provision for any equivalent income tax reduction for widowers. By s 34 of the Finance Act 1999, the WBA has been abolished in relation to deaths occurring on or after 6 April 2000.

[4] In 1997, Christopher Crossland, a widower who had been refused an allowance equivalent to WBA on the grounds of his sex, brought a complaint before the European Commission of Human Rights, alleging that the lack of any provision for a bereavement tax allowance for widowers under United Kingdom law discriminated against him on the grounds of his sex, in breach of art 14 read with art 8 and art 1 of the First Protocol of the convention. The United Kingdom government did not contest the admissibility of Mr Crossland's claim, which was referred to the court, and declared admissible on 8 June 1999 (Crossland v UK App No 36120/97 (8 June 1999, unreported)).

[5] In September 1999, the government, having never at any stage contested the merits of Mr Crossland's claim, reached a friendly settlement with him. Under the settlement, the respondents paid to Mr Crossland the sum of £575, representing the full amount that he would have been paid had WBA been available to men at the date of his wife's death, and the sum of £3,962.48, representing his reasonable legal costs. As a result, Mr Crossland's case was struck out of the court's list on 9 November 1999.

[7] Mr Wilkinson, the claimant in these proceedings, is a widower whose wife died on 23 June 1999. After his wife's death, Mr Wilkinson became aware of Mr Crossland's case, and the settlement that the respondents had reached with him. By a letter dated 13 November 2000, Mr Wilkinson claimed from the Inland Revenue the equivalent of WBA (he requested a 'widower's bereavement payment'), referring to Mr Crossland's case.

'You have made a claim for a Widow's Bereavement payment for the year ended 5 April 2000. This was on the basis of the Crossland case which our Head Office have considered carefully. I can confirm that the allowance was challenged by Mr Crossland under the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) because it was only available to Women, and that the challenge was resolved through a friendly settlement.

However, there is still no basis in UK law for allowing Widowers to claim the Widow's Bereavement Allowance, I am therefore unable to accept your claim for the year in question.'

[9] On 27 February 2001, Liberty wrote to the respondents on Mr Wilkinson's behalf, inviting them to allow his claim for a WBA, or an extra-statutory equivalent. By a letter dated 5 March 2001, the respondents denied that they had any power to grant an allowance to Mr Wilkinson, stating:

'The Board's care and management powers allow us to make relaxations which give taxpayers a reduction in liability to which they are not entitled under the strict letter of the law. Most concessions are made to deal with what are, on the whole, minor or transitory anomalies under the legislation and to meet cases of hardship at the margins of the code where a statutory remedy would be difficult to devise or would run to a length out of proportion to the intrinsic importance of the matter ... a

The care and management powers do not allow the Inland Revenue to contradict unambiguous, primary legislation such as the provisions that govern entitlement to WBA. The Human Rights Act makes it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way that is incompatible with a Convention right unless it is required to do so by primary legislation. In applying the rules of the WBA legislation, the Inland Revenue was applying a provision of primary legislation, Section 262 Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. The intention of the legislation was clear: to help widows, not widowers. If the effect of the Human Rights Act was to require us to grant WBA to widowers under our care and management powers, notwithstanding the clear terms of the legislation, that would effectively undermine Parliamentary sovereignty which the Human Rights Act was careful to preserve. b c

[10] An application for judicial review was lodged on 9 March 2001. On 14 February 2002, Moses J granted a declaration that s 262 of the 1998 Act was incompatible with the convention, but otherwise dismissed the application. d

THE TAX LEGISLATION

[11] Section 262(1) of the 1988 Act (as amended) provided as follows: e

'Where a married man whose wife is living with him dies, his widow shall be entitled—(a) for the year of assessment in which the death occurs, to an income tax reduction calculated by reference to an amount equal to the amount specified in section 257A(1) for that year; and (b) (unless she married again before the beginning of it) for the next following year of assessment, to an income tax reduction calculated by reference to an amount equal to the amount specified in section 257A(1) for that year.' f

[12] The amount specified for the tax year 1999–2000 was £1,970, restricted to a 10% reduction of tax liability. The amount specified for the tax year 2000–2001 was £2,000, restricted to a 10% reduction of tax liability. Mr Wilkinson restricts his claim to the tax year 1999–2000. g

[13] By s 34 of the Finance Act 1999, s 262 of the 1988 Act ceased to have effect in relation to deaths occurring on or after 6 April 2000.

Duties and powers of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue h

[14] By s 1(1) of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act 1890, it is lawful for the Crown to appoint persons to be Commissioners for the collection and management of inland revenue.

'The Commissioners shall collect and cause to be collected every part of inland revenue, and all money under their care and management, and shall keep distinct accounts thereof at their chief office.' j

[16] Section 1(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970 provides (as far as material): 'Income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax shall be under the care and management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ...'

a [17] By s 6(1) of the 1998 Act, it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right. It is not disputed that the commissioners are a public authority within the meaning of this provision.

b 'Subsection (1) does not apply to an act if—(a) as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation, the authority could not have acted differently; or (b) in the case of one or more provisions of, or made under, primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights, the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions.'

c [19] By s 3(1) of the 1998 Act, primary legislation and subordinate legislation much be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the convention rights, so far as it is possible to do so. By s 3(2)(a), this provision applies to legislation whenever enacted.

d [20] Article 14 of the convention provides:

e 'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.'

f 'Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law.

g The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties.'

h [22] Article 14 has no independent existence, but complements the other substantive provisions of the convention and its Protocols. Although the application of art 14 does not presuppose a breach of those provisions, in order for it to be applied, the facts of the case must come within the ambit of one or more of them: Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471 at 499, 503 (paras 71 and 82).

THE ALLEGED INCOMPATIBILITY WITH CONVENTION RIGHTS

j [23] In our judgment in Hooper's case we have explained how art 14 of the convention will be infringed where there is discrimination that falls 'within the ambit' of one of the other convention rights. In the present case it is common ground that s 262 of the 1988 Act was discriminatory in that it treated widows more favourably than widowers. Moses J held, and the commissioners now concede, that this discrimination fell within the ambit of art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention and thus infringed art 14—see Darby v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 774.

THE ISSUES

[24] Mr Wilkinson contends that s 1(1) of the 1970 Act gives to the commissioners a wide statutory power to grant concessions to taxpayers which derogate from their obligations to pay tax in accordance with the letter of the applicable tax legislation. He contends that this power entitled the commissioners to grant to widowers an allowance equivalent to the WBA to which widows were entitled. The commissioners contend that when enacting s 262 of the 1988 Act and, more pertinently, when abolishing that section prospectively by s 34 of the Finance Act 1999, it was Parliament's clear intention that entitlement to a WBA should be restricted to widows. The commissioners further contend that their powers under s 1(1) of the 1970 Act do not extend to granting concessions that will conflict with the intention of Parliament, as expressed in the relevant legislation.

[25] Moses J ruled in favour of Mr Wilkinson on this issue. The commissioners cross-appeal against his ruling. If they succeed in their cross-appeal it will follow that s 262 of the 1988 Act obliged them to discriminate in favour of widows in breach of art 14. Section 6(2)(a) of the 1998 Act will then provide them with a defence to the allegation that they have acted in breach of s 6(1) of that Act. The extent of the commissioners' powers under s 1(1) of the 1970 Act is the first issue that we shall address. This issue bears some similarity to the issue in the Hooper appeal of the extent of the Secretary of State's common law power to make extra-statutory payments to widowers to match benefits to which widows were entitled under statute.

[26] The second issue will only arise if the commissioners' cross-appeal fails. It is common ground that the tax regime keeps open a taxpayer's fiscal position for a period of five years from the 31 January following the year of assessment (see s 43 of the 1970 Act). Mr Wilkinson contends that, when the 1998 Act came into force on 2 October 2000, s 6(1) of that Act imposed on the commissioners an obligation to exercise the powers that they enjoy under s 1 of the 1970 Act by paying to him an allowance equivalent to the WBA to which he would have been entitled had he been a widow.

[27] Moses J held that s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act entitled the commissioners to decline to exercise their s 1 powers in this way, without committing any breach of s 6(1). Mr Wilkinson challenges this conclusion. Whether Moses J correctly applied s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act is the second issue that we shall address. This issue bears some similarity to the issue in the Hooper appeal of the applicability of s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act.

[28] The third issue involves a comparison between the treatment of Mr Crossland, whose claim before the Strasbourg court was the subject of an amicable settlement, and the treatment of Mr Wilkinson, whose claim before the English court the commissioners have declined to settle. In relation to this issue, and in contrast to the majority of the appellants in the Hooper appeal, Mr Wilkinson does not allege that the difference in treatment of which he complains infringes art 14. He contends that it constitutes a breach of the commissioners' duty, under established principles of public law, to avoid discriminating between taxpayers without justification, and thus an abuse of power. Thus this issue is similar to the issue raised by the contention in the Hooper appeal that the Secretary of State's treatment of the majority of the appellants was in breach of established principles of public law. Moses J shortly rejected Mr Wilkinson's contentions in respect of this issue by cross-reference to a his decision in Hooper's case. Whether he was correct in so doing is the third issue that we shall address.

The first issue

b [29] The commissioners have long proceeded on the basis that the power and duty placed upon them by s 1 of the 1970 Act to take responsibility for the care and management of income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax vests in them a wide managerial discretion to refrain from recovering taxes which are payable under a strict application of the relevant legislation. Evidence in relation c to this practice is given in the witness statement of Sarah Walker. As assistant director of personal tax she has had responsibility for policy matters concerning the structure of income tax rates and allowances, including the widow's bereavement allowance. The commissioners publish a list of extra-statutory concessions that they are prepared to make when collecting taxation. By 31 August 1999 this list totalled no less than 294 concessions, not all of which are of current applicability. The list is introduced by the explanation:

d 'An extra statutory concession is a relaxation which gives taxpayers a reduction in tax liability to which they would not be entitled under the strict letter of the law. Most concessions are made to deal with what are, on the whole, minor or transitory anomalies under the legislation and to meet cases of hardship at the margins of the code where a statutory remedy would be difficult to devise or would run to a length out of proportion to the intrinsic e importance of the matter.'

[30] Sarah Walker, in para 41 of her statement, adds the explanation:

f 'The Board would consider it appropriate to use its power to make ESC's where the result would be consistent with the intention of Parliament in passing the relevant legislation.'

[31] In the Hooper litigation the Secretary of State was concerned to contend that he enjoyed a wide power to make extra-statutory payments, notwithstanding that this contention was adverse to his position in the particular litigation. Equally, in the present case, Mr Brennan QC for the commissioners g has argued from the premise that their practice of making extra-statutory concessions falls within their powers under s 1(1) of the 1970 Act. Miss Rose has, naturally, been more than happy to accept that premise. It was also accepted by Moses J. In these circumstances the argument in respect of this issue was confined within a narrow compass. What were the limits of the commissioners' h powers to make extra-statutory concessions? Mr Brennan argued that they could not extend to granting concessions which were contrary to the intention of Parliament in passing the relevant legislation. Miss Rose argued, by particular reference to four of the published concessions, that no such restriction existed.
Clearly, she submitted, it was open to the commissioners to make a concession j where this was necessary to avoid an infringement of a convention right. Indeed, s 3 of the 1998 Act required the court so to interpret s 1(1) of the 1970 Act as to give the commissioners that power.

[32] Moses J accepted as appropriate the exercise of examining individual published concessions on the premise that they constituted legitimate exercises of the commissioners' powers. He accepted that two of the four examples relied upon by Miss Rose evidenced the grant of concessions which were contrary to the intention of Parliament as expressed in the relevant legislation. He observed ([2002] STC 347 at [27]):

'The essential quest ought, in my view, to be targeted on finding some principled distinction between extra-statutory concessions and the concession sought in this case. I can find none. Once it is accepted that there are extra-statutory concessions which are not merely temporary, are not merely of minor effect, but directly contradict the intention of Parliament expressed in statutory provisions, it becomes impossible to find any principle according to which in some cases the Revenue will grant a concession and in others they will not.'

'I conclude that there is no principle which would prevent the Revenue from issuing an extra-statutory concession which contradicted the intention of Parliament to restrict the allowances to women.'

[34] Before us Mr Brennan attacked the judge's approach. He started by conceding that it was common ground—

'that the Revenue, with the duty of care and management of the tax system, has the power to issue and publish Extra Statutory Concessions—relaxations which give the taxpayers a reduction in tax liability to which they would not be entitled under the strict letter of the law.'

[35] He went on, however, to challenge the use of individual published concessions as a touchstone for determining the extent of the commissioners' power to make such concessions. In so far as an individual concession was contrary to the intention of Parliament, as expressed in the relevant legislation, the correct conclusion was that the concession was beyond the commissioners' powers, not that the commissioners had power to disregard Parliament's expressed intention. He went on, none the less, to challenge the judge's conclusion that two of the published concessions were, in fact, contrary to—at least—the spirit of the relevant legislation.

[36] Both Mr Brennan and Moses J referred to expressions of judicial concern as to the legitimacy of the commissioners' practice of making extra-statutory tax concessions, though neither suggested that the legitimacy of the practice was in doubt. It seems to us that, before drawing conclusions from the way in which the commissioners' practice has been exercised, it is pertinent to consider what the courts have had to say about that practice.

[37] Bates v IRC [1967] 1 All ER 84, [1968] AC 483 concerned s 408 of the Income Tax Act 1952 which, on its plain meaning, produced results in some cases which were 'monstrous' and which Parliament can never have intended—see [1967] 1 All ER 84 at 89, [1968] AC 483 at 504 per Lord Reid. The commissioners had not sought to amend the legislation. Instead, as Lord Upjohn explained ([1967] 1 All ER 84 at 96, [1968] AC 483 at 516):

'... realising the monstrous result of giving effect to the true construction of the section, have in fact worked out what they consider to be an equitable way of operating it which seems to them to result in a fair system of taxation.'

Lord Upjohn commented: 'I am quite unable to understand upon what principle they can properly do so.'

a [38] In Vestey v IRC [1977] 3 All ER 1073, [1979] Ch 177 Walton J was concerned with another section of the 1952 Act, which had become s 478 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, which also had monstrous and unintended results, if applied in accordance with its natural meaning. The commissioners did not seek to apply the section in a manner which produced such results. Walton J quoted with approval the comment of Lord Upjohn which
b we have set out above, and added 'One should be taxed by law, and not be untaxed by concession'.

[39] In Vestey v IRC (No 2) [1979] 2 All ER 225 at 233, [1979] Ch 198 at 202–203 Walton J expanded on this comment in a passage which deserves citation in full:

c 'It is at this point that there arises what counsel for the taxpayers has denominated as a serious constitutional question; namely what rights the Inland Revenue Commissioners have to pick and choose when recovering tax. The Solicitor General says, and doubtless rightly says, that the commissioners are under no duty to recover every halfpenny of tax which d may be due. One may say "Amen" to that very readily, because the costs of recovery of extremely small amounts of tax would far outweigh the tax recovered. One expects the tax authorities to behave sensibly. In this connection I was referred to s 1 of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act 1890 and to s 1 of the Taxes Management Act 1970, but I do not think that either of these provisions has any real bearing on the matter. What the revenue authorities, through the Solicitor General, are here claiming is a general e dispensing power, no more and no less. He submitted that the system of extra-statutory concessions was well known and well recognised, and that what was happening in the present case was no more than the grant of an additional extra-statutory concession. In the first place, I, in company with many judges before me, am totally unable to understand upon what basis the f Inland Revenue Commissioners are entitled to make extra-statutory concessions. To take a very simple example (since example is clearly called for), upon what basis have the commissioners taken it upon themselves to provide that income tax is not to be charged upon a miner's free coal and allowances in lieu thereof? That this should be the law is doubtless quite correct; I am not arguing the merits, or even suggesting that some other g result, as a matter of equity, should be reached. But this, surely, ought to be a matter for Parliament, and not the commissioners. If this kind of concession can be made, where does it stop; and why are some groups favoured as against others?'

h [40] The two Vestey decisions were appealed direct to the House of Lords. Lord Wilberforce had this to say of the commissioners' submission that they had a discretion as to how the section in issue should be applied, which enabled them to mitigate the rigours of the section if applied literally ([1979] 3 All ER 976 at 984–985, [1980] AC 1148 at 1172):

j 'Taxes are imposed upon subjects by Parliament. A citizen cannot be taxed unless he is designated in clear terms by a taxing Act as a taxpayer and the amount of his liability is clearly defined. A proposition that whether a subject is to be taxed or not, or, if he is, the amount of his liability, is to be decided (even though within a limit) by an administrative body represents a radical departure from constitutional principle. It may be that the revenue could persuade Parliament to enact such a proposition in such terms that the courts would have to give effect to it: but unless it has done so, the courts, acting on constitutional principles, not only should not, but cannot, validate it. The Crown's contentions to the contrary, however moderate and persuasive their presentation by leading counsel, fail to support the proposition. The Crown say that the income tax legislation gives the commissioners a general administrative discretion as to the execution of the Acts, and it refers to particular instances, of which one is s 115(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (power to decide period of assessment). The judge described the comparison of such limited discretions with that now contended for as "laughable". Less genially I agree. More generally, they say that s 412 imposes a liability upon each and every beneficiary for tax in respect of the whole income of the foreign transferees; that there is no duty on the commissioners to collect the whole of this from any one beneficiary, that they are entitled, so long as they do not exceed the total, to collect from selected beneficiaries an amount decided on by themselves. My Lords, I must reject this proposition. When Parliament imposes a tax, it is the duty of the commissioners to assess and levy it on and from those who are liable by law. Of course they may, indeed should, act with administrative commonsense. To expend a large amount of taxpayers' money in collecting, or attempting to collect, small sums would be an exercise in futility: and no one is going to complain if they bring humanity to bear in hard cases. I accept also that they cannot, in the absence of clear power, tax any given income more than once. But all of this falls far short of saying that so long as they do not exceed a maximum they can decide that beneficiary A is to bear so much tax and no more, or that beneficiary B is to bear no tax. This would be taxation by self asserted administrative discretion and not by law. As the judge well said ([1977] 3 All ER 1073 at 1098, [1979] Ch 177 at 197): "One should be taxed by law, and not be untaxed by concession." The fact in the present case is that Parliament has laid down no basis on which tax can be apportioned where there are numerous discretionary beneficiaries.'

[41] Viscount Dilhorne ([1979] 3 All ER 976 at 994, [1980] AC 1148 at 1185) also expressed the view that the commissioners had no power to mitigate the gross injustice that would result from the strict application of the section, as interpreted by them. Lord Salmon ([1979] 3 All ER 976 at 998, [1980] AC 1148 at 1190) agreed with everything said by Lord Wilberforce.

[42] Beginning at [1979] 3 All ER 976 at 1001-1002, [1980] AC 1148 at 1194 Lord Edmund-Davies carried out a detailed review of the authorities dealing with the practice of the commissioners of making extra-statutory concessions, in the course of which he referred to the provisions of s 1 of the 1970 Act. He observed that judicial comment was mixed, but aligned himself firmly with those who disapproved of the practice, including Scott LJ, who in Absalom v Talbot (Inspector of Taxes) [1943] 1 All ER 589 at 598 had stated: 'No judicial countenance can or ought to be given in matters of taxation to any system of extra-legal concessions.' Lord Edmund-Davies concluded ([1979] 3 All ER 976 at 1003, [1980] AC 1148 at 1196) that the devices resorted to by the commissioners were unconstitutional.

[43] The extent of the powers of the commissioners under s 1 of the 1970 Act was directly in issue in IRC v National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 93, [1982] AC 617. The commissioners had been concerned at tax evasion to the tune of some £1m a year by casual workers

- a employed in Fleet Street. They made an agreement with the employers and the unions that would enable them to collect tax in the future, but in achieving this agreed that they would not attempt to pursue those who had evaded taxes in the past. The Federation sought to challenge this concession and the principal issue was whether it had standing to do so. It was relevant, however, to consider the strength of the case that the commissioners were acting beyond their powers.
- b Lord Diplock described their powers as follows ([1981] 2 All ER 93 at 101, [1982] AC 617 at 636–637):

- c ‘... the Board are charged by statute with the care, management and collection on behalf of the Crown of income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax. In the exercise of these functions the Board have a wide managerial discretion as to the best means of obtaining for the national
- d exchequer from the taxes committed to their charge, the highest net return that is practicable having regard to the staff available to them and the cost of collection. The Board and the inspectors and collectors who act under their directions are under a statutory duty of confidentiality with respect to information about individual taxpayers’ affairs that has been obtained in the
- e course of their duties in making assessments and collecting the taxes; and this imposes a limitation on their managerial discretion. I do not doubt, however, and I do not understand any of your Lordships to doubt, that if it were established that the board were proposing to exercise or to refrain from exercising its powers not for reasons of “good management” but for some extraneous or ulterior reason, that action or inaction of the Board would be ultra vires and would be a proper matter for judicial review if it were brought to the attention of the court by an applicant with “a sufficient interest” in having the Board compelled to observe the law.’

- f [44] Lord Scarman approved the following statement ([1981] 2 All ER 93 at 111, [1982] AC 617 at 651):

- g ‘... in the daily discharge of their duties inspectors are constantly required to balance the duty to collect “every part” of due tax against the duty of good management. This conflict of duties can be resolved only by good managerial decisions, some of which will inevitably mean that not all the tax known to be due will be collected.’

- h [45] It seems to us that the effect of these authorities is plain. One of the primary tasks of the commissioners is to recover those taxes which Parliament has decreed shall be paid. Section 1 of the 1970 Act permits the commissioners to set about this task pragmatically and to have regard to principles of good management. Concessions can be made where those will facilitate the overall task of tax collection. We draw attention, however, to Lord Diplock’s statement that the commissioners’ managerial discretion is as to the best manner of obtaining for the national exchequer the highest net return that is practicable.

- j [46] No doubt, when interpreting tax legislation, it is open to the commissioners to be as purposive as the most pro-active judge in attempting to ensure that effect is given to the intention of Parliament and that anomalies and injustices are avoided. But in the light of the authorities that we have cited above and of fundamental constitutional principle we do not see how s 1 of the 1970 Act can authorise the commissioners to announce that they will deliberately refrain from collecting taxes that Parliament has unequivocally decreed shall be paid, not because this will facilitate the overall task of collecting taxes, but because the commissioners take the view that it is objectionable that the taxpayer should have to pay the taxes in question. a

[47] We do not consider that there is any need to enter into the debate as to whether, as Moses J concluded, two of the published tax concessions contradicted the intention of Parliament. If they did, then it is arguable that the concessions fell outside the authority of the commissioners. What they could not do was justify Moses J's conclusion that— b

‘there is no principle which would prevent the Revenue from issuing an extra-statutory concession which contradicted the intention of Parliament to restrict the allowances to women.’

[48] Miss Rose argued that s 3 of the 1998 Act enabled and required the court to read s 1 of the 1970 Act as permitting the commissioners to grant concessions to taxpayers if they are necessary in order to prevent discrimination in the imposition of taxes which violates art 14. We do not accept that it is possible to interpret s 1 in such a way. c

[49] We are in no doubt that, when enacting s 262 of the 1988 Act and s 34 of the Finance Act 1999, Parliament intended the WBA, for so long as it remained in existence, to be restricted to women. The commissioners had no power to make similar allowances to men. For this reason, which was not the one that he gave, Moses J was correct to make a declaration of incompatibility. d

[50] On the finding that we have made the second issue does not arise. We propose none the less to deal with it, albeit briefly. e

[51] Moses J held that s 1 of the 1970 Act gave the commissioners a discretionary power to grant allowances to widowers that matched the WBA. In these circumstances he held that s 6(2)(a) of the 1998 Act provided the commissioners with no defence to Mr Wilkinson's claim. He went on to hold, however, that the commissioners had a defence under s 6(2)(b). As we understand his reasoning, it was as follows. (i) Where a statute confers a power, the exercise of which will inevitably be incompatible with convention rights, s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act enables that power to be exercised without breach of s 6(1)—see R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69 and R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929. f
(ii) The present case is the converse of those two cases. Failure by the commissioners to exercise their powers under s 1 of the 1970 Act will inevitably be incompatible with Mr Wilkinson's convention rights. (iii) To postulate that the commissioners must exercise their power under s 1 of the 1970 Act to give allowances to widowers is to convert that power into a duty, so that it ceases to be a power at all. This is not legitimate. (iv) Accordingly: g

[52] We are no more able to accept this reasoning than we were the similar reasoning in Hooper's case. It seems to us that s 6(2)(b) addresses the grant by Parliament of a statutory power which, regardless of the circumstances in which it is exercised, will inevitably be incompatible with convention rights. In such circumstances the power cannot be given effect to in a way which is compatible j a with the convention, and thus s 6(2)(b) enables the exercise of the power without breach of s 6(1).

[53] We appreciate the argument that if a failure to exercise a statutory power will inevitably involve a breach of convention rights, s 6(2)(b) is engaged, because implicit in the statutory power is the right to refrain from exercising the power. We make no comment as to whether that argument is sound or unsound. We simply observe that it has no application to the facts of this case. Section 1 of the 1970 Act is a wide general power. In most circumstances exercising that power will involve no incompatibility with the convention. Equally, in most circumstances failing to exercise the power will involve no incompatibility with the convention. If circumstances arise under which it is necessary to exercise the power in order to avoid a breach of convention rights, we can see no basis upon which the commissioners can rely upon s 6(2)(b) to justify a refusal to exercise the power.

[54] For these reasons we disagree with the conclusion of Moses J on the second issue. Had we held that the commissioners had power under s 1 of the 1970 Act to grant extra-statutory allowances to widowers to match the WBA, we would not have held that s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act excused them from failing to exercise that power.

[55] Miss Rose contends that the refusal of the commissioners to offer Mr Wilkinson a settlement on the same terms as those granted to Mr Crossland and Mr Fielding in their Strasbourg proceedings constitutes an abuse of power. She puts her case in two ways. (i) 'The respondents are under a common law duty to treat taxpayers fairly, and not to discriminate without justification between taxpayers: see IRC v National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 93 at 111, [1982] AC 617 at 651; R v IRC, ex p Unilever plc [1996] STC 681 at 692; R (on the application of British Sky Broadcasting Group) v Customs and Excise Comrs [2001] EWHC Admin 127 at [6]–[10], [2001] STC 437 at [6]–[10].' (ii) Mr Wilkinson is bound to obtain the compensation he seeks, together with his costs, if he pursues his claim to Strasbourg. To compel him, and others in his position, to go to those lengths will 'simply massively increase the financial burden of these claims on public funds' and is irrational.

[56] Although we have held that s 1 of the 1970 Act did not empower the commissioners to introduce a scheme of making extra-statutory concessions to all widowers, we are prepared to accept for the purposes of the present issue that their powers extend to settling Mr Wilkinson's claim and that of any other taxpayer who sets out on the road of litigation that may end in Strasbourg.

[57] Moses J applied to Miss Rose's arguments the reasoning that he had applied to the same issue in Hooper's case. He held that the commissioners were 'entitled to litigate the issue of reliance on s 6(2)(b) notwithstanding a settlement of Mr Crossland's application'. The commissioners have sought to support this reasoning.

[58] In elaboration of the first way Miss Rose puts her case, she submitted in her skeleton argument:

'In accordance with good administration and fairness, having settled a test case in Strasbourg, and elected not to pursue any argument that refusing to grant the Allowance to widowers was compatible with the Convention, the Respondents ought to have treated other similarly-situated taxpayers in the same way: see R v Hertfordshire County Council, ex p Cheung (1986) Times, 4 April, quoted by Moses J in R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2002] EWHC 191 (Admin) at [154], [2002] All ER (D) 193 (Feb) at [154].’

[59] We see no basis for the contention that Crossland’s case was a test case, nor do we see that the fact that the commissioners chose to settle the claims made at Strasbourg by Mr Crossland and Mr Fielding precludes them from challenging similar claims in the domestic forum, now that the 1998 Act permits convention issues to be raised in that forum.

[60] So far as Miss Rose’s argument based on irrationality is concerned, s 6(2) of the Human Rights Act 1998 provides a defence in respect of acts or omissions that infringe convention rights where Parliament has required or authorised the acts or omissions in question. Where this occurs the claimant will almost inevitably have a remedy if he pursues his claim to Strasbourg. If Miss Rose’s argument is correct, s 6(2) could almost always be finessed by a contention that it was irrational to compel the claimant to incur the expense of going to Strasbourg for his remedy. None the less, if the commissioners had conceded that there would be no answer to Mr Wilkinson’s claim for compensation once he got to Strasbourg, we would have some sympathy with her argument. That is not, however, the position.

JUST SATISFACTION

[61] The considerations in the Hooper appeal that led us to conclude that just satisfaction did not require the payment to Mr Naylor of compensation for failure to receive a widow’s pension apply with even greater force in the present context.

[62] The history of the tax regime for married couples is complex. Moses J attempted to summarise it ([2002] STC 347 at [7]) in order to set the dispute before him in context. In essence WBA was an anachronistic relic of a tax regime abandoned by 1994. Under the new regime there was no legitimate justification for granting a widow this allowance on the death of her husband. The allowance no longer reflected an adverse fiscal consequence of the husband’s death. While the WBA discriminated in favour of widows, it seems to us that the discrimination provided widows with an unjustified advantage not merely over widower taxpayers, but over all taxpayers.

[63] Before the 1998 Act had come into force, the Revenue had taken steps to remove this anomaly, by abolishing the WBA prospectively, with effect from 6 April 2000. To award Mr Wilkinson, or other taxpayers in his position, an equivalent payment would be to swell the numbers of those who have received tax allowances for which there is no legitimate justification. The principle of just satisfaction does not require any such payment.

[64] The facts of the present case are not to be compared with that of Darby v Sweden. That case concerned a thoroughly justified exemption from a particular tax, which was not allowed to Mr Darby on the ground that he was resident outside Sweden. The court held that this fact did not provide legitimate justification for not extending the exemption to him and ordered that he be repaid the tax that had been wrongly exacted.

[65] Miss Rose submitted that it was inconceivable that the Strasbourg court would not award compensation to Mr Wilkinson, having regard to the decisions in Crossland’s case and Fielding v UK. We do not agree. This is the first occasion upon which the principle of just satisfaction has received judicial consideration in the present context. We consider that the case for not making to widowers a payments equivalent to a WBA is a cogent one and it is at least possible that the Strasbourg court will take the same view.

[66] For these reasons the commissioners cannot be said to have acted unfairly or irrationally in declining to settle Mr Wilkinson's claim. This appeal is dismissed.

Practice – Parties – Description of parties – Description sufficiently certain to identify defendant – Whether requirement that defendant be named – CPR PD 7, para 4.1(1) – CPR 3.10.

The second claimant was the well-known writer of the Harry Potter books. Arrangements were made by the first claimant, the publisher, for the fifth book in the series to be printed under conditions of exceptional security. However, copies of the book were taken from the printers, without authority, and offered to the press at varying prices. The court made an order against 'the person (or persons) who have offered the publishers of the Sun, the Daily Mail, and the Daily Mirror newspapers a copy of the book ... requiring them to deliver up all copies of the book, any notes recording any part of it or any information derived from it and restraining them from disclosing to any person all or any part of the book or any information derived from it'. The issue was whether the orders against the second defendant should be continued until the date of the publication of the book notwithstanding that he, she and/or they were not described by name. At the hearing the claimants sought to amend the description of that defendant or defendants to include 'the person or persons who has or have physical possession of a copy of the said book or any part thereof without the consent of the claimants'. CPR 3.10^a conferred on the court a general power of dispensation where there had been a procedural error and provided that such error did not invalidate any step taken in the proceedings unless the court so ordered. CPR PD 7, para 4.1(1)^b indicated that the title of the proceedings 'should state ... the full name of each party'.

Held – The overriding objective and the obligations cast on the court were inconsistent with an undue reliance on form over substance. There was no requirement that a defendant had to be named, merely a direction that he should be. The proper application of CPR 3.10 was incompatible with a conclusion that the joinder of a defendant by description rather than by name was for that reason alone impermissible. However, the description used had to be sufficiently certain as to identify both those who were included and those who were not. If that test was satisfied then it did not matter that the description might apply to no one or more than one person nor that there was no further element of subsequent identification whether by service or otherwise. Accordingly, the court was a CPR 3.10 provides: 'Where there has been an error of procedure ... (a) the error does not invalidate any step taken in the proceedings unless the court so orders; and (b) the court may make an order to remedy the error.'

Application

The claimants, Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd and JK Rowling, sought to amend the description of certain defendants, described as person or persons unknown, in an order of Laddie J made on 7 May 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1087 (Ch), [2003] All ER (D) 344 (May)) requiring the delivery of copies of an unpublished book and any notes and information derived from it and restraining them from disclosing to any person any part of the book or any information derived from it. The order was continued by Laddie J on 9 May, by Rimer J on 14 May and by Sir Andrew Morritt V-C on 21 May. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir Andrew Morritt V-C.

23 May 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

SIR ANDREW MORRITT V-C.

[1] The second claimant, JK Rowling, is the well-known writer of the Harry Potter books. The fifth book is eagerly awaited and is to be published by the first claimant, Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd (Bloomsbury), on 21 June 2003. In April 2003 Bloomsbury made arrangements for the book to be printed by Clays Ltd of Bungay, Suffolk under conditions of exceptional security.

[2] Those arrangements have not been wholly successful. The evidence clearly establishes that at least three copies of the book have been taken away from the printers without authority and offered to the press at varying prices. Thus, on 5 May 2003 a man telephoned the Daily Mail. He indicated that he had a copy of the new book and asked how much they would pay him for it. On 6 May Mr Webb found two somewhat damp copies in the grass on the Common at Bungay. It is unclear how they got there. They have now been returned to the claimants via the first defendant, the Sun newspaper. Later on the same day the Sun received two separate telephone calls from a man. In the first he offered to sell to them three chapters of the book for £25,000. In the second, he offered to sell four chapters for £20,000. On 7 May the Daily Mirror was offered the first three chapters for an unspecified price. On 13 May another copy of the book was found in the grass on the Common at Bungay.

[3] These events prompted a number of legal steps. On 7 May Laddie J made an order (([2003] EWHC 1087 (Ch), [2003] All ER (D) 344 (May)) against 'the person (or persons) who have offered the publishers of the Sun, the Daily Mail, and the Daily Mirror newspapers a copy of the book Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix by JK Rowling' requiring them to deliver up all copies of the book, any notes recording any part of it or any information derived from it and restraining them from disclosing to any person all or any part of the book or any information derived from it. In his judgment he explained the unusual nature of the order against defendants so described and recognised the need in due course to address the issue in more detail. That order was continued by Laddie J on 9 May and by Rimer J on 14 May. On 21 May I continued it again until today in order to put this judgment into writing.

[4] The application against the first defendant has been disposed of on the basis of certain undertakings. The third to sixth defendants were arrested on 7 May and charged with theft of copies of the book or receiving them knowing them to have been stolen. They were joined as defendants by name on 14 May and submitted to the orders I made against them on 21 May. Thus the only outstanding issue is whether the orders against the second defendant first made by Laddie J on 7 May should be continued until 21 June notwithstanding that he, she and/or they are not described by name. In the light of the argument the claimants seek to amend the description of that defendant or those defendants so as to read:

'... the person or persons who have offered the publishers of the Sun, the Daily Mail, and the Daily Mirror newspapers a copy of the book Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix by JK Rowling or any part thereof and the person a or persons who has or have physical possession of a copy of the said book or any part thereof without the consent of the claimants.'

[5] The problem with regard to an order against persons so described was revealed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Friern Barnet UDC v Adams [1927] 2 Ch 25. In that case the plaintiff sought to recover the cost of certain street works from the relevant frontagers. They did not know their names and issued a writ against 'the owners of' certain land clearly identified by name. It was pointed out that only owners of that land at the date of the completion of the works could be liable. In order to cover that point the plaintiff sought to amend the description by adding 'at the time of the completion of the works'. The judge refused leave to amend and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

c Lord Hanworth MR said (at 30):

'A writ cannot be issued in the terms proposed referring to the parties sought to be summoned in this vague way. I think that that is clear from the rules and the official forms. Tracing the matter a little further back the original official form of writ in use was established by the Act of 2 Will. 4, c.39. That Act recited that "whereas the process for the commencement of personal actions is by reason of its great variety and multiplicity very inconvenient in practice," and proceeded to enact that the process in all such actions should be according to the form contained in the Schedule to the Act annexed marked No. 1, and which process should be called a writ of summons. In the form of the writ in the Schedule the writ is directed to C. D. of, etc., in the County of ... That form was followed in the Judicature Act, 1873, and it is to be found now in the forms directed to be used in Order II., r. 3, which directs that "the writ of summons for the commencement of an action shall, except in the cases in which any different form is hereinafter provided, be in one of the Forms Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 in Appendix A, Part 1, with such variations as circumstances may require," and the appendix shows that the writ must be directed to a particular defendant of a specified address. In my opinion, this writ does not comply with the form of writ which has the basis of statutory authority.'

'It appears to me that the procedure established by the Judicature Act necessarily implies even if it does not expressly state—and I think it does so state—that it is necessary to an action that the defendants should be named. In some cases they may be described by the office which they hold, but apart from that, they must be named; and it seems to me to be contrary to the rules to issue a writ against defendants whom you do not know by describing them merely as owners of certain property. It is not right to describe the defendants in the vague way adopted in this writ.'

'This is a writ in personam, and in my opinion, the writ, in not naming the defendants, but merely describing them as the owners of adjoining property, is bad. The plaintiffs do not know, and the writ does not state, whether any one of the defendants is a lunatic, or an infant, or is residing abroad, or is under any kind of disability, in each of which cases some special directions or some special procedure might be required. There is no authority or precedent for such a writ, and counsel was unable to tell us of any case where a writ of this sort has been allowed.'

Thus the objections were twofold. First, the prescribed form required names and addresses. Second the description was too vague.

[8] A similar problem arose in Re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, ex p Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association for the South East [1971] Ch 204, [1970] 3 WLR 649. In that case squatters had broken into and were in occupation of vacant premises. The plaintiff owner did not know their names. He applied for an order for possession by means of an ex parte originating summons to which there was no defendant. Service was effected by putting it through the letter box. Stamp J refused to make an order for possession on such an application. He concluded that there were two insuperable objections. The first ([1971] Ch 204 at 208, [1970] 3 WLR 649 at 653) was:

'... it is axiomatic that a person claiming an order of this court against another, except where a statute provides otherwise—and I shall have to consider whether the order and rules made under statute do provide otherwise—cannot obtain that relief except in proceedings to which that other person is a party and after that other person—the person against whom the relief is sought—has had the opportunity of appearing before this court and putting forward his answer to the claim. The accusatorial process by which the person against whom relief is sought is summoned to appear to answer the plaintiff's claim is the process by which justice has been done in England and Wales between man and man over the centuries.'

'The second objection, and it is in my judgment a fatal objection, to the procedure which the applicants invoke is that an order made upon an ex parte application in ex parte proceedings will bind nobody. It is a truism that an order or judgment of this court binds only those who are parties to or attending the proceedings in which the order or judgment is given or made. This principle is blurred where the action is an action for the recovery of land by reason of the process by which the judgment is executed. The sheriff acting pursuant to a writ of possession will be bound to turn out those he finds upon the land whether they are bound by the judgment or not. But judgment and the execution of the judgment are two different things, and much of the argument which has been addressed to me in this case, I think, ignores that distinction. It is no doubt correct that if I were to grant the relief which the applicants seek upon this present application and order that the persons in occupation do deliver possession of the premises and that the applicants be at liberty forthwith to issue a writ of possession the trespassers would be turned out and in that sense the order would be binding upon them. But as a matter of law an order that the plaintiffs do recover possession of the premises binds only the parties to the proceedings: which these trespassers are not.'

Thus the objections in this case were different to those in the Friern Barnet case, namely, there was no defendant and the order, as sought, would have no effect.

[10] In McPhail v persons, names unknown [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447 the Court of Appeal was faced with a similar problem to that confronting Stamp J.

a Lord Denning MR doubted the correctness of the decision of Stamp J ([1973] 3 All ER 393 at 398, [1973] Ch 447 at 458) but, as the rules had been altered, did not say why. Similar problems have arisen in the case of 'touts' and others selling pirate copies of copyright goods. In such cases if one of them is identified by name the court has been prepared to make an order against that defendant on his own behalf and as representing all other persons engaged in the activity of which

b complaint is made. In EMI Records Ltd v Kudhail [1985] FSR 36 the Court of Appeal concluded that the common link afforded by that activity and the common interest in wishing to remain anonymous is sufficient to justify the order.

[11] Accordingly even before the introduction of the CPR the position in England was anomalous. A claimant could obtain an injunction against all infringers by description so long as he could identify one of them by name, but,

c by contrast, if he could not name one of them then he could not get an injunction against any of them.

[12] Other common law countries took a different line. Thus in Jackson v Bubela [1972] 5 WWR 80 the British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed an amendment to correct the name of the defendant from 'John Doe' to the real

d name of the driver involved in the relevant accident. It was held to be a misnomer not the substitution of one party for another. Bull JA said (at 82):

'However, I have reached the conclusion that the Local Judge was wrong in holding that a substitution for, or addition of, a party was involved and erred in not holding that the application was merely to correct a misnomer of an existing party to the action. The words "John Doe" to my mind are not e restricted in connotation to a "fictitious" person or one not in existence. Traditionally the words were used in that limited sense in early ejectment suits, but for generations they have come to be accepted, used and understood, both in legal and common parlance, as indicating a real person existing and identifiable but whose name is not known or available to the f person referring to him. That is the situation here. The appellant was not purporting to sue a fiction to maintain or acquire some property right as was done in ancient times. On the contrary, she was suing a living man whom she alleged was at a particular defined time and place operating a described motor vehicle in such a negligent manner as to cause her injuries then and

g there. Her litigating finger was pointed at that driver and no one else, but she did not know his name. For the purposes of suit (and it was necessary to act quickly because of the imminent expiry of the limitation period) she gave that identifiable and identified man a name, using one that would clearly connote to all that it did not purport to be his real name. And, further, in the endorsement it was clearly stated that the real name of the defendant

h driver was not "John Doe" but was unknown except to the other defendant, the female respondent. Under these circumstances, I can see no elements of an addition of, or substitution for, a defendant. No new entity or person was involved. It was merely an application to change the name of a party from a patently incorrect one to his proper one.'

j Thus the description 'John Doe' sufficiently identified the driver of the vehicle at the relevant time and place even though it was obviously not his name. The use of that description was both permitted and sufficiently certain. Such a description was also approved by the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Levy v Levy (9 November 1979, unreported), see Barnett v French [1981] 1 WLR 848 at 853 per Donaldson LJ.

[13] Jackson's case was followed by the British Columbia Supreme Court in Golden Eagle v International Organization of Masters [1974] 5 WWR 49. In that case the plaintiff (see [1974] 5 WWR 49 at 50) sued 'persons unknown to the Plaintiffs picketing in the vicinity of ... carrying signs directed against the Plaintiffs' vessel ...' Four persons entered appearances in the name 'John Doe' and applied to have the proceedings struck out. The judge refused to strike out the action so as to frustrate a genuine claim on the ground that the plaintiff could not name the defendant. After referring to the Friern Barnet case, Re Wykeham Terrace and Jackson's case, the judge said (at 52-53):

'The Court of Appeal of this province has endorsed the practice of the use of "John Doe" to describe a defendant who is a real person but whose name is not known. In the case of Jackson v Bubela, [1972] 5 W.W.R. 80, 20 D.L.R. (3d) 500 (B.C. C.A.), the Court of Appeal permitted the plaintiff to amend his writ of summons to substitute for the name "John Doe" the proper name of the driver of the motor vehicle. The discussion in that case indicates very clearly that in this jurisdiction a plaintiff is not to be frustrated in his claim by a procedural requirement that the defendant be named where the circumstances are such that the name is not known or ascertainable. A well-established practice of the court ought not to be changed without a convincing reason. None has been shown to me and moreover, by implication, the practice has the approval of the Court of Appeal.'

There is no indication in the reports of either Jackson's case or the Golden Eagle case that the decisions turned on provisions peculiar to the law of British Columbia.

[14] The Friern Barnet case and Re Wykeham Terrace have not been followed in New Zealand either. In Tony Blain Pty Ltd v Splain [1993] 3 NZLR 185 the second defendant was sued as 'all persons who sell unlicensed ... merchandise at or about the ... stadium on 26th March 1993 who are served with this statement of claim'. Anderson J granted the ex parte order sought. He said (at 187):

'It is an ancient maxim of the law that where there is a right there is a remedy; ubi jus, ibi remedium. In circumstances where it is plain that persons are infringing proprietary interests which the law recognises, or deceiving the public by way of trade in a manner which may indirectly affect the commercial interests of others, the law should, if it reasonably can, provide a remedy. What is proposed in this case is that certain solicitors named in the application, who by virtue of their status are officers of this Court, should be authorised to accost bootleggers at the concert venues and require them to provide their current addresses, evidence of identity, and to surrender up to the named solicitors all merchandise including t-shirts, headbands, badges or programmes in their possession or control. Persons required to respond to these oral interrogatories, which conceptually is what they are, will be such persons as are served with the orders for injunction also sought in this proceeding. The second and third defendants are identified as persons who sell unlicensed merchandise at the relevant concert venues. It is expedient to refer to them in this judgment as "John Doe" and "Jane Doe". The fact that persons cannot be identified at this stage of the proceeding is no bar to relief against persons who may be identified at a relevant time. It is not the name but the identity and identification of infringing persons which is relevant. The identity may not be immediately established but persons a infringing will be identified by their act of infringement. Jane Doe and John Doe will be known by their works.'

b [15] I should also refer to the relevant provisions of the CPR. CPR 1.1(1) proclaims that: 'These Rules are a new procedural code with the overriding objective of enabling the court to deal with cases justly.' What that involves is amplified in CPR 1.1(2). CPR 1.2 requires the court to give effect to the overriding objective when it exercises any power given by the CPR. Such powers include the general powers of management set out in CPR 3.1 which include the power (see CPR 3.1(2)(m)) to 'take any other step or make any other order for the purpose of managing the case and furthering the overriding objective'. CPR 3.10 confers on the court a general power of dispensation where there has been a procedural error and provides that such error does not invalidate any step taken in the proceedings unless the court so orders.

d [16] Proceedings are started when the court issues a claim form at the request of the claimant (see CPR 7.2(1)). The form to be used is specified in CPR 4(1). CPR 4(2) authorises a variation in that form 'if ... required by the circumstances of a particular case'. CPR PD 7, para 4.1(1) provides that the claim form must be headed with the title of the proceedings and indicates that the title 'should state ... the full name of each party'. The claim form must be served on the defendant within four months or such extended time as the court may allow (see CPR 7.5).

e [17] Counsel for the claimants has properly been concerned throughout each stage of these proceedings with whether the court had the power to make orders of the type he sought against a defendant described otherwise than by name. He emphasises that the evidence clearly indicates that at least four copies of the book have been taken from the printers, at least one of which is still at large. He points out that, given the elaborate security surrounding the printing it must have been obvious to any one who took or received a copy that such copy and its contents were secret until publication on 21 June 2003. He suggests that an order in the form sought cannot cause confusion because anyone to whom it is shown will know immediately whether or not it is descriptive of and therefore directed to him or her.

g [18] Thus there are two questions. (a) Am I entitled to make the order sought? And if so (b) should I do so? The answer to the first question depends on whether and if so to what extent I am bound by the ratio decidendi of either the Friern Barnet case or Re Wykeham Terrace. I will consider them in turn.

h [19] Friern Barnet UDC v Adams [1927] 2 Ch 25 was decided on two grounds, first that the prescribed form of writ required the defendant to be named, second that the description used was too vague. Both points were decided against the background of the regime prescribed by the RSC. The regime introduced by the CPR is quite different. There is no requirement that a defendant must be named, merely a direction that he 'should' be. The failure to give the name of the defendant cannot now invalidate the proceedings both because they are started by the issue of the claim form at the request of the claimant and because, unless the court thinks otherwise, CPR 3.10 so provides. The overriding objective and the obligations cast on the court are inconsistent with an undue reliance on form over substance. The proper application of CPR 3.10 is incompatible with a conclusion that the joinder of a defendant by description rather than by name is for that reason alone impermissible. For these reasons I conclude that the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Friern Barnet case is not applicable to proceedings brought under the CPR.

[20] The decision of Stamp J in Re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, ex p Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association for the South East [1971] Ch 204, [1970] 3 WLR 649 is not binding on me in any event, though I would follow it unless it was distinguishable or I was satisfied that it was wrongly decided. I consider that it is distinguishable as being, like the Friern Barnet case, inapplicable to cases under the CPR. But it is also distinguishable on other grounds. First the objection in that case was that there was no defendant. In this case there is; the question is whether he or she has been properly described. Second, the objection in that case was that the order sought would not bind anyone to do or abstain from doing anything. That is not so in this case. A person falling within the description of the defendant could be liable for contempt of court if he acted inconsistently with it. Any other person who knowing of the order assists in its breach or nullifies the purpose of a trial may also be liable for contempt: Acrow (Automation) Ltd v Rex Chainbelt Inc [1971] 3 All ER 1175, [1971] 1 WLR 1676 and A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398, [1992] 1 AC 191.

[21] These conclusions are consistent with the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Biguzzi v Rank Leisure plc [1999] 4 All ER 934, [1999] 1 WLR 1926 and Stewart v Engel [2000] 3 All ER 518, [2000] 1 WLR 2268. Accordingly I conclude that the claimants are entitled to join as defendants and I am entitled, if I see fit, to make the order sought against persons described as quoted in [4], above. Mr Carr, as advocate to the court, for whose assistance I am most grateful, suggested that there might be a distinction to be drawn between cases such as Jackson's case and Levy's case, in which the description clearly referred to an identified person, the Golden Eagle case in which the defendants were identified in part by service of the statement of claim and the Tony Blain case in which the defendant was also identified in part by service of the order, and this case where the description may cover no one or, by contrast, more than one person. I accept that those distinctions may be drawn but I do not consider that they should lead to a different result. The crucial point, as it seems to me, is that the description used must be sufficiently certain as to identify both those who are included and those who are not. If that test is satisfied then it does not seem to me to matter that the description may apply to no one or to more than one person nor that there is no further element of subsequent identification whether by service or otherwise.

[22] I can see no injustice to anyone if I make an order in the form sought but considerable potential for injustice to the claimants if I do not. For these reasons I will make the order.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

THORPE, SEDLEY LJ AND RICHARDS J

1, 11 APRIL 2003

Employment Appeal Tribunal – Jurisdiction – Unfair dismissal – Employee adjudicated bankrupt – Bankrupt’s estate vesting in trustee in bankruptcy – Whether unfair dismissal claim property right rather than personal right.

The claimant’s employment with the prison service was terminated, and she made a complaint to an employment tribunal, alleging unfair dismissal, wrongful dismissal and disability discrimination. In November 2001 the claims were all struck out for repeated non-compliance with procedural directions, and the employee gave notice of appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal. In January 2002 she was adjudged bankrupt. At the hearing of the appeal before the EAT, the employer submitted that the claimant lacked standing to pursue the appeal, because all her property, including things in action, such as the right to bring legal proceedings, had vested in her trustee in bankruptcy by reason of ss 283(1), 306 and 436^a of the Insolvency Act 1986. The EAT acceded to that submission and dismissed the appeal. The claimant appealed. Whilst she accepted that her claims for wrongful dismissal and disability discrimination, which were in substance money claims, had vested in her trustee in bankruptcy, she argued that the claim for unfair dismissal, being principally a claim for reinstatement in the lost job or re-engagement in a similar job, was a personal claim and as such did not vest in her trustee.

Held – Whilst the 1986 Act provided that a bankrupt’s right to bring or pursue legal proceedings, which was a thing in action, vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, there was a distinction between proceedings which sought to recover money or property, in which the bankrupt’s creditors would have an interest, and causes of action personal to the bankrupt, which did not vest in his trustee. A claim for reinstatement or re-engagement consequent on an unfair dismissal, and indeed a significant element of the compensation which could be awarded in lieu of those, was not a thing in action of the kind which formed part of a bankrupt’s estate, even though the eventual fund, if an award were made, might be. It was a claim of a unique kind which offered the restoration to the claimant of something only the claimant could do. To vest it in the trustee in bankruptcy would be of no appreciable benefit to the creditors except to the extent that it might produce a money settlement. The appeal would accordingly be allowed, and the matter would be remitted to the EAT for determination on the merits (see [10], [11], [25], [27], [29], below).

^a Sections 283 and 436, so far as material, are set out at [10], below. Section 306, so far as material, provides: ‘(1) The bankrupt’s estate shall vest in the trustee immediately on his appointment taking effect ... (2) Where any property which is ... comprised in the bankrupt’s estate vests in the trustee ... it shall so vest without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.’

Appeal

The claimant, Sharon Marie Grady, appealed with permission of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Judge McMullen QC, Mr D Lambert and Mr A Manners) from the tribunal's decision on 5 December 2002 dismissing for want of jurisdiction the claimant's appeal against the Employment Tribunal's decision striking out, for non-compliance with procedural directions, her claims for unfair dismissal, wrongful dismissal and disability discrimination. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. f

Jeremy Johnson (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Prison Service.

11 April 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

SEDLEY LJ.

[1] This is a judgment of the court. j

THE ISSUE

[2] The appellant was for almost 15 years an administration officer in the Prison Service. Following the termination of her employment in November 2000 she brought proceedings before the employment tribunal sitting at Leeds alleging unfair dismissal, wrongful dismissal and disability discrimination. The employment tribunal has jurisdiction today, as it used not to have, in all three matters.

a [3] On the date scheduled for the hearing, 12 November 2001, her claims were all struck out for repeated non-compliance with procedural directions and she was ordered to pay costs. She gave notice of appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) on 21 November. On 31 January 2002 she was adjudged bankrupt, and when her appeal came on for hearing before the EAT counsel for the respondent submitted that Ms Grady lacked standing to pursue it because all b her rights of action had vested by law in her trustee in bankruptcy, who had not reassigned any of them to her. The EAT acceded to this argument and dismissed the appeal for want of jurisdiction ([2003] All ER (D) 49 (Feb), (2003) Times, 24 February). Because the point was not an easy or a clear one, they themselves granted permission to appeal to this court.

c [4] Before going any further it is right to say that the EAT went on to indicate that the substantive appeal, if competent, might have had merit.

THE STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

d [5] Since the answer to the issue before us depends in part on the framework of statute law, it is as well to set it out now. For reasons to which we will come, we are concerned only with the unfair dismissal provisions.

e [6] By s 94(1) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 an employee has the right not to be unfairly dismissed. While dismissal is necessarily a matter of contract law, fairness in relation to it is a statutory construct. By s 98, provided that the employer can show that the dismissal was on a stipulated ground, the tribunal must decide whether or not it was reasonable in the circumstances to base the e dismissal on it.

f [7] By s 111 employment tribunals are given jurisdiction to hear complaints of unfair dismissal. If they find it established, the remedies are those set out in ss 112–117: reinstatement, re-engagement and compensation. By s 112 the tribunal must explain to the complainant what orders it can make under the first f two heads and in what circumstances. If the complainant then asks for such an order, the tribunal has power to make it (see s 112(3)), and by s 116(1) it must begin by considering reinstatement in the same job (see s 114). If, but only if, it decides against reinstatement it must consider re-engagement (see s 115).

g [8] By s 112(4) if no order is made either for reinstatement or for re-engagement, the tribunal is to make an award of compensation, calculated according to ss 118–127A. This consists in essence of a basic award, representing g not consequential loss but the years of the employee's life invested in the lost job, and a compensatory award representing an equivalent of common law damages. By s 117(3), if an order for reinstatement or re-engagement has been made and not complied with, the tribunal is required to make a full award in lieu for unfair h dismissal, plus 'an additional award of compensation of an amount not less than twenty-six nor more than fifty-two weeks' pay'.

j [9] Section 206(2) and (3) provides that where an employee has died, tribunal proceedings for unfair dismissal may be instituted or continued by the employee's personal representative. No provision is made for transmission or j discontinuance in the event of bankruptcy.

THE EFFECT OF BANKRUPTCY

[10] Section 306 of the Insolvency Act 1986 provides that the estate of a bankrupt shall vest in his trustee in bankruptcy at the moment of the trustee's appointment without the need of any formality. By s 283(1) the estate is defined as comprising 'all property belonging to or vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy', and by s 436 property is defined as including 'things in action'. A right to bring or pursue legal proceedings is a thing in action. a

[11] The law has for many years distinguished, however, between proceedings which seek to recover money or property in which the bankrupt's creditors will have an interest and causes of action personal to the bankrupt which do not vest in his trustee. Among these, as Hoffmann LJ explained in Heath v Tang, Stevens v Peacock [1993] 4 All ER 694 at 697, [1993] 1 WLR 1421 at 1423, are— b

'cases in which—"the damages are to be estimated by immediate reference to pain felt by the bankrupt in respect of his body, mind, or character, and without immediate reference to his rights of property."' (See Beckham v Drake (1849) 2 HL Cas 579 at 604, 9 ER 1213 at 1222 per Erle J. See also Wilson v United Counties Bank Ltd [1920] AC 102, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1035.) Actions for defamation and assault are obvious examples. The bankruptcy does not affect his ability to litigate such claims.' c

If, however, the damages from such a claim are invested, the investment can be claimed by the trustee: see Re Wilson, ex p Vine (1878) 8 Ch D 364.

[12] If within a single claim both kinds of remedy are sought (in other words, if the claim is hybrid), the claim falls outside the exception and vests in the trustee: see Ord v Upton (as trustee to the property of Ord) [2000] 1 All ER 193 at 197, [2000] Ch 352 at 360. But where one event gives rise to two or more claims, one for damage to property and one for personal injury, the former alone vests in the trustee and the latter remains with the bankrupt: see 3(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2002 reissue) para 436. d

[14] The borderline is marked by such distinctions as that between a claim for damages for a conspiracy which has caused mental and physical distress and loss of reputation (which, if it relates in part to the bankrupt in the way of his business, ranks as property passing to the trustee: see Wenlock v Moloney [1965] 2 All ER 871, [1965] 1 WLR 1238), and a claim for damages for negligence or assault causing personal injury, or for defamation (see Beckham's case). There is no bright line. f

THE ARGUMENTS

[15] Mr Mulholland accepted before the EAT that in the light of these authorities Ms Grady's claims for wrongful dismissal and disability discrimination, being in substance money claims, had vested by operation of law in her trustee in bankruptcy and could not be pursued except by the trustee or by means of reassignment to her. But he has submitted that the claim for a remedy for unfair dismissal is of a different and personal kind, falling within the exception in favour of personal causes of action, because it is principally a claim for reinstatement in the lost job or re-engagement in an equivalent one. g

[16] Mr Johnson, for the Prison Service, in addition to a technical point to which we will come in a moment, contends that a claim in respect of unfair h

- a dismissal is not materially different from a claim in respect of unlawful dismissal. In the latter, reinstatement by way of specific performance is also possible: see Hill v CA Parsons & Co Ltd [1971] 3 All ER 1345, [1972] Ch 305. In the former, the claim is as much for compensation as for reinstatement or re-engagement. He also contends that Mr Mulholland, by admitting that the claim in respect of wrongful dismissal has gone, has debarred himself from arguing that the claim in respect of unfair dismissal has not gone too. But his essential contention is that unfair dismissal is in its essence an action on a contract with the immaterial qualification that by statute the breach has to involve unreasonableness.
- b

[17] For the appellant it is said that this is a false analysis: the action is a unique statutory tort in which termination is merely the gateway to the enforcement of a right to keep a job which the claimant has unfairly lost.

c HOW MANY CLAIMS?

- [18] Mr Johnson begins with a somewhat technical argument that because both tribunals below had before them a single application containing three claims, two of which were admitted to have vested in the trustee, the appeal which was under way when Ms Grady became bankrupt was a hybrid claim the whole of which therefore vested in her trustee. We did not find it necessary to trouble Mr Mulholland about this. Not only is this manifestly a case falling within the class, set out in [11], above, of distinct claims arising out of a single set of facts. The submission, if right, would produce the pointless result that applicants could guard themselves against the risk of a supervening bankruptcy by issuing three applications or notices of appeal instead of one (and no doubt that their lawyers could be sued for not advising them to do so).

DID THE UNFAIR DISMISSAL CLAIM VEST IN THE TRUSTEE?

- [19] The principle underlying this seemingly metaphysical question is that a bankrupt forfeits his assets, beyond the means of subsistence, to his creditors. The qualification that a viable legal claim does not pass to the trustee with the bankrupt's other assets if it represents redress for some wrong personal to the bankrupt is not, as Mr Johnson suggested it was, an exception to the statutory provision devised by the common law. It is the accepted construction, known to Parliament long before the passage of the 1986 Act, of a thing in action in the context of the insolvency legislation: see Ord v Upton (as trustee to the property of Ord) [2000] 1 All ER 193 at 197–198, [2000] Ch 352 at 360 per Aldous LJ. There is no dispute that, by the process described in [10], above, all things in action belonging to the bankrupt vest in her trustee. The question is whether the pending appeal to the EAT was a thing in action within the meaning of the legislation.
- f
- g
- h

[20] There can in our judgment be no distinction for this purpose between the claim and the appeal. The appeal, brought as of right, was a continuation of the claim once it had failed at first instance. Either both fall or neither falls within the material meaning of a thing in action.

- j [21] It seems to us that the upshot of the many decided cases on this topic is that a claim which represents a transmissible asset of the bankrupt forms part of the estate on which the creditors have a claim, while one which reflects some aspect of the bankrupt's individuality does not. This is not to say that the end-product of the latter is also protected. Just as an investment of, say, libel damages will accrue to the estate and vest in the trustee (see [11], above), one would expect that earnings beyond those needed for subsistence from a job in which the bankrupt was reinstated would form part of the estate, as those from a bankrupt's continuing employment do. a

[22] In our judgment the essential nature of a claim for unfair dismissal is personal, not proprietary. Unlike a claim for wrongful dismissal, which (except in the rare case where specific performance can be granted) is an action for damages for breach of a contract, a claim for unfair dismissal only begins with the employer's fundamental breach. It proceeds through the issues described in paraphrase in [6] and [7], above. The purpose and effect of the sequential provisions for judgment and redress can fairly be said to be the recognition of a vested interest in a job—something of a different order from the common law's view of a job as a simple contract which can be broken by a party willing to pay the appropriate price for breach. b

[23] Mr Johnson relies nevertheless on the reasoning of Lord Brougham in Beckham v Drake (1849) 2 HL Cas 579 at 640, 9 ER 1213 at 1235: c

‘The law ... is shewn to be this, that even where there is no actual damage proved, or even where the damage is merely nominal for a breach of contract, still if that is in respect either of property or of a proprietary right, such as service or work and labour, as in the present case, even in that case it passes.’ d

While Beckham's case is undoubtedly regarded as a continuing source of law, care needs to be taken with it. It was in form a decision of the House of Lords in the years before the Judicature Acts, and the speech of Lord Brougham was concurred in by Lord Campbell alone. The report does not indicate which if any other members of the House sat and voted. The report is for this reason more valued for the extensive opinions of the judges which their Lordships had called for upon the appeal from the Court of Exchequer Chamber, among them the opinion of Erle J cited by Hoffmann LJ in Heath v Tang, Stevens v Peacock [1993] 4 All ER 694 at 697, [1993] 1 WLR 1421 at 1423 (see [11], above). The action was for payment of a fixed contractual sum for the premature termination of the plaintiff's seven-year contract of service, and the plea in bar was that the cause of action had passed on his bankruptcy to the assignees. Erle J said ((1849) 2 HL Cas 579 at 606, 9 ER 1213 at 1223): e

‘As to that part of [the promise] respecting the continuance of this relation, it has no reference to the feelings of the bankrupt, so as to be analogous to the promises and causes of action which are decided to be excepted, and it is not the substance of the promise which is considered in the award of damage; but as to the other part, namely, the paying of the wages, it is the consideration for the promise of service ... [T]he first ground above mentioned, namely, that the contract relates to the person, is true only in respect of the consideration for the promise, which is personal skill and labour, and not in respect of the promise itself ...’ f

‘... it cannot be doubted that where a contract remains to be executed, and cannot be executed without the co-operation of the bankrupt, his assignees cannot enforce the contract, at all events unless they can procure him to co-operate.’ h a Williams J goes on to point out ((1849) 2 HL Cas 579 at 599, 9 ER 1213 at 1220) that, a breach having now occurred, the plaintiff 'is not bound by the contract to bestow any of his skill and labour in order to sustain the right of action'.

[24] None of this reasoning answers the present question, but all of it in our view tends to place on the non-vesting side of the line a claim which is primarily directed at the restoration of a contractual relationship in which the claimant's skill and labour are the essential commodity. There is nothing frivolous in Mr Mulholland's question whether the Official Receiver could seriously seek reinstatement in Ms Grady's former job—for that is the principal remedy claimed in these proceedings which are said to have become his, and the first remedy which the tribunal is required by law to explore. It was in principle the question posed by Lord Abinger CB (dissenting, it is true, but not on this aspect of the argument) in Gibson v Carruthers (1841) 8 M & W 321 at 343–344, 151 ER 1061 at 1070–1071. Lord Abinger CB recalled that at the time when Sir Walter Scott's publisher became bankrupt (he was probably referring to Constable, who in 1826 went down with over £250,000 in debts) he had contracted to pay Scott £4,000 for his next novel. When his assignees claimed the benefit of the contract, Scott had objected that the quality and respectability of the publisher was so central to the contract that Constable's bankruptcy had discharged it. 'I must own' said Lord Abinger CB—

e 'that his reasoning appeared satisfactory to me; but a more obvious illustration of the principle on which it rested would have been afforded by reversing the case, and supposing that Sir Walter Scott had been the bankrupt and his booksellers solvent, would they have been content to pay their £4000, and take the risk of publishing a novel written by the assignees of the novelist?'

f [25] In our judgment a claim for reinstatement or re-engagement consequent on an unfair dismissal, and indeed a significant element of the compensation which can be awarded in lieu of these, is not a thing in action of the kind which forms part of a bankrupt's estate, even though the eventual fund (if an award is made) may be. It is a claim of a unique kind which offers the restoration to the claimant of something which only the claimant can do. To vest it in the trustee in bankruptcy would be of no appreciable benefit to the creditors except to the extent that it might produce a money settlement (which would represent not a concession but a liquidation of the bankrupt's claim to her job). For the rest, the creditors will probably be better served if the bankrupt can get her job back or a similar job in its place, and that is something the trustee cannot do in her stead. Mr Johnson rightly does not fall back on the circular proposition that in that case the trustee can always reassign the claim to the bankrupt.

j [26] The EAT (Judge McMullen QC, Mr Lambert and Mr Manners) ([2003] All ER (D) 49 (Feb), (2003) Times, 24 February) took the view that the difference between wrongful and unfair dismissal being chiefly one of remedies, and orders for re-engagement and reinstatement being 'very rare' (we do not in fact know the figures), there was no sufficient difference between the two to indicate a differential effect of bankruptcy. They concluded that in the light of the authorities a right to claim unfair dismissal was a property right and not a personal right.

[27] For reasons which we have given we respectfully take the contrary view. We consider that an unfair dismissal claim, both in its nature and in its remedies, is personal to the claimant and not apt to vest in her trustee in bankruptcy as a thing in action. a

[28] We have been invited, if we reach this stage, to determine the substantive issue which the EAT considered itself precluded from determining. We decline to do so. The issue is one which depends heavily on the accumulated experience and knowledge of the EAT in respect of employment tribunal practice and procedure, and our judgment—at least in the absence of a reasoned decision from them—would be a poor substitute for theirs. b

[29] We therefore allow the appeal as to Ms Grady's standing and remit the matter to the EAT for determination on its merits. c

b 21 MAY, 30 JUNE 2003

Housing – Homeless person – Duty of housing authority to provide accommodation – Priority need – Sudden unexplained disappearance of caravan used as accommodation – Whether disappearance an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster – Housing Act 1996, s 189(1)(d).

c The appellant lived in a caravan placed on land owned by the respondent housing authority. He had no lawful right to do so. The authority began enforcement action but before the relevant hearing could take place the caravan vanished without trace while the appellant was absent. It was never found. The appellant
d found temporary accommodation with friends. He made a formal application to the authority for housing as a homeless person pursuant to Pt VII of the Housing Act 1996. Section 189(1)(d)^a provided that a person who was homeless as a result of an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster had a priority need for accommodation. A housing authority had a duty to ensure that accommodation was available for a person with a priority need who was not intentionally
e homeless. The authority accepted that the appellant was homeless and that he was not intentionally homeless but concluded that he did not have a priority need. The authority considered that in order to qualify as ‘a disaster’, the disaster had to be in the nature of a flood or fire, and involve some form of physical damage or threat of damage. The appellant requested a review of the decision, f and upon its confirmation, he appealed to the county court. The judge concluded that the disappearance of the caravan without explanation as to by whom, for what motive, or what had become of it, did not fall within s 189 and that therefore the authority was not under a duty to ensure that accommodation was available. The appellant appealed. The authority submitted that the appellant’s homelessness was in any event not a result of the loss of the caravan since by g virtue of s 175(2)(b)^b of the 1996 Act a person was homeless if he had accommodation which consisted of a moveable structure and had no place where he was entitled to place and reside in it.

Held – The sudden disappearance without trace of a caravan in which a person
h was making his home came within the description of ‘an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster’ in s 189(1)(d) of the 1996 Act so as to give the owner a priority need for accommodation. The loss of the appellant’s home was an emergency akin to those referred to expressly. It involved the sudden and wholly unexpected loss of the appellant’s home in circumstances wholly outside his control by the loss of the structure in which he had made his home. However, in j the instant case, the loss of the caravan had done nothing to change the appellant’s status as homeless. His homelessness was caused under s 175(2)(b) of the 1996 Act by whatever circumstances had led him to live in a caravan, which he had no right to park anywhere, not the subsequent loss of the caravan.

b Section 175, so far as material, is set out at [6], below

Accordingly, the appellant did not have a priority need and his appeal would therefore be dismissed (see [19], [20], [24], [25], [30], [31], [33]–[36], below).

Appeal

The appellant, Scott Higgs, appealed with permission of Sedley LJ given on 13 March 2003, from the decision of Mr Recorder Morris-Coole on 5 February 2003 in the Brighton County Court upholding the decision of Brighton and Hove City Council (the authority) that the sudden disappearance without trace of the caravan in which the appellant had been living without permission on authority property was not an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster within s 189(1)(d) of the Housing Act 1996. By a respondent's notice, for which permission was given at the hearing, the authority maintained that the appellant had not been made homeless as a result of his loss within s 189(1)(d). The facts are set out in the judgment of Kay LJ.

David Watkinson (instructed by Brighton Housing Trust) for the appellant.

Clare Roberts (instructed by Abraham Ghebre-Ghiorgis, Hove) for the respondent authority.

30 June 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

KAY LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Simon Brown LJ).

[1] This appeal brought with permission from Sedley LJ raises a short point of statutory construction namely whether the sudden disappearance without trace of the caravan in which a person was making his home comes within the description of 'an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster' in s 189(1)(d) of the Housing Act 1996 so as to give him a priority need for accommodation. The respondent's notice, for which we gave permission at the hearing, raises a further issue as to whether the appellant's homelessness was in any event 'as a result of the loss of his caravan.'

[2] On 5 February 2003 Mr Recorder Morris-Coole sitting at Brighton County Court concluded that the loss of the caravan was not such an emergency and accordingly dismissed an appeal brought by the appellant, Scott Higgs, against a decision of Brighton and Hove City Council (the respondent authority) that it was not under a duty to provide him with accommodation.

a [3] From a date some time after Christmas 2001 the appellant lived in a caravan placed on council land in Hove Park. It is accepted that he had no lawful right to locate the caravan at that place. In March 2002, the respondent took enforcement action under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 requiring the appellant to remove the caravan. A summons was served on the appellant for the matter to be heard on 2 April.

b [4] Before that hearing could take place, the appellant went out with his dogs on 30 March and discovered on his return that his caravan containing all his possessions had vanished without trace. The caravan has never been found and there is no evidence as to what became of it.

c [5] The appellant found temporary accommodation with friends and on 21 May 2002, he made a formal application to the respondent authority for housing as a homeless person pursuant to Pt VII of the 1996 Act.

d '(1) A person is homeless if he has no accommodation available for his occupation, in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, which he—(a) is entitled to occupy by virtue of an interest in it or by virtue of an order of a court, (b) has an express or implied licence to occupy, or (c) occupies as a residence by virtue of any enactment or rule of law giving him the right to remain in occupation or restricting the right of another person to recover possession.

e (2) A person is also homeless if he has accommodation but—(a) he cannot secure entry to it, or (b) it consists of a moveable structure, vehicle or vessel designed or adapted for human habitation and there is no place where he is entitled or permitted both to place it and to reside in it.'

f [7] By s 192 of the 1996 Act a housing authority has a duty to provide advice and information to a homeless person in any attempts he might make to ensure that accommodation becomes available for his occupation. If, however, a homeless person has 'a priority need for accommodation', and is not intentionally homeless the duty becomes one under s 193 to ensure that accommodation is available for him.

g [8] Section 189(1) of the 1996 Act provided the following definition of a priority need for those purposes:

h 'The following have a priority need for accommodation—(a) a pregnant woman or a person with whom she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside; (b) a person with whom children reside or might be expected to reside; (c) a person who is vulnerable as a result of old age, mental illness or handicap or physical disability or other special reason, or with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside; (d) a person who is homeless or threatened with homelessness as a result of an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster.'

j [9] The respondent authority accepted that the appellant was homeless and further that he was not intentionally homeless but concluded that he did not have a priority need. In the letter containing its decision, dated 7 September 2002, the relevant officer explained why he did not consider that the appellant came within category (d) of s 189(1) by reference to the Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (July 2002). Paragraph 8.42 of the code provided:

'To qualify as an "other disaster" the disaster must be in the nature of a flood or fire, and involve some form of physical damage or threat of damage.

The volcanic activity on the island of Montserrat was treated as an example of an "other disaster". Applicants have a priority need by reason of such an emergency whether or not they have dependent children or are vulnerable for any reason.' a

After considering that guidance the decision letter concluded that the appellant did not come within the relevant provision. Thus the respondent authority was prepared to offer advice and information but not to secure accommodation. b

'... I am satisfied that the decision made on 7th September 2002 was correct and although Mr Higgs is homeless, he is not in priority need ... Consideration was given to the circumstances in which Mr Higgs lost his caravan, and whether or not that constituted an emergency. Having consulted the code of guidance, it was decided that these circumstances did not amount to an emergency within the meaning of the Act. Mr Higgs has lost his accommodation in the same way that someone might if evicted illegally, however this in itself does not constitute priority need.' c

[11] The appellant exercised his right of appeal to the county court. At the hearing the recorder's attention was drawn to the case of R v Bristol City Council, ex p Bradic [1995] 3 FCR 189 in which this court had to consider precisely the same provisions then contained in s 59(1)(d) of the Housing Act 1985. e

[12] In that case the court dealt with the case of a person rendered homeless when his landlord unlawfully evicted him whilst he was away on holiday and the landlord himself lost possession of the premises to a building society by court order. The judge at first instance concluded that the loss of his home in such circumstances was to be characterised as an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster and the local authority appealed that decision. f

[13] The Court of Appeal affirmed the view expressed by the court in considering a similar provision in earlier legislation, s 2(1)(b) of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, in the case of Noble v South Herefordshire DC (1983) 17 HLR 80, where Waller LJ, with whom May LJ agreed, said (at 81): g

'In my opinion that argument [that the word "emergency" was used in a wider sense than emergencies confined to emergencies arising from disaster] has no force in this case because in the phrase "any emergency such as flood, fire or any other disaster" the words "or any other disaster" are clearly indicating "any other disaster" similar to a flood or a fire.' h

[14] Having accepted that proposition, Roch LJ in his judgment in Ex p Bradic, with which the other two members of the court expressly agreed, said ([1995] 3 FCR 189 at 209):

'In my view the event that results in the homelessness of the person claiming a priority need must have the characteristics of being "an emergency" and "a disaster". The omission of the word "any" before the words "other disaster" in the 1985 Act reinforces, in my opinion, this reading of the subsection. I would therefore interpret the words of the subsection to mean an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster of a similar nature. The line is not, in my judgment, to be drawn as narrowly as to confine the emergencies which can give rise to a priority need to those amounting to j

a "force majeure". Parliament must have had in mind emergencies caused by fires deliberately or accidentally started by human beings and floods deliberately or accidentally caused by human beings. In my opinion the line is to be drawn so as to embrace all emergencies which consist of physical damage to the accommodation of the applicant which have made the accommodation uninhabitable.'

b [15] The recorder in this case applying the construction of the section 'as laid down in Ex p Bradic' concluded that 'the disappearance of this property without any explanation as to by whom, for what motive, or what has become of it does not fall within the construction of this priority section'.

c [16] On behalf of the respondent, Miss Roberts contends that the recorder was right to so find. She argues that whilst the loss of the caravan was no doubt a disaster from the point of view of the appellant, it was not a disaster similar to flood or fire. She contends that what the section clearly envisages is a loss of home through some physical disaster.

d [17] Miss Roberts accepts that the intervention of some other person will not prevent an emergency coming within the provision. Roch LJ gave the example of an arsonist deliberately setting fire to a home. But she argues that physical damage is the essential element.

e [18] I cannot accept these arguments. No one knows what became of this caravan. It may for all that is known have been removed and destroyed. Can Parliament really have intended that unless the appellant could trace his caravan or its remains and show that it had been rendered uninhabitable, he was not to be treated as a priority need?

f [19] It would be surprising to say the least if a person whose caravan was removed without trace was in a fundamentally different position from someone whose caravan was destroyed whether by deliberate fire or by vandalism. Most other dwellings simply cannot be removed but if one considers a prefabricated structure that was dismantled and taken away it is difficult to see how such a situation could be viewed as different from someone having just razed it to the ground.

g [20] Thus I am satisfied that this loss of the appellant's home was an emergency akin to those expressly referred to in s 189(1)(d) of the 1996 Act. It involved the sudden and wholly unexpected loss of the appellant's home in circumstances wholly outside his control by the loss of the structure in which he made his home. The removal of the caravan was a form of physical interference with the property that deprived the appellant of his home and this is to be contrasted with the situation in Ex p Bradic where the home remained available as a home in which the respondent could have lived but for the operation of the law that precluded him from regaining occupation of the premises.

h [21] If it were not for the second point raised by the respondent's notice I should feel bound to allow the appeal. However, Miss Roberts raises a further difficulty in the path of the appellant which she contends meant that in any event his claim was bound to fail.

j [22] Section 175(2)(b) of the 1996 Act means that a person is homeless if he lives in a caravan and he has no place where he is entitled to locate his caravan and to reside in it. That, Miss Roberts argues, was the position of the appellant prior to the loss of his caravan. He was, therefore, homeless long before the caravan went missing. In these circumstances she submits the homelessness was not 'as a result' of the loss of his caravan as is required by s 189(1)(d) of the 1996 Act.

[23] Mr Watkinson, on behalf of the appellant, responds by saying that at the time when a person claims to be homeless, it is necessary to look at the operating factor that has deprived him of his home at that stage and in this case that was the loss of the caravan. It is, he submits, of no consequence that prior to the loss of the caravan he might have been deemed to be homeless because it was only the disappearance of the caravan that caused the appellant to seek the assistance of the respondent.

[24] With every respect to Mr Watkinson, that argument simply cannot be right. The appellant had not had a home for some time and the supervening event of the loss of the caravan did nothing to change his status as homeless. His homelessness was caused under the 1996 Act by whatever circumstances led him to live in a caravan which he had no right to park anywhere. Unless and until he had a home again, his homelessness continued and it resulted from that cause and not as in this case from the subsequent loss of the caravan.

[25] For these reasons, I accept the respondent's argument that the decision below must be upheld, although not for the reasons given by the recorder but rather by reference to the matter raised in the respondent's notice. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

[26] This appeal centres on s 189(1)(d) of the Housing Act 1996 which provides:

'The following have a priority need for accommodation ... (d) a person who is homeless or threatened with homelessness as a result of an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster.'

[27] Two questions arise: first, whether the sudden disappearance of the appellant's caravan in the circumstances described by Kay LJ constituted 'an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster'; secondly, even supposing that it did, whether the appellant's homelessness was 'as a result of' that emergency.

[28] Mr Recorder Morris-Coole decided the first issue against the appellant who now appeals to this court by permission of Sedley LJ who described the issue as 'a short and truly important point of principle'. The recorder noted but expressed no conclusion upon the second issue which now comes before us by way of a respondent's notice (for which we gave leave at the hearing).

[29] The most authoritative decision in point on this issue is R v Bristol City Council, ex p Bradic [1995] 3 FCR 189 in which this court held that a tenant's illegal eviction did not constitute an emergency within the relevant provision (then s 59(1)(d) of the Housing Act 1985). In the leading judgment Roch LJ said (at 209):

'In my view the event that results in the homelessness of the person claiming a priority need must have the characteristics of being "an emergency" and "a disaster" ... I would therefore interpret the words of the subsection to mean an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster of a similar nature. The line is not, in my judgment, to be drawn as narrowly as to confine the emergencies which can give rise to a priority need to those amounting to "force majeure". Parliament must have had in mind emergencies caused by fires deliberately or accidentally started by human means and floods deliberately or accidentally caused by human beings. In my opinion the line is to be drawn so as to embrace all emergencies which consist of physical damage to the accommodation of the applicant which have made that accommodation uninhabitable.'

[30] Was the sudden disappearance of the appellant's caravan properly to be characterised both as 'an emergency' and a 'disaster' of a similar nature to the destruction of a building by flood or fire (recognising that such flood or fire may be 'caused deliberately as well as accidentally')? In my judgment it was. If a b relevant emergency is constituted by someone hostile to the applicant setting fire to his accommodation, why not equally by such a person permanently removing it? If a tornado were to carry away a caravan, why should one treat its loss through malign human action as any less of an emergency and disaster? Most accommodation, of course, is to be found in permanent rather than moveable structures. Where, however, as here, it is moveable, it seems to me vulnerable c to the additional hazard of disappearance (in the case of a vessel, for example a houseboat, by sinking), a disaster to my mind of a similar nature to the burning or flooding of a house.

[32] Section 175(2)(b) of the 1996 Act provides:

'A person is also homeless if he has accommodation but ... (b) it consists of a moveable structure, vehicle or vessel designed or adapted for human habitation and there is no place where he is entitled or permitted both to e place it and to reside in it.'

[33] In these proceedings it is conceded that at the date of the caravan's disappearance (indeed for some months previously) there was no place where the appellant was entitled or permitted both to place it and to reside in it. He was,
f therefore, at that time homeless within the meaning of the 1996 Act.

[34] In those circumstances it seems to me quite impossible to contend that he was homeless 'as a result of' the emergency constituted by the caravan's disappearance so as to establish a priority need for accommodation under s 189(1)(d) of the 1996 Act. He was already homeless. He was not made homeless by the caravan's disappearance.

g [35] I would accordingly uphold the decision below—the decision that the appellant has not made out a case for priority need—but solely by reference to the causation issue raised by the respondent's notice. On this basis, in common with Kay LJ whose judgment I have now read, and agree with, I too would dismiss the appeal.

[36] I agree that for the reasons given in both judgments the loss of the appellant's caravan should properly have been characterised as an 'emergency' and a 'disaster' similar in nature to the destruction of a building by flood or fire.

j However I also agree again for the reasons given in both judgments that the appeal must be dismissed because the appellant was already homeless, and thus his homelessness was not as a result of that emergency or disaster.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD WOOLF CJ, HALE AND LATHAM LJJ

22 JANUARY, 4 FEBRUARY 2003

Evidence – Improperly obtained evidence – Relevant to matters in issue – Duty of court – Whether court concerned with method of obtaining evidence – CPR 32.1 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8.

The claimant commenced proceedings against the defendant employer, claiming damages for personal injury to her right hand, as a result of which she alleged that she was suffering continuing disability. The defendant admitted liability but disputed that the claimant was suffering continuing disability. An inquiry agent, acting for the defendant's insurers, obtained access to the claimant's home on two occasions by posing as a market researcher, and recorded the claimant, without her knowledge, using a hidden video camera. The defendant's expert, having viewed the video recordings, was of the opinion that the claimant had an entirely satisfactory function in her right hand. The defendant applied for directions as to whether the video recordings were admissible in evidence. The claimant, relying on the court's discretion under CPR 32.1(2)^a and on the right to privacy in art 8(1)^b of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), contended that the recordings should not be admitted. The district judge concluded that the evidence should be excluded, because the court should not give approval to the methods used by the defendant's agent. The defendant appealed, and the judge held that the evidence was admissible, the primary question for the court being not whether or not to give approval to the method whereby evidence had been obtained, but rather whether justice and fairness required its admission. The claimant appealed.

Held – The judge's approach to the question whether the evidence was admissible was consistent with that which would have been adopted prior to the coming into force of the CPR and the 1998 Act, when the achieving of justice in the particular case before the court was the paramount consideration. That approach, however, did nothing to promote the observance of the law by those engaged or about to be engaged in legal proceedings, which was also a matter of real public concern. If the conduct of the insurers went uncensured, there would be a significant risk that practices of the type which they had adopted would be encouraged, and that would be highly undesirable. Proactive management of civil proceedings, which was at the heart of the CPR, was not only concerned with an individual piece of litigation which was before the court, but was concerned with litigation as a whole. Where, therefore, as in the instant case, a defendant's insurers had been responsible for trespass and for contravention of a

^b Article 8(1) provides: 'Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.'

- a* claimant's privacy, in violation of art 8 of the convention, that was a relevant consideration for the court in the exercise of its discretion in making orders as to the management of the proceedings. In the instant case, the conduct of the insurers had not been so outrageous that the defence should be struck out, and it would be artificial and undesirable for evidence which was relevant and admissible not to be before the judge who had the task of trying the case.
- b* Accordingly, it would not be right to interfere with the decision of the judge below. The court could, however, reflect its disapproval of the insurers' conduct by ordering that the defendant pay the costs of the proceedings relating to the admissibility of the evidence before the district judge, the judge, and on the appeal (see [21]–[23], [25], [28]–[31], below).

Introduction

The claimant, Jean Jones appealed against the decision of Judge Charles Harris QC sitting as a deputy High Court judge on 16 May 2002 allowing the appeal of the defendant, the University of Warwick, from the decision of District Judge Wartnaby on 1 November 2001 that video evidence obtained at the claimant's home would not be admissible as evidence in proceedings brought by the claimant against the defendant for damages for personal injury. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Robert Weir (instructed by Irwin Mitchell) for the claimant.

Robert Owen QC (instructed by Bullers Jeffries) for the defendant.

4 February 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD WOOLF CJ.

[1] The issue which this appeal raises is whether, and if so when, a defendant to a personal injury claim is entitled to use as evidence a video of the claimant which was obtained by filming the claimant in her home without her knowledge after the person taking the film had obtained access to the claimant's home by deception.

[2] As Mr Robert Weir, who appears on behalf of the claimant contends, the issue on the appeal requires this court to consider two competing public interests: the interests of the public that in litigation, the truth should be revealed and the interests of the public that the courts should not acquiesce in, let alone encourage, a party to use unlawful means to obtain evidence.

THE BACKGROUND TO THE APPEAL

[3] The claimant, Mrs Jean F Jones, appeals against an order of Judge Charles Harris QC, sitting as a deputy High Court judge, who on 16 May 2002, allowed an appeal from the decision of District Judge Wartnaby and made an order allowing the University of Warwick, the defendant, to rely, at the trial of the claimant's action against the defendant, on a video film which they had recorded of the claimant in her home without her knowledge.

[5] The claimant was employed by the defendant. The claimant contended that she had developed a focal dystonia. She alleged significant continuing disability and claimed special damages in excess of £135,000.

[6] The defendant admits liability but disputes that the claimant has the continuing disability she alleges. The defendant has expert medical evidence that accepts that the claimant appears to have had an episode of extensor tenosynovitis but contends she had virtually recovered by March 1998 and her ongoing disability 'remains uncertain but it seems to be more related to habit than need'.

[7] The video evidence, the admissibility of which is in dispute, was obtained on two occasions by an inquiry agent, acting for the insurers of the defendant. The first occasion was 19 November 1999 and the second 18 January 2000. The inquiry agent obtained access to the claimant's home by posing as a market researcher. The inquiry agent used a hidden camera and the claimant had no idea that she was being filmed. The film which was made was disclosed on 11 June 2001. This was after High Court proceedings had been issued on 30 August 2000 by the claimant in which she claimed substantial damages. Nothing turns on the date that the filming took place. It was, however, followed by the filming of the claimant in public on 21 January and 30 March 2001. The admissibility of this later filming is not in dispute but it is common ground that the later films are not as helpful to the defendant as the films which were taken in the claimant's home.

a The claimant's medical experts have come to a different conclusion. This is that the claimant still has a significant continuing disability but the films taken in her home can be explained because the extent of the disability in her hand varies. She has good and bad days.

[9] It is not in dispute that: (i) the inquiry agent was guilty of trespass and that she would not have been given permission to enter had she not misled the claimant as to her identity; (ii) as the medical experts have now seen what was recorded in the films taken at the claimant's home, if the film was not to be admitted in evidence, those experts would not be able to give evidence. New medical experts would have to be instructed and the existence of the recordings would have to be concealed from the court and the new experts.

c THE APPROACH OF THE JUDGES IN THE LOWER COURTS

[10] On 23 August 2001 the defendant made an application to the court for directions as to whether the video evidence obtained at the claimant's home should be admissible in evidence. At a hearing before District Judge Wartnaby on 19 October 2001, the claimant contended the disputed recordings should not be admitted, relying on the court's discretion under CPR 32.1(2) and art 8(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). On 1 November 2001 District Judge Wartnaby gave a reserved judgment in writing, in which he came to the conclusion that:

e 'The court has to carry out a balancing exercise between the benefit to the court of having all the evidence available and the consideration of the improper way in which the video evidence was obtained.

f The court should not in any way give approval to the methods used by the defendant's agent misleading the claimant and gaining improper entry to her home. In those circumstances I am not satisfied that the video evidence should be available and I order that it is excluded.'

[11] In his reserved judgment of 16 May 2002, Judge Harris came to the opposite conclusion. Judge Harris drew attention to the fact that the claimant was alleging a substantial handicap and therefore that she was entitled to substantial compensation; that the disputed films revealed in the words of the defendant's orthopaedic expert 'that she has regained full function of her right hand'; that as copies of the film had been provided on 11 June 2001, this was not an ambush case; that in English criminal proceedings the fact that evidence has been illegally obtained does not render it inadmissible, subject to the power of the trial judge to exclude evidence in the exercise of its common law discretion or under the provisions of s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

[12] Judge Harris was considerably influenced by the approach adopted by Lord Nolan in his speech in R v Khan (Sultan) [1996] 3 All ER 289, [1997] AC 558. Judge Harris pointed out that 'the overriding objective in a civil case tried in England is that court should deal with a case justly' and referred to his own judgment in McNally v RG Manufacturing Ltd [2001] Lloyd's Rep IR 379 at 382, where he had stated that if a party is making—

'an inflated, exaggerated or unjustified claim then he is seeking other people's money to which he is not entitled. It is clearly both just and fair that he should be prevented from succeeding in this. In order to uncover his deception steps may have been taken which involved him in being misled or his privacy being infringed. Misleading him may be the only practical means of showing that he himself is misleading other people ...'

He added that in that case he had concluded—

'there were next to no physical signs as opposed to complaints of anything wrong with him. I do not think that the deception involved in coming to his house in the guise of a market researcher ... was of such gravity or impropriety as to render evidence thus obtained inadmissible.'

[13] As to the reliance upon the convention, he contended that under the Strasbourg jurisprudence questions of admissibility were matters of domestic law. Referring to the CPR, he stated that:

'The overriding objective of those rules is to enable the court to deal with cases justly. This includes, inter alia, ensuring that the parties are on an equal footing, that the case is dealt with in ways which are proportionate to the amount of money involved and that the case is dealt with "fairly" (see CPR 1.1). The plaintiff knows very well what she can do with her hand, the defendants do not. They are not, therefore, on an equal footing in this respect.'

[14] Judge Harris added:

'So, the question for me to decide, in my review of District Judge Wartnaby's decision is whether it was wrong. I think it plainly was. The central passage of District Judge Wartnaby's reasoning was, "the courts should not in any way give approval to the method used by the defendant's agent. In those circumstances, I am not satisfied that the video evidence should be available."

'The primary question for the court is not whether or not to give approval to the method whereby evidence was obtained. It is whether justice and fairness require that this highly material evidence, which contradicts the evidence which she has given to others, should be put to her before the trial judge to enable him to reach a sound conclusion about the true extent of any disability. True, the claimant was herself deceived but there is strong prima facie evidence that she herself is deceiving or misleading the defendants to enrich herself thereby. It is not easy for the defendants to protect themselves against exaggerated claims. Anyone with much experience of personal injury litigation will know that the defendants and their insurers are frequently faced by claimants who suggest that their disabilities are far greater than they are, and large sums of money may be unjustifiably sought. Though such people are rarely, if ever prosecuted, in many cases what they do or seek to do must amount to the crime of obtaining property or pecuniary advantage by deception. In these circumstances I do not believe that the courts should be too astute to prevent effective investigation by the defendants of claimants against them. Clearly, there is a public interest that unfair, tortious and illegal methods should not be used in general and where they are unnecessary, but the conflicting considerations are on the one side the claimant's privacy and on the other the legitimate need and public interest that defendants or their insurers should be able to prevent and uncover unjustified, dishonest and fraudulent claims. In the instant case I a have no doubt that the latter considerations do and should outweigh the former.'

[16] Finally, Judge Harris commented in a critical manner about the fact that up to that stage the claimant's solicitors had kept the films from their own medical experts, 'thus not giving them all the available material to enable them to make a disinterested assessment of the degree of her disability'. Having b acknowledged that he had not heard very extensive argument upon this 'perhaps not wholly straightforward topic', he added, 'at first blush this seems, to put it mildly, very unsatisfactory'.

THE CONTENTIONS OF THE PARTIES

c [17] We can deal with Mr Robert Owen QC's submissions on behalf of the defendant fairly succinctly because he naturally relied very strongly on the forceful reasoning of Judge Harris. Mr Owen was, however, careful to make it clear that in his submissions he was not inviting the court to give a green light to insurers taking unlawful action, such as trespassing, in order to obtain evidence. His submission was that the court had a discretion to exercise and the judge had d exercised his discretion properly, having come to the conclusion that the district judge had exercised his discretion wrongly, and this being so, this court should not intervene.

[18] Mr Weir was in agreement with Mr Owen that the judge had a discretion. The discretion was contained in CPR 32.1 which provides, so far as relevant:

- e '(1) The court may control the evidence by giving direction as to ... (c) the way in which the evidence is to be placed before the court.
(2) The court may use its power under this rule to exclude evidence that would otherwise be admissible.'

f He also relies upon the overriding objective contained in CPR 1.1 which provides:

- '(1) These Rules are a new procedural code with the overriding objective of enabling the court to deal with cases justly.
(2) Dealing with a case justly includes, so far as practical—(a) ensuring that the parties are on an equal footing ... (d) ensuring that it is dealt with expeditiously and fairly; and (e) allotting to it an appropriate share of the g court's resources, while taking into account the need to allot resources to other cases.'

He could also have referred to the duty of the parties under CPR 1.3 'to help the court to further the overriding objective'.

h [19] When it comes to determining how a court should exercise its discretion Mr Weir argues that the answer is provided by the relevant provisions of the convention and in particular arts 6 and 8 thereof. The art 6 right to a fair hearing he argues must be analysed in the context of the court's obligation to determine whether the introduction of the video is in accordance with the law and necessary for the protection of the defendant's rights. In saying this he relies on the fact that j the video recording was obtained as a result of the defendant's representative having trespassed and infringed the claimant's right of privacy under art 8(1). The reference to law and necessity he extracts from art 8(2) which provides:

[20] Mr Weir accepts that he cannot rely upon art 8 directly because the insurers of the defendant were responsible for obtaining the evidence in this way and not a public authority. But he contends that this does not prevent him relying upon art 8. This is because of the fact that the court that has to exercise its discretion is a public authority (see s 6(3) of the 1998 Act) and it is 'unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right' (see s 6(1)). He submits that for the court to ignore the manner in which the video evidence was obtained would involve the court acting in a way that is incompatible with the claimant's art 8 rights unless the evidence which was obtained in contravention of art 8 was necessary in order to achieve justice in the case.

SQUARING THE CIRCLE

[21] It is not possible to reconcile in a totally satisfactory manner, the conflicting public policies which District Judge Wartnaby and Judge Harris had to try and balance in this case. The approach of Judge Harris was consistent with the approach which would have been adopted in both criminal and civil proceedings prior to the coming into force of the CPR and the 1998 Act. The achieving of justice in the particular case which was before the court was then the paramount consideration for the judge trying the case. If evidence was available, the court did not concern itself with how it was obtained.

[23] If the conduct of the insurers in this case goes uncensured there would be a significant risk that practices of this type would be encouraged. This would be highly undesirable, particularly as there will be cases in which a claimant's privacy will be infringed and the evidence obtained will confirm that the claimant has not exaggerated the claim in any way. This could still be the result in this case.

[24] Fortunately, in both criminal and civil proceedings, courts can now adopt a less rigid approach to that adopted hitherto which gives recognition to the fact that there are conflicting public interests which have to be reconciled as far as this is possible. The approach adopted in Kuruma Son of Kaniu v R [1955] 1 All ER 236, [1955] AC 197, R v Sang [1979] 2 All ER 1222, [1980] AC 402 and R v Khan (Sultan) [1996] 3 All ER 289, [1997] AC 558 which was applied by Judge Harris has to be modified as a result of the changes that have taken place in the law. The position in criminal proceedings is that now when evidence is wrongly obtained the court will consider whether it adversely affects the fairness of the proceedings and, if it does, may exclude the evidence (see s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984). In an extreme case, the court will even consider whether there has been an abuse of process of a gravity which requires the prosecution to be brought to a halt (see R v Loveridge [2001] EWCA Crim 973, [2001] 2 Cr App R 591 and R v Mason [2002] EWCA Crim 385 at [50], [68] and [76], [2002] 2 Cr App R 628 at [50], [68] and [76]). In civil proceedings, Potter LJ recognised this in Rall v Hume [2001] EWCA Civ 146 at [19], [2001] 3 All ER 248 at [19]. He commenced by saying:

'In principle ... the starting point on any application of this kind must be that, where video evidence is available which, according to the defendant, undermines the case of the claimant to an extent that would substantially reduce the award of damages to which she is entitled, it will usually be in the overall interests of justice to require that the defendant should be permitted

[25] But Potter LJ then added that this does not apply if the conduct of the defendant amounts 'to trial by ambush'. The discretion on the court is not, however, confined to cases where the defendants have failed to make proper disclosure. A judge's responsibility today in the course of properly managing litigation requires him, when exercising his discretion in accordance with the overriding objective contained in CPR Pt 1, to consider the effect of his decision upon litigation generally. An example of the wider approach is that the judges are required to ensure that a case only uses its appropriate share of the resources of the court (see CPR 1.1(2)(e)). Proactive management of civil proceedings, which is at the heart of the CPR, is not only concerned with an individual piece of litigation which is before the court, it is also concerned with litigation as a whole. So the fact that in this case the defendant's insurers, as was accepted by Mr Owen, have been responsible for the trespass involved in entering the claimant's house and infringing her privacy contrary to art 8(1) of the convention is a relevant circumstance for the court to weigh in the balance when coming to a decision as to how it should properly exercise its discretion in making orders as to the management of the proceedings.

[26] Mr Weir argues that unless it was necessary for the insurers to take the actions they did, the evidence must inevitably, at least in a case such as this, be held inadmissible. He submits that otherwise the court would be contravening the duty that it is under, pursuant to s 6 of the 1998 Act, not to contravene art 8. While the court should not ignore the contravention of art 8, to adopt Mr Weir's approach would fail to recognise that the contravention would still remain that of the insurer's inquiry agent and not that of the court. The court's obligation under s 6 of the 1998 Act is to 'not itself act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right' (see Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 908 at 917–918, [2001] Fam 430 at 445–446 (paras 24–27)).

[27] As the Strasbourg jurisprudence makes clear, the convention does not decide what is to be the consequence of evidence being obtained in breach of art 8 (see Schenk v Switzerland (1988) 13 EHRR 242 and PG and JH v UK App No 44787/98 (25 September 2001, unreported), para 76). This is a matter, at least initially, for the domestic courts. Once the court has decided the order, which it should make in order to deal with the case justly, in accordance with the overriding objectives set out in CPR 1.1 in the exercise of its discretion under CPR 32.1, then it is required or it is necessary for the court to make that order. Accordingly if the court could be said to have breached art 8(1) by making the order which it has decided the law requires, it would be acting within art 8(2) in doing so.

[28] That leaves the issue as to how the court should exercise its discretion in the difficult situation confronting District Judge Wartnaby and Judge Harris. The court must try to give effect to what are here the two conflicting public interests. The weight to be attached to each will vary according to the circumstances. The significance of the evidence will differ as will the gravity of the breach of art 8, according to the facts of the particular case. The decision will depend on all the circumstances. Here, the court cannot ignore the reality of the situation. This is not a case where the conduct of the defendant's insurers is so outrageous that the defence should be struck out. The case, therefore, has to be tried. It would be artificial and undesirable for the actual evidence, which is relevant and admissible, not to be placed before the judge who has the task of trying the case. We accept Mr Owen's submission that to exclude the use of the evidence would create a wholly undesirable situation. Fresh medical experts would have to be instructed on both sides. Evidence which is relevant would have to be concealed from them, perhaps resulting in a misdiagnosis; and it would not be possible to cross-examine the claimant appropriately. For these reasons we do not consider it would be right to interfere with Judge Harris's decision not to exclude the evidence.

[29] Mr Weir's submission that we should determine the issue on the basis of the facts as they were before District Judge Wartnaby is not realistic. None the less, it is right that we should make clear that we do not accept that the criticism of the claimant's legal advisers for deciding not to reveal the contents of the video films in issue to their medical experts is justified. It was sensible to defer doing so until it was known whether the evidence could be used. While not excluding the evidence it is appropriate to make clear that the conduct of the insurers was improper and not justified. We disagree with the indication by Judge Harris to the contrary. The fact that the insurers may have been motivated by a desire to achieve what they considered would be a just result does not justify either the commission of trespass or the contravention of the claimant's privacy which took place. We come to this conclusion irrespective of whether Mr Weir is right in contending that in this particular case the evidence could be obtained by other means.

[30] Excluding the evidence is not, moreover, the only weapon in the court's armoury. The court has other steps it can take to discourage conduct of the type of which complaint is made. In particular it can reflect its disapproval in the orders for costs which it makes. In this appeal, we therefore propose, because the conduct of the insurers gave rise to the litigation over admissibility of the evidence which has followed upon their conduct, to order the defendants to pay the costs of these proceedings to resolve this issue before District Judge Wartnaby, Judge Harris and this court even though we otherwise dismiss the appeal. This is subject to Mr Owen having an opportunity to persuade us to do otherwise. In addition, we would indicate to the trial judge that when he comes to deal with the question of costs he should take into account the defendant's conduct which is the subject of this appeal when deciding the appropriate order for costs. He may consider the costs of the inquiry agent should not be recovered. If he concludes, as the complainant now contends, that there is an innocent explanation for what is shown as to the claimant's control of her movements then this is a matter which should be reflected in costs, perhaps by ordering the defendants to pay the costs throughout on an indemnity basis. In giving effect to the overriding objective, and taking into account the wider interests of the administration of justice, the court must while doing justice between the parties, also deter improper conduct of a party while conducting litigation. We do not pretend that this is a perfect reconciliation of the conflicting public interests. It is not; but at least the solution does not ignore the insurer's conduct.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
KAY LJ, GRIGSON AND OUSELEY JJ
4 JULY, 12 DECEMBER 2002

Sentence – Disqualification – Order disqualifying individual from working with children – Whether such an order could be made in respect of offence committed before implementation of statutory provisions creating order – Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, s 28 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7.

In two cases raising the same point of law, the defendants, F and Y, were convicted of, or pleaded guilty to, various sexual offences. Those offences had been committed before the implementation of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, but sentencing took place after the Act came into force. Section 28^a of the Act required the court to make an order disqualifying an individual from working with children if either of two qualifying conditions were satisfied. The first qualifying condition, which both defendants satisfied, required, inter alia, that the individual had been convicted of an offence against a child. There was no such requirement for a conviction in the second qualifying condition. The court could not make a s 28 order if it were satisfied that it was unlikely that the individual would commit any further offence against a child. In each case, the sentencing judge made a disqualification order under s 28. On an appeal by F against sentence, he contended that a such an order was a 'penalty' within the meaning of art 7^b of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998); that, if imposed in respect of an offence committed before s 28 had come into force, such an order would be in breach of art 7 of the convention as constituting a heavier penalty than the one applicable at the time that the criminal offence had been committed; and that, in order to render s 28 compatible with convention rights, it had to be construed as applying only to convictions in respect of offences committed on or after the day that the relevant Part of the 2000 Act had come into force. The success of an application by Y for leave to appeal against sentence depended on the outcome of F's appeal.

Held – A disqualification order could be made under s 28 of the 2000 Act based on an offence committed before the Act came into force. Such an order did not constitute a penalty under art 7 of the convention. It was of considerable importance that a conviction was not a necessary condition for the making of a s 28 order. When consideration was given to the nature and purpose of such an order, it pointed overwhelmingly to that being for preventative rather than punitive effect. The same order was made whether or not a person was convicted, and the making of the order had no regard to the extent or seriousness of the offending but rather to whether a repetition of the conduct was likely. It followed that art 7 did not require the court to interpret s 28 in a way that would make it apply only to convictions for offences committed after the 2000 Act had come into force. Accordingly, F's appeal would be dismissed and Y's application would be refused (see [58], [62], below).

Appeal against sentence and application for leave to appeal against sentence

- b R v Field

Brian John Field appealed from the order of Judge Simpson, made in the Crown Court at Maidstone on 11 May 2001 pursuant to s 28 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, disqualifying him from working with children. The order formed part of the sentence imposed on Field following his conviction on 6 April 2001 of five counts of indecent assault and one count of indecency with a child. The Secretary of State for the Home Department intervened in the appeal. The facts, so far as material, are set out in the judgment of the court.

R v Young

- d Alfred Young applied for leave to appeal from the order of Judge Mitchell, made in the Crown Court at Wolverhampton on 16 November 2001 pursuant to s 28 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, disqualifying him from working with children. The order formed part of the sentence imposed on Young following his plea of guilty on 15 October 2001 to two offences of indecent assault. The facts, so far as material, are set out in the judgment of the court.

12 December 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

KAY LJ.

- g [1] The court has before it two cases that raise the same point of law in relation to s 28 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000. The question is whether a disqualification order can be made under s 28, disqualifying an adult from working with children, based on an offence committed before the 2000 Act came into force.

- h [2] In the first case, on 6 April 2001 Brian John Field was convicted at the Crown Court at Maidstone on five counts of indecent assault and one count of indecency with a child. The offences had been committed between 1 July and 3 September 2000, which was before the 2000 Act came into force on 11 January 2001. On 11 May 2001, he was sentenced by Judge Simpson to four years' imprisonment on each count, such sentences to be concurrent with one another.
- j In addition the judge made an order under s 28 of the 2000 Act disqualifying him from working with children indefinitely.

[3] He sought leave to appeal against conviction and sentence. Leave to appeal against conviction was refused by the single judge and on 17 January 2002 the court rejected his renewed application. The application for leave to appeal against sentence, which was confined to the order under s 28, was referred to the court by the registrar and leave was granted. In view of the difficult issues raised, the court required assistance from the Crown and the matter was adjourned. The Secretary of State for the Home Department sought and was granted leave to intervene, and it is the appeal against that aspect of the sentence with which we are now concerned. a

[4] In the second case, on 15 October 2001 Alfred Young pleaded guilty at the Crown Court at Wolverhampton to two offences of indecent assault. He was sentenced on 16 November by Judge Mitchell to an extended term of five years' imprisonment of which the custodial part was two years. He too was disqualified indefinitely under s 28 of the 2000 Act from working with children. In his case the two offences were committed between the 21 August 1999 and 20 August 2000, again before the coming into force of the relevant part of the 2000 Act. b

[5] Alfred Young sought leave to appeal against his sentence. His grounds challenged both the extended prison sentence and the disqualification order. The application was referred directly to the full court by the Registrar and on 14 March 2002 the court considered his application. It refused the application in respect of the extended sentence but adjourned consideration of the application relating to the disqualification order for it to be heard together with Field's case. Arrangements were made for the skeleton arguments in Field's case to be made available to Young's counsel so that he could, if he wished, make representations to the court to add to the arguments advanced. No such representations have been made and since the point is an identical one, determination of Field's appeal will be determinative of the decision in Young's application. c

[6] It is wholly unnecessary to record the facts of either case because nothing turns upon the circumstances of the convictions already set out. In any event they are recorded in the earlier judgments of this court to which reference has already been made. d

[8] As Mr Crow, on behalf of the Secretary of State comments, these issues are potentially of great significance. Largely because of the age and the vulnerability of the victims, sexual offences relating to children are often reported and prosecuted many years after the offences in question were committed. Accordingly these questions will arise not merely in the short term but for many years to come. f

[9] The arguments advanced on behalf of the appellant and the applicant are acknowledged by the Secretary of State to be arguments that have received significant support in the past. When the 2000 Act was enacted, the Home Office view was that such a disqualification order could not be made relating to a pre-enactment offence. This view was thereafter expressed in circulars issued by the Crown Prosecution Service to prosecutors and by the Lord Chancellor's Department to the Court Service. However, both the Home Office and the circulars recognised that interpretation of the statute was ultimately a matter for decision by the courts. g

[10] Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice (2001 edn) (Third Supplement) p 49 (para 5-562a) lent further support stating that the 2000 Act 'has been drafted in such a way as to make it clear that it has no application to an h a offence committed before the commencement date'. Both the 2002 and 2003 editions are in less emphatic terms but maintain the same standpoint saying, 'it appears that (s 28) can apply only to persons convicted of offences committed on or after' the commencement date. An article in Criminal Law Week (issue 41) reached a similar conclusion.

'(1) This section applies where either of the conditions set out below is satisfied in the case of an individual.

c (2) The first condition is that—(a) the individual is convicted of an offence against a child committed when he was 18 or over, and (b) a qualifying sentence is imposed by a senior court in respect of the conviction.

d (3) The second condition is that—(a) the individual is charged with an offence against a child committed when he was aged 18 or over, and (b) a relevant order is made by a senior court in respect of the act or omission charged against him as the offence.

(4) Subject to subsection (5), the court must order the individual to be disqualified from working with children.

e (5) An order shall not be made under this section if the court is satisfied, having regard to all the circumstances, that it is unlikely that the individual will commit any further offence against a child.

(6) If the court does not make an order under this section, it must state its reasons for not doing so and cause those reasons to be included in the record of the proceedings.'

f [12] An 'offence against a child' is defined in s 26 and Sch 4 and includes various specified sexual and violent offences against children. A 'qualifying sentence' is defined by s 30 to be 'a sentence of imprisonment for a term of 12 months or more' in the case of an adult. A 'relevant order' for the purpose of the condition contained in s 28(3) is defined by s 30 as either 'an order made by the Crown Court ... that the individual in question be admitted to hospital' or 'a guardianship order'.

g [13] By s 35, it is an offence for a person who has been disqualified under s 28 to seek or engage in a defined range of work with children. The areas of work are extensive covering not only those that might immediately come to mind but also such activities as baby-sitting and being on a school's governing body. The prohibition applies to both paid and unpaid work. It is further an offence for any other person to offer or provide work to a disqualified person.

h [14] Section 31(1) provides for a right of appeal against the disqualification order imposed following conviction 'as if the order were a sentence'. Section 38(1) provides that a disqualification order 'is not a sentence for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.

j [15] An order under s 28 is of indefinite duration. Provision is made by s 32 for review of the disqualification. An adult who is subject to a disqualification order may apply after a minimum of ten years to the tribunal established by s 9 of the Protection of Children Act 1999 for the order to cease to have effect. Section 32(3) of the 2000 Act provides:

'If the Tribunal is satisfied that the individual is suitable to work with children, it must direct that the order is to cease to have effect; otherwise it must dismiss the application.'

[16] Section 34 provides for a chief officer of police or a director of social services of a local authority to apply to the High Court for restoration of an order that has ceased to have effect when—

'the individual has acted in such a way (whether before or after the order ceased to be in force) as to give reasonable cause to believe that an order under this section is necessary to protect children in general, or any children in particular, from serious harm from him.'

[17] The relevant parts of the 2000 Act were brought into effect on 11 January 2001 by the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 (Commencement No 1) Order 2000, SI 2000/3302. The order made no transitional provisions and provides no assistance on the issues that the court has to determine.

[18] The argument advanced on behalf of the appellant and the applicant is that a disqualification order is a penalty within the meaning of art 7 of the convention and thus if imposed in respect of an offence committed before the relevant statutory provisions came into effect would amount to a breach of art 7(1) being the imposition of 'a heavier penalty ... than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed'. Since, under s 3 of the 1998 Act, the court is required to read and give effect to primary and subordinate legislation in a way which is compatible with convention rights so far as it is possible so to do, it is submitted that s 28 of the 2000 Act should be interpreted as only applying to convictions in respect of offences committed on or after the day when the relevant part of the Act came into force.

[19] On behalf of the Secretary of State it is accepted that the argument is valid provided that a disqualification order is a penalty for the purposes of art 7. Thus the issue turns on the meaning of the word 'penalty' in art 7.

[20] It is common ground between the parties that this is an autonomous concept under the convention defined by reference to criteria closely analogous to those applicable to the concept of a 'criminal charge' under art 6. Both counsel have drawn attention to the leading case in the European Court of Human Rights concerning the determination of whether an order is or is not a penalty: Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247. Mr Crow on behalf of the Secretary of State has distilled from that judgment the following criteria. (i) The starting point is whether the measure is imposed following a criminal conviction (see paras 28 and 29 of the judgment). (ii) The nature and purpose of the measure are also relevant (paras 28 and 30). (iii) Its characterisation under national law is relevant (paras 28 and 31). (iv) The procedures involved in the making and implementation of the measure are relevant (para 28). (v) Its severity is relevant (paras 28 and 32). (vi) The court will look at the substance, rather than the form, in determining whether the measure forms part of a 'regime of punishment' (paras 27, 33 and 34).

[21] Mr Bendall for the appellant agrees that this list properly reflects the considerations indicated by the court and thus the task facing this court is to apply each of these criteria to s 28 of the 2000 Act.

[22] Mr Crow in his submissions to the court was minded to concede that a disqualification order was an order which could only be imposed following a criminal conviction. However, when the court invited his assistance on s 28(3),

- a he recognised that his argument in this respect was stronger than he suggested. Section 28(1) and (3) effectively require the making of an order, subject to s 28(5), where either a jury returns a special verdict of 'not guilty by reason of insanity' or where a person has been found to be under a disability under s 4 of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 and it is determined on the available evidence that he did the act or made the omission charged against him pursuant to s 4A of the same Act, and in either case the court makes an order that he be admitted to hospital or a guardianship order. Whilst there are purposes for which such an order is treated as if it was a conviction (see s 25 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, restrictions on the grant of bail for serious offences), such a finding is not a conviction and cannot justify the imposition of a penalty although it may require the making of an order for the protection of the public. An order made because the condition under s 28(3) is satisfied is indistinguishable in its terms from an order made following conviction.

[23] In Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2001] EWHC Admin 554, [2001] 4 All ER 289, [2002] QB 459, the Divisional Court considered whether football banning orders under s 14A of the Football Spectators Act 1989 were a penalty. Section 14A provided for the making of an order where a person was convicted of a relevant offence. Section 14B made further provision for a chief officer of police to apply for such an order where a person had at any time 'caused or contributed to any violence or disorder in the United Kingdom or elsewhere'. There was no requirement that a conviction should precede the making of an order under s 14B.

e [24] In his judgment, Laws LJ said ([2001] 4 All ER 289 at [42]):

'(2) The order is not made as part of the process of distributive criminal justice. Under s 14B there is no requirement of a criminal conviction, so that the Welch starting point is not met. In s 14A, the existence of a relevant conviction is in my judgment no more than a gateway criterion for the making of the order, equivalent to the provision in s 14B(4)(a) when no conviction is involved.'

[25] Laws LJ went on to point to the fact that s 14A(4)(a) provided that a football banning order could only be made 'in addition' to a sentence thereby contrasting the banning order with the sentence. That is to an extent mirrored in the 2000 Act, which provides for an appeal against a disqualification order under s 28 'as if it were a sentence imposed following conviction'.

[26] The conclusions of Laws LJ in this regard were specifically indorsed on appeal by the Court of Appeal (see [2002] EWCA Civ 351 at [89], [2002] 2 All ER 985 at [89], [2002] 3 WLR 289).

[27] Under s 28 of the 2000 Act, a conviction is 'a gateway criterion' in the sense described by Laws LJ for the making of a disqualification order but it is not the only such criterion: a special verdict or a finding in respect of a person under a disability that they did the act or made the omission charged against them will require the making of a disqualification order subject to s 28(5).

[28] Mr Bendall contended in argument that these other circumstances give rise to an 'analogous situation'. We do not accept that this is so. In neither of these other cases is there a conclusion that would merit the imposition of any penal provision even though restriction of the right of the individual may be demonstrated to be necessary in order to protect others. This view gains the strongest possible support from a decision which Mr Bendall very properly thought ought to be drawn to the court's attention following the hearing as it bore upon these issues but had not been referred to in argument. a

[29] In R v M, R v Kerr, R v H [2001] EWCA Crim 2024, [2002] 1 WLR 824, this court had to consider whether, following a finding that a defendant was unfit to plead, proceedings to determine whether he did the act charged against him were incompatible with art 6 of the convention. The court thus had to determine whether such proceedings were criminal proceedings within the meaning of art 6. The court concluded that they were not because they could not result in a conviction or the imposition of a penalty. Giving the judgment of the court, the Vice-President of the Criminal Division, Rose LJ, said ([2002] 1 WLR 824): b

'[19] In our judgment, the criminal charge provisions of article 6 do not apply to proceedings which cannot result in a conviction. The object of the Convention is to protect the citizen against abuse of his rights by the state. The protection afforded by Article 6 is unnecessary if the proceedings in question cannot lead to the conviction and punishment of the accused. A procedure that can lead only to an acquittal of a criminal charge is not within article 6 ... We find some support for this approach in that, as mentioned below, the European Court of Human Rights has never held proceedings to be criminal if they cannot result in the imposition of a penalty. Proceedings that can only result in an acquittal cannot result in a penalty. If, therefore, proceedings under sections 4 and 4A are to be held to be criminal, it must be some reason other than that an acquittal may result from them. c

[20] ... if an accused is found to have committed the act, the verdict is not one of guilty, but a finding that he did the act or made the omission charged against him ... The finding of a jury that an accused person has committed the act lacks a finding as to intent. It cannot, therefore, be a finding of guilt of the offence. Expressions such as "guilty" and "convicted" are noticeably absent from these provisions. Significantly, if an accused is found to be unfit and to have committed the act charged against him, and subsequently recovers, he may be tried for the criminal offence in question ... As was held in R v Antoine ([2000] 2 All ER 208, [2001] 1 AC 340), once it has been determined under section 4(5) that the accused person is under a disability, the trial terminates and he is no longer liable to be convicted. d

[21] Furthermore, the orders available to the court under section 5(2) do not include any punishment or any order that can be seen as retributive or deterrent. With the exception of an absolute discharge, they are concerned with the treatment and care of the accused ... e

[26] Lastly, although proceedings under section 4A involve the determination of facts which may constitute a criminal offence, this, in our judgment, is irrelevant. Civil and disciplinary proceedings often involve allegations that a person has committed acts which constitute a criminal offence. That does not transform such proceedings into criminal proceedings ... f

- a [31] Mr Crow points to the fact that when an order has ceased to have effect as a result of a review by the tribunal under s 32, it can be restored under s 34 without any requirement for a further conviction. It is sufficient that the court concludes that the conduct of the person gives 'reasonable cause to believe that an order ... is necessary to protect children in general, or any children in particular, from serious harm from him'. Since the restriction can be re-imposed without the necessity of there being any further conviction, it is suggested that this again supports the view that it is not a penalty.

- b [32] The next element to be considered is the nature and purpose of the order. Mr Bendall submits that the nature of the measure is an indefinite disqualification from working with children which carries with it up to five years' imprisonment or a fine for breach of the order. He accepts that the purpose is 'presumably the protection of children' but submits that this is not conclusive. He points to the fact that in Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247 the purpose of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 was to prevent future trafficking but this did not prevent it from being a penalty. He refers to the judgment and that part which reads (at 262 (para 30)):

- d 'The preventive purpose of confiscating property that might be available for use in future drug trafficking operations as well as the purpose of ensuring that crime does not pay are evident from the ministerial statements that were made to Parliament at the time of the introduction of the legislation ... However, it cannot be excluded that legislation which confers such broad powers of confiscation on the courts also pursues the aim of punishing the offender. Indeed, the aims of prevention and reparation are consistent with a punitive purpose and may be seen as constituent elements of the very notion of punishment.'

- f [33] He also draws attention to Jamil v France (1995) 21 EHRR 65 where the European Court of Human Rights rejected arguments that prison terms in default of payment of customs fines were not punitive because they were not intended to punish but to compel discharge of a civil obligation, and that they were not classified as penalties under French law. The court reiterated that it must remain free to go behind appearance and detect the substance of the provision.

- g [34] Mr Crow submits that an order under s 28 is plainly not penal in its nature since it neither restricts the offender's liberty, nor involves any fine or confiscation of property. It merely involves a restriction on certain activities in relation to children.

- h [35] It does not seem to us that a matter is not penal in nature merely because it does not restrict liberty or impose a fine or other financial consequence. By way of example, a disqualification from driving a motor car does no more than restrict a person's right to a particular form of activity and it does have a preventive element to it. None the less we should have thought that it was clearly penal in its nature. It is imposed by reference to the conduct that led to the conviction and without necessarily any relationship to the danger a person may represent when driving a motor car.

- j [36] It is difficult to divorce the nature of the measure from its purpose and Mr Crow submits that the purpose of an order under s 28 is plainly preventive and not punitive. He points to the acceptance of this by Mr Bendall and suggests that the factors which cause that concession are important to the overall conclusion in this matter. He highlights the following specific points: (i) The long title to the 2000 Act expressly recites that one of its purposes is 'to make further provision for the protection of children'. (ii) Part II of the 2000 Act, in which s 28 appears, is itself headed 'Protection of Children'. (iii) The effect of a disqualification order is plainly to minimise an offender's ability to work with children in certain defined circumstances, in order to reduce the risk of re-offending. (iv) It is submitted that it is also significant that, under s 28(5), the court is not required to make an order if, having regard to all the circumstances, it concludes that it is unlikely that the individual will commit any further offence against a child. In other words, the grounds for making, or refraining from making, a disqualification order are based not on the gravity of the offence for which the individual has been sentenced, but on the risk of his re-offending in the future. This, it is submitted, is the hallmark of a preventive, rather than a punitive measure. (v) The effect of s 28(5) in relation to adults is complementary to the provisions contained within s 29 which relates to juveniles who have been convicted. In respect of a juvenile, under s 29(4) an order is only to be made if it is likely that he will commit another offence against a child. Once again, it is submitted the whole basis for making an order is the risk of re-offending, not punishment for past offences. (vi) The power of the tribunal to direct the disqualification order be set aside can only be exercised if it considers that the individual 'is suitable to work with children'. Once again it is submitted that this emphasises the preventive nature of the order. (vii) Finally, the duty of the court to restore a disqualification order under s 34 is triggered if the individual has acted in such a way as to give reasonable cause to believe that an order under the section is 'necessary to protect children in general, or any children in particular, from serious harm from him'. Yet again, the purely protective purposes of the disqualification regime under the 2000 Act are said to be clear.

[37] Mr Crow suggests that a confiscation order under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 is clearly distinguishable from an order under s 28. He submits that the passage from the judgment quoted above merely illustrates a self-evident truth, namely that a punitive sanction may also contain a protective element and that a protective measure may also contain a punitive sanction. However this, he suggests, does not assist the court in determining the specific issue in a particular case.

[38] The decision in Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247 that the measure in question was a penalty was, it is submitted, prompted by a number of considerations not in any way present in the making of a disqualification order under s 28: (i) the legislative presumption that all property passing through the defendant's hands in a six-year period was the proceeds of drug trafficking unless proved otherwise; (ii) the confiscation order was not limited to the element of enrichment or profit; (iii) the discretion of the trial judge in fixing the amount of confiscation to take into account the degree of culpability of the accused; (iv) the possibility of automatic imprisonment in the event of a failure to pay.

[39] Next we consider characterisation under domestic law and the procedure involved in the making and implementation of the order. Mr Bendall contends that a disqualification order is characterised under domestic law as a criminal measure because it can only be imposed by a criminal court.

[40] Mr Crow submits that the reason why it is initially imposed by a criminal court is simply one of administrative convenience. He points to the fact that the triggering event for making such an order is a criminal conviction or one of the other orders that require the making of such an order. There would be no administrative purpose to be served in referring the matter to some other a tribunal at that stage since the criminal court has just made the necessary determination and is best placed to consider any issue under s 28(5). He submits that it is also for the same reason that a disqualification order is treated 'as if it were a part of the sentence passed on him' for the purposes of an appeal. He then contrasts the position to that stage later on when the setting aside of an order is to be considered by the tribunal rather than a criminal court and the possible restoration of the order once it has been set aside is to be considered by the High Court rather than a criminal court. In addition he points to the fact that for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 the order is not treated as part of the sentence. For these reasons he submits that a disqualification order is not characterised as a criminal sanction under domestic law.

b [41] We are further bound to have regard to the severity of the order. There is no doubt that the order can have a major impact upon a person's life. It may prevent that person from pursuing the only employment for which they have been trained. The order runs indefinitely and no application can be made for ten years to discharge it.

c [42] However many orders that are undoubtedly civil in nature and not a penalty can have severe consequences and whilst this element must be borne in mind in assessing the true nature of the order, it cannot be the only factor to be considered.

d [43] In R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester, R v Clingham v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 281, [2001] 4 All ER 264, [2001] 1 WLR 1084 (quoted with approval on appeal to the House of Lords by Lord Steyn [2002] UKHL 39 at [25], [2002] 4 All ER 593 at [25], [2002] 3 WLR 1313) Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR observed ([2001] 4 All ER 264 at [39]):

e 'Many injunctions in civil proceedings operate severely upon those against whom they are ordered. In matrimonial proceedings a husband may be ordered to leave his home and not to have contact with his children. Such an order may be made as a consequence of violence which amounted to criminal conduct. But such an order is imposed not for the purpose of punishment but for protection of the family. This demonstrates that, when considering whether an order imposes a penalty or punishment, it is necessary to look beyond its consequence and to consider its purpose.'

f [44] In addition to these submissions on the criteria as explained in Welch's case, our attention has been drawn to a number of authorities relating to other comparable legislative regimes. It is not suggested by either side that they can be determinative of this matter but Mr Crow submits that they provide strong support for the Secretary of State's argument that a s 28 disqualification order is a penalty.

g [45] We have already made reference to Gough's case in which both the Divisional Court ([2001] 4 All ER 289, [2002] QB 459) and the Court of Appeal ([2002] 2 All ER 985, [2002] 3 WLR 289) concluded that a football banning order was not a penalty within the meaning of art 7 of the convention whether or not the order had been made following a conviction. Thus such an order can be made even where the conduct relied upon occurred before the relevant date.

j [46] Mr Bendall seeks to distinguish a disqualification order under s 28 from a football banning order because a football banning order under s 14B of the Football Spectators Act 1989 can be imposed without any prior conviction. However, following R v M [2002] 1 WLR 824 this distinction cannot be maintained because a s 28 disqualification order can be made in circumstances where the Court of Appeal has clearly determined that there is no conviction following a finding that a person who is not fit to stand trial did the act or made the omission charged. In each of these cases where there is no conviction, there will need to be a determination of the facts to satisfy the relevant condition and hence no significant distinction is to be found between the two in this regard. a

[47] Mr Bendall next suggests there is a distinction to be drawn because a football banning order can only be made if there are reasonable grounds for believing that the making of an order will help to prevent violence or disorder in connection with regulated football matches. A s 28 disqualification order, he suggests, is mandatory save in limited circumstances. However it is the qualification that there are limited circumstances that has to be considered. An order will not be made if the court is satisfied that the individual will not commit further offences against a child. Thus the only distinction is that there is a rebuttable presumption in favour of an order in the case of a disqualification under s 28, which is not to be found in considering a football banning order. But, as Mr Crow submits, the substance of the court's decision in each case is the same, namely whether there is a risk of re-offending. b

‘There is no room for doubt about the mischief against which this legislation is directed, which is the risk of re-offending by sex offenders who have offended in the past and have shown a continuing propensity to offend. Parliament might have decided to wait until, if at all, the offender did offend again and then appropriate charges could be laid on the basis of that further offending. Before 1998 there was effectively no choice but to act in that way. But the obvious disadvantage was that, by the time the offender had offended again, some victim had suffered. The rationale of s 2 was, by means of an injunctive order, to seek to avoid the contingency of any further suffering by any further victim. It would also of course be to the advantage of a defendant if he were to be saved from further offending. As in the case of a civil injunction, a breach of the court's order may attract a sanction. But, also as in the case of a civil injunction, the order, although restraining the defendant from doing that which is prohibited, imposes no penalty or disability upon him. I am accordingly satisfied that, as a matter of English domestic law, the application is a civil proceeding, as Parliament undoubtedly intended it to be.’ d

[49] It is to be observed that the order in that case upheld by the Divisional Court prohibited the appellant from: (1) seeking to communicate with a child or young person under the age of 16 years, (2) associating with or befriending a child or young person under the age of 16 years, (3) residing in any private dwelling where a child or young person under the age of 16 years was present, or (4) undertaking any activity (paid, voluntary or recreational) which by its nature was likely to bring him into contact with a child or young person under the age of 16 years. In terms of the severity of the restrictions imposed by the order, it was at least as far-reaching as those under a s 28 disqualification order but the e a severity of the consequences for the appellant did not in any way translate it into a penalty.

[50] In Ibbotson v UK (1998) 27 EHRR CD 332, the European Commission of Human Rights has ruled that the requirement to register under the Sex Offenders Act 1997 does not involve the imposition of a penalty within the meaning of art 7 of the convention. Mr Bendall seeks to distinguish this decision on the basis that the obligation is imposed as a matter of law, not as a part of the sentencing process. In one sense that is correct: the requirement to register will take effect whether or not the court says anything about it. However, a s 28 disqualification order is mandatory unless the court concludes that it is unlikely that the person will commit any further offence against a child. It is not immediately obvious why this distinction should in itself lead to a different conclusion.

c [51] Mr Bendall also seeks to distinguish Ibbotson v UK on the basis that the restrictions imposed under a disqualification order under s 28 are far greater than the requirements in respect of registration. That is undoubtedly right and it is a factor to be considered in the overall equation but, for reasons already explained, it cannot be determinative of the question.

d [52] Finally we were referred to R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester. That case had been heard in the Court of Appeal at the time of the hearing but judgment was awaited in the House of Lords. We were asked to postpone our judgment pending the decision of the House of Lords and this explains the delay in our giving judgment. We invited counsel to make written representations on the decision and we have received such representations from Mr Crow. Mr Crow provided Mr Bendall with a copy of his representations and Mr Bendall has indicated that there is nothing that he feels he can add to his earlier submissions.

f [53] In McCann's case, the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords had to consider antisocial behaviour orders made under s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. The question raised in that case was whether such proceedings were to be classified as civil or criminal in domestic law and whether they constituted a 'criminal charge' within art 6 of the convention. It is accepted that what amounts to a penalty under art 7 is closely analogous to the concept of a 'criminal charge' under art 6.

g [54] In McCann's case [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2002] 3 WLR 1313 the House of Lords recognised that s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 formed part of a wider raft of legislation in which Parliament employed the technique of the civil injunction to deal with novel social problems where the criminal law itself did not provide adequate protection for the public (see [2002] 4 All ER 593 at [17]–[18], h [42], [85] per Lord Steyn, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Hutton, respectively). We have no doubt that s 28 of the 2000 Act has to be seen in much the same light and again employs injunctive remedies to supplement the normal criminal sanctions which are perceived as providing inadequate protection for children.

j [55] One of the principal reasons for concluding that the proceedings in McCann's case were classified in domestic law as civil and not criminal was that the nature of an antisocial behaviour order is not penal and its purpose is not punitive. It is designed to protect members of the public and prevent future misconduct not to punish past misconduct. (See in this regard Lord Steyn at [19]–[24] and Lord Hutton at [94]–[95].) Mr Crow submits that exactly the same purpose can be discerned in relation to the disqualification order in this case.

[56] In McCann's case, the House of Lords rejected the suggestion that, in seeking to determine whether an antisocial behaviour order is civil or criminal, the effect of the order itself must be considered in conjunction with the consequences of any possible breach. (See Lord Steyn at [23].)

[57] Having thus recorded the arguments advanced and the authorities to which we were referred, we have to determine whether a s 28 disqualification order is a penalty within the meaning of art 7. We make clear that we have been considerably helped by both counsels' clear and concise submissions in this regard for which we are grateful.

[58] Having considered the matters though we have little difficulty in concluding that the arguments advanced on behalf of the Secretary of State by Mr Crow must prevail. It seems to us of considerable importance that a conviction is not a necessary condition for the making of such an order. When one considers the nature and purpose of such an order it points overwhelmingly to this being for preventative rather than punitive effect. Precisely the same order is made whether a person is convicted or not and the making of the order has no regard to the extent or seriousness of the offending but rather to whether a repetition of the conduct is likely. Save to the very limited extent we made clear in setting out his submissions, we accept the force of the various arguments advanced by Mr Crow. The various authorities to which we were referred seem entirely consistent with the approach that he adopted and we believe lead to an inevitable conclusion that a s 28 disqualification order is not a penalty within the meaning of art 7. It follows that art 7 does not require the court to interpret s 28 in a way that would make it apply only to convictions for offences after the coming into force of the 2000 Act.

THE INTERPRETATION ISSUE

[59] In the grounds of appeal in Field's case, it seemed that a second issue was raised as to whether as a matter of statutory interpretation, s 28 could apply where a conviction related to conduct that pre-dated the coming into force of the 2000 Act. Mr Bendall indicated that he was not taking any separate point over and above the convention point but it is perhaps desirable that we make clear that we have considered this aspect of the matter as well.

1. Looking simply at the words of s 28(2)(a), its temporal effect is entirely general. The only limitation is that the offender must have committed an offence against a child when he was aged 18 years or over. There is no suggestion from the wording of s 28 that the acts constituting the offence must have been committed after the 2000 Act came into force.

2. Assuming that a disqualification order is not a criminal penalty, the Secretary of State's interpretation does not offend against the presumption against retrospective legislation. That presumption is based on concepts of fairness and legal certainty, which dictate that accrued rights and the legal status of past acts should not be altered by subsequent legislation. But the effect of a disqualification order is entirely prospective, because it only affects future conduct. In such circumstances, a statute does not offend against the presumption against retrospective effect merely because it depends for its future application upon events that may have occurred before it came into force.

- a* 3. Finally, the purpose of s 28 is plainly to protect children. That purpose would be severely undermined if a disqualification order could only be imposed in relation to offences committed after the Section came into force. The court should take a more relaxed approach to a potentially retro-active element in legislation where its intended purpose is to protect the public.'
- b* [61] We have no doubt that the Secretary of State's submissions are right and that s 28 is to be construed as applying to a conviction whenever the offending behaviour occurred.

CONCLUSION

- c* [62] For these reasons the appeal of Field against sentence is dismissed. It follows that there are no prospects of Young successfully appealing against the disqualification order made in his case and his application for leave to appeal against sentence is refused in this respect as it was in relation to the extended term of imprisonment.

Field's appeal dismissed. Young's application for leave to appeal refused.

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD STEYN, LORD HUTTON, LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

Declaration – Jurisdiction – Jurisdiction of civil court to grant declaration regarding criminal law – Declaration regarding criminality of future conduct – Criteria to be applied when determining whether to grant such declaration – Treason Felony Act 1848, s 3 – Human Rights Act 1998.

The claimants were the editor of a newspaper and one of its journalists. They agreed to write and publish a series of articles urging the peaceful abolition of the monarchy. The editor was aware of s 3^a of the Treason Felony Act 1848 which made it an offence, punishable by a maximum sentence of life imprisonment, for a person to compass by publication 'to deprive or depose' the Queen from the Crown. Although no prosecution had been brought under that provision since 1883, the editor invited the Attorney General to announce an intention to disapply the 1848 Act in respect of all published advocacy of the deposition of the monarchy other than by criminal violence. In accordance with his normal practice, the Attorney General declined to give an assurance regarding whether or not a prosecution or other action would be undertaken in respect of the proposed conduct. The newspaper published the articles and no prosecution was brought. In subsequent judicial review proceedings, the claimants sought a declaration as to the proper interpretation of s 3 of the 1848 Act read in the light of the Human Rights Act 1998, or a declaration that s 3 was incompatible with the right to freedom of expression guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). The Administrative Court, sitting as a Divisional Court, refused permission to apply for judicial review. The claimants applied to the Court of Appeal for permission to appeal. That court formally refused the application, but held that the claimants should be allowed to proceed with an amended claim for a declaration that s 3 of the 1848 Act was to be read and given effect to as if the words 'by acts of force or constraint or other unlawful means' followed and qualified the words 'to deprive or depose'. The Court of Appeal also allowed the claimants to proceed with their alternative claim for a declaration of incompatibility. On the Attorney General's appeal to the House of Lords, their Lordships considered, inter alia, the principles to be applied by a civil court when it was determining whether to entertain a claim for declaratory relief on a question of criminal law.

Held – Three criteria were to be applied to determine whether a particular case fell within the exceptional category where it would be proper for a member of the public to bring proceedings against the Crown for a declaration that certain

- a proposed conduct was lawful. The first was the absence of any genuine dispute about the subject matter. That had to be approached realistically. There would be a dispute if the Attorney General threatened to prosecute but not if, in accordance with present practice, he simply declined to indicate any view. That could not by itself conclude the matter, or be a weighty criterion if there were otherwise good reasons to allow the claim for a declaration to go forward. The second criterion was whether the case was fact sensitive or not. That was a factor of great importance. Most claims for a declaration that particular conduct was unlawful would founder on that ground. However, a question of pure law might more readily be made the subject matter of a declaration. The third criterion was whether there was a cogent public or individual interest which could be advanced by a grant of a declaration. Such an interest could include matters of constitutional importance. The instant case might fall within the exceptional category, but no purpose would be served by allowing it to go back to the Administrative Court. The part of s 3 of the 1848 Act which appeared to criminalise the advocacy of republicanism was part of a bygone age, and the idea that it could survive scrutiny under the 1998 Act was unreal. It had become a dead letter, and the issue which the claimants had brought before the courts could not be described as a live, practical question. It was not the function of the courts to bring the statute book up to date. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [16], [22]–[25], [28], [29], [33], [36]–[38], [40], [44], [45], [47], [48], [51], [53], [56], [58]–[61], below).

Appeal

- The defendant, the Attorney General, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 23 July 2002 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Schiemann, May and Jonathan Parker LJ) on 21 March 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 397) remitting to the Administrative Court amended proceedings brought by the claimants, Alan Rusbridger and Polly Toynbee, against the Attorney General under s 7(1)(a) of the Human Rights Act 1998. The Administrative Court, sitting as a Divisional Court (Rose LJ and Silber J), had refused the claimants permission to apply for judicial review on 22 June 2001 ([2001] EWHC Admin 529). The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Steyn.
- e

Philip Sales, David Perry and Ben Hooper (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Attorney General.

- f Geoffrey Robertson QC, Martin Westgate and Laura Dubinsky (instructed by Jan Johannes) for the claimants.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- g 26 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD STEYN.

- [1] My Lords, behind the procedural questions brought before the House by the Attorney General lies the question whether the editor of a newspaper, who conducts a press campaign advocating the peaceful and constitutional replacement of the monarchy by a republican form of government, may be guilty of an offence under s 3 of the Treason Felony Act 1848. The same question could be asked about the rights of an individual. The Attorney General has invited the House to concentrate on procedural issues with minimal reference to the ultimate question. Judges, however, ought not to work in the dark.

- j (1) THE 1848 ACT

[2] 1848 was the year of revolutions on continental Europe, but there was only one Chartist demonstration on 10 April 1848 in a relatively tranquil Britain. But there was a fear that the contagion of revolution, with its associations with the Terror after 1789, might spread to Britain. This was probably one of the reasons why Parliament passed the 1848 Act. A further factor was that while the Treason

Act 1351 applied to the whole United Kingdom it was unclear whether later statutes (such as the Treason Act 1795) extended to Ireland. Certainly Parliament was told that this was the principal mischief to be addressed. There was another objective. The 1351 Act was still in place as it is in part to this day. The 1795 Act was passed to facilitate the prosecution of constructive treasons: it did so by criminalising them as treasons. But juries were reluctant to convict defendants of what were sometimes perceived to be political charges but carrying the death penalty. The 1848 Act therefore provided that certain constructive treasons were to be felonies, punishable by life imprisonment. It did, however, specifically provide that conduct penalised by the 1848 Act could still be charged as treason. This is the relevant historical setting of the statute.

‘... if any person whatsoever ... shall, within the United Kingdom or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend to deprive or depose our Most Gracious Lady the Queen ... from the style, honour, or royal name of the imperial crown of the United Kingdom, or of any other of her Majesty’s dominions and countries, or to levy war against her Majesty ... within any part of the United Kingdom, in order by force or constraint to compel her ... to change her ... measures or counsels, or in order to put any force or constraint upon or in order to intimidate or overawe both Houses or either House of Parliament, or to move or stir any foreigner or stranger with force to invade the United Kingdom or any other of her Majesty’s dominions or countries under the obeisance of her Majesty ... and such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices, or intentions, or any of them, shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing ... or by any overt act or deed, every person so offending shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable ... to be transported beyond the seas for the term of his or her natural life ...’

The gaps in the text reflect words repealed by the Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1891 and the Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1892. The old common law classification of crimes as treasons, felonies and misdemeanours has been abolished: see s 1 of the Criminal Law Act 1967. The reference in s 3 of the 1848 Act to ‘felony’ is to be read as a reference to an offence. The penalty under s 3 is now imprisonment for life or any shorter period: see the Penal Servitude Act 1857 and Criminal Justice Act 1948. Subject to these statutory changes, s 3 remains in full force.

[4] The question has been raised whether s 3 makes punishable a press campaign to seek to persuade the British people to make a peaceful change from a monarchical form of government to a republican one. The way in which this point arises on the wording of the section can be briefly explained. Despite the quaintness of the language it is possible to divide the scheme of s 3 into: (1) the compassing (contriving) etc, generally and (2) the compassing specifically by publishing etc, in order: (a) to deprive the Sovereign of the Crown; (b) to levy war against the Sovereign; (c) to encourage foreigners to invade the United Kingdom. This is how the section is approached in 11(1) Halsbury’s Laws (4th edn reissue) para 86, and in Smith and Hogan Criminal Law (6th edn, 1988) pp 832–833, the relevant section being omitted from subsequent editions of this book. For present purposes the material part of s 3 is that directed against compassing by publication to deprive or depose the Queen from the Crown. This provision had as a prime target editors of newspapers and this was indeed the main use made of a it in prosecutions in Victorian times. No prosecutions have, however, been brought under it since 1883.

[5] It will be noted that in parts (b) and (c) identified above the use of force is expressly made a necessary ingredient of the offence. The question is whether it is also an ingredient of the offence contained in part (a). At first glance the language is wide enough to cover a press campaign advocating the adoption of a republican form of government by constitutional processes. If that is so, peaceful political debate on the virtues of republicanism is criminalised. The question could be posed whether this is the correct reading. Interpretation is not infinitely expandable; there is a Rubicon which may not be crossed. On the other hand, counsel for the Attorney General accepted that the 1848 Act must be construed as an always speaking statute in a modern democracy. In this context it may well be that the strong operative words 'deprive or depose' import the idea of changing our form of government by unlawful force. If this interpretation is correct, the reason for the present litigation collapses at the threshold. For reasons which will become clear it is not necessary to express a view on this point.

d (II) THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT 1998

[6] The United Kingdom became a party to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in 1950. Its provisions are well known. The establishment and recognition of fundamental individual rights was its main aim but its preamble envisaged that this aim could only be established by creating conditions of 'effective political democracy'. Plainly that e involved the idea that peaceful political debate about constitutional and governmental structures should be encouraged. Political free speech, criticising an existing form of government, was regarded as central to the development of European liberal democracies.

[7] The Human Rights Act 1998 has potential implications for interpretation of s 3 of the 1848 Act if it makes punishable the advocacy of republicanism by f individuals or the press by constitutional methods. The convention right at stake is freedom of expression. Article 10 of the convention provides:

g '1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

h 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.'

j Freedom of political speech is a core value of our legal system. Without it the rule of law cannot be maintained. Whatever may have been the position before the 1998 Act came into operation, it is difficult to think of any rational argument justifying the criminalisation of the conduct of citizens who wish to argue for a different form of government.

Section 3(1) is not available where the suggested interpretation is contrary to express statutory words or is by implication necessarily contradicted by the statute: see Re S (children: care plan), Re W (children: care plan) [2002] UKHL 10 at [40], [2002] 2 All ER 192 at [40], [2002] 2 AC 291 at [40] per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. If it is unavailable, incompatibility of legislation with a convention right brings s 4 into play. Section 4, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Subsection (2) applies in any proceedings in which a court determines whether a provision of primary legislation is compatible with a Convention right.

(2) If the court is satisfied that the provision is incompatible with a Convention right, it may make a declaration of that incompatibility.

(3) Subsection (4) applies in any proceedings in which a court determines whether a provision of subordinate legislation, made in the exercise of a power conferred by primary legislation, is compatible with a Convention right.

(4) If the court is satisfied—(a) that the provision is incompatible with a Convention right, and (b) that (disregarding any possibility of revocation) the primary legislation concerned prevents removal of the incompatibility, it may make a declaration of that incompatibility ...

(6) A declaration under this section ("a declaration of incompatibility")—(a) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of the provision in respect of which it is given; and (b) is not binding on the parties to the proceedings in which it is made.'

Any suggestion that a total legislative ban on republican discourse in print could be compatible with art 10 of the convention would stretch judicial gullibility to breaking point. It, therefore, appears inevitable that any resultant incompatibility would have to be read down under the strong interpretative obligation under s 3(1).

(III) THE SHAPE OF THE APPEAL

[9] The Guardian is a daily newspaper with a circulation in excess of 400,000. Mr Alan Rusbridger and Ms Polly Toynbee are respectively the editor and a well-known journalist of the Guardian. In November 2000 they and other employees of the Guardian agreed to write and publish a series of articles urging the abolition of the monarchy. They agreed that none of the articles would in any way encourage the use of force. Mr Rusbridger was aware of the 1848 Act. He was concerned that his agreement to promote republicanism might constitute a treasonable campaign. He received legal advice that the interpretation of s 3 of the 1848 Act would be read down under s 3 of the 1998 Act on the grounds that s 3 of the 1848 Act, as interpreted in various nineteenth century decisions, was incompatible with art 10 of the convention: see R v Mitchel (1848) 6 State Tr NS 599; and R v Duffy (1848) 7 State Tr NS 795. In a letter dated 28 November 2000 Mr Rusbridger informed the Attorney General of the Guardian's proposals to publish the articles. He asked for a clarification of his legal position in the light of the 1848 Act and invited the Attorney General to announce an intention to disapply the 1848 Act in respect of all published advocacy of the deposition of the monarchy other than by criminal violence. In the alternative, he suggested that a the Attorney General might seek a declaration as to the proper interpretation of s 3 of the 1848 Act in the light of the 1998 Act. In his written reply of 4 December 2000, the Attorney General declined to give an assurance regarding whether or not a prosecution or other action would be taken in respect of the conduct proposed.

b [10] On 6 December 2000, the Guardian published articles which unambiguously advocated republicanism and Mr Rusbridger sent a copy of the newspaper to the Attorney General together with a reply to the Attorney General's letter of 4 December 2000. Mr Rusbridger asked to be informed, within 28 days, whether a prosecution would be brought and also stated that he would be commencing a claim under s 7 of the 1998 Act for a declaration on the construction of the 1848 Act. The Attorney General replied on 8 December 2000.

c In the event, no prosecutions were brought against Mr Rusbridger and Ms Toynbee.

[11] On 16 February 2001, the Guardian commenced a claim for: (1) a declaration that two decisions allegedly taken by the Attorney General during his exchange of correspondence with Mr Rusbridger were erroneous in law and in breach of s 6 of the 1998 Act; (2) a declaration that s 3 of the 1848 Act, when read in the light of the 1998 Act, does not apply to persons who evince in print or in writing an intent to depose the monarch or deprive her of her imperial status or to establish a republican form of government unless their intent is to achieve this by acts of force, constraint or other unlawful means; and (3) in the alternative, a declaration of incompatibility.

e [12] On 22 June 2001, the Administrative Court sitting as a Divisional Court (Rose LJ and Silber J) ([2001] EWHC Admin 529) held that there was no decision made by the Attorney General which was susceptible to challenge. In any event, the Administrative Court held that it was—

f 'not ... appropriate for declarations as to the criminality or otherwise of conduct to be made, save in exceptional circumstances, and certainly not, generally speaking, before the conduct has itself occurred.'

The Administrative Court refused the Guardian's application for permission to pursue their claim in so far as it was properly to be characterised as a judicial review claim and, in the alternative, struck out the claim. Permission to appeal was refused.

g [13] On 18 February 2002, the Guardian renewed the application for permission to appeal before the Court of Appeal. At an oral hearing the Guardian did not press its appeal against the refusal to grant permission for the judicial review of the Attorney General's two alleged decisions. The Guardian obtained an amendment of its claim for declaratory relief to a claim for a declaration that s 3 of the 1998 Act applies to s 3 of the 1848 Act and that in consequence the latter section must henceforth be read and given effect to as if the phrase 'by acts of force or constraint or other unlawful means' followed and qualified the words 'to deprive or depose'.

j [14] In its judgment of 20 March 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 397), the Court of Appeal formally refused the application for permission to appeal against the Administrative Court's decision to refuse to grant permission for the judicial review claim to proceed. However, the Court of Appeal held that the Guardian should be allowed to proceed with both their claim for a declaration on the proper construction of s 3 of the 1848 Act and their alternative claim for a declaration of incompatibility. Giving the judgment of the court Schiemann LJ observed (at [27]):

'We of course express no view as to whether a declaration in the form now sought should be granted or as to the construction of the 1848 Act but we consider that it would not be in the interests of justice to prevent the matters raised in this application from being fully argued. We do not approach the matter as though we were reviewing the exercise of discretion by the Administrative Court since that court did not have before it the application for the declaration which we have before us and since the arguments apparently addressed to it were different from those which we heard.'

The Guardian's claim as amended was ordered to be remitted to the Administrative Court. The Court of Appeal declined to grant leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

[15] On 23 July 2002, the House granted leave to appeal to the Attorney General. The questions which are now before the House are as follows.

(1) What are the principles that determine whether a civil court should entertain a claim for declaratory relief on a question of criminal law? (2) Was the Court of Appeal entitled to interfere with the Administrative Court's decision to dismiss the Guardian's claim for a declaration? (3) In the light of the answers to issues (1) and (2), should the Guardian's remaining claims for declaratory relief be allowed to proceed?

(IV) ISSUE (1): THE PRINCIPLE

[16] The general principle has often been stated that, save in exceptional circumstances, it is not appropriate for a member of the public to bring proceedings against the Crown for a declaration that certain proposed conduct is lawful and name the Attorney General as the formal defendant to the claim. This principle was discussed in Imperial Tobacco Ltd v A-G [1980] 1 All ER 866, [1981] AC 718. That case, however, involved an attempt to obtain a declaration in the face of pending criminal proceedings which were properly launched and were not vexatious. Here there are no criminal proceedings pending or threatened. All that need be said about the actual decision of the House in the Imperial Tobacco case is that it was based on the paradigm for the application of the restrictive principle. Viscount Dilhorne did, however, express himself more generally. He observed ([1980] 1 All ER 866 at 876, [1981] AC 718 at 742):

'My Lords, it is not necessary in this case to decide whether a declaration as to the criminality or otherwise of future conduct can ever properly be made by a civil court. In my opinion it would be a very exceptional case in which it would be right to do so.'

Since 1951 it has become well established that there is jurisdiction for a civil court to make such a declaration: compare Zamir and Woolf The Declaratory Judgment (3rd edn, 2002) p 214 (para 4.201); R v DPP, ex p Camelot plc (1997) 10 Admin LR 93. But the exceptional nature of such a declaration by a civil court has on a number of occasions been emphasised.

[17] In Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821, [1993] AC 789 the House granted a declaration that it would be lawful to discontinue life-sustaining treatment to Mr Bland who was in a permanent vegetative state. This was, of course, a truly exceptional case and the House held that the general principle does not debar declaratory relief.

a [18] The principle, and the exception to it, is in line with the ratio of the decision of the House of Lords in R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, viz that, absent 'dishonesty or mala fide or an exceptional circumstance' decisions by the Director of Public Prosecutions to consent to a prosecution are not amenable to judicial review. In R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP [2002] UKHL 61, [2002] 1 All ER 1, [2002] 1 AC 800 the applicant sought a declaration that it was lawful for Mrs Pretty to be assisted by her husband to commit suicide. Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough observed (at [116]):

c 'In exceptional circumstances it may be proper for a member of the public to bring proceedings against the Crown for a declaration that certain proposed conduct is lawful and name the Attorney General as the formal defendant to the claim. But that is not what occurred here and, even then, the court would have a discretion which it would normally exercise to refuse to rule upon hypothetical facts. Had the case raised by the appellant been one where it was appropriate to grant a declaration as to legality or compatibility, the court would no doubt have adopted that approach.'

d [19] Counsel for the Attorney General has not argued that the principle summarised by Lord Hobhouse requires revision. His concern was rather with the fact that the Court of Appeal treated the present case as exceptional and with the way in which the reasoning was expressed. The Attorney General apparently fears that the decision of the Court of Appeal may be a slippery slope to the virtual abandonment of the principle. Counsel for the Guardian also did not invite the House to consider any revision. For my part the principle as formulated is as necessary after the advent of the 1998 Act as it was before. It must be maintained. Normally, the seeking of a declaration in a civil case about the lawfulness of future conduct will not be permitted. But in truly exceptional cases the court

f [20] In a powerful speech counsel for the Attorney General observed that a more structured approach to what may constitute exceptional circumstances was required. He invited the House to examine the criteria which may be relevant to a decision whether a particular case falls within the exceptional category or not. Such a decision is not an entirely discretionary matter; rather it involves an exercise of judgment. I agree that the applicable criteria ought to be examined.

g [21] The starting point must be that the relief claimed may as a matter of jurisdiction be granted. The Guardian do not have to demonstrate that they are 'victims' under s 7 of the 1998 Act. That much is conceded and, in any event, obvious on proper view of the place of s 3 in the scheme of the 1998 Act. It is, however, worth noting the broad approach which the European Court of Human Rights adopts to the concept of victim. Thus in Norris v Ireland (1991) 13 EHRR 186 a homosexual man complained that the criminalisation of homosexual conduct in Ireland violated his art 8 right to respect for his private life, although he accepted that the risk of being prosecuted was remote. The court accepted that he was a victim. Even an administrative policy of not prosecuting for the offence in question would not have made a difference. For present purposes it is sufficient that the Guardian has an interest and standing. That is the threshold requirement.

j [22] I now turn directly to the matters, which counsel for the Attorney General invited the House to spell out. He put forward three criteria. The first was the absence of any genuine dispute about the subject-matter. This objection must be realistically approached. There would be a dispute if the Attorney General threatened to prosecute. In that event it would be said that no claim for a declaration is possible because there is an imminent threat of prosecution. On the other hand, if in accordance with present practice the Attorney General simply declines to indicate any view, there is no dispute. But that cannot by itself conclude the matter or be a weighty criterion if there are otherwise good reasons to allow the claim for a declaration to go forward. It is not a significant factor militating against placing the present case in an exceptional category. Unfortunately, the oral debate in the House concentrated on the wrong target. Counsel for the Guardian relied on what he termed the chilling effect of s 3 of the 1848 Act. Given that the editor did publish articles advocating a republic, the argument was threadbare. Clearly, the editor of the Guardian has not slept uneasily in his bed for fear of being prosecuted under s 3 of the 1848 Act. But the Guardian may be entitled to seek certainty by pursuing its claim for declaratory relief. In that event the outcome may be that a declaration is unnecessary as was the case in A-G v Able [1984] 1 All ER 277, [1984] QB 795. The Court of Appeal has not foreclosed such a conclusion.

[23] The second criterion advanced is whether the case is fact-sensitive or not. This is a factor of great importance and most claims for a declaration that particular conduct is unlawful will founder on this ground. In principle therefore I accept the approach of counsel for the Attorney General. But it has always been recognised that a question of pure law may more readily be made the subject-matter of a declaration: see Munnich v Godstone Rural DC [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427, cited with approval by Lord Lane (with whom Lord Edmund-Davies and Lord Scarman agreed) in Imperial Tobacco Ltd v A-G [1980] 1 All ER 866 at 883–884, [1981] AC 718 at 751–752. It is clear as a pikestaff that there can be no issue of fact concerning either the incompatibility of s 3 of the 1848 Act with art 10 of the convention or the court's decision under s 3 of the 1998 Act. It is not a fact-sensitive case. In my view the Guardian has satisfied this criterion.

[24] The third criterion advanced by counsel for the Attorney General focuses on the question whether there is a cogent public or individual interest which could be advanced by the grant of a declaration. Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821, [1993] AC 789 was an example of an overwhelming interest of an individual in the grant of a declaration that the cessation of life-sustaining medical support was lawful. But the jurisdiction is in no way limited to life and death issues: see Royal College of Nursing of the UK v Dept of Health and Social Security [1981] 1 All ER 545, [1981] AC 800. The Guardian alleges that some 25% of the population supports republicanism. The Guardian wishes to continue the debate. In words attributed to Voltaire the person on the Underground might say: 'I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to death your right to say it.' It may be a matter of constitutional importance. An historic anomaly in our political democracy could be examined by our courts. There is something to be said for the view that it ought not to be left to the court in Strasbourg to drag us to an obvious conclusion.

[25] I conclude that the present case may fall within the exceptional category. This does not, however, conclude the matter.

(V) ISSUE (2): THE DECISION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE COURT

[26] Counsel for the Attorney General submitted that the Court of Appeal was not entitled to reverse the decision of the Administrative Court. He relied on the familiar principles summarised in Hadmor Productions Ltd v Hamilton [1982] 1 All

- a ER 1042 at 1046, [1983] 1 AC 191 at 220. The difficulty is, however, that neither the Administrative Court—nor for that matter the Court of Appeal—approached the case in the structured way, with reference to specific criteria, which I have been persuaded must be adopted. Dealing with the decision of the Administrative Court, I concentrate on the judgment of Rose LJ with whom Silber J agreed. In truth the motivation of Rose LJ is conclusory in nature and not altogether easy to follow. He did not examine the argument that the Guardian is entitled to certainty. He did not consider the fact that the issues are of pure law. He did not take into account the constitutional import of the case. In fairness one must add that the argument before the House probably dealt with the criteria in somewhat more detail than was the case before the Administrative Court. The criteria applicable to determining whether a case falls in the exceptional category have now been clarified to some extent for future guidance.

[27] But the House is not bound to follow the decision of the Administrative Court.

(VI) ISSUE (3): THE APPROPRIATE ORDER

- d [28] It is now necessary to look at the matter in the round. Ought the matter to be heard again by the Administrative Court? It would certainly be competent for the House to allow the case to go back. But what purpose would it serve? The part of s 3 of the 1848 Act which appears to criminalise the advocacy of republicanism is a relic of a bygone age and does not fit into the fabric of our modern legal system. The idea that s 3 could survive scrutiny under the 1998 Act is unreal. The fears of the editor of the Guardian were more than a trifle alarmist. In my view the courts ought not to be troubled further with this unnecessary litigation.
- e

(VII) CONCLUSION

- f [29] I would allow the appeal and quash the decision of the Court of Appeal. In the result the application of the Guardian is dismissed. I would further direct that there should be no order of costs below and that the Guardian must pay the costs of the appeal to the House.

LORD HUTTON.

- g [30] My Lords, the freedom of the press to express views and opinions on political and constitutional matters is a fundamental and central element in the life of a democratic society and is enshrined in art 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).
- h [31] It is upon this principle that the claimants, Mr Alan Rusbridger, the editor of the Guardian, and Ms Polly Toynbee, a prominent journalist of that newspaper, rely in these proceedings, the background to which has been fully described in the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn. They contend that there is uncertainty as to the meaning of s 3 of the Treason Felony Act 1848.
- j They further contend that there is a risk that those who advocate in print the replacement of the monarchy by a republican form of government by peaceful and constitutional means might be prosecuted and be liable to imprisonment under that section and that this risk constitutes an infringement of their rights under art 10 of the convention. They seek to uphold the decision of the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 397) that the Administrative Court ([2001] EWHC Admin 529) should rule on their application for a declaration that, consequent on the application of s 3 of the 1998 Act, s 3 of the 1848 Act does not make it an offence to publish views advocating that the Queen should be deprived of or deposed from the Crown by peaceful and constitutional means. a [32] In reply to the claimants' argument the Attorney General submits that a civil court should not give a declaratory judgment on an issue of criminal law save in an exceptional case, and that the present proceedings are not such a case. The Attorney General cites Imperial Tobacco Ltd v A-G [1980] 1 All ER 866 at 876, [1981] AC 718 at 742 where Viscount Dilhorne stated: b

'My Lords, it is not necessary in this case to decide whether a declaration as to the criminality or otherwise of future conduct can ever properly be made by a civil court. In my opinion it would be a very exceptional case in which it would be right to do so.' c

'In exceptional circumstances it may be proper for a member of the public to bring proceedings against the Crown for a declaration that certain proposed conduct is lawful and name the Attorney General as the formal defendant to the claim. But that is not what occurred here and, even then, the court would have a discretion which it would normally exercise to refuse to rule upon hypothetical facts.' d

[33] My Lords, whilst the claimants' submissions relate to principles of great importance in respect of the freedom of the press in a democratic society, I consider that when the actual facts of this case are considered it becomes apparent that those principles are not directly engaged and that the risk described by the claimants is, in the real world, non-existent. Nor is there any real possibility that 'the chilling effect' referred to by Lord Keith of Kinkel in Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 1011 at 1018, [1993] AC 534 at 548 would operate. This is clearly shown by the passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Schiemann LJ which states (at [21]): e

'We do not understand the claimants to suggest that the uncertainty of our law as to treason has affected their decision to publish in the past or is likely to in the future. Their stance is that of the Duke of Wellington: publish and be damned. Nor is there any evidence to suggest that the existence of the 1848 Act causes them to sleep in their beds less soundly.' g

Therefore it is clear that the freedom of the claimants to express views and opinions and to impart ideas has not been hindered or impeded and that their rights under art 10 of the convention have not been breached. h

'[22] On the other side, there are powerful arguments in favour of free speech and also of having our criminal law formulated in such a way that the citizen can see what is prohibited and what is not. Of course there will always be borderline cases but it cannot seriously be contended that our many statutes dealing with treason which go back to 1351 but are still partly in force leave the law in a satisfactory state ...' j a [23] ... No one has been prosecuted under the 1848 Act for over 100 years. Every few years Parliament passes a Statute Law (Repeals) Act which repeals outdated statutes. While bits of the 1848 Act were repealed in the nineteenth century other bits including the section with which we are concerned survive in part ...

b [24] In 1998, 150 years later, the Human Rights Act was passed. Parliament chose, for reasons which are readily understandable, not to amend all Acts which might require amendment in the light of our obligations under the convention but instead to leave the courts to do what they can with the help of s 3 of the 1998 Act ...

c [26] The Attorney General has chosen not to express his view as to the proper construction of the 1848 Act in the light of the 1998 Act. Indeed we do not know if he has one. Neither he nor the Director of Public Prosecutions have indicated what prosecution policy is in relation to articles advocating republicanism in this country. The proper construction of the 1848 Act seems to us potentially relevant to the exercise by the court of any discretion to make a declaration. We see room for a possible argument to the effect that s 3 of the 1848 Act is on its face incompatible with the 1998 Act even if read in the light of s 3 of the 1998 Act and that it is in the public interest that this incompatibility be declared so that the remedial action in s 10 may be considered by the Home Secretary.'

e [35] I respectfully dissent from this view expressed by the Court of Appeal. It is not the function of the courts to decide hypothetical questions which do not impact on the parties before them. This point was well put by Lord Justice-Clerk Thomson in Macnaughton v Macnaughton's Trustees 1953 SC 387 at 392:

f 'Our Courts have consistently acted on the view that it is their function in the ordinary run of contentious litigation to decide only live, practical questions, and that they have no concern with hypothetical, premature or academic questions, nor do they exist to advise litigants as to the policy which they should adopt in the ordering of their affairs. The Courts are neither a debating club nor an advisory bureau. Just what is a live practical question is not always easy to decide and must, in the long run, turn on the circumstances of the particular case.'

g [36] As it is clear that any uncertainty as to the interpretation of s 3 of the 1848 Act has not affected the decision of the claimants to publish in the past and is not likely to affect their decision to publish in the future, I consider that the issue which the claimants have brought before the courts cannot be described as a live, practical question. In addition I wish to express my full agreement with the views of my noble and learned friends Lord Rodger of Earlsferry and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe that it is not the function of the courts to keep the statute book up-to-date and that ss 3 and 4 of the 1998 Act are not intended to be an instrument by which the courts can chivvy Parliament into spring-cleaning the statute book.

j [37] Therefore for the reasons which I have given I would allow the appeal and quash the decision of the Court of Appeal.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

[38] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn and am in complete and respectful agreement with everything he has said.

[39] The claimants have said that they fear that if they advocate the abolition of the monarchy and its replacement by a republic, all by peaceful and constitutional means, they may be prosecuted for treason pursuant to s 3 of the Treason Felony Act 1848. They refer to the 'chilling effect' that section has upon the freedom of expression guaranteed by art 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[40] My Lords, I do not believe a word of it. It is plain as a pikestaff to the claimants and everyone else that no one who advocates the peaceful abolition of the monarchy and its replacement by a republican form of government is at any risk of prosecution. Whatever may be the correct construction of s 3, taken by itself, it is clear beyond any peradventure first, that the section would now be 'read down' as required by s 3 of the 1998 Act so that the advocacy contemplated by the respondents could not constitute a criminal offence, and second, that no Attorney General or Director of Public Prosecutions would or could authorise a prosecution for such advocacy without becoming a laughing stock. To do so would plainly be an unlawful act under s 6(1) of the 1998 Act.

[41] Moreover, if a private prosecution, complaining of advocacy for the peaceful abolition of the monarchy and its replacement by a republic, were to be brought by some successor of the League of Empire Loyalists it would be the clear duty of the Attorney General, in order to honour the right to freedom of expression guaranteed by art 10 to issue a nolle prosequi—unless, of course, the Director of Public Prosecutions had exercised his power to take over and then discontinue the prosecution. It may be that if it were the claimants who were prosecuted they would welcome the prosecution and be anxious for the proceedings to come before a judge with the maximum of publicity. They must know that the prosecution would be bound to fail. The judge would have no alternative but to dismiss the case as hopeless.

[42] The claimants will have received legal advice about the prospects of such a prosecution being brought and about the prospects of its success. The advice is protected by the legal professional privilege to which they are entitled but, speaking for myself, I do not for one moment believe that they were advised that there was any risk of a prosecution or of a conviction.

[43] It was, in my opinion, instructive that Mr Sales, counsel for the Attorney General, told your Lordships that he had no instructions to make any submission about the merits of the respondents' s 3 point. If he had made any submission it could only have been to accept that, at least since 2 October 2000 when the 1998 Act came into force, no one who advocates the abolition of the monarchy by peaceful and constitutional means has been at any risk of prosecution (other than a private prosecution) or of conviction. Mr Sales is a very good lawyer. So, too, is Mr Robertson QC. But you do not have to be a very good lawyer to know that to advocate the abolition of the monarchy and its replacement by a republic by peaceful and constitutional means will lead neither to prosecution nor to conviction. All you need to be is a lawyer with common sense.

[44] The Administrative Court ([2001] EWHC Admin 529), in dealing with the claimants' judicial review application, regarded the application, I rather think, as not worth taking seriously. I sympathise with them and do not criticise their dismissal of the application. They dismissed the application on the procedural ground that although civil courts have jurisdiction to make declarations as to the criminality or non-criminality of conduct, proposed or actual, it is a jurisdiction to be exercised only in exceptional circumstances. The claimants' s 3 point, said a the Administrative Court, did not qualify. But they did not spell out that the reason why the point did not qualify was because it was so obviously and incontestably right that the time of the court should not have been wasted in having to deal with it. The Administrative Court should, in my view, have dealt with the application either by dismissing it on the ground I have mentioned or by making the declaration sought but ordering the claimants to pay the costs of the unnecessary court proceedings. To dismiss the application on the procedural ground that the case did not fall within the exceptional circumstances category without making clear that the Emperor had no clothes led to the case coming before the Court of Appeal on the quite unreal footing that the Emperor was wearing some sort of costume that did require to be recognised and dealt with. The Court of Appeal, for its part, recognised the high constitutional importance of freedom of speech in a political context and sent the case back to the Administrative Court in order, as I infer, for there to be a formal recognition by that court of what must have been obvious to the Court of Appeal, namely, that s 3 of the 1848 Act is a dead letter so far as advocacy of political change by peaceful and constitutional means is concerned.

d [45] And so the case comes to your Lordships' House. My Lords the valuable time of the courts should be spent on real issues. I have already expressed my non-belief in the reality of the claimants' alleged fear of prosecution. I repeat it. I do not suppose there is any school debating society that has not regularly debated the issue of monarchy versus republic. Everyone who reads newspapers or magazines will have read numerous articles and letters extolling the advantages of a republic over a monarchy and advocating a change—and vice versa, of course. These articles and letters have not led to prosecution or any threat of it. Nor have those responsible for school debating societies received visits from the Special Branch. This has been the state of affairs throughout my adult life but it is, I do not doubt, of longer standing than that. There has been no prosecution under the 1848 Act since 1883. The enactment and coming into force of the 1998 Act made the tolerance de facto of advocacy of peaceful political change a tolerance de jure.

e [46] The Attorney General, in his responses to the letters written to him by the claimants, said nothing to give them any reason to suppose that he did not share the views expressed above. He took his stand on the theoretical impropriety of assurances being given in advance about the non-criminality of hypothetical conduct. It might have been better if he had simply said that the United Kingdom is a mature democracy and in a mature democracy people do not get prosecuted for advocating political change by peaceful and constitutional means. If he had said that there would surely have been no litigation.

g [47] Your Lordships in dealing with the appeal have unanimously endorsed the lawfulness of such advocacy. The claimants may regard that endorsement as representing a successful outcome to their litigation. But if unnecessary litigation is commenced in order to obtain obvious results, the claimant must expect to have to pay the costs of the exercise. In my opinion the appeal should be allowed and the dismissal of the claimants' application affirmed. The claimants should pay the costs of the appeal to this House but there should be no order as to the costs below.

[48] My Lords, I agree with your Lordships that the appeal should be allowed and that the order proposed by my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn should be made. Since he has fully described the background, I can state my reasons quite shortly. a

[49] At the hearing before the House Mr Sales, counsel for the Attorney General, was careful to make no submissions as to the proper interpretation of s 3 of the Treason Felony Act 1848. I proceed on the basis, however, that a person commits an offence if he 'shall ... compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend' to do the various things listed— b

'and such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices, or intentions, or any of them, shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing ... or by any overt act or deed ...'

In other words, the offender must not only compass etc the various things but must express, utter or declare such compassings etc by publishing a printing or writing or by an overt act or deed. c

[50] One of the things that it is an offence to compass etc in these ways is 'to deprive or depose our Most Gracious Lady the Queen ... from the style, honour, or royal name of the imperial crown of the United Kingdom ...' If these words are read in isolation, they appear to make it an offence, punishable with life imprisonment, for anyone, including journalists and newspaper editors, to publish articles advocating a peaceful change from a constitutional monarchy to a republic in the United Kingdom. That is how the courts interpreted the words shortly after the 1848 Act was passed. Relying on s 3 of the Human Rights Act 1998 and art 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act), however, in these proceedings the claimants, Mr Rusbridger and Ms Toynbee, seek a declaration that s 3 of the 1848 Act should be read as applying only to compassing etc 'by acts of force or constraint or other unlawful means' to deprive the Queen of her position. Alternatively, they seek a declaration under s 4 of the 1998 Act that s 3 of the 1848 Act is incompatible with the right to freedom of expression in art 10 of the convention. d

[51] The 1848 Act was passed to meet a perceived threat, particularly in Ireland, in the heated atmosphere of that year. Section 3 has not been used as the basis of a prosecution since R v Gallagher (1883) 15 Cox CC 291. This is despite the fact that across the intervening years many people of greater or lesser prominence in public life, from members of Parliament, peers and other politicians to academics, journalists and media personalities, have published books, articles and interviews advocating a peaceful change from a monarchy to a republic. Support for a republic was the declared editorial policy of at least one national daily newspaper and one national Sunday newspaper long before the Guardian decided to publish its articles at the end of 2000. Needless to say, there has never been the slightest hint that any of these people would be prosecuted for publishing their views. This part of s 3 of the 1848 Act has long been a dead letter. Otherwise, it would surely have been amended so as to cover modern methods of communication. g

[52] In an ideal world the statute book would always be up-to-date and contain only those Acts and provisions which are needed at present. In practice, that has never been the case. At any given moment you can find statutes which have become out-of-date and which should be repealed or amended but which linger on untouched since, in a crowded Parliamentary timetable, governments have had other priorities. Such statutes pose a familiar problem for those who have to decide whether to prosecute, especially when social circumstances have j

a changed. Recent history provides examples. Should breaches of the Sunday trading laws be prosecuted when the shops appear to meet a public demand? Should corner shop owners be prosecuted if, to their customers' satisfaction, they stay open long after the statutory closing time, that was introduced to save fuel during the First World War? Should people be prosecuted for participating in consensual homosexual acts in private? When these and similar issues have arisen, prosecutors have done what they always do: they have had regard to the public interest in deciding whether to prosecute. See, for instance, paras 6.1–6.3 of the Code for Crown Prosecutors issued by the Crown Prosecution Service. If the prosecutors mistake the public interest, any resulting prosecution is liable to provoke public criticism or even ridicule, while placing a martyr's crown on the defendant's head.

c [53] This part of s 3 of the 1848 Act is another example of a provision whose time has long passed. Therefore, as one would expect, no prosecutions have been instituted under it for more than a century, despite the many publications advocating a peaceful change to a republican constitution. This inaction on the part of generations of prosecutors throughout the United Kingdom speaks louder than words. They long ago recognised that it would not be in the public interest to prosecute those who published such material. Indeed it seems unlikely that the possibility of prosecuting had even occurred to the relevant authorities for many years until Mr Rusbridger wrote to the Attorney General. Inevitably, no prosecution followed. Equally clearly, there is not the slightest prospect that the claimants will be prosecuted if they choose to publish similar articles in future.

d Nor is the threat of a rogue private prosecution any more substantial, since the reality is that, having regard to the public interest, the Director of Public Prosecutions would take it over and discontinue it or the Attorney General would enter a nolle prosequi.

f [54] Unlike, I suspect, the vast majority of the population, the claimants have actually heard of s 3 of the 1848 Act and know what it says. But they also know that they will not be prosecuted for publishing their articles and so, as rational individuals, they are not adversely affected by the mere existence of s 3. In the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 397) Schiemann LJ, giving a twist to the Duke of Wellington's famous challenge, described the claimants' attitude in this way (at [21]):

g 'We do not understand the claimants to suggest that the uncertainty of our law as to treason has affected their decision to publish in the past or is likely to in the future. Their stance is that of the Duke of Wellington: publish and be damned. Nor is there any evidence to suggest that the existence of the 1848 Act causes them to sleep in their beds less soundly.'

h In other words neither any decision that the claimants take in their professional lives nor their general well-being is adversely affected by the existence of s 3 of the 1848 Act. In argument on their behalf Mr Robertson QC accepted this but—with understandable diffidence—suggested that s 3 might have subconsciously affected them in deciding on the tone of the articles. But for s 3, they might not, for instance, have proposed that a referendum should be held before any change to a republic. Nothing supports that implausible suggestion.

[55] The claimants are, therefore, unaffected either in their actions or in their well-being by the existence of s 3. In both respects they are in a very different position from the applicant in Norris v Ireland (1991) 13 EHRR 186 who claimed that legislation penalising homosexual conduct infringed his art 8 rights. There the European Court of Human Rights emphasised that art 25 (now art 34) of the convention requires that an individual applicant should be able to claim to be actually affected by the measure of which he complains. The convention article may not be used to found an action in the nature of an actio popularis. The court proceeded (at 195–196 (para 33)) to identify reasons why the existence of the legislation actually affected Mr Norris' activities and well-being, even though the more recent practice was for the Irish Attorney General not to authorise prosecutions based on conduct in private between consulting adults. In that situation a majority of the court were prepared to regard Mr Norris as a victim in convention terms. By contrast, since there is no sign that the claimants have been affected in any way by the existence of s 3 of the 1848 Act, the present proceedings are in substance an actio popularis.

[56] Should these proceedings go ahead? The Divisional Court thought not, while the Court of Appeal thought they should. I agree with the Divisional Court. The claimants seek a declaration as to the interpretation of s 3 of the 1848 Act or as to its incompatibility with the right to freedom of expression under art 10 of the convention. Before the House the parties agreed that these declarations should be treated in the same way as a civil declaration as to the criminality or otherwise of future conduct. A civil court can make such a declaration, although it would be right to do so only in a very exceptional case: see Imperial Tobacco Ltd v A-G [1980] 1 All ER 866 at 876, [1981] AC 718 at 742 per Viscount Dilhorne. The authorities do not spell out what constitutes a very exceptional case for these purposes. In ordinary cases people must take and act on their own legal advice. So, broadly speaking, a very exceptional case must be one where, unusually, the interests of justice require that the particular claimant should be able to obtain the ruling of the civil court before embarking on, or continuing with, a particular course of conduct which, on one view, might expose him to the risk of prosecution.

[57] Approaching the matter in that way, I am satisfied that the present is not a very exceptional case of that kind. The claimants have published articles supporting a transition to a republic and, even though Mr Rusbridger specifically drew the articles to the attention of the Attorney General, they have not been prosecuted. They want to publish similar articles in the future and, if they do so, they will not be prosecuted then either. Their decisions as to whether or not to publish such articles are not affected in any way by the existence of s 3. The issue of the compatibility or incompatibility of that section with art 10 of the convention is therefore moot so far as the claimants are concerned. It is also moot in respect of other people: the claimants themselves make the point that—

'It is most unlikely that the issue will ever be decided by the criminal courts in the course of an actual prosecution, given the absence of any such prosecution (despite some published republican advocacy) over the last century.'

The Divisional Court is therefore being asked to make a declaration about a point of criminal law because a criminal court will never have to decide it. So far from this being the kind of very exceptional case where the interests of justice require that the claimants should be able to obtain a declaration from the Divisional Court, it is exactly the kind of case where they should not.

[58] It is not the function of the courts to keep the statute book up-to-date. That important responsibility lies with Parliament and the executive. As long ago

- a as 1977 the Law Commission recommended reform of the law of treason and allied offences. Parliament has not so far found the time to enact legislation to give effect to that recommendation. Successive Home Secretaries have given a higher priority to other reforms. While that might seem unfortunate, it is ultimately a matter for the political judgment of the executive and Parliament. The claimants are, of course, free to use their influence in a campaign to try to change that political judgment. But it would be wrong in principle for the courts to allow the claimants to go on with proceedings where the only favourable outcome of any practical use to them would be a declaration of incompatibility that they could use to further any such political campaign.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

- c [59] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn. I agree with Lord Steyn that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons set out in his speech, with the consequence that the Court of Appeal's order ([2002] EWCA Civ 397) would be quashed. I add a few remarks of my own.
- d [60] Lord Steyn has described s 3 of the Treason Felony Act 1848 as a relic of a bygone age. I agree. It is inconceivable that it could be invoked in the twenty-first century in order to punish anyone who advocates that a republican form of government should be established by peaceful means. Mr Rusbridger himself (in his first letter to the Attorney General) said that the law had 'become in effect a dead letter'. In the statement of facts which Mr Rusbridger verified he said no more than that he was 'concerned' about the law. Before this House his counsel did not challenge the Court of Appeal's observation that Mr Rusbridger was not losing sleep because of the 1848 Act.
- e [61] In my opinion it is most undesirable that obsolete statutes should remain unrepealed. Quaint language and interesting historical associations are no justification for preserving obsolete statutes in a mummified state. But as the Attorney General replied to Mr Rusbridger, it is still the role of the legislature, rather than that of the courts, to decide whether to repeal or retain legislation. Sections 3 and 4 of the Human Rights Act 1998 are intended to promote and protect human rights in a practical way, not to be an instrument by which the courts can chivvy Parliament into spring-cleaning the statute book, perhaps to the detriment of more important legislation. Such a spring-cleaning process might have some symbolic significance but I can see no other practical purpose which this litigation would achieve.
- f
- g [62] However to conclude (as I do) that the litigation is unnecessary does not display the slightest enthusiasm for the continued existence of s 3 of the 1848 Act if and so far as it could theoretically apply to the expression of political opinion advocating non-violent constitutional change.

Company – Shares – Issue of shares – Bonus shares – Mistake – Proper approach to determining whether issue and allotment of bonus shares void for mistake.

Company – Dealing with company – Person dealing with company in good faith – Statutory provision operating in favour of ‘a person dealing with a company’ – Whether shareholder receiving bonus shares such a person – Companies Act 1985, s 35A(1).

(1) The issue and allotment of bonus shares, at least once they have been accepted by the shareholders to whom they have been allotted, is analogous to a contract, and accordingly the question whether the issue and allotment of such shares is void for mistake must be decided by reference to the principles governing the effect of a common mistake on a contract. Thus the court must not overlook the commercial common sense of the nature of the mistake or oversight, and it should be very reluctant to reach a conclusion which is plainly contrary to that which could conceivably have been intended by the parties. In particular, where the mistake consists in overlooking the need for consent to the transaction by one of the parties, it is wrong to conclude (at least in the absence of very unusual facts) that the mistake can be regarded as ‘essential’ or ‘fundamental’, so as to vitiate the contract or arrangement, if all the parties would have plainly rejected the notion that the mistake would have had that effect (see [159], [168], [170], [176], [181], below); Associated Japanese Bank (International) Ltd v Crédit du Nord SA [1988] 3 All ER 902 and Great Peace Shipping Ltd v Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd, The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 applied; dictum of Scott J in Re Cleveland Trust plc [1991] BCLC 424 at 434 followed.

(2) A shareholder receiving bonus shares from a company is ‘a person dealing with a company’ within the ambit of s 35A(1)^a of the Companies Act 1985, and accordingly such a shareholder can in principle take advantage of s 35A(1) which provides that, in favour of a person dealing with a company in good faith, the power of the board of directors to bind the company, or authorise others to do so, shall be deemed to be free of any limitation under the company’s constitution. The words ‘a person dealing with a company’ are not expressly fettered in any way. As a matter of ordinary language, a shareholder receiving bonus shares from the company is within the ambit of those wide words, and, in the absence of a powerful reason to the contrary, it is inappropriate to treat naturally wide words in a statute as subject to an implied limitation (see [196], [203], below); Smith v Henniker-Major & Co [2002] 2 BCLC 655 considered.

INTRODUCTION

- j [1] This judgment concerns certain preliminary questions which are directed to the validity of bonus shares issued, paid up by appropriating a sum in the share premium account, by EIC Services Ltd (the company) on 15 December 1999. The argument that the bonus issue was wholly or partly invalid is based on the propositions that: (1) a very substantial number of the bonus shares were allotted to shareholders whose shares were not paid up, namely (a) 200 shares issued in April 1999 and (b) 110,320 shares issued in November 1999; (2) the issue of bonus shares was not approved by a resolution of, or otherwise authorised by, the shareholders of the company; (3) in these circumstances, the bonus issue and the allotment of some or all of the bonus shares were invalid and void. These propositions encapsulate the issues to be decided. a

[2] I shall begin by setting out the basic facts. Then, I shall turn to explain a little more fully the nature of the three issues, and how they arise. I shall then discuss issue 1(a), which primarily turns on findings of fact, and issue 1(b), which turns on findings of fact, although it additionally involves the determination of an application to amend. Issue 2 involves questions of fact and law (principally relating to the applicability of the so-called Duomatic principle (see Re Duomatic Ltd [1969] 1 All ER 161, [1969] 2 Ch 365)). Issue 3 only involves questions of law, namely the interrelationship of the law of mistake and the unauthorised decisions by directors, and the ambit of s 35A of the Companies Act 1985. b

- The facts: [4]–[20];
- The issues: [21]–[35];
- Issue 1(a): Payment for the 200 shares: [36]–[52];
- Issue 1 (b): Payment for the 110,320 shares:
 - (i) Introductory: [53]–[58]; d
 - (ii) The pleaded case: [59]–[100];
 - (iii) The application to amend: [101]–[119];
- Issue 2: Approval of the bonus issue: [120]–[147];
- Issue 3: The status of the bonus shares:
 - (i) Introductory: [148]–[151];
 - (ii) The contention that the bonus shares are void for mistake: [152]–[190];
 - (iii) The effect of the breach of the articles and s 35A: [191]–[208];
 - (iv) The declaration as to voidness: [209]–[225];
- Conclusion: [226]. e

[4] On 8 April 1999, the company was incorporated in England and Wales under the name of Milentone Ltd with an authorised share capital of 1,000 shares of £1 each, two of which were issued to the original subscribers, who did not pay for them.

[5] On 20 May 1999, Mr James Spickernell and Mr Julian Bryson were appointed directors of the company in place of its first director. They were already directors of a number of other companies, including Enterprise Technology Development Ltd (ETD). The shareholders in that company were members of the family, or friends, of Mr Spickernell or Mr Bryson. ETD was intended to focus on healthcare technology investments. However, at the beginning of 1999, Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson became interested in investments in Internet-related businesses, and investigated such opportunities, especially in the United States. They acquired the company for the purpose of investing in that type of business. g

[6] On 21 July 1999, the two nil paid £1 shares in the company were transferred, one to Mr Spickernell and the other to Mr Bryson. On the same day, the authorised share capital of the company was divided into 100,000 ordinary shares of 1p each, so that Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson each had 100 1p shares (the subscriber shares). Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson each subsequently transferred his 100 shares to a company owned by him, namely Berdino International Ltd (Berdino) and Okimax International Ltd (Okimax) respectively. h

a EGM necessary for that purpose), the authorised capital of the company was increased from £1,000 to £300,000 by the creation of an additional 29,900,000 1p shares. At the board meeting, Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson appointed Mr Simon Reid as a third director of the company. (Mr Reid actually started working for the company in January 2000.)

b [8] Also on 12 November 1999, Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson decided to allot to Berdino, Okimax, Mr Reid, and 13 other parties a total of 110,320 new 1p shares (the November shares). These 13 other parties (the 13 shareholders) were all shareholders in ETD; they included the second defendant Mr Jonathan Paul. Accordingly, as at close of business on 12 November 1999, there were 110,520 issued 1p shares in the company, owned by 16 shareholders, ie the 13 shareholders, Okimax, Berdino and Mr Reid (the 16 shareholders). It was c recorded in the minutes of the board meeting that each of the 16 shareholders 'had already paid the company a total of 1p in respect of each share to be allotted to them'.

d [9] At a board meeting held on 15 December 1999, the directors of the company resolved to allot a further 27,035 1p shares in the company, at a price of £29 each, to a total of 33 shareholders, of whom five were among the 16 shareholders. Accordingly, with effect from 15 December 1999, there were 28 new shareholders (the 28 shareholders), including the first defendant, Mr Stephen Phipps. This meant that the total number of issued shares in the company was 137,555. At the same meeting on 15 December 1999, the directors resolved to e make a 99 for 1 bonus issue. That share issue (the bonus issue) increased the number of shares in issue by 13,617,945. This bonus issue involved capitalising £136,179.45 (representing the value of the 13,617,945 bonus 1p shares) of the amount standing to the credit of the share premium account.

f [10] The decision to issue the bonus shares arose from the fact that Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson were well on the way with implementing proposals to float the company on the alternative investment market (AIM). The market for shares in Internet-related shares such as the company was very strong; indeed, one could fairly describe it as a bubble. The advice received by the company was that the shares might be worth around £250 each, and that such a high price might render them less marketable. Accordingly, a bonus issue of 99 g for 1 would result in a more attractive projected share price of £2.50.

[11] The resolution of the directors passed at the board meeting of 15 December 1999 began by noting 'that there were now 137,555 ordinary shares in issue'. The resolution then went on to state that—

h '£136,179.45 of the sum standing to the credit of the share premium account ... be capitalised and appropriated to the holders of the Ordinary Shares on the register ... in the same proportion as they would be entitled to that sum were it distributed by way of dividend ... in paying up in full at par all the [bonus] shares to be issued and distributed credited as fully paid to those persons in the proportion of 99 Ordinary Shares for each Ordinary j Shares now registered in their names.'

[12] On 22 December 1999, the third defendant, Mr Jeremy Lee Barber, agreed to subscribe for 2,500,000 1p shares at a price of £1.25 each, and, shortly thereafter, he paid £3,125,000 for those shares. On 20 January 2000, the company issued these shares to Mr Lee Barber, and a further 220,000 shares to other persons who had also subscribed £1.25 per share. Subsequently, a further

5,542,000 1p shares were issued by the company at a price of £2.50 each between 4 February and 23 March 2000. a

[13] On 22 March 2000, Mr Spickernell drew a cheque in favour of the company in the sum of £1,105.20. This sum represented the nominal value of the subscriber shares plus the November shares (the disputed shares). The reason he wrote out this cheque was because Mr Gop Menon of PricewaterhouseCoopers, the company's auditors, had said that there was no record of any payment having been made for the subscriber shares or the November shares, in the company's books and records, as far as he could see. b

[14] On 24 March 2000, European Internet Capital Ltd, a Guernsey company (the Guernsey company), then named Vesuvius Ltd, made an offer to acquire all of the issued shares in the company, in exchange for shares in the Guernsey company. That offer was accepted, and it was completed on 9 April 2000. Accordingly, the company is, and has been since 9 April 2000, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Guernsey company. Shortly thereafter, Mr Spickernell, Mr Bryson and Mr Reid ceased to be directors of the company. c

[15] The company's name changed from time to time. On 30 July 1999, it was changed to ETD Infotech Ltd, and on 22 October 1999 to European Internet Capital Ltd. Finally, on 17 May 2000, after the take-over of the company in April 2000, it acquired its current name, EIC Services Ltd. d

[16] The second half of 1999 and the first three months of 2000 was, as the evidence in this case vividly showed, the height of the Internet bubble. Since that time, shares in almost all companies concerned with Internet activities have fallen in value, mostly very substantially. As I understand it, the value of the shares in the company and the Guernsey company are no exception. e

[17] It appears that Mr Lee Barber sought legal advice during the first half of 2001; in or shortly before September 2001, he and some other shareholders started to suggest that the bonus issue effected on 15 December 1999 was wholly or partially invalid. This point was formally taken on behalf of Mr Lee Barber in a letter from his solicitors dated 21 September 2001. The present proceedings were brought by the company and the Guernsey company on 18 December 2001. They seek a determination as to the validity of the bonus issue. f

[18] On 26 June 2002, Master Moncaster directed the determination of three preliminary issues. The first part of the first issue is whether the subscriber shares were fully paid up at the time of the bonus issue, namely on 15 December 1999. The second part of the first issue is whether the November shares were fully paid at the time of the bonus issue. The second issue is whether the capitalisation of reserves and the issue and allotment of the bonus shares were effectively authorised by the members of the company. The third issue, which Master Moncaster directed should only be determined 'if the trial judge thinks fit', is whether, in light of the determination on the other issues, the bonus shares were themselves validly issued or allotted. The master also ordered that the first and second defendants, Mr Phipps and Mr Paul, should contend that the issues be answered in the affirmative, on behalf of all those interested in so arguing, and that the third defendant, Mr Lee Barber, should argue that the issues be answered in the negative, on behalf of those interested in so arguing. g

[19] The company and the Guernsey company (the claimants) say that they are simply seeking guidance as to the correct answer or approach in relation to the preliminary issues. Accordingly, although appearing by counsel, Mr Philip Gillyon, they take no position on the issues in these proceedings with one exception. The contention that the disputed shares were not fully paid, and the

- a contention that the capitalisation of reserves and bonus issues were not properly authorised, are therefore advanced by Mr David Mabb QC, who appears (with Mr Leon Kuschke) for Mr Lee Barber; Mr Mabb also argues that the bonus shares were not validly issued or allotted. The contrary argument in relation to each of the preliminary issues, is raised by Mr David Chivers QC, who appears on behalf of Mr Phipps and Mr Paul. However, Mr Chivers also argues that I should not
b determine the third issue. The claimants want the third issue determined. It is also right to record that the costs of Mr Phipps and Mr Paul on this preliminary issue have been underwritten by Mr Spickernell, Mr Bryson and Mr Reid.

- [20] It should also be mentioned that there have been proceedings in Guernsey which have gone to the Guernsey Court of Appeal. Those proceedings have little, albeit some, relevance to the determination of the issues which I have
c to determine.

- [21] The importance of the first issue (namely whether the disputed shares were fully paid up by 15 December 1999), and of the second issue (whether there
d has been a valid approval of the bonus issue) arises from the provisions of reg 110 and 104 of the 1985 version of table A, in the Schedule to the Companies (Tables A to F) Regulations 1985, SI 1985/805, which were incorporated into the articles of the company.

[22] Regulation 110 provides, so far as relevant:

- e 'The directors may with the authority of an ordinary resolution of the company—(a) ... resolve to capitalise ... any sum standing to the credit of the company's share premium account ... [and] (b) appropriate the sum resolved to be capitalised to the members who would have been entitled to it if it were distributed by way of dividend and in the same proportions and apply such sum
f on their behalf ... in paying up in full unissued shares ... of the company in nominal amount equal to that sum, and allot the shares ... credited as fully paid ...' (My emphasis.)

- [23] The relevant part of reg 104 is to this effect: '... all dividends shall be declared and paid according to the amounts paid up on the shares on which the g dividend is paid.' (My emphasis.)

- [24] Accordingly, regs 110 and 104 require that, in relation to any bonus issue, (a) the amounts appropriated to members in paying up bonus shares must be in proportion to the amount paid up on the shares in respect of which the bonus shares are to be allotted, and (b) the appropriation of any sum in the share h premium account in paying up bonus shares must be authorised by an ordinary resolution of the company.

- [In [25]–[35] his Lordship reviewed some of the submissions, and then considered, in [36]–[119], whether the 200 subscriber 1p shares issued in April 1999 and the 110, 320 'November' 1p shares issued in November 1999 had been
j fully paid up by the date of the bonus issue on 15 December 1999. He concluded that the subscriber shares had been fully paid up by that date, but that the November shares were not paid up by then, and remained unpaid until March 2000. His Lordship then went on to decide, in [120]–[147], that, although all the existing shareholders had been informed of the bonus issue, they could not be treated as having authorised or approved it. In so concluding, he held that the Duomatic principle did not apply. He then proceeded to consider the third issue.]

[148] The first submission by Mr Mabb on behalf of Mr Lee Barber, is that the bonus issue was void, and that the bonus shares should effectively be treated as never having been issued and allotted, on the ground of common mistake. On the facts I have found, he primarily identifies two mistakes, namely: (i) the bonus shares issued to the holders of the November shares were allotted to those shareholders contrary to regs 104 and 110 of the 1985 regulations, because the November shares were not paid up; (ii) all the 13,617,945 bonus shares were issued purportedly paid up to the 16 shareholders and the 28 shareholders (the 44 shareholders) in that they were issued and paid up without 'the authority of an ordinary resolution' contrary to reg 110. As a result, he contends, the issue of all the bonus shares, or of the bonus shares allotted to the 16 shareholders, is void.

[149] It is right to mention that Mr Mabb has what may be characterised as two variations on the first point, namely, that there are other vitiating mistakes, namely, that in their resolution to issue the bonus shares: (i) the directors did not purport to appropriate any sum to be capitalised from the share premium account to members holding unpaid shares (ie the 16 shareholders); and (ii) the directors did not purport to allot bonus shares to members holding unpaid shares. I shall refer to these aspects as 'the additional mistakes'.

[150] Mr Mabb's second submission is that the issue of the bonus shares was void because, in light of regs 104 and 110, the company, and/or the three directors, had no power to cause the bonus shares to be issued, paid up through the capitalisation of the share premium account, to the 16 shareholders in respect of the unpaid November shares and/or because of the absence of approval by the 16 shareholders. I put this argument second, because Mr Mabb advanced common mistake as his main point (to the extent that Mr Chivers apparently understood it to be his only point).

[151] I shall first consider Mr Lee Barber's case based on common mistake. I shall then deal with the case based on breach of the articles, which involves consideration of the ambit of s 35A. I shall then turn to the question of the grant of a declaration.

The contention that the bonus issue is void for mistake

[152] Mr Mabb relies on the decision of Scott J in Re Cleveland Trust plc [1991] BCLC 424. That case concerned three companies, McInnes, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Gunnergate, itself a wholly-owned subsidiary of Cleveland; all three companies had common directors. McInnes declared a substantial dividend, which it then paid to Gunnergate, which in turn declared the same sum by way of dividend, which it paid to Cleveland. Cleveland then made a bonus issue of fully paid shares to be capitalised out of its profit and loss account, ie out of the sum paid by way of dividend by McInnes and Gunnergate. It then transpired that McInnes had no capacity to declare the dividend. The argument accepted by the judge was that, in these circumstances, the bonus issue was void on grounds of common mistake.

[153] Scott J (at 434) accepted: 'The issue and acceptance of the bonus shares involved ... a relationship between Cleveland and the shareholders analogous to a contractual relationship.' He then went on to consider (at 435-436) the law relating to 'the basis on which a contract may be set aside as void on the ground of common mistake'.

‘It was fundamental to the [bonus] issue that the dividend deriving from McInnes’s capital profit could be used in paying up the bonus shares. The true state of affairs, in which the capital profit could not be so used and the Gunnergate dividend was repayable, did, in my judgment, “render essentially and radically different the subject matter which the parties believed to exist”. I am, accordingly, satisfied that the bonus issue can probably be declared void on the ground of common mistake.’

[155] The law relating to the effect of common mistake on a contract is difficult, and has been most recently considered by the Court of Appeal in Great Peace Shipping Ltd v Tsavlis Salvage (International) Ltd, The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407, [2002] 4 All ER 689, [2003] QB 679. Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR, giving the judgment of the court, considered the effect of a number of cases, most notably Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161, [1931] All ER Rep 1 and Associated Japanese Bank (International) Ltd v Crédit du Nord SA [1988] 3 All ER 902, [1989] 1 WLR 255, both of which were cited by Scott J in Re Cleveland.

[156] The decision in The Great Peace represents significant development in the law, not only in so far as it rejected the doctrine of equitable rescission in relation to mistake (see [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [95]–[161]), but also in relation to the analysis of the common law, and in particular the famous speech of Lord Atkin in Bell v Lever Bros.

[157] In The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [76], the court indicated that authority suggested that there should be five ‘elements [which] must be present if common mistake is to avoid a contract’. They are as follows:

‘... (i) there must be a common assumption as to the existence of a state of affairs; (ii) there must be no warranty by either party that that state of affairs exists; (iii) the non-existence of the state of affairs must not be attributable to the fault of either party; (iv) the non-existence of the state of affairs must render performance of the contract impossible; (v) the state of affairs may be the existence, or a vital attribute, of the consideration to be provided or circumstances which must subsist if performance of the contractual adventure is to be possible.’

[158] These tests are similar to those which can be extracted from the principles identified by Steyn J in the Associated Japanese Bank case [1988] 3 All ER 902 at 912–913, [1989] 1 WLR 255 at 268, which the court in The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [90], [91] quoted and approved. The passage cited from the judgment of Steyn J begins with this sentence: ‘The first imperative must be that the law ought to uphold rather than destroy apparent contracts.’ Steyn J went on to say that, in order to render the contract void, ‘the mistake must render the subject matter of the contract essentially and radically different from the subject matter which the parties believed to exist’.

[159] I respectfully agree with the observations of Scott J in Re Cleveland Trust plc [1991] BCLC 424, to the effect that the issue and allotment of bonus shares, at least once they have been accepted by the shareholders to whom they have been allotted, is analogous to a contract, albeit that, as he suggested (at 435), it ‘may not be strictly contractual’. I also am content to proceed on the basis that the law relating to common mistake in contract can be applied by analogy to the completed issued of bonus shares (as both counsel accept). However, because the case proceeds by analogy, it may be that a certain amount of adaptation of the principles is necessary, because they have been developed in relation to contracts, whereas a case such as the present involves something similar and analogous, but not identical, to a contract. a

[160] The two grounds (the defects) upon which voidness is alleged, namely the fact that the November shares were not paid up at the time of the allotment of the bonus shares, and the absence of an ordinary resolution, can each properly be characterised as common mistakes. Neither the company nor the 16 shareholders, nor, indeed, the three directors, appreciated that the November shares should have been paid up before the bonus shares could properly be allotted to the 16 shareholders. That was a mistake which was common to all the parties concerned. (The 16 shareholders, or at least 13 of them, believed that the November shares were paid up because they had been told that Mr Spickernell would pay for them, but that was probably a unilateral mistake, as the three directors at least ought to have known that those shares were not paid up.) However, the need for an ordinary resolution was not appreciated by any of the parties concerned: they made a common mistake in overlooking this requirement. b

[161] In the case of each defect there was therefore 'a common assumption as to the existence of a state of affairs', namely that the issue and allotment of the bonus shares were regular and proper. Although that formulation applies to both defects, they must, I think, be considered separately. Although they are each deficiencies which have arisen in relation to the bonus issue, and which are relied on to support the same or a similar argument, namely that the bonus shares were void in whole or in part, they are, as a matter of fact and law, separate and unrelated points. That is well illustrated by the fact that, if Mr Mabb is correct, the failure to obtain a resolution would render the issue of all the bonus shares void, but the fact that the November shares were not paid up may render only those bonus shares allotted to the 16 shareholders void. c

[162] The first defect whose effect I shall consider is the fact that the November shares were not paid up at the date that the bonus shares were issued to the 16 shareholders, and whether this should lead to the conclusion that the allotment of the bonus shares to those shareholders was void. d

[163] I accept that, when they decided to issue some of the bonus shares to the 16 shareholders, the three directors had overlooked the fact, indeed were wholly unaware of the fact, that the bonus shares should not have been allotted paid up to the 16 shareholders, unless and until the November shares were paid up. I consider that the three directors, or at least two of them, namely Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson, were aware of the facts that gave rise to the conclusion that the November shares were not fully paid up. That conclusion is almost inevitable, because, as at 15 December 1999, it was Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson who had been solely responsible for deciding on, and arranging for, the way in which the November shares would be paid for (apart from the advice received from Mr Connolly, the solicitor, and the involvement of Mrs Thomson, Mr Spickernell's secretary). e

[164] It also is clear that the 13 shareholders (ie the holders of the November shares, with the exception of Berdino, Okimax and Mr Reid) were unaware that their November shares were not fully paid up. I think it substantially more likely than not that they were unaware of the requirement that those shares had to be fully paid up, before any bonus shares could properly be allotted in respect of them. However, I do not consider that, on the facts of this case, this justifies concluding that the issue of the bonus shares to the 13 shareholders on f a 12 November 1999 was void. I reach that conclusion on the basis of the combined effect of three factors.

[165] First, it appears to me that this is not a case where it can merely be said that the 13 shareholders were innocent of any responsibility for, or in connection with, the mistake. They were positively misled into believing that the November shares would be fully paid up, because they had been told, before the November shares were issued to them, by one of the three directors, that Mr Spickernell would ensure that their shares were fully paid up. That is the effect of the evidence of Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson, supported by the evidence of Mr Paul, and it seems inherently probable, especially in light of the documentary evidence, and the evidence of Mrs Thomson.

c [166] By contrast, the position of the company was very different. It was, at best, merely innocent, but it was not misled. However, on one view, its directors had misled the 16 shareholders by telling them that their shares would be paid up by one of the directors, who then failed to pay up the shares. In these circumstances, the observation of Steyn J in the Associated Japanese Bank case [1988] 3 All ER 902 at 913, [1989] 1 WLR 255 at 268 is close to being in point:

d 'In my judgment a party cannot be allowed to rely on a common mistake when the mistake consists of a belief which is entertained by him without any reasonable grounds to such belief ...'

e I would also refer to propositions (ii) and (iii) in The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [76].

[167] Secondly, the case for rejecting the contention that the allotment of the bonus shares to the 13 shareholders was rendered void by this mistake is heavily reinforced by considering the consequence of that contention. The issue of the bonus shares to the 13 shareholders (and, indeed, to any other shareholders) in no way altered the size of their respective interests in the company; indeed, save to render their interests a little more marketable if and when the company was floated on AIM, the issue of the bonus shares did not alter the value of their respective holdings in the company. Accordingly, were the bonus shares issued to the 16 shareholders void, it would mean that the apparently innocuous, indeed apparently beneficial, issue of the bonus shares reduced the value of their interest in the company by a very substantial extent, possibly as against the 28 shareholders (whose shares were fully paid up on 15 December 1999), and certainly as against any subsequent shareholders. The 28 shareholders (if they retain their bonus shares), and any persons who subsequently acquired shares (such as Mr Lee Barber) believing the November shares allotted to the 16 shareholders were valid, would enjoy a concomitant windfall. Particularly as the 16 shareholders were misled into the mistake by the directors, the conclusion that the bonus shares allotted to the 16 shareholders were void cannot, in my view, be the proper analysis.

j [168] That commercially commonsense factor appears to me to be particularly important given that one is in the area of law relating to contract. The court should be very reluctant to reach a conclusion, which is plainly contrary to that which could conceivably have been intended by the parties. Further, it appears to me that this point is reinforced once one remembers 'the first imperative' identified by Steyn J, namely 'that the law ought to uphold rather than destroy apparent contracts'—see the passage cited in The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [90]. To put the point slightly differently, if Mr Mabb is right as to

[169] Thirdly, it appears to me that the mistake was one which as at 15 December 1999, would have been perceived as one which obviously could readily have been put right. Indeed it was put right around three months after that date, by Mr Spickernell making out the March cheque, for a sum which resulted in the November shares being fully paid up. Mr Mabb argues that that is not enough to prevent the allotment of the bonus shares being void at least in so far as they were allotted to the 16 shareholders, because the matter has to be judged as at 15 December 1999. There is obvious logical force in that argument, because 15 December 1999 is the date on which the bonus shares were issued and allotted, and it is on the date of allotment that the shares in respect of which the bonus shares were allotted should have been fully paid up. b

[170] However, even accepting that point, I do not consider that the allotment of the bonus shares to the 13 shareholders was rendered void by the mistake. In so far as the allotment of bonus shares can be treated as analogous to a contract (as Scott J held in Re Cleveland), and in so far as voidness on the ground of mutual mistake is to be judged by reference to the question of whether the mistake relates to a 'fundamental' or 'essential' aspect of the transaction, it appears to me that one must not overlook the commercial common sense of the nature of the mistake or oversight. Standing as at 15 December 1999, the November shareholders had been told that their shares were paid up, and steps were being taken to ensure that the November shares were paid up, although the matter was not being given the sort of attention which it should have been given, because of the very heavy pressures on Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson, and because they were unaware of the urgency of the need to make the November shares fully paid up. c

[171] Furthermore, the amount of money needed to make the shares fully paid up was just over £1,000, which, in the context of the company's then perceived value and potential, was virtually de minimis. On the assumption that the November shares were worth £250 each (before the issue of the bonus shares), their combined value was over £2.5m, whereas the amount needed to make them paid up was just over £1,000. The notion that there would be any difficulty about making those shares paid up would have been nothing short of fanciful, as, indeed, is borne out by the ease with which the cheque was obtained from Mr Spickernell on 22 March 2000. That is further reinforced by the fact that, as the three directors would have known, Mr Spickernell was contractually obliged (as against the 13 shareholders) to pay for their shares. d

[172] It appears to me therefore that, so far as the common mistake argument is concerned, rather than the allotment of the bonus shares to the 13 shareholders being void, the position as at 15 December 1999 was that their allotment was irregular, but was capable of being put right by rendering the November shares paid up. This view derives a little indirect support from the decision of the House of Lords in Ooregum Gold Mining Co of India Ltd v Roper, Wallroth v Roper [1892] AC 125. That case is authority for the proposition that a company cannot allot shares as fully paid unless it receives at least par value for them, ie that a company cannot issue shares at a discount (see in this context s 100(1) of the Companies Act 1985). The conclusion reached by the House of Lords was that, although the issue of such shares was beyond the powers of the company, the original allottees of the shares were liable to pay to the company in cash the full amount unpaid on the shares. e

a [173] As I see it, it would have been open to the allottees of the shares in the Oregum case to contend that they were not liable to pay anything in respect of the shares concerned, because the issue, or at least the allotment, of the shares was void, as it was outside the powers of the company to allot shares on the basis that they were allotted. If such an argument had been maintained and had been upheld, then the conclusion reached by the House of Lords would presumably b have been different. It would, however, be wrong to place too much weight on that point, partly because at least some of the shares in that case had been transferred to third parties, and partly because the argument that the allotment was void was not raised. However, it does appear to me to be consistent with the conclusion I have reached in the present case.

c [174] I do not consider that the decision in Re Cleveland Trust plc [1991] BCLC 424 casts doubt on my conclusion. First, it does not appear to have been a case where any particular group of shareholders would have suffered or benefited by the bonus issue being avoided, because, unlike the present case, there had been no issue of shares equivalent to the issue of new shares to the 33 shareholders on 15 December 1999, and no increase in the number of shares since the allocation
d of the bonus shares, equivalent to the issue of new shares to Mr Lee Barber and others. Therefore, in Re Cleveland, each of the shareholders lost the same number of bonus shares relative to the number of shares he held. Secondly, Re Cleveland does not appear to have been a case where it could have been said that the company or its directors misled the shareholders in the way in which the three directors in the present case led at least 13 of the 16 shareholders to believe that e their shares would be fully paid up. Thirdly, there was no question of Re Cleveland being able to recover from anyone a sum equal to the amount which had been wrongly paid to it by McInnes via Gunnergate, whereas, in the present case, it was clear, as at 15 December 1999, that the November shares could and would be fully paid up in due course. Fourthly, the mistake in Re Cleveland was
f conceptually, as well as commercially, far more 'essential' or 'fundamental' to the issue of the bonus shares than the mistake in this case.

[175] I turn to the second defect upon which Mr Mabb rests his case on common mistake, namely the failure of the directors to obtain the approval, whether at an ordinary meeting or otherwise, of the shareholders of the company to the issue and allotment of the bonus shares. Here too, I take the view that this
g mistake did not vitiate, so as to render void, the issue of the bonus shares. In the first place, this was, as it were, a procedural defect, rather than a substantive defect. There is no doubt that the company, through its directors, had power to issue the bonus shares, and that, subject to the first defect which I have considered, the bonus shares could properly have been allotted as they were h allotted. The failure to obtain the approval of the shareholders could, I accept, be said to result in the directors having exceeded their powers, because those powers were limited by the articles.

[176] Once again, it seems to me that the question of whether the issue and allotment of the bonus shares was, as a result, void for mistake must be decided
j by reference to the principles laid down by Steyn J in the Associated Japanese Bank case and by the Court of Appeal in The Great Peace effectively by analogy as indicated by Scott J in Re Cleveland. In connection with this defect, while the mistake can be said to be entirely the fault of the three directors, there is no question, as there was in relation to the first defect, of their having misled the 13 shareholders, or indeed the 28 shareholders (who also received the bonus shares) on this issue.

[177] Applying the approach of Scott J in Re Cleveland, on which Mr Mabb rests his case, one must consider whether the failure to obtain the consent of the 16 shareholders should be treated as such a fundamental defect as to vitiate the entire issue and allotment of the bonus shares. As Mr Mabb contends, the question has primarily to be determined by reference to how matters stood at the date of the issue and allotment of the bonus shares, ie the date that the notional contract came into existence and was performed, namely 15 December 1999. As at that date, the notional contract in relation to the issue of the bonus shares was between the company (and, possibly, the three directors) and the relevant shareholders, ie probably the 16 shareholders, given that the decision to issue and allot the bonus shares was made before the 28 shareholders became shareholders. Following The Great Peace I consider that the failure to obtain the consent of the 16 shareholders to the issue of the bonus shares to them could not possibly have been regarded, whether subjectively by the parties or objectively, as such a fundamental or essential mistake that it rendered the issue and allotment of the bonus shares void.

[178] The implied term test was rejected by the Court of Appeal in The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [73] as the basis for determining whether a term was 'essential' in the context of a mutual mistake. However, it is not uninformative to consider the position if, on 15 December 1999, the officious bystander had asked the directors and the 16 shareholders whether the issue and allotment of the bonus shares should be treated as vitiated by mistake because there had been a failure to obtain the consent of the 16 shareholders to the issue and allotment of the bonus shares. There could only have been one answer, namely, 'Of course, not'.

[179] The mistake concerned was the directors' failure to obtain the consent of the 16 shareholders to the issue of the bonus shares. The purpose of that issue was to improve the position of the 16 shareholders (and any future shareholders), by rendering their shares in the company more easily and profitably marketable, if and when the company was floated on AIM. It would be fanciful to suggest that, in answer to the officious bystander, it is even conceivable that any of the shareholders would have suggested that the failure to obtain their consent, in these circumstances, to the allotment of the bonus shares would vitiate that allotment. Similarly, given that the company, through the three directors, wished to issue and allot the bonus shares, it is not conceivable that any of the directors would have even attempted to suggest, in answer to the officious bystander, that the failure to obtain the consent of the 16 shareholders should vitiate the issue and allotment of shares. The notion that the effect of £136,000-odd being transferred from the share premium account to the share capital account would have given a moment's concern to any shareholder, or indeed to the directors, appears to me to be fanciful.

[180] That view is reinforced when one considers the disastrous commercial consequences for the 16 shareholders if the bonus shares allotted to them had been void, a factor to which I have already referred. Because the bonus shares issued to the 33 shareholders may not be void, and because future allottees of shares (such as Mr Lee Barber) would acquire their shares for a price which assumed that the bonus shares were valid, a subsequent cancellation of the bonus shares would very substantially reduce the value of the shareholding of each of the 16 shareholders.

[181] However, as I have said, the implied term test is not, of itself, appropriate for determining the effect of mutual mistake. But the present a instance is a case where the mistake was overlooking the need for the consent to a transaction by one of the parties, namely the 16 shareholders. In such a case, if all the parties involved in the contract, or the analogous arrangement, would have plainly rejected the notion that the mistake would have vitiated the contract or the arrangement, it seems to me (at least in the absence of very unusual facts) wrong to conclude that the mistake could be regarded as 'essential' or b 'fundamental', so as to vitiate the contract or arrangement.

[182] If the party whose consent was required, but not obtained, is not merely content to dispense with the consent, but is positively disadvantaged by the absence of his consent leading to the result that the contract or arrangement being avoided, it seems almost grotesque that he should be forced to that result. Yet that is the effect of Mr Mabb's argument, as is illustrated by the fact that
c Mr Paul, the representative of the 16 shareholders, whose assent was required, is arguing, through Mr Chivers, against the arrangement in question, the issue of the bonus shares, being avoided.

[183] I do not consider that the additional mistakes (identified in [149], above) take matters further. It is clear from the number of bonus shares, the specific sum
d to be capitalised, and the fact that the issue was to be 99 for 1, all of which were mentioned in the 15 December 1999 resolution, that the three directors intended to allot bonus shares to the 16 shareholders. Accordingly, on the basis of commercial common sense, the oral evidence of the three directors, and the contemporaneous facts (eg the discussions with each of the 13 shareholders), it is clear that the three directors intended to allot bonus shares to the 16

[184] The argument for avoiding the bonus issue (entirely or in so far as it relates to bonus shares allotted to the 16 shareholders) on the basis of the additional mistakes places unjustifiable weight on the fact that the 15 December 1999 resolution appropriated the capitalised sum from the share premium
f account to shareholders 'in the same proportion as they would be entitled to that sum were it distributed by way of dividend'. The argument not only overlooks commercial common sense, the oral evidence of the three directors and the contemporaneous evidence. It also overlooks that part of the 15 December 1999 resolution which specifically allots bonus shares to the holders of 'each ordinary share'. Further, if one takes such a blinkered approach to the question of g concentrating on the company's formal records, one would have to take into account the 12 November 1999 minutes, which specifically record that the November shares were fully paid up.

[185] Accordingly, I conclude that the contention that the issue of the allotment of the bonus shares was, in whole or in part, void on the grounds of h mistake must be rejected, even though, in so far as the bonus shares were allotted to the 16 shareholders, there was a defect in that the November shares had not been paid up at all, and, in relation to the issue and allotment of all the bonus shares, there was a failure to obtain the assent of the 16 shareholders.

[186] If this analysis of the consequences of the common mistakes in this case
j is not right, then, as at present advised, I would still have rejected the contention that the bonus shares were void. Each of the two defects arises from the fact that the bonus shares (or some of them) should not have been issued paid up through the capitalisation of a sum in the share premium account. In other words, neither the issue nor the allotment of the bonus shares as shares were of themselves irregular owing to the defects: the irregularity lay in the fact that the bonus shares (or some of them) were issued and allotted paid up. In those circumstances, I would have concluded that, if there was a void aspect, it was the payment up of the bonus shares (or at least those allotted to the 16 shareholders) through the capitalisation of a sum in the share premium account, rather than the issue of the bonus shares. Thus the bonus shares would be valid as shares, but (at least those allotted to the 16 shareholders) they would not be treated as paid up (with the consequences which follow from the reasoning in the Ooregum case). As a matter of principle, it appears to me that where a common mistake results in voidness, the court should, where it accords with principle and is commercially sensible, seek to achieve an outcome which minimises the extent of the voidness. That view seems to me to accord with Steyn J's 'first imperative', but it is somewhat tentative, as the point was only touched on, but not fully argued, during the hearing.

[187] I suppose one reason that it was not fully argued may be that the point does not strictly arise on the preliminary issues ordered by the master. None the less, if there is an avoidable aspect of the bonus shares, the conclusion that it only attaches to the payment up of those shares (or some of them), rather than to the shares themselves, appears to me to accord far better with principle and commercial common sense. Such a conclusion, in relation to each of the two defects, does not run into the commercial common sense difficulties which face the conclusion that the bonus shares were themselves void.

[188] Finally, on this aspect, I should make three points. First, it might appear that my conclusion that the issue of the bonus shares was not void, despite the failure to obtain the consent of the 16 shareholders, is precious close to letting in the argument based on the Duomatic principle through the back door, having barred the front door. However, I do not consider that that is a valid point. If the Duomatic principle had applied, then (at least if the November shares had been fully paid up by 15 December 1999) the issue and allotment of the bonus shares would have been regular and unimpeachable. In light of my decision that the Duomatic principle does not apply, the issue and allotment of the bonus shares was irregular, and would, in light of the reasoning in Re Cleveland, have been capable of being void. As it is, because of the particular facts I have described, and in light of the reasoning in The Great Peace and the Associated Japanese Bank case, the issue and allotment of the shares, while in breach of the terms of the articles, is not void, and, indeed, appears to me to be unlikely to be assailable.

[189] Secondly, the voidness argument may be stronger in relation to the bonus shares allotted to Berdino, Okimax and Mr Reid, the three of the 16 shareholders being or owned by the three directors. Their state of knowledge, as to the defects, and, in relation to the first defect, because they were not misled into thinking that the November shares were paid up, puts them in a potentially different category from the 13 shareholders. At present, I doubt these distinctions justify a different result, but I have heard no argument on the point, and, indeed, any such argument may have been inappropriate because neither Berdino, Okimax or Mr Reid are parties to these proceedings.

[190] Thirdly, nobody has suggested that the logically anterior question of allocation of risk played any part in this case (see The Great Peace [2002] 4 All ER 689 at [80], [84]).

The effect of the breach of the articles and s 35A of the 1985 Act

[191] The second argument raised by Mr Mabb is that there was simply no power to issue the bonus shares on the facts I have found, because each of the two defects impinged the authority of the three directors, or of the company itself, to a issue the bonus shares, either generally or in respect of the November shares. In answer to this, Mr Chivers does not rely on cases such as Royal British Bank v Turquand (1856) 6 E & B 327, [1843–60] All ER Rep 435. His contention is that the three directors have acted beyond their powers but the company has not acted beyond its powers, and that s 35A accordingly applies.

b (1) In favour of a person dealing with a company in good faith, the power of the board of directors to bind the company, or authorise others to do so, shall be deemed to be free of any limitation under the company's constitution.

c (2) For this purpose—(a) a person “deals with” a company if he is a party to any transaction or other act to which the company is a party ...

(5) [Subsection (1) does not] affect any liability incurred by the directors, or any other person, by reason of the directors' exceeding their powers.'

[193] Mr Chivers contends that each shareholder who received the bonus shares was a person who 'deal[t] with' the company, on the basis that the issue and allotment of the bonus shares constituted a 'transaction or other act', 'to which the company [was] a party'. In this connection, I think it does not matter whether one regards the issue of the bonus shares as a single composite act, or whether one regards the issue of each parcel of bonus shares to particular shareholders as a separate act. That point was not gone into, and I suppose that it is conceivable that the decision to issue the bonus shares should be treated as one act, and each decision to allot a specific parcel of bonus shares to shareholder is a separate act.

e [194] In so far as Mr Reid, and Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson, and their respective companies, are concerned, it is perhaps also relevant to refer to the provisions of s 35A(2)(b) and (c), which are to the following effect:

f (b) a person shall not be regarded as acting in bad faith by reason only of his knowing that an act is beyond the powers of the directors under the company's constitution; and (c) a person shall be presumed to have acted in good faith unless the contrary is proved.'

g It can be said with considerable force, and probably correctly (albeit that the point was not discussed), that, as directors of the company, Mr Spickernell, Mr Bryson and Mr Reid should have known of the two breaches of the articles, and they knew the facts which gave rise to the two breaches. However, it seems to me pretty clear on the evidence that they did not 'know' that the issue and allotment of the bonus shares was 'beyond [their] powers', in the sense of being in breach of the articles in the two respects I have found.

h [195] I have not been specifically addressed on the issue of whether Mr Spickernell, Mr Bryson and Mr Reid acted 'in good faith' in connection with the issue and allotment of the bonus shares. In light of the findings I have made during the course of this judgment, my present, reasonably strong, inclination would be to conclude that they did act in good faith. Although I have made criticisms of Mr Spickernell and Mr Bryson as witnesses, and although I have made a fairly damaging finding in relation to the disputed letter^b, none of the findings impinge directly on their conduct or state of mind as at 15 December 1999 in relation to the issue of the bonus shares. Further, at least at the moment, b Editor's note: this was a letter whose dating was in dispute.

I would be very unattracted by any suggestion that any detrimental findings I have made would somehow even indirectly cast doubt on the good faith of Mr Spickernell, Mr Bryson and Mr Reid in relation to the issue and allotment of the bonus shares. a

[196] I turn, then, to the central issue, namely whether the 44 shareholders to whom the bonus shares were allotted can, in principle, take advantage of s 35A. The words 'a person dealing with a company' in s 35A(1) are not expressly fettered in any way. Thus, as a matter of ordinary language, a person (whether or not already a shareholder) receiving shares (whether or not bonus shares) from a company is 'a person dealing with a company'. Indeed, the reasoning and approach of Scott J in Re Cleveland, which represents something of a sheet anchor to Mr Mabb's case on voidness for mistake, appears to me to be consistent with that view, as Mr Chivers points out. Both 'a person' and 'dealing with' are wide expressions, which are not expressly limited in s 35A. b

[197] It is true that s 35A was enacted to give effect to art 9 of the First Council Directive (EEC) 68/151 (on the co-ordination of safeguards which, for the protection of the interests of members and others, are required by member states of companies within the meaning of the second paragraph of art 58 of the Treaty, with a view to making such safeguards equivalent throughout the Community) (OJ English Sp Edn 1968 (I) p 41) (see Smith v Henniker-Major & Co [2002] EWCA Civ 762 at [19]–[20], [2002] 2 BCLC 655 at [19]–[20], [2003] Ch 182 at [19]–[20]), and that art 9(2) limits reliance on the powers of the organs of the company 'as against third parties'. However, I do not find that of much assistance to the third defendant's case, essentially for two reasons. First, it is not entirely clear what is meant by 'third parties' in art 9(2). Secondly, even if Directive 68/151 required legislation along the lines of s 35A to protect persons dealing with the company, who were not members of the company, there is no reason why the legislation subsequently enacted should not have gone further—see what was said by Schiemann LJ in Smith's case [2002] 2 BCLC 655 at [119]. Further, I note that neither Carnwath LJ nor Schiemann LJ, who gave s 35A a slightly more restricted effect, at least in relation to a director dealing with the company, than the wholly unqualified meaning which the words might suggest, relied upon the directive. c

[198] Mr Mabb suggests that the words 'to bind the company' and '[i]n favour of a person' in s 35A(1) and the wording of s 35A(2)(a) suggest that members of the company were not intended to be within the ambit of s 35A. I do not see how those words assist that contention. d

[199] In my view, there is no reason why s 35A should not apply to members of the company dealing with the company, certainly in connection with matters such as receiving shares, whether shares for which they pay, or bonus shares. Apart from the natural meaning of s 35A, it seems to me that this conclusion receives a degree of support from the judgment in Smith's case. e

[200] Robert Walker LJ, who dissented on this issue, accepted (at [52]) that, even the director involved in the unauthorised act, could be a 'person' within s 35A, in light of the preceding paragraphs. It is fair to say that part of his reasoning could not be directly invoked by Mr Chivers in the present case, in that he relied in part on s 322A of the 1985 Act, which only applies to directors. However, it seems to me that it would be surprising if s 35A could apply to the very director involved in making the unauthorised decision, but could not apply to a wholly innocent shareholder. f

[201] So far as the judgment of Carnwath LJ is concerned, he held that, on the facts of that case, the director concerned could not rely on s 35A, but emphasised g a (at [110]) that he preferred 'to express no view about the position of directors in other circumstances'. In the preceding paragraph, he accepted that s 35A—

'does not distinguish between insiders and outsiders. It applies to any "person dealing with the company". These words are wide enough to include a director of the company. There is nothing in law to prevent a director from being "a person dealing" with his own company.'

b Like Robert Walker LJ, he derived some assistance in reaching that conclusion from s 322A, but it appears to me that, rather contrary to Mr Mabb's submission, Carnwath LJ's judgment tends, if anything, to support the view that a shareholder is not prevented from relying on s 35A in a case such as this.

c [202] Schiemann LJ agreed with Carnwath LJ. He asked (at [118]):

'Does that section [sc s 35A] enable a director, who has made an honest mistake as to the meaning of the provision in the articles of the company of which he is director, himself to rely on his own mistake in order to give validity to something which would lack validity were it not for that mistake?'

d He accepted (at [125]) 'that the word "person" is on its face wide enough to include such a director', but ultimately rejected the contention that it did. The implication in his judgment, at least to me, is that as a matter of principle a director may not be excluded from s 35A, and that there is no reason why a shareholder should be excluded from that section, especially where he is 'dealing with' the company, in the ordinary sense of that expression.

e [203] In these circumstances, I am of the view that a shareholder receiving bonus shares from the company is 'a person dealing with a company' within the ambit of s 35A(1). First, as a matter of ordinary language, such a shareholder would be within the ambit of those wide words, and, in the absence of a powerful reason to the contrary, it is inappropriate to treat naturally wide words in a statute as subject to an implied limitation. Secondly, the majority view in Smith's case was that the policy behind s 35A was such that the very director responsible for the mistake, even if an innocent mistake, should not be able to rely upon s 35A, but that does not, to my mind, cast doubt on my conclusion. Thirdly, the reasoning of each member of the Court of Appeal, as summarised above, appears to me, if anything, to support the conclusion I have reached.

g [204] Fourthly, I believe that s 322A of the 1985 Act, to which reference was made in all three of the judgments in Smith's case, tends, albeit indirectly, to support this conclusion. Section 322A sets out the circumstances in which s 35A cannot be relied on (see sub-s (7)), and it is concerned with the voidability of certain transactions entered into between the company and either a director or a person connected with a director. As Mr Chivers contends, it would be strange if the benefit of s 35A was removed from one group of individuals, namely directors and persons connected with them, in express terms by the legislature, but the benefit of the section was removed from another group, namely shareholders, merely by implication.

j [205] Fifthly, the policy behind s 35A was summarised by Carnwath LJ in Smith's case (at [108]), in these terms:

'The general policy seems to be that, if a document is put forward as a decision of the board by someone appearing to act on behalf of the company, in circumstances where there is no reason to doubt its authenticity, a person dealing with the company in good faith should be able to take it at face value ...'

It appears to me that, in relation to the bonus share certificates issued to the 16 shareholders (and indeed the 33 shareholders), this case plainly falls within that policy.

[206] If s 35A is in principle capable of being relied on by a shareholder receiving bonus shares, Mr Mabb further contends that reg 110 is not so much a 'limitation', the word used in s 35A(1), but an enabling power, and, even if it is to be regarded as a limitation, it is a limitation on the power of the company, not on the power of the board. I do not agree. It appears to me that the opening words of reg 110 make it clear that the power to issue bonus shares is ultimately given to the directors. I accept that reg 110 may be characterised as 'an enabling power', but it is a power subject to limitations, and the defects in this case, namely that the shares in respect of which the bonus shares were issued must be paid up, and that the bonus shares should have been issued with the authority of an ordinary resolution, arise from the fact that the limitations have been effectively ignored in those respects.

[207] Finally, Mr Mabb argues that the question of whether s 35A applies to a particular shareholder will depend upon the facts relating to the particular shareholder, and the point is therefore covered by the limitation already imposed on the declaration as to voidness which he seeks, namely 'without prejudice to the right of any person who was previously a member of the company to raise any defence arising out of his own particular circumstances'. While that point has some force, it is a rather strange submission from a party who is seeking a declaration as to voidness subject to that limitation. If I had concluded that the issue of the bonus shares was void, it would then have been necessary to decide whether or not to grant a declaration to that effect. One of Mr Chivers's objections to such a declaration (which I shall consider below) would have been that it would be of little use, because it would still be necessary to consider the facts of each case, as the qualification I have quoted indicates. Mr Mabb's answer to that point is that it would none the less be useful to have a decision in principle on the issue of voidness. If that is right, then it would also be useful, as I see it, to have a decision in principle as to the applicability of s 35A. In any event, at least on the facts currently known to me, it is hard to see the grounds upon which any shareholder who received bonus shares could be prevented from relying on s 35A.

[208] If I am wrong as to the applicability of s 35A, then I would none the less have concluded that the effect of the two defects would not have been to have rendered the bonus shares, or some of them, invalid. It would have been to render their having been paid up invalid. As I have observed in relation to the mistake argument (see [186], [187], above), it seems right to minimise the effect of the defects, in so far as it is possible to do so consistently with principle and commercial common sense. Again, as with my similar view in relation to mistake, this is a somewhat tentative view, but it would appear to produce a more sensible result than the bonus shares themselves being avoided.

h

The declaration as to voidness

[209] If I had decided that the issue or allotment of the bonus shares was void, that would have raised a further question, namely whether I should have granted a declaration to that effect. The court has a discretion whether or not to grant a

- a declaration. It seems to me that the effect of the observations of Millett LJ in Patten v Burke Publishing Co Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 821, [1991] 1 WLR 541 and of Lord Woolf MR in Messier-Dowty Ltd v Sabena SA (No 2) [2001] 1 All ER 275, [2000] 1 WLR 2040 is that, when considering whether to grant a declaration, the court should bear in mind justice to the parties, the extent to which a declaration would serve a useful purpose, and whether there are any special reasons, in favour or against granting a declaration. In effect, the discretion is one whose exercise depends very much on the particular facts of the particular case.

[210] The arguments against granting a declaration in such circumstances would have been fairly formidable. First, even if the issue and allotment of the bonus shares had been void initially, it seems to me that the bonus shares could no longer have been treated as void once they had been acquired for value by the Guernsey company. Whether that would have been on the basis of the Guernsey company being a bona fide purchaser for value of the shares without notice, or whether it is more properly based on estoppel, matters not. For authority on this point, one need look no further than observations, admittedly obiter, of Scott J in Re Cleveland Trust plc [1991] BCLC 424 at 437 to the following effect:

- d 'Finally I should comment on the position of third parties who might have become assignees for value of the bonus shares. I am told that there are no such third parties. If there had been, they would, I think, have been entitled as against Cleveland to rely on the share certificates relating to the shares. Their title would derive not from the void bonus issue itself but from an estoppel based upon the content of the share certificates. A decision that the bonus issue should be declared void for mistake does not, in my opinion, place innocent third party assignees in jeopardy.'

- [212] Secondly, the person arguing for a declaration that the bonus shares were void is the third defendant, Mr Lee Barber. He would seem to have no locus standi to argue the point, given that he is no longer a shareholder in the company, having ceased in April 2000 to be a shareholder when the company was taken over by the Guernsey company. Further, at least on the evidence I have heard, he would seem to have no basis for complaint in any event. When he acquired his shares in the company, in January 2000, Mr Lee Barber was not misled in any way in connection with the bonus shares. Thus, he was not led to believe that the bonus shares did not exist: he bought his shares, as I understand it, knowing full well the total number of issued shares in the company. While I appreciate that he did not understand that the bonus shares had been issued and allotted in breach of the articles, he in no way suffered as a result.

- [213] Had the Guernsey company not taken over the company, then, as I have mentioned, it would have represented nothing other than a wholly uncovenanted windfall for Mr Lee Barber, and other persons who had acquired shares in the company after 15 December 1999, if some or all of the bonus shares were effectively cancelled. It would have resulted in their owning a substantially greater proportion of the company than they had previously owned, or than they thought they were acquiring when they purchased their shares. Indeed, in his evidence he acknowledged that he had received the correct number of, and the correct proportion of the total issued shares for which he had negotiated. Even though he is a representative party, Mr Chivers points out that, if I conclude that he is not entitled to a declaration, then it cannot be contended that any other person whom he represents would be entitled to a declaration (see Towers v African Tug Co [1904] 1 Ch 558 at 566–567 per Vaughan Williams LJ).

[214] Thirdly, just as it would have represented an unfair windfall for shareholders such as Mr Lee Barber, if the bonus shares were void, so would it have represented an unfair penalty for shareholders who received bonus shares, such as Mr Phipps and Mr Paul.

[215] Fourthly, the declaration which would have been sought by Mr Lee Barber on this issue would have been qualified in any event, because the declaration of voidness would have been expressly subject to the proviso that it was ‘without prejudice to the right of any person who was previously a member of the company to raise any defence arising out of his own particular circumstances’.

[216] Despite these arguments, if I had decided that the issue and allotment of the bonus shares was void in whole or in part, I would have thought it right to grant a declaration to that effect. It is not as if Mr Lee Barber is the only party to the litigation who would have been seeking such a declaration if I had made such a finding. The claimants, ie the company and the Guernsey company, would both have wanted a declaration to that effect. Secondly, the purpose of seeking such a declaration would have been to have a determination by an English court, as to the effect of the breaches of the articles on the validity of, issue and allotment of, the bonus shares. This would then have assisted the Guernsey court, which, as I have mentioned, is faced with litigation which involves some of the parties alleging that the bonus shares were void.

[217] As I understand it, the argument of some of the shareholders in the Guernsey company, including Mr Lee Barber, is that many of the shares in the Guernsey company which were allotted, on the takeover of the company, to shareholders in the company who had bonus shares, should effectively be reallocated to shareholders who did not have such bonus shares. This would presumably be on the basis that, at the time of the acquisition of the company, the bonus shares were void, and therefore should have been cancelled, in accordance with the reasoning of Scott J in Re Cleveland, and that therefore the shares in the Guernsey company allotted in respect of the bonus shares should not have been so allotted, and should have been allotted instead to the other shareholders in the company.

[218] I do not propose to comment on the strength or otherwise of this argument (which I may have summarised somewhat ineptly), because it would be for the Guernsey courts to determine in accordance with Guernsey law, as it relates to a Guernsey company, and in any event it has not been developed before me. However, if I understand it correctly, it is, or may be, a necessary foundation of this argument that the bonus shares were void when issued. I think there is considerable force in Mr Gillyon’s contention that it would be more sensible for the English court to determine whether or not the bonus shares were void, rather than leaving it to the Guernsey company to determine this point of English law. Observations of the Guernsey Court of Appeal appear to support this conclusion—see the judgment of Sir John Nutting QC (paras 43, 46, 50).

[219] Furthermore, at the most recent meeting of the shareholders of the Guernsey company, there was a dispute as to which shareholders were entitled to vote, and in respect of how many shares each shareholder was entitled to vote. That dispute was, as I understand it, essentially based on the arguments I have been rehearsing. As a result, it is said that the meeting could not proceed. It is a fair to say that there is some reason for thinking that this dispute may not have been the real reason for the meeting of the Guernsey company being adjourned, and therefore I prefer not to rest my decision on that aspect.

[220] It is true that the declaration would have had to be qualified so that any individual could raise his particular circumstances to show that, despite my conclusion, the voidness of a particular bonus share, or parcel of bonus shares, was not void, at least as against him. An obvious example would be a purchase of the bonus shares. However, I do not see why that should prevent a declaration of the sort I would have made if satisfied that the issue was void, being of some value to the company, the Guernsey company and the Guernsey courts.

[221] In all the circumstances, had I decided that some or all of the bonus shares were void, at least until they were acquired by the Guernsey company, I would have been prepared so to declare. As it is, the point does not arise.

[222] In view of my decision that the issue of the bonus shares was not void on either ground raised by Mr Mabb, there is no reason why I should not so declare. However, as I have held that the breaches of the articles are avoided by s 35A, and there could be circumstances in which shareholders who received bonus shares might not be able to rely upon s 35A, the declaration should be framed to reflect this. None the less, even in that event, I do not think any of the bonus shares would have been treated as void: they would merely have been treated as not paid up (see [208], above).

[223] I should like to add two points with regard to my conclusion that, despite the breaches of the articles in relation to the issue of the bonus shares, their issue and allotment were not void. First, it is a conclusion which, on the facts of this case, appears to me to be a sensible one. So far as the failure to obtain the approval of the 16 shareholders to the payment of the bonus shares by the capitalisation of moneys in the share premium account is concerned, I have already observed that this appears to me to be nothing but a technical defect. To my mind, it would have been a foregone conclusion that a majority of the 16 shareholders, indeed, all of those shareholders who bothered to vote, would have supported the proposal. In those circumstances, it would have been an extraordinary result if what, on the facts of this case, amounted to no more than a technical oversight on the part of the three directors, which was itself attributable to poor legal advice, would have had the extraordinarily far-reaching and penal result of the bonus shares being cancelled.

[224] The fact that the November shares, in respect of which bonus shares were issued fully paid, were unpaid at the time, also appears to me to be, at least on the facts of this case, little more than a technical point, which one would not expect to have far-reaching and penal consequences. Quite apart from the fact that, at any rate 13 of the 16 shareholders, who would suffer if the bonus shares were cancelled, were misled into thinking that their shares were paid up, the amount involved in paying up the November shares was very small, and it is clear that the November shares were going to be paid up. The only problem was that, as at the crucial date, namely the date of issue and allotment of the bonus shares, no firm decision had been reached as to how they were to be paid up. Even if I am wrong in concluding that the issue of the bonus shares to the 13 shareholders (or, indeed, as it currently appears to me, to the 16 shareholders) was not affected, so far as they were concerned, by the fact that their November shares were not paid up, it appears to me that the furthest the effect of that fact can go, is to result in the bonus shares allotted to them being treated as nil paid.

[225] The second point is that, my conclusion that the two defects did not render the bonus shares void does not mean that no relief could be accorded to anybody as a result of the defects. It may be that, for instance, the issue or allotment of some of the bonus shares could be voidable at the instance of a person with a relevant interest who could establish that he had suffered as a result of the breaches of the articles. Alternatively, such a person may be entitled to recover damages or some other relief against (in decreasing order of likely liability) the directors, or (possibly) the shareholders to whom the bonus shares were allotted, or the company. Such a claim is specifically contemplated by s 35A(5). On the facts of this case, at least as at present advised, I find it difficult to see how any such claim could be established. However, there are a number of issues raised by Mr Lee Barber (and possibly other persons who acquired shares in the company after December 1999) against the three directors, and I do not know much about some of those issues. At the moment, I do not understand how any loss or prejudice alleged in those proceedings could sensibly be said to have been suffered as a result of the failure to comply with the articles in relation to the issue and allotment of the bonus shares, but it should be emphasised that that is little more than a matter of impression.

CONCLUSION

[226] In these circumstances, my conclusions are as follows in relation to the issues to be determined at this stage: (i) the bonus issue and the allotment of the bonus shares were irregular because they were effected in respect of some shares, namely the November shares, which were not paid up, albeit that the subscriber shares were paid up; (ii) the issue of the bonus shares and their allotment was irregular, because it was not approved by a resolution of the shareholders of the company; (iii) however, in the circumstances of this case, neither of these defects rendered the issue or allotment of the bonus shares void, but if s 35A did not apply to a particular allottee, his bonus shares would have been treated as not paid up.

Order accordingly.

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD MILLETT AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

30 APRIL, 1 MAY, 26 JUNE 2003

Social security – Income support – Urgent cases payments – Asylum seekers – Claimant asylum seeker entitled to benefit until date claim for asylum recorded by Secretary of State as having been determined – Secretary of State recording determination of claim for asylum – Deliberate delay in notifying claimant – Whether claimant entitled to benefit until date of actual notification – Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, reg 70(3A)(b)(i).

The claimant applied for asylum in August 1998, and then made a claim for income support as an asylum seeker within reg 70(3A)(a)^a of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, which provided that persons were asylum seekers within the meaning of the regulations when they submitted a claim which was recorded by the Secretary of State. She was paid income support at the applicable rate. Regulation 70(3A)(b)(i) provided, inter alia, that a person ceased to be an asylum seeker, in the case of a claim for asylum which was recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined (other than on appeal), on the date on which it was so recorded. On 20 November 1999 an internal file note was signed in the Home Office, reading: 'For the reasons given in the letter aside ... Refusal is appropriate. Case hereby recorded as determined.' The content of that note was communicated to the Benefits Agency on 30 November. It was not communicated to the claimant, and the 'letter aside' addressed to the claimant containing the Secretary of State's reasons for refusal of asylum was not sent to her. The claimant's income support was stopped with effect from 9 December 1999; the Benefits Agency informed the claimant's solicitors later in the month that payments had been stopped because it had been notified that her asylum claim had been refused on 20 November. It was Home Office departmental policy not to communicate to an asylum seeker that their claim had been refused until an immigration officer had considered whether the asylum seeker's request for leave to enter should be granted on some ground other than that of refugee status. On 25 April 2000 an immigration officer's written notice of refusal was sent to the claimant, together with the letter of 20 November 1999. The claimant applied for judicial review of, inter alia, the Home Secretary's decision to treat her asylum claim as having been refused on 20 November 1999 and the Secretary of State for Social Security's decision to withdraw her income support on 9 December 1999. Her application was dismissed, as was her subsequent appeal to the Court of Appeal, because both courts regarded themselves as bound by a previous decision of the Court of Appeal to the effect that, for the purposes of

reg 70(3A)(b)(i), a person ceased to be entitled to income support from the date when his claim for asylum was recorded as determined on an internal file note in the Home Office, even though he had not yet been informed of the determination. The claimant appealed. a

Held – (Lord Bingham dissenting) The right of access to justice was a fundamental and constitutional principle of the United Kingdom legal system. That right meant that notice of a decision was required before it could have the character of a determination with legal effect because the individual concerned had to be in a position to challenge that decision in the courts if he or she wished to do so. The constitutional principle requiring the rule of law to be observed also required that a constitutional state had to accord to individuals the right to know of a decision before their rights could be adversely affected. It was an unjust proposition that an uncommunicated administrative decision could bind an individual. Parliament had not expressly or by necessary implication legislated to displace the applicable constitutional principles. The claimant's appeal would accordingly be allowed (see [26], [28], [30], [31], [34], [36], [37], [43], [44], [57], [59], below); R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Salem [1999] QB 805 overruled. b f 26 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, the issue in this appeal is whether income support should have been paid to Nadezda Anufrijeva (the appellant) as an asylum seeker between 10 December 1999 and 25 April 2000. The answer depends on whether, on or before the earlier of those dates, she had ceased to be an asylum seeker. That in turn depends on whether, on or before the earlier of the dates, her claim for asylum had been 'recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined (other than on appeal)' within the meaning of reg 70(3A)(b)(i) of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967.

h [2] On 31 August 1998 the appellant, then aged 20, arrived at Gatwick airport with her father and several other members of her family. They were Lithuanians of Russian origin and had flown to this country from Lithuania. Her father claimed asylum for himself and other dependent members of the family. The appellant claimed asylum on her own behalf. It seems clear (and it has not been questioned) that her claim for asylum was duly recorded by the Secretary of State as having been made.

j [3] On 4 September 1998 the appellant claimed payment of income support. This is an income-related benefit governed by Pt VII of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992. The amount payable to a 'person from abroad' as defined in reg 21(3) of the 1987 regulations is ordinarily nil, entitling such person to no payment. But Pt VI of the 1987 regulations made special provision for some urgent cases, in which there was an entitlement to payment of 90% of the amount normally payable to those entitled. The class of urgent case relevant for present purposes is persons from abroad who were asylum seekers for purposes of para (3A) of reg 70 of the regulations. That paragraph provided (so far as relevant):

‘For the purposes of this paragraph, a person—(a) is an asylum seeker when he submits on his arrival (other than on his re-entry) in the United Kingdom from a country outside the Common Travel Area a claim for asylum to the Secretary of State that it would be contrary to the United Kingdom’s obligations under the [Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951); TS 39 (1953); Cmnd 9171) and the 1967 Protocol to that convention (New York, 31 January 1967; TS 15 (1969); Cmnd 3906)] for him to be removed from, or required to leave, the United Kingdom and that claim is recorded by the Secretary of State as having been made ...’

The appellant was accepted as falling within that description. Income support at the applicable rate (90% of the normal rate) was accordingly paid to her with effect from 4 September 1998. It continued to be paid for some 14 months until, with effect from 9 December 1999, payment was stopped.

[4] At some time after her arrival in the United Kingdom the appellant was interviewed by an immigration officer concerning the merits of her asylum claim. Decisions on asylum, however, unlike decisions on leave to enter, are taken not by immigration officers but by the Secretary of State. This long-standing rule is now found in r 328 of the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1994) (HC 395) laid before Parliament in accordance with s 3(2) of the Immigration Act 1971 as a statement of ‘the practice to be followed’ in the administration of the Immigration Acts. Rule 328 provides:

‘All asylum applications will be determined by the Secretary of State in accordance with the United Kingdom’s obligations under the United Nations Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees. Every asylum application made by a person at a port or airport in the United Kingdom will be referred by the Immigration Officer for determination by the Secretary of State in accordance with these Rules.’

The immigration officer’s record of the interview with the appellant has not been produced in these proceedings, but it was produced to and considered by an adjudicator who heard appeals by the appellant and her father in December 2000–January 2001 (appeal nos CC/17722/00 and CC 15675/00, March 2000 (para 75)) and it seems clear that the record was sent to the officials responsible for making asylum decisions on behalf of the Home Secretary to enable them to make that decision.

[5] On 20 November 1999 the responsible official in the Integrated Casework Directorate of the Home Office made a note to the following effect in the file relating to the appellant’s asylum claim:

‘This woman has cited numerous mishaps throughout the 1990s and puts her woes down to an encounter her father had with a drunken solicitor in 1991. There is no credibility in any of this and no Convention reason anyway. For the reasons given in the letter aside, this applicant has failed

b The terms of this note, and the certification of the appellant's asylum claim under para 5(4)(a) of Sch 2 to the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 as not showing a fear of persecution for a convention reason, make plain that in the opinion of the Home Office the claim was hopeless. This was not the view later taken by the adjudicator who, although rejecting the asylum claim, believed the appellant's account, recommended that the Home Secretary consider granting her exceptional leave to remain and declined to uphold the certificate under para 5(4)(a). But the Home Office did not regard the appellant's claim as in any way borderline, as is evident from the terms of the 'letter aside': this was a draft letter setting out the Home Secretary's reasons for refusing the asylum claim which was dated 20 November 1999, the same date as the file note, but was not at that stage sent to the appellant or her solicitors.

d [6] Upon the making of the file note just described, the Home Office considered (whether rightly or wrongly, which is the issue in this appeal) that the appellant was no longer an asylum seeker and so no longer entitled to payment of income support. As already shown, the appellant's entitlement to income support depended on her being an asylum seeker within the definition in para (3A) of reg 70 of the 1987 regulations. But that paragraph also provided:

e 'For the purposes of this paragraph, a person ... (b) ceases to be an asylum seeker—(i) in the case of a claim for asylum which, on or after 5th February 1996, is recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined (other than on appeal) or abandoned, on the date on which it is so recorded ...'

f The Home Office treated the appellant as ceasing to be an asylum seeker on 20 November 1999 and communicated its decision to the Benefits Agency, responsible for paying income support to the appellant, some days later. That agency ceased to pay income support to the appellant with effect from 9 December 1999 and on the same day wrote to her asking for the return of her income support order book and directing her to cash no further orders. A week earlier the London Borough of Southwark had written to the solicitors acting for the appellant and her father referring to refusal of 'the family's' asylum application and indicating that there was no longer an entitlement to housing assistance. The appellant's solicitors gathered from the Benefits Agency and the local authority that her (and her father's) asylum claims had been refused, and on 23 December 1999 the Benefits Agency confirmed that it had been told by the Home Office that her asylum claim had been refused on 20 November and that payments of income support had been stopped with effect from 9 December. It is, however, a very regrettable feature of this case that the appellant was not informed directly that her asylum claim had been refused or when, was given neither reasons for the refusal nor any promise that reasons would be given at a later date, and was not told that her income support payments were to be stopped or why or when.

j [7] Upon the Home Secretary's determination (or purported determination) of the appellant's asylum claim, responsibility for resolving her immigration status returned to the immigration officer at Gatwick. Had the Home Secretary decided to grant asylum and had the appellant not yet received leave to enter, the immigration officer would have granted limited leave to enter pursuant to r 330 of the Immigration Rules. But r 331 provides:

‘If a person seeking leave to enter is refused asylum, the Immigration Officer ... will then resume his examination to determine whether or not to grant him leave to enter under any other provision of these Rules. If the person fails at any time to comply with a requirement to report to an Immigration Officer for examination, the Immigration Officer may direct that the person’s examination shall be treated as concluded at that time. The Immigration Officer will then consider any outstanding applications for entry on the basis of any evidence before him.’

[8] In order to discharge the duty under this rule, the immigration officer at Gatwick wrote to the appellant on 28 November 1999, inviting her to attend for interview there on 11 January 2000. At this interview, had it taken place, it is likely that the appellant would have been refused leave to enter and would have been handed the letter of 20 November 1999 setting out the Home Secretary’s reasons for refusing asylum. Rule 333 of the rules prescribed the procedure to be followed:

‘A person who is refused leave to enter following the refusal of an asylum application will be provided with a notice informing him of the decision and of the reasons for refusal. The notice of refusal will also explain any rights of appeal available to the applicant and will inform him of the means by which he may exercise those rights ... the applicant will not be removed from the United Kingdom so long as any appeal which he may bring or pursue in the United Kingdom is pending.’

At the applicant’s request the interview arranged for 11 January 2000 was deferred to 7 March 2000, but the appellant (unable, as she claimed, to afford the train fare) did not attend. Nor, for the same reason, did she attend a further interview arranged for 17 April. That led the immigration officer to give her a written notice of refusal of leave to enter. The notice was dated 18 April 2000 but was sent to her on 25 April. At the same time he sent to the appellant the letter of 20 November setting out the Home Secretary’s reasons for refusing asylum. Copies of these documents were sent to her solicitors on the same date. It is common ground that the appellant would not on any showing have been entitled to income support after 25 April 2000, unless an appeal against the refusal of asylum had succeeded, in which case reg 21ZA of the 1987 regulations would have entitled her to retrospective payment.

[9] The appellant unsuccessfully challenged the refusal of her asylum claim before an adjudicator, was refused permission by the Immigration Appeal Tribunal to appeal against that decision and applied unsuccessfully for judicial review of that refusal (see [2002] EWHC Admin 383). She was also refused permission to apply for judicial review of the Home Secretary’s refusal of leave to enter (see [2002] EWHC Admin 600). In the present proceedings she sought judicial review of two decisions: the Home Secretary’s decision to treat her asylum claim as having been refused on 20 November 1999; and the Secretary of State for Social Security’s decision to withdraw her income support benefit on 9 December 1999. Her application was heard by Sir Christopher Bellamy QC sitting as a deputy judge: in a detailed and careful reserved judgment given on 25 October 2001 ([2001] EWHC Admin 895, [2001] All

- a ER (D) 353 (Oct)) he dismissed the application, recognising considerable force in the submissions made on her behalf but holding himself bound to reject it by the Court of Appeal's decision in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Salem [1999] QB 805, [1999] 2 WLR 1. In a judgment of the court delivered by Schiemann LJ, the Court of Appeal (Schiemann, Hale and Sedley LJ) ([2002] EWCA Civ 300, [2002] All ER (D) 365 (Mar)) also held itself bound by Ex p Salem to dismiss the appeal but saw force in her arguments and gave her permission to appeal to the House.

- b [10] In opening the appeal, Mr Drabble QC for the appellant submitted, first, that it was not open to the Home Secretary to record a claim as determined on a date earlier than that on which it had in fact been determined. This is plainly so. Regulation 70(3A)(b)(i) of the 1987 regulations provides that a person ceases to be an asylum seeker on (relevantly) the date on which it is recorded by the Secretary of State that his claim for asylum has been determined otherwise than on appeal. An event cannot be 'recorded' for purposes of the subparagraph unless it has taken place. Thus on 20 November 1999 the responsible official could validly record the appellant's asylum claim as determined only if it had been determined. The plain intention of the provision was that income support should be payable to a qualifying asylum seeker so long as the Home Secretary's determination of the claim was pending but not once he had determined the claim and his determination had been recorded.

- d [11] Mr Drabble's second main submission was based on r 348 of the Immigration Rules which at the material time provided:

- e 'Special provisions governing appeals in asylum cases are set out in the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 and the Asylum Appeals (Procedure) Rules 1996 [SI 1996/2070]. Where asylum is refused, the applicant will be provided with a notice informing him of the decision and of the reasons for refusal. At the same time that asylum is refused, the applicant may be notified of removal directions, or served with a notice of the Secretary of State's intention to deport him, as appropriate. The notice of refusal of asylum will also explain any rights of appeal available to the applicant and will inform him of the means by which he may exercise those rights.'

- f This rule, it was argued, must be read with reg 70(3A)(b)(i). It governs the steps to be taken when asylum is refused, requiring provision of a notice informing the applicant of the refusal and the reasons for it, and also the giving of information about the applicant's right of appeal. The rule is quite inconsistent with an uncommunicated refusal of asylum, recorded only in a departmental file. Not until the steps required by the rule have been accomplished has an asylum application been refused or determined adversely to the applicant. Thus the Home Secretary could not, on 20 November 1999, validly record an adverse determination which had yet to be made.

- g [12] There are, in my opinion, a number of reasons why this argument cannot be accepted. First, the language of reg 70(3A)(b)(i) is not in any way ambiguous. It defines a date by reference to the recording by the Secretary of State of the claim for asylum as having been determined. It makes no reference to notification of the claimant. The reference to 'recorded' is, as Hobhouse LJ pointed out in Ex p Salem [1999] QB 805 at 812, [1999] 2 WLR 1 at 7: '... a formal criterion which must be applied by looking at the records kept by the Secretary of State. It is used in contrast and contradistinction to any concept of notification.’ Although the Court of Appeal was divided on the outcome in Ex p Salem, there was no disagreement on this point. Secondly, the absence of reference to notification in reg 70(3A)(b)(i) cannot be treated as inadvertent, since in reg 21ZA of the 1987 regulations, inserted by amendment later in the same year as para (3A), express reference was made in paras (1) and (3) to notification of the asylum claimant that he had been recorded as a refugee. In s 6 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 (since repealed but re-enacted) it was similarly provided that:

‘During the period beginning when a person makes a claim for asylum and ending when the Secretary of State gives him notice of the decision on the claim, he may not be removed from, or required to leave, the United Kingdom.’

Parliamentary draftsmen have no difficulty in distinguishing between the making of a determination or decision and giving notice of it to the party affected. Thirdly, there are compelling practical reasons why reg 70(3A)(b)(i) should not have provided for notification. As already noted in [7], above, the Home Secretary’s decision on asylum is the first stage in a two-stage process in which, under rr 330 and 331 of the Immigration Rules, the second stage is performed by the immigration officer. Where the Home Secretary’s decision is to grant asylum, the immigration officer’s role may be something of a formality. But where the Home Secretary’s decision is to refuse asylum, the immigration officer must none the less consider whether leave to enter should be given. Thus the Home Secretary’s decision on asylum, even if favourable, does not finally resolve the applicant’s immigration status, and if it is adverse it gives rise of itself to no ground of appeal, since under s 8 of the 1993 Act (since repealed but re-enacted) an appeal lay only against the refusal of leave to enter and not against the refusal of asylum as such. Rule 348 of the Immigration Rules is directed to the last formal stage of the immigration officer’s involvement, as evidenced by the references to removal directions and notice of intention to deport. The Home Secretary’s decision on asylum must necessarily have come earlier.

[13] A further ground for rejecting Mr Drabble’s second submission is found in consideration of the perceived mischief at which reg 70(3A)(b)(i) was directed. The provisions contained in the Social Security (Persons from Abroad) Miscellaneous Amendments Regulations 1996, SI 1996/30, were the subject of a statement made by the Secretary of State to the Social Security Advisory Committee in accordance with s 174(2) of the Social Security Administration Act 1992. In this he recorded that in recent years the number of asylum applications made in the United Kingdom had increased very sharply, both absolutely and proportionately in relation to other countries. Well over 90% of those claiming were found not to be genuine refugees. Most of these were economic migrants, attracted to this country by the ready availability in this country of benefits which were relatively generous, in comparison both with wages in the applicants’ countries of origin and with benefits available in some other European countries. The availability of such benefits during the process of appeal following initial rejection of an asylum claim provided a further inducement, since a high proportion of a unsuccessful applicants appealed, although only 4% of appeals succeeded. The number of applicants and appellants made for further delay and, inevitably, greater cost to the taxpayer. The proposed solution (para 57 of the statement) was to withdraw benefits from 'asylum seekers who have been found by the immigration authorities not to be refugees' and also from those claiming asylum otherwise than on arrival in the country. In R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p B [1996] 4 All ER 385, [1997] 1 WLR 275 the Court of Appeal, by a majority (Neill LJ dissenting), held the 1996 regulations to be ultra vires on the ground that:

c 'Parliament cannot have intended a significant number of genuine asylum seekers to be impaled on the horns of so intolerable a dilemma: the need either to abandon their claims to refugee status or alternatively to maintain them as best they can but in a state of utter destitution.' (See [1996] 4 All ER 385 at 402, [1997] 1 WLR 275 at 293 per Simon Brown LJ.)

d Parliament's response was to enact s 11 of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, which provided in sub-s (1):

'Notwithstanding any enactment or rule of law, regulations may exclude any person who has made a claim for asylum from entitlement to any of the following benefits, namely—(a) income support ...'

e Regulation 70(3A)(b)(i) of the 1987 regulations applied to asylum applicants whose claims were granted by the Home Secretary as well as those whose claims were refused, but the latter were expected to be far more numerous. (In an earlier explanatory memorandum submitted to the Advisory Committee reference had been made, in para 12, to 'ending the benefit entitlement of all asylum applicants at the point where they receive a negative decision from the Home Office' and, in para 17, to removing entitlement 'at the point where the initial decision is made by the immigration authorities that the applicant is not a refugee and should not be granted exceptional leave to remain'. This language was not, however, repeated in the Secretary of State's later statement and is not to be found in the regulations as amended in 1996.) To read f reg 70(3A)(b)(i) as intended to deny income support to an unsuccessful asylum applicant from the day that the Home Secretary's decision to refuse asylum was recorded, no matter how long it might thereafter take the immigration officer finally to resolve the applicant's immigration status, is not to defeat but to give effect to what I regard as a clear legislative intention. It is not of course for the g House, sitting judicially, to express any view on the merits of this legislation. Mr Drabble pointed out that although a very small percentage of those h claiming asylum were found to be refugees, a much larger number were granted exceptional leave to remain.

j [14] Mr Drabble's second major submission was that the statutory scheme imposed a public law duty on the Home Secretary to notify the appellant of the asylum decision, that a decision only recorded in an uncommunicated file note could not be other than provisional, since it could be altered at any time before notification was given to the appellant, and that accordingly there was no determination for purposes of reg 70(3A)(b)(i) until 25 April 2000. This submission drew on the revulsion naturally felt for an official decision, taken privately, recorded in an undisclosed file and not communicated to the person to whom the decision relates. This somewhat Kafkaesque procedure was to some extent mitigated in this case by the fact that the appellant and her solicitors learned of the decision, although indirectly, relatively soon after it was made, that she would have received formal notice of the refusal with reasons two months earlier than she did if she had not cancelled the meeting fixed for 11 January 2000 and that her right of appeal would not have arisen until she had been refused leave to enter even if notice of the asylum decision had been given earlier. This is, however, an unhappy feature of the case and it is reassuring to learn that the practice has been changed.

[15] I would readily accept that the Home Secretary was subject to a public law duty to notify the appellant of his decision on her asylum application and, if it was adverse, his reasons for refusing it. Such an obligation is expressed explicitly in r 348 of the Immigration Rules and would in any event be implied. But there is inevitably, in a written procedure, some gap between the making and notifying of a decision. Rule 348 prescribes no time limit. Any implied duty would be to give notice within a reasonable time. Failure to give notice within a reasonable time would be a breach of the Home Secretary's public law duty but would not necessarily nullify or invalidate his decision. In any event, it was not argued that notice of the Home Secretary's reasons was not given within a reasonable time.

'A fundamental principle in the Community legal order requires that a measure adopted by the public authorities shall not be applicable to those concerned before they have the opportunity to make themselves acquainted with it.'

Reference was also made to Opel Austria GmbH (Austria intervening) v EU Council (European Commission intervening) Case T-115/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 97 at 118, [1997] ECR II-39 at 82 (para 124). Both these cases, however, concerned Community regulations, and even so it was recognised that there could exceptionally be departures from the principle (see the Firma A Racke case [1979] ECR 69 at 86 (para 20)). I do not think this principle can be readily applied in a domestic context to an official decision which, although undoubtedly affecting the rights of the individual, calls for no compliance by that individual and exposes him or her to no penalty. No domestic authority was cited to support such a rule, which would in any event be overridden by what I have found to be a clear legislative intention that payment of income support should stop on the day the Home Secretary's decision is recorded, irrespective of notification to the claimant.

[17] I would accept that, to be a determination within the meaning of reg 70(3A)(b)(i), a decision must have a sufficient quality of finality about it. There is no room for what Hobhouse LJ in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Salem [1999] QB 805 at 823, [1999] 2 WLR 1 at 17-18, called 'the undeterminative determination'. In that case, however, all members of the court agreed—

'that as a matter of statutory construction, the asylum seeker's right to income support in a favoured category of "persons from abroad" stops immediately on the date the Secretary of State records his determination

b The issue which divided the court was whether the Home Secretary had made a determination in May 1997, when an internal record of refusal was made. Hobhouse LJ, dissenting, held that there had been no determination at that date because later correspondence was wholly inconsistent with the Home Secretary having already made a determination. The majority (Brooke LJ and Sir John Balcombe) held that the Home Secretary had made a determination in May when he was recorded as having done so, even though he continued to be willing to receive representations bearing on the applicant's claim for asylum. It is unnecessary to resolve that difference of opinion, which turned very largely on how the exchanges between the parties were properly to be understood. The facts here permit no such difference of opinion. As pointed out in [5], above, the Home Office regarded this (wrongly, as the adjudicator held) as a very clear case. Relatively prompt steps were taken to stop the payment of benefit and the provision of housing assistance and to instruct the immigration officer to resume the examination. Only with reluctance did the immigration officer agree to postpone the meeting arranged for 11 January 2000. At no stage did the Home Secretary or his officials invite or indicate willingness to consider further submissions on the appellant's asylum claim, and nothing suggests that they had second thoughts about the correctness of its rejection.

e [18] I cannot accept that a decision or determination must necessarily be regarded as provisional and lacking the quality of finality necessary for recognition as a decision or determination because it is open to the decision-maker to alter it. I take one example. Section 47(2) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 provides that:

f '... a sentence imposed, or other order made, by the Crown Court when dealing with an offender may be varied or rescinded by the Crown Court within the period of 28 days beginning with the day on which the sentence or other order was imposed or made ...'

g The existence of that power could not, in my opinion, be said to render provisional any sentence passed or order made, or to deny recognition of such sentence or order as a decision or determination. In that context, of course, the sentence or order would ordinarily be communicated to the defendant, but it has already been shown that notification or communication of a decision in this context is not, in law, a necessary condition of its recognition as having been made.

h [19] In my respectful opinion the legal principles stated by all three members of the court in Ex p Salem were correct, and I would endorse them. Applied to this case, for the reasons I have given, they compel the conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed.

j [20] I am naturally concerned that my noble and learned friends have formed a different opinion. I would not for my part question the principle of legality, let alone the importance of maintaining the rule of law. It is however a cardinal principle of the rule of law, not inconsistent with the principle of legality, that subject to exceptions not material in this case effect should be given to a clear and unambiguous legislative provision. There is nothing in any way unclear or ambiguous about the words 'recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined ... on the date on which it is so recorded'. They define the moment when a person ceases to be an asylum seeker and so disentitled to income support. The words do not say and cannot be fairly understood to mean 'recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined ... on the date on which it is so recorded and notice given to the applicant'. To contrast this provision with other provisions in which express reference is made to notification is not to rely on niceties of statutory language but to undertake a conventional exercise of construction, seeking to give effect to the meaning of the regulations. If, as I think, the meaning of reg 70(3A)(b)(i) is plain, it cannot be overridden by the terms of the Immigration Rules, which do not have legislative force and which in any event provide that refusal of asylum by the Home Secretary will be followed by the immigration officer's decision on leave to enter, at which stage (not before) notice of the refusal of asylum and the reasons for it will be given. It is only then that the applicant's right of appeal for the first time arises. While I share the distaste of my noble and learned friends for the procedure followed in this case, that distaste should not lead the House to give reg 70(3A)(b)(i) anything other than its clear and obvious meaning.

LORD STEYN.

[21] My Lords, the question is how reg 70(3A)(b)(i) of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1962, should be interpreted. The question is whether Parliament intended to authorise the withdrawing of income support by an internal note on a departmental file with legal effect from a date before notification of the decision. At first glance it may appear to be a rather technical issue. But the decision by the House may have a more general bearing on the development of our public law.

[22] The background is as follows. On 31 August 1998 the appellant applied for asylum. On 4 September 1998 she claimed income support benefits, which were paid with effect from that date. Regulation 70(3A) of the 1987 regulations provides for the payment of income support at the rate applicable for urgent cases (90% of the normal rate) to persons who are asylum seekers within the meaning of the same regulation. Regulation 70(3A)(b)(i) provides that a person ceases to be an asylum seeker (and thus loses the right to income support)—

'in the case of a claim for asylum which, on or after 5th February 1996, is recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined (other than on appeal) or abandoned, on the date on which it is so recorded ...'

On 20 November 1999 a Mr Stuart Beaton signed an internal file note. It read:

"This woman has cited numerous mishaps throughout the 1990s and puts her woes down to an encounter her father had with a drunken solicitor in 1991. There is no credibility in any of this and no Convention reason anyway. For the reasons given in the letter aside, this application has failed to establish a well founded fear of persecution. Refusal is appropriate. Case hereby recorded as determined."

On 30 November 1999 the content of this file note was communicated to the Benefits Agency. It was not communicated to the appellant and the 'letter aside' of 20 November 1999 containing the Home Secretary's reasons for refusal of asylum was not sent to the appellant.

a [23] By letter of 28 November 1999 the appellant was asked to attend an interview on 11 January 2000. On 9 December and 15 December 1999 the Benefits Agency asked for the return of the appellant's income support book. The appellant's income support was stopped without explanation with effect from 9 December 1999. On 17 December 1999 the solicitors now acting for the appellant asked the Home Office for a postponement of the interview fixed for b 11 January 2000. On 23 December 1999 the Benefits Agency advised the appellant's solicitors that it had been informed by the Home Office that the appellant's claim for asylum had been refused on 20 November 1999. For this reason the Benefits Agency had stopped the income support payments with effect from 9 December 1999. On 24 December 1999 the appellant's solicitors lodged an appeal with the Benefits Agency against the withdrawal of the c appellant's income support. A further interview was arranged by the Home Office for 7 March 2000, which was subsequently refixed for 17 April 2000. The appellant was unable to comply because she was unable to obtain funds for the train fare. Under cover of a letter dated 25 April 2000 the decision rejecting the appellant's application for asylum and refusing her leave to enter was sent to d her. The notice of refusal of leave to the appellant to enter the United Kingdom was signed by an immigration officer on 18 April 2000 and sent to the appellant. The notice of 18 April 2000 was accompanied by the reasons for refusal letter dated 20 November 1999.

[24] The hearing at first instance before Sir Christopher Bellamy QC ([2001] EWHC Admin 895, [2001] All ER (D) 353 (Oct))—to whose judgment I wish to e pay tribute—took place under the shadow of the decision of the Court of Appeal in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Salem [1999] QB 805, [1999] 2 WLR 1. In Ex p Salem the Court of Appeal (Hobhouse, Brooke LJ and Sir John Balcombe) held that for the purposes of reg 70(3A)(b)(i) a person f ceased to be entitled to income support from the date when his claim for asylum was recorded as determined on an internal file note in the Asylum Directorate in the Home Department, even though he had not yet been informed of the determination. The House granted leave to appeal the decision in Ex p Salem. In the event, the matter did not proceed as Mr Salem was granted refugee status (see [1999] 2 All ER 42, [1999] AC 450). Reluctantly, Sir Christopher felt compelled to dismiss the appellant's application for judicial g review. The Court of Appeal also regarded itself as bound by Ex p Salem. Having so decided the Court of Appeal had to dismiss the appeal of the present appellant. But the Court of Appeal voiced its concerns about the policy of the Secretary of State and the decision in Ex p Salem in clear terms. Schiemann LJ ([2002] EWCA Civ 399 at [29], [2002] All ER (D) 365 (Mar) at [29]) (with the h agreement of Hale and Sedley LJ) trenchantly observed about the factual matrix:

j 'We have also been told by leading counsel for the Home Secretary, Mr John Howell QC, that the delay of over four months between the preparation and the dispatch of the letter explaining why asylum has been refused was not accidental: it was a consistent practice. But for it, the present issue of law would have no significance. Mr Howell was wholly unable to explain it, let alone justify it. He was able to do no more than read us part of an affidavit which had been sworn in Ex p Salem which asserted that the implications of cost and effort if interim notifications were sent out were too great. When one bears in mind first that the asylum-seeker's ability to contest the refusal of asylum is entirely dependent on receipt of the Home Secretary's reasons for refusal, and secondly that the letter containing full reasons is already on file and that sooner or later the Home Office will have to put it in an envelope and post it, even the flimsy explanation we were given falls away. Since Mr Howell was able to tell us that the practice is now to send out a prompt notification (though he could not tell us whether it included reasons, and Mr Gill's instructions suggested that it did not), one is left wondering what the real reason was. Ms Anufrijeva's inability, her benefit having been stopped, to find £17 to travel to Gatwick for her "reasons for refusal" interview gives little to be proud of.' a

In oral argument before the House counsel stated that the Secretary of State did not condone delay in notification of a decision on asylum. These were weasel words. There was no unintended lapse. The practice of not notifying asylum seekers of the fact of withdrawal of income support was consistently and deliberately adopted. There simply is no rational explanation for such a policy. Having abandoned this practice the Secretary of State still seeks to justify it as lawful. It provides a peep into contemporary standards of public administration. Transparency is not its hallmark. It is not an encouraging picture. c

[25] The Court of Appeal observed about the interpretation of the regulation (at [30]):

'... once an asylum seeker knows that her application has been refused, and that she is not to be given leave to enter the country on any other basis, and has the reasons for those decisions, she can reasonably be expected to make a choice: either to accept the decision and leave or to stay and fight but without recourse to state benefits. But she cannot reasonably be expected to make that choice before she knows of the decisions and the reasons for them. There is nothing in the material before us to suggest that it is consistent with the declared purpose of the regulation to expect her to do so.' e

I would respectfully endorse this observation.

[26] The arguments for the Home Secretary ignore fundamental principles of our law. Notice of a decision is required before it can have the character of a determination with legal effect because the individual concerned must be in a position to challenge the decision in the courts if he or she wishes to do so. This is not a technical rule. It is simply an application of the right of access to justice. That is a fundamental and constitutional principle of our legal system (see Raymond v Honey [1982] 1 All ER 756 at 758-759, [1983] 1 AC 1 at 10 per Lord Wilberforce, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Leech [1993] 4 All ER 539 at 547, [1994] QB 198 at 209, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, [2000] 2 AC 115). g

[27] What then is the relevance of this dimension for the present case? The answer is provided by Lord Hoffmann's elegant explanation of the principle of legality in Ex p Simms. He said: j

'Parliamentary sovereignty means that Parliament can, if it chooses, legislate contrary to fundamental principles of human rights. The Human Rights Act 1998 will not detract from this power. The constraints upon its

- a exercise by Parliament are ultimately political, not legal. But the principle of legality means that Parliament must squarely confront what it is doing and accept the political cost. Fundamental rights cannot be overridden by general or ambiguous words. This is because there is too great a risk that the full implications of their unqualified meaning may have passed unnoticed in the democratic process. In the absence of express language or necessary
- b implication to the contrary, the courts therefore presume that even the most general words were intended to be subject to the basic rights of the individual. In this way the courts of the United Kingdom, though acknowledging the sovereignty of Parliament, apply principles of constitutionality little different from those which exist in countries where the power of the legislature is expressly limited by a constitutional document.' (See [1999] 3 All ER 400 at 412, [2000] 2 AC 115 at 131.)
- c

- This principle may find its primary application in respect of cases under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). But the convention is not an exhaustive statement of fundamental rights under our
- d system of law. Lord Hoffmann's dictum applies to fundamental rights beyond the four corners of the convention. It is engaged in the present case.

- [28] This view is reinforced by the constitutional principle requiring the rule of law to be observed. That principle too requires that a constitutional state must accord to individuals the right to know of a decision before their rights can be adversely affected. The antithesis of such a state was described by Kafka: a state
- e where the rights of individuals are overridden by hole in the corner decisions or knocks on doors in the early hours. That is not our system. I accept, of course, that there must be exceptions to this approach, notably in the criminal field, eg arrests and search warrants, where notification is not possible. But it is difficult
- f to visualise a rational argument which could even arguably justify putting the present case in the exceptional category. If this analysis is right, it also engages the principle of construction explained by Lord Hoffmann in Ex p Simms.

- [29] In European law the approach is possibly a little more formalistic but the thrust is the same. It has been held to be a 'fundamental principle in the Community legal order ... that a measure adopted by the public authorities shall
- g not be applicable to those concerned before they have the opportunity to make themselves acquainted with it' (see Firma A Racke v Hauptzollamt Mainz Case 98/78 [1979] ECR 69 at 84 (para 15), Opel Austria GmbH (Austria intervening) v EU Council (European Commission intervening) Case T-115/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 97 at 118, [1997] ECR II-39 at 82 (para 124), Schwarze European Administrative Law (1992) pp 1416–1420, Council of Europe Publishing The administration and you—A handbook (1996) Ch 3 (para 49).
- h

- [30] Until the decision in Ex p Salem it had never been suggested that an uncommunicated administrative decision can bind an individual. It is an astonishingly unjust proposition. In our system of law surprise is regarded as the enemy of justice. Fairness is the guiding principle of our public law. In Hillingdon London BC v Commission for Racial Equality [1982] AC 779 at 787, [1982] 3 WLR 159 at 165 Lord Diplock explained the position:
- j

'Where an Act of Parliament confers upon an administrative body functions which involve its making decisions which affect to their detriment the rights of other persons or curtail their liberty to do as they please, there is a presumption that Parliament intended that the administrative body should act fairly towards those persons who will be affected by their decision.'

Where decisions are published or notified to those concerned accountability of public authorities is achieved. Elementary fairness therefore supports a principle that a decision takes effect only upon communication.

[31] If this analysis is correct, it is plain that Parliament has not expressly or by necessary implication legislated to the contrary effect. The decision in question involves a fundamental right. It is in effect one involving a binding determination as to status. It is of importance to the individual to be informed of it so that he or she can decide what to do. Moreover, neither cost nor administrative convenience can in such a case conceivably justify a different approach. This is underlined by the fact that the bizarre earlier practice has now been abandoned. Given this context Parliament has not in specific and unmistakable terms legislated to displace the applicable constitutional principles.

[32] The contrary arguments can be dealt with quite briefly. Counsel for the Home Secretary submits that before a 'determination' can be 'notified' there must be a determination. This is legalism and conceptualism run riot. One can readily accept that in this case there must have been a decision as reflected in the file note. That does not mean that the statutory requirement of a 'determination' has been fulfilled. On the contrary, the decision is provisional until notified.

[33] Counsel for the Home Secretary relied strongly on some niceties of statutory language. He pointed out that reg 21ZA of the 1987 regulations, as well as in s 6 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, the draftsmen provided expressly for notification. In contrast reg 70(3A)(b)(i) makes no reference to notification. The fact, however, that other provisions made the requirement of notification explicit does not rule out the possibility that notification was all along implicit in the concept of 'the determination'. For my part a stronger indication of Parliamentary intent is provided by the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1994) (HC 395), which were laid before Parliament on 23 May 1994 under s 3(2) of the Immigration Act 1971. The concept of a 'refusal' of asylum to be found in rr 331, 333 and 348 plainly contemplates notification of an adverse decision. These rules are part of the contextual scene of reg 70(3A)(b)(i). They support the argument that notification of a decision is necessary for it to become a determination. But the major point is that the semantic arguments of counsel for the Home Secretary cannot displace the constitutional principles outlined above.

[34] For all these reasons I would reject the submissions of counsel for the Home Secretary and hold that Ex p Salem was wrongly decided. It follows that in my view the present appeal should be allowed.

[35] My noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill has observed that the Home Secretary was under a public law duty to give notice within a reasonable time but that breach of this duty cannot nullify or invalidate his decision. I would question this conclusion. It is important to bear in mind that the breach involved a deliberate policy decision by the Home Office not to comply with the public law duty. This amounts to an abuse of power and ought to preclude the Home Secretary from relying on his unlawful conduct until notification has taken place. While generally an estoppel cannot operate against the Crown, it can be estopped when it is abusing its powers (see HTV Ltd v Price Commission [1976] ICR 170 at 185 per Lord Denning MR, Preston v IRC [1985] 2 a All ER 327 at 340, [1985] AC 835 at 865 per Lord Templeman, Laker Airways Ltd v Dept of Trade [1977] 2 All ER 182 at 194, 195–196, [1977] QB 643 at 707, 709 per Lord Denning MR, Roskill LJ, respectively). For this further reason I would reject the submissions made on behalf of the Home Secretary.

b [36] I recognise, of course, that in some ways the appellant's case does not merit great sympathy. But even in unprepossessing cases fundamental principles must be upheld. The rule of law requires it. In my view the appellant is entitled to recover income support until proper notification of the determination on 25 April 2000. I would therefore allow the appeal.

c [37] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn. For the reasons he has given, I too would allow this appeal.

d [38] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the powerful speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Steyn. Until then I was of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed; but I have been persuaded to change my mind.

e [39] I agree that a determination must actually be made before it can properly be recorded; and that it is not necessarily merely provisional until it is notified to the person or persons adversely affected by it. But it does not follow that it has legal effect before it has been notified; and it is fallacious to suppose that an uncommunicated decision must be effective for all purposes or for none.

f [40] I am satisfied that the appellant's asylum application was determined on 20 November 1999, that the determination was final and not provisional, and that it had immediate legal effect for some purposes. Thus it returned the responsibility for deciding the appellant's immigrant status to the immigration officer, so that he could consider whether she should be granted exceptional leave to remain. But she could not be removed from or required to leave the United Kingdom until she had been given notice of the decision on her claim: s 6 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 expressly so provided. The question is whether the refusal of her application had immediate effect for the purpose of ending her entitlement to income support or took effect for this purpose only when she was notified of it.

g [41] I was initially influenced by two considerations. One was the evidence that it was Parliament's intention to deprive asylum seekers of social security benefits even while the decision to refuse asylum is under challenge. On further reflection I do not think that this can be determinative of the present question: it does not follow that Parliament intended to deprive an asylum seeker of benefit before he or she is even told of the decision.

h [42] The second consideration was textual. Benefit ends when the claimant 'ceases to be an asylum seeker'; and this depends on the date on which the claim to asylum 'is recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined'. There is a conspicuous absence of any reference to the need to notify the claimant of the decision. The claimant ceases to be an asylum seeker, neither on the date when the decision is made nor on the date when it is notified to the claimant, but on the date on which it is recorded. This initially persuaded me that even the deliberate failure to inform the appellant at the same time as the benefit office of the outcome of her application for asylum was merely an act of maladministration which did not invalidate the decision or delay the time at which her entitlement to benefit should cease. a [43] But I am persuaded that the omission was of more fundamental effect. The presumption that notice of a decision must be given to the person adversely affected by it before it can have legal effect is a strong one. It cannot be lightly overturned. I do not subscribe to the view that the failure to notify the appellant of the decision invalidated it, but I have come to the conclusion that it could not properly be recorded so as to deprive her of her right to income support until it was communicated to her; or at least until reasonable steps were taken to do so. This does not require any violation to be done to para (3A) of reg 70 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967. It means only that the word 'determined' in that paragraph should be read as meaning not merely 'actually determined' but as meaning 'determined in such manner as to affect the claimant's legal rights'. The presumption against legal effect being given to uncommunicated decisions does the rest. The determination must have been made and appropriate steps must have been taken to communicate it to the claimant before it can lawfully be recorded so as to have the effect contended for. b

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[45] My Lords, the appellant, Nadezda Anufrijeva, arrived in this country from Lithuania on 31 August 1998 and made an application for asylum as a Geneva convention refugee (see Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951; TS 39 (1953); Cmnd 9171)). On 4 September 1998 she made a claim for income support. Entitlement to income support is governed by Pt VII of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 and the regulations made thereunder (or under one of the Act's legislative predecessors). The regulations applicable to the appellant's claim were the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967. e

[46] A 'person from abroad' (see reg 21(3) of the 1987 regulations) is not entitled to income support unless he or she qualifies for such support as an urgent case. Persons from abroad falling within an urgent case category are entitled to 90% of the normal amount of income support. Asylum seekers, who often, if not usually, arrive in this country with no means of support, are recognised as falling within an urgent case category. The appellant accordingly qualified for income support as an asylum seeker and as from 4 September 1998 received income support at 90% of the normal rate. g

[47] The appellant continued to receive income support until 9 December 1999 when it ceased. It ceased because the Benefits Agency had been informed by the Home Office that she had ceased to be an asylum seeker. The Home Office was purporting to apply para (3A)(b)(i) of reg 70 of the 1987 regulations. Paragraph (3A)(b)(i) says that: j

'... a person ... (b) ceases to be an asylum seeker—(i) in the case of a claim for asylum which, on or after 5th February 1996, is recorded by the Secretary of State as having been determined (other than on appeal) or abandoned, on the date on which it is so recorded ...'

a [48] The file entry which led the Home Office to inform the Benefits Agency that the appellant had ceased to be an asylum seeker was contained in a Home Office file note dated 20 November 1999 which said, inter alia, that—

b ‘For the reasons given in the letter aside, this applicant has failed to establish a well founded fear of persecution. Refusal is appropriate. Case hereby recorded as determined. Certified under 5(4)(a).’

So 20 November 1999 is the date on which, the Home Office contend, it was recorded that the appellant’s asylum claim had been determined.

c [49] The ‘letter aside’ referred to in the note was a letter, also dated 20 November 1999, which set out the reasons for the refusal of the appellant’s asylum claim. The letter was addressed to the appellant but it was not sent to her until much later, nor was any other notification of the refusal of her asylum claim sent to her. This was not an oversight on the part of the Home Office; it appears to have been departmental policy not to communicate to an asylum seeker that his or her claim for asylum had been refused until an immigration officer had had the opportunity to consider whether the asylum seeker’s request for leave to enter the country should be granted on some other ground than that of refugee status. Once the immigration officer had reached a decision on the request for leave to enter, the asylum seeker would then be informed of it and at the same time would be sent the letter stating that his or her claim to refugee status had been refused and the reasons for the refusal.

e [50] In the present case the appellant was not sent the letter refusing her claim for asylum and telling her the reasons for the refusal until 25 April 2000 notwithstanding that the letter had been written as long before as 20 November 1999 and in the intervening period had simply been retained in the Home Office file.

f [51] The appellant must, of course, have come to understand in a roundabout way that her asylum claim had been refused but she did not know the reasons for the refusal until she received on 25 April 2000 the ‘letter aside’ dated 20 November 1999. The relevant sequence of events between those two dates is set out in [22], [23], above, and I need not repeat them.

g [52] The departmental policy that led to the long delay in notifying the appellant that her asylum claim had been refused, and why, has been the subject of adverse comments by the Court of Appeal, cited by Lord Steyn in his opinion, and by Lord Steyn on his own account (see [24], above). I would wish to associate myself fully with Lord Steyn’s comments. There seem to have been no practical reasons why the refusal of an asylum claim and the reasons for it could not have been promptly notified to the asylum seeker. It is true that the asylum seeker’s request for leave to enter the country had to be dealt with by an immigration officer and that the immigration officer’s role in dealing with the request for leave to enter was a role separate from although complementary to the Secretary of State’s role in deciding whether to allow or refuse the asylum claim. But the immigration officer’s role would not be in the least prejudiced or undermined by a prompt notification to the asylum seeker of the fate of the asylum claim. The connection, if there is one, between the immigration officer’s role and the institutional delay by the Home Office in notifying asylum seekers of the fate of their asylum claims does not constitute a practical reason justifying the delay. That it was no such thing seems to me to be shown by the fact that the practice has apparently now been abandoned.

[53] Be that as it may, the issue for your Lordships on this appeal is whether the unnotified decision of the Secretary of State to refuse the appellant's asylum claim, 'recorded as determined' according to the 20 November 1999 note, effectively deprived her as from that date of her status as an asylum seeker for income support purposes, or whether she retained that status until she was notified on 25 April 2000, by her eventual receipt of the letter of 20 November 1999, of the refusal of her asylum claim.

[54] The issue is one of construction of reg 70(3A)(b)(i) of the 1987 regulations. Paragraph (3A) was added to reg 70 by an amendment made in 1996. Like any other provision of primary or secondary legislation, para (3A)(b)(i) must be construed in the context of the statutory scheme of which it forms part. The statutory scheme includes s 11(1) of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, cited in [13] of the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, which makes explicit Parliament's intention to give power to the Secretary of State to make regulations excluding asylum seekers from entitlement to income support. And there is no doubt that para (3A)(b)(i) was intended to exclude asylum seekers from income support once a particular stage in the progress of their asylum claims had been reached. But what was that stage? At what point are asylum claims to be regarded as 'having been determined'?

[55] The contextual background against which para (3A)(b)(i) must be construed consists also of the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1994) (HC 395). The rules current in 1996, when para (3A)(b)(i) was added to reg 70, included r 333, cited in [8], above. Rule 333 makes clear that the refusal of an asylum claim is to be notified to the asylum seeker by a 'notice of refusal' which will inform him or her of the reasons for the refusal. Rules 331 and 348 underline the point. It is, indeed, inherent in the concept of a 'refusal' that it should be communicated to the person to whom it is directed. The communication of a refusal may be either by words or by conduct from which the requisite inference can be drawn, but without communication there will be no more than a non-acceptance, a quite different concept from that of a refusal. The Immigration Rules require a refusal and that the refusal is to be communicated by a 'notice of refusal'.

[56] It has been rightly accepted before your Lordships that, for the purposes of reg 70(3A)(b)(i), an asylum claim cannot be 'recorded as determined' until it has actually been 'determined'. The submissions of counsel for the Secretary of State draw a distinction between the refusal of the asylum claim for the purposes of the Immigration Rules, which requires a notice of the refusal to be sent to the asylum seeker, and the determination of the claim for the purposes of reg 70(3A)(b)(i), which does not. So the claim can be 'determined' before it has been 'refused'. This is an elegant linguistic conceptual distinction but it makes, to my mind, little practical sense and is redolent with unfairness to the asylum seeker.

[57] My noble and learned friend Lord Steyn has cogently explained why an uncommunicated decision terminating an asylum seeker's right to income support offends against well-established principles of legality and access to justice. I cannot improve on his exposition and agree with it. Parliament can, of course, override these principles. But in s 11(1) of the 1996 Act Parliament has not done so expressly. There is nothing in the empowering provision to suggest a Parliamentary intention that an asylum seeker's status as an asylum seeker entitled to income support can be terminated not only without the asylum a seeker being told the reasons for the termination of the status but without the asylum seeker even being notified of the termination.

[58] There are, therefore, two reasons why, in my opinion, this appeal must succeed and R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Salem [1999] 2 All ER 42, [1999] AC 450 be overruled. First, I would construe the reference in reg 70(3A)(b)(i) to an asylum claim being 'determined' in a manner consistent with the Immigration Rules and hold that it cannot be 'determined' until it has been refused and that that requires notification. Second, and alternatively, I consider that s 11(1) of the 1996 Act did not empower the Secretary of State to make regulations which have the effect that an asylum seeker can be deprived of that status for income support purposes without notification.

b [59] For these reasons, supplemental to those of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn with which I am in complete agreement, I would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

[2002] EWCA Civ 774

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, ROBERT WALKER AND CLARKE LJ

15, 29 MAY 2002

Conflict of laws – Foreign judgment – Registration in England – Setting aside registration – Judgment obtained without notice to defendant – Whether judgment obtained in breach of right to fair trial – Whether registration contrary to public policy – Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, Sch 1, art 27(1), (2) – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6(1).

In 1984 the applicant commenced negligence proceedings in the Netherlands against the respondent, a dentist then practising in that country. The proceedings were duly served on the respondent, whose lawyers filed a defence on his behalf. In 1986 the proceedings were stayed because of the applicant's bankruptcy. In 1991 the respondent moved to England and informed the local authorities and the Dutch dentists' association of his new address. Seven years later, the applicant instructed a new firm of lawyers to pursue the claim. The applicant's lawyers contacted the respondent's lawyers, who informed them that the respondent was living in England. The respondent's lawyers thereupon withdrew from the case because they could not obtain instructions. Judgment was entered in favour of the applicant. The respondent was still unaware of the reactivation of the proceedings when his right of appeal expired three months later. The applicant sought to register the judgment in England and Wales pursuant to the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (the Brussels Convention)^a, which application was granted by the master. Article 27(1) of the Brussels Convention provided that a judgment should not be recognised if recognition would be contrary to public policy in the state in which it was sought and art 27(2) provided that a judgment should not be recognised where it was given in default of appearance and the defendant was not duly served with the document which instituted the proceedings in sufficient time to enable him or her to arrange for a defence. On appeal, the judge held that the right to an effective opportunity to defend oneself in civil proceedings was an important public policy in England and Wales and throughout the European Union and that the respondent had been denied that right. The judge therefore declared himself satisfied that the recognition of the judgment of the Dutch court would be contrary to the public policy of England and Wales because the procedures of the Dutch court had made it possible for a stale claim to be revived and pursued to judgment in circumstances in which the respondent was not aware of the reactivation of proceedings and in which he was not personally at fault. The applicant appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending, inter alia, that the judge had erred in having carried out a review of whether the respondent had received a fair trial before the Dutch court. The respondent submitted that the protection of the right to a fair trial, which was a requirement of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental

- a Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), was a requirement of public policy in England and Wales and, as to the facts, that the judge had correctly concluded that no fault lay with him.

- Held – One of the fundamental objectives of the Brussels Convention was to facilitate the free movement of judgments by providing for a simple and rapid enforcement procedure. That objective would be frustrated if the courts of an enforcing state could be required to carry out a detailed review of whether the procedures that had resulted in the judgment had complied with art 6 of the convention. The courts should therefore apply a strong presumption that the procedures of other signatory states to the convention were compliant with art 6. However, that did not mean that the court was to apply an irrebuttable presumption that a judgment given in another European Community member state could not have resulted from a breach of art 6: although the court of a state asked to enforce a judgment could not decline, on the ground of public policy, to enforce that judgment on the ground that it infringed Community law, there was a distinction in principle between a decision that resolved an issue of substantive law and a decision reached by a procedure that violated the fundamental human right to a fair trial. Moreover, the provisions of art 27(2) of the Brussels Convention expressly recognised the paramount importance of one aspect of the right to a fair trial; the trial process had to ensure that the defendant had a fair chance to defend himself. It was thus clear that in an exceptional case where the procedure of the court first seised had resulted in a defendant being prevented from putting his or her case to the court, art 27(1) of the Brussels Convention could justify a refusal to enforce the resultant judgment on grounds of public policy. In the instant case, the respondent had been unaware that proceedings in the Netherlands against him had been reactivated until even the time for an appeal had passed, and he had not been present or had any representation at the trial. The respondent had manifestly not received the fair trial required by art 6 and there could be no doubt that the judge had been correct to conclude that it would have been contrary to public policy to enforce the applicant's judgment. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [23]–[30], [37], [38], below).

Appeal

Wim Harry Gerard Maronier appealed with the permission of Dyson LJ from the decision of Judge Richard Seymour QC sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division on 22 May 2001 whereby he dismissed an appeal from the order of Deputy Master Chism made on 2 February 2001 setting aside registration of a judgment of the District Court of Rotterdam on 30 December 1999 made against the respondent, Bryan Larmer. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. b

29 May 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR. eINTRODUCTION

[1] Mr Maronier is a citizen of the Netherlands. He appeals against the decision of Judge Richard Seymour QC (sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division). He dismissed an appeal against the order of Deputy Master Chism made on 2 February 2001. By that order the deputy master set aside registration of a judgment of the District Court of Rotterdam dated 30 December 1999. By that judgment Mr Maronier was awarded damages assessed at 17,864 Netherlands guilders, together with interest and costs. As we shall explain, the procedure followed in this case has gone awry, but it is accepted that this court has jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. f

[2] This appeal raises an issue as to the manner of application of art 27(1) of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (the Brussels Convention). With effect from 1 March 2002 a new regime for the enforcement of Community judgments was introduced under the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Order 2001, SI 2001/3929. Under the transitional provisions that order has no effect on this appeal and the wording of the new order raises similar issues to those arising on this appeal. Those issues arise in the context of facts which are quite extraordinary. Furthermore, the evidence before the court leaves unclear a number of matters which are or might be material. g a [4] Mr Larmer, the respondent, is now aged 68. Since 1991 he has lived at an address in Kingston-upon-Thames. Between 1978 and 1991 he practised as a dentist in Rotterdam. One of his patients was the appellant, Mr Maronier. In 1983 Mr Maronier complained to the Rotterdam Dental Association, which is a local branch of the Dutch Association of Dentists, about treatment that he had received from Mr Larmer. This complaint led, after an informal hearing, to b Mr Larmer being fined the equivalent of about £1,600 and subsequently being ordered to pay the costs of remedial treatment by another dentist.

EVENTS IN HOLLAND

[5] On 12 March 1984 Mr Maronier commenced proceedings in the District Court of Rotterdam in which he claimed damages in respect of the treatment that he had received, which he alleged was negligent, in the sum of 57,059 Netherlands guilders. That is the equivalent of approximately £17,000. c The proceedings were duly served on Mr Larmer in the Netherlands. Mr Larmer consulted the firm of de Blik Linssen, which appears to have been a partnership of Mr de Blik and Mr Linssen. Mr Linssen filed a defence on Mr Larmer's behalf. There was then an exchange of pleadings and statements, ending with a statement filed by Mr Maronier on 2 May 1986.

d [6] A statement filed on behalf of Mr Maronier by Mr Jacobs, a lawyer whom he instructed later in the story, informs us that the proceedings brought against Mr Larmer were delayed due to the fact that Mr Maronier was working abroad for long periods and also suffered chronic health problems and that the proceedings in the District Court of Rotterdam were stayed. Surprisingly, Mr Jacobs omits to state why the proceedings were stayed. The reason is that on e 20 May 1986 Mr Maronier went bankrupt. The bankruptcy was dissolved on 3 March 1987.

f [8] Nothing that is relevant then occurred until, in July 1998, Mr Maronier instructed a new firm of lawyers, of which Mr Jacobs was a partner, to pursue his claim. These lawyers, a firm called Kniestedt Jacobs & Duijs, wrote a letter dated 23 July 1998 to Mr Linssen, which was not put in evidence. Mr Linssen had by this time dissolved his partnership with Mr de Blik. Mr Linssen's reply dated the 24 July 1998 read:

g 'In the above-mentioned matter we received your letter of 23 July 1998. This matter is unknown to me; the matter is not a current matter and does not show in our records. Apart from that, I have had no contact with the client for a number of years. According to my information, the client is presently living in England. I am sorry that I cannot inform you otherwise.'

h [9] What then occurred is described by Mr Jacobs as follows:

i 'When the proceedings were reactivated, the defendant was represented before the District Court of Rotterdam by his solicitor, Mr J de Blik. At the point the proceedings recommenced, Mr de Blik declared himself to be "incapable", which in Holland means a solicitor withdraws from a case due to problems encountered with his client. The withdrawal of Mr de Blik from the proceedings was agreed by the District Court of Rotterdam as can be seen from the front page of the judgment dated the 30 December 1999 ... I believe, in this current matter, that Mr de Blik withdrew from the case as he could not obtain any instructions from his client.'

[10] The judgment to which Mr Jacobs refers records Mr Larmer as 'residing in Rotterdam' and adds: 'Attorney initially Mr J de Blik, presently not represented anymore in law.' That judgment awarded Mr Maronier 17,864 Netherlands guilders together with 'statutory interest' and costs. Interest vastly exceeded the capital sum awarded, and the total amount of the judgment was 70,234 Netherlands guilders. a [11] Under Dutch procedure there was a right of appeal against this judgment. That right expired, however, three months after the judgment, at a time when Mr Larmer was not yet aware of the reactivation of the action, let alone of its outcome. It is common ground that the judgment is now 'unassailable' in Holland. b

MATTERS NOT IN EVIDENCE c

[12] The following matters cannot be deduced from the evidence before us: (i) what Mr Larmer could reasonably expect to happen to the proceedings once the action was stayed; (ii) what Mr Larmer could reasonably expect to happen to the proceedings when he left for England approximately five years after the last step had been taken in the action; (iii) whether Mr Larmer should have instructed de Blik Linssen to continue to represent him in the action; (iv) what, if any, grounds were required for reactivating the action, after so long a delay; (v) what procedures had to be followed to reactivate the action; (vi) what duty, if any, either Mr Linssen or Mr de Blik owed to Mr Larmer when the action was reactivated after 12 years of inactivity; (vii) what explanation Mr de Blik advanced to the court when obtaining permission to withdraw from the case; (viii) whether, as the judgment suggests, the court believed that Mr Larmer was resident in Rotterdam; (ix) the basis upon which the rules of the Rotterdam District Court permitted the claimant to proceed to obtain a judgment in the absence of Mr Larmer; (x) the nature of the time limit placed on the exercise of the right of appeal and in particular whether the District Court had any discretion to extend the period within which to appeal if Mr Larmer was unaware of the judgment; (xi) how Mr Maronier obtained Mr Larmer's address in Kingston-upon-Thames, which he succeeded in doing for the purpose of enforcement. d

PROVISIONS OF THE BRUSSELS CONVENTION e

[13] In addition to its application under the transitional provisions of the 2001 order, the Brussels Convention remains applicable between member states and Denmark. We shall refer to its effects in the present tense, despite its limited field of application. f

[14] The Brussels Convention has the force of law in the United Kingdom by virtue of the provisions of s 2 of the 1982 Act. The following provisions of the Brussels Convention are material: g

'Article 26

A judgment given in a Contracting State shall be recognised in the other Contracting States without any special procedure being required ... h

Article 27

A judgment shall not be recognised: i

(1) if such recognition is contrary to public policy in the State in which recognition is sought;

(2) where it was given in default of appearance, if the defendant was not duly served with the document which instituted the proceedings or with an

- a equivalent document in sufficient time to enable him to arrange for his defence ...

Article 31

A judgment given in a Contracting State and enforceable in that State shall be enforced in another Contracting State when, on the application of any interested party, it has been declared enforceable there. However, in the United Kingdom, such a judgment shall be enforced in England and Wales, in Scotland, or in Northern Ireland when, on the application of any interested party, it has been registered for enforcement in that part of the United Kingdom.

Article 32

- c 1. The application shall be submitted ...
(1) in England and Wales, to the High Court of Justice ...

Article 33

The procedure for making the application shall be governed by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought ...

- d Article 34

The court applied to shall give its decision without delay; the party against whom enforcement is sought shall not at this stage of the proceedings be entitled to make any submissions on the application.

The application may be refused only for one of the reasons specified in Articles 27 and 28.

- e Under no circumstances may the foreign judgment be reviewed as to its substance ...

Article 36

- f If enforcement is authorised, the party against whom enforcement is sought may appeal against the decision within one month of service thereof ...

Article 37

An appeal against the decision authorising enforcement shall be lodged in accordance with the rules governing procedure in contentious matters ...

- g (1) in England and Wales, with the High Court of Justice ... The judgment given on the appeal may be contested only ... in the United Kingdom, by a single further appeal on a point of law.'

THE ERROR OF PROCEDURE

- h [15] The procedure for recognition and enforcement of a judgment required by the Brussels Convention differs from that normal in this jurisdiction in the following respect. The application for enforcement is made to a master without notice to the judgment debtor. Under normal procedure the judgment debtor would be entitled to apply to have an order made in such circumstances set aside. The convention requires, however, that he is not allowed to make any submissions on the application, but is to have a right to appeal. When Mr Maronier's judgment was registered, the material provision of the CPR was in CPR Sch 1 RSC Ord 71 r 33, which provided: '(1) An appeal under article 37 ... must be made to a judge by application in accordance with CPR Pt 23.'

[16] The order obtained by Mr Maronier, which was made by Master Trench on 14 July 2000, provided:

'IT IS ORDERED that the judgment dated the 30 December 1999 of the District Court of Rotterdam be registered in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice pursuant to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982. AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the said Bryan Larmer shall have liberty within two months after service upon them of notice of registration of the judgment to appeal against such registration and execution shall not issue to enforce the judgment until after the expiry of that period or until after any such appeal has been determined.'

[17] This order was served on Mr Larmer on 10 August 2000 at his home in Kingston-upon-Thames. This was the first notice that he received that the Rotterdam proceedings had been reactivated.

[18] What Mr Larmer should have done, in accordance with the procedure set out above, was to appeal against this order to a High Court judge. Instead, those acting for Mr Larmer 'appealed' to Deputy Master Chism. He, despite protest from those representing Mr Maronier that he had no jurisdiction, entertained the appeal and allowed it. He did so on the ground that it was contrary to public policy in this country for Mr Maronier's lawyers, in the circumstances described above, to revive his case without making any attempt to trace Mr Larmer in order to give notice of what they were doing.

[19] The appropriate course in these circumstances is to disregard the hearing before Deputy Master Chism as a procedural aberration and treat the judgment of Judge Seymour as if it had been delivered pursuant to a first appeal.

THE JUDGMENT BELOW

[20] Judge Seymour upheld the decision of Deputy Master Chism. He reviewed relevant European case precedent, which we consider below. He expressed his conclusion as follows:

'The right to an effective opportunity to defend oneself in civil as in criminal proceedings is thus, in my judgment, an important public policy in England and Wales as throughout the European Union. On the facts of the present case, Mr Larmer has been denied that right. I am satisfied on the evidence that he personally is not in any way to blame for that state of affairs arising. A suggestion by Mr Pryce, that in relation to an action in which no steps had been taken by the claimant for five years before Mr Larmer left the Netherlands, he should have kept the District Court of Rotterdam notified of his address, or kept in touch with his Dutch lawyers, I regard as fanciful. Mr Larmer's uncontradicted evidence is that he notified the City Hall in Rotterdam, and the Dutch Association of Dentists, of his address in England. In the result, I am satisfied that the recognition of the judgment of the District Court of Rotterdam is contrary to the public policy of England and Wales because the procedures of the Dutch court have made it possible for a very stale claim to be revived and pursued to judgment without the defendant ever being aware of what was going on and in circumstances in which he was not personally at fault, he having every reason to suppose that the claim had been abandoned.'

[21] On behalf of Mr Maronier, Mr Ralls QC advanced two submissions: (i) the judge had erred in carrying out a review of whether Mr Larmer had received a fair trial before the Rotterdam District Court; (ii) the judge erred in his

a finding as to absence of fault. He should have found that, though Mr Larmer might not be personally at fault, his lawyers were at fault for withdrawing from representing him without informing him that the action was being revived. In such circumstances there was no justification for denying recognition of the judgment.

b [22] For Mr Larmer, Mr Foy QC contended that protection of the right to a fair trial, which was a requirement under art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the convention), was a requirement of public policy in England. If a defendant had not had a fair trial, then recognition of the judgment was contrary to public policy. As to the facts, Mr Foy submitted
c that the judge had correctly concluded that no fault lay with Mr Larmer. The same was true of his lawyers. To conduct the trial when Mr Larmer was in ignorance that it had been revived had violated his right to a fair trial under art 6. Quite apart from this, a delay in pursuing the claim for 12 years was an independent violation of that article.

d PUBLIC POLICY AND THE RIGHT TO A FAIR TRIAL

[23] Mr Ralls submitted forcefully that Holland, as a party to the convention, is committed to ensuring that art 6 is observed. Dutch courts would automatically have regard for the requirements of art 6. It was contrary to the e scheme of the recognition and enforcement provisions of the Brussels Convention for one member state to review or 'second guess' compliance with art 6 by the courts of another member state.

[24] We sympathise with the broad thrust of Mr Ralls' submissions. As the Court of Justice of the European Communities observed in Solo Kleinmotoren GmbH v Boch Case C-414/92 [1994] ECR I-2237 at 2256 (para 20), one of the fundamental f objectives of the Brussels Convention is to 'facilitate, to the greatest extent possible, the free movement of judgments by providing for a simple and rapid enforcement procedure'. This objective would be frustrated if courts of an enforcing state could be required to carry out a detailed review of whether the procedures that resulted in the judgment had complied with art 6.

g [25] Court procedures differ from one state to another and the courts of this country should apply a strong presumption that the procedures of other signatories of the convention are compliant with art 6. What we cannot accept is that we must apply an irrebuttable presumption that a judgment given in another member state cannot have resulted from a violation of art 6.

h [26] Where the state first seised of a dispute reaches a decision of substantive law, even if it is a decision on its own jurisdiction, the court of a state asked to enforce the resultant judgment cannot decline, on grounds of public policy, to enforce the decision on the ground that it infringes Community law. As the j Court of Justice observed in Régie Nationale des Usines Renault SA v Maxicar SpA Case C-38/98 [2000] ECR I-2973 at 3021–3022 (para 32): 'It is for the national court to ensure with equal diligence the protection of rights established in national law and rights conferred by Community law.' There is, however, a distinction in principle between a decision that resolves an issue of substantive law and a decision reached by a procedure that violates the fundamental human right to a fair trial.

[27] The provisions of art 27(2) of the Brussels Convention expressly recognise the paramount importance of one aspect of the right to a fair trial. The trial process must ensure that the defendant has a fair chance to defend himself. The court must hear both parties: see Hendrikman v Magenta Druck & Verlag GmbH Case C-78/95 [1996] All ER (EC) 944 at 959, [1997] QB 426 at 441, [1996] ECR I-4943 at 4966 (para 15) and cases there cited. a

[28] In Krombach v Bamberski Case C-7/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 584, [2001] QB 709, [2001] ECR I-1935 the Court of Justice considered an objection under art 27(1) to the enforcement in Germany of an award of damages made following the conviction of the defendant at a criminal trial in Paris. The defendant declined to attend the relevant hearing in person, but sought to be legally represented at the hearing. He was not allowed to do so. He challenged enforcement of the subsequent award of damages on the ground that he had been denied a fair hearing in violation of his art 6 rights. The Bundesgerichtshof sought a ruling on whether this was a matter to which it could legitimately have regard under art 27(1). The court observed ([2001] All ER (EC) 584 at 604, [2001] QB 709 at 728–729, [2001] ECR I-1935) that: b

‘25. The court has consistently held that fundamental rights form an integral part of the general principles of law whose observance the court ensures ... For that purpose, the court draws inspiration from the constitutional traditions common to the member states and from the guidelines supplied by international treaties for the protection of human rights on which the member states have collaborated or of which they are signatories. In that regard, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969) (the European Convention on Human Rights) has particular significance ...’ c

26. The court has thus expressly recognised the general principle of Community law that everyone is entitled to fair legal process, which is inspired by those fundamental rights ...’ d

‘42. ... it follows from a line of case law developed by the court on the basis of the principles referred to in paras 25 and 26, above, that observance of the right to a fair hearing is, in all proceedings initiated against a person which are liable to culminate in a measure adversely affecting that person, a fundamental principle of Community law which must be guaranteed even in the absence of any rules governing the proceedings in question ...’ f

43. The court has also held that, even though the [Brussels Convention] is intended to secure the simplification of formalities governing the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments of courts or tribunals, it is not permissible to achieve that aim by undermining the rights to a fair hearing ... g

44. It follows from the foregoing developments in the case law that recourse to the public policy clause must be regarded as being possible in exceptional cases where the guarantees laid down in the legislation of the state of origin and in the convention itself have been insufficient to protect the defendant from a manifest breach of his right to defend himself before h a the court of origin, as recognised by the European Convention on Human Rights.'

(We have omitted the authorities cited in support of these propositions.)

[30] It is thus clear that, in an exceptional case where the procedure of the court first seised has resulted in a defendant being prevented from putting his case to the court, art 27(1) of the Brussels Convention can justify a refusal to enforce the resultant judgment on grounds of public policy.

FAULT

[31] Mr Ralls submitted that Mr Larmer's predicament in this case was attributable to breach of duty on the part of de Bliek Linssen in failing to inform Mr Larmer that the Rotterdam proceedings had been reactivated. This submission was based on a complaint made by Mr Larmer in his first witness statement. He stated that he had been in correspondence with Mr Linssen about another matter in 1991. Thus Mr Linssen should have been aware of his English address. Alternatively he should have obtained this from the Rotterdam City Hall. Mr Larmer alleged of the firm 'being lawyers acting on my behalf and being on the court record in the matter they owed me a duty of care to undertake such inquiries'.

[32] We would not conclude on the evidence before us that the two partners of de Bliek Linssen retained, or were under a duty to retain, Mr Larmer's address over the 12 years that elapsed since the Rotterdam action was stayed, or that they were under a duty to seek out his address in order to inform him that the proceedings had been reactivated. We note that Mr Jacobs makes no such allegation. He simply comments that 'it is clear that if Mr Larmer believes Mr de Bliek wrongly withdrew from the case the defendant's recourse lies in an action against Mr de Bliek for damages sustained by him as a result'.

[33] As we have noted above, Mr Jacobs' understanding was that Mr de Bliek withdrew because he could not obtain any instructions from his client. He added:

'The matters referred to by Mr Larmer in relation to the lack of attention given to this matter by his own lawyers is not a matter which can concern the claimant. When a solicitor withdraws from proceedings on behalf of a party in Holland, this is entirely at the risk of the party represented. Dutch law does not demand any action from the other party, neither from the court. If no new solicitor is appointed on behalf of the party in question, the proceedings will continue without the party.'

[34] The facts of this case have some similarities to those considered by the Court of Justice in Debaecker v Bouwman Case 49/84 [1985] ECR 1779. That case concerned the application of art 27(2) of the Brussels Convention. A tenant of business premises in Antwerp suddenly left leaving no forwarding address. The landlords issued a summons, claiming damages for breach of the lease, which was duly served on the tenant in accordance with Belgian procedural rules by being delivered to the Antwerp police headquarters. The tenant then wrote repudiating the lease and leaving a contact address. The landlords did not contact the tenant, but entered judgment in default, relying on the fact that service had been validly effected under Belgian law. The landlords sought to enforce their judgment in Holland. The Hoge Raad sought the decision of the Court of Justice on a number of questions including whether, for the purposes of art 27(2), the adequacy of service fell to be considered having regard to the facts existing at the time of service, or whether it was legitimate to have regard to subsequent events. In particular, the court was asked whether the plaintiff could be required, as a result of events which took place after service, to take further steps to inform the defendant of the pending action or whether the fact that it was the defendant's own fault that he was not served personally prevented the court from having regard to events after service was effected.

[35] The Court of Justice held (at 1800) that the Brussels Convention did not impose any obligation on the plaintiffs to take steps to alert the defendant to the proceedings once service had been effected. It continued, however:

'27. ... The failure to take such steps is in reality merely a factor which must be taken into account in order to establish whether service was effected in sufficient time.

28. Seen in that light, the fact that the plaintiff, after service, learns of the defendant's new address does not compel him to take any further steps, but renders his subsequent behaviour important for the purpose of determining whether service was effected in sufficient time. By notifying the defendant at his new address, the plaintiff ensures that the court in which enforcement is sought cannot decide that the defendant's change of address is an exceptional circumstance which prevents the service effected at his former address from being regarded as having been effected in sufficient time.'

[36] There is much that we find surprising about the present case. We find it surprising that the procedure of the Rotterdam court permitted Mr Maronier to reactivate an action that had been stayed for 12 years without requiring fresh service of an appropriate process to be effected on Mr Larmer. We find it surprising that full interest was awarded to Mr Maronier for the whole of the period of the delay, which appears to have been entirely of his own making. We find it surprising that, having regard to the fact that Mr Larmer was unaware that the action had been reactivated, the three-month limit for appealing renders the judgment 'unassailable' without the court apparently having any discretion to reopen the matter. We are, however, acutely aware that, as we demonstrated early in this judgment, there are many matters which are unclear on the evidence and nothing that we have said should be taken as criticism of the Rotterdam District Court or the procedure that it was applying.

[37] It may well be that, in a normal case, a defendant to an action in Holland should continue to retain lawyers to act on his behalf in relation to proceedings which have been stayed. This is not, however, a normal case. We feel sure that a stay lasting 12 years of a simple claim for medical negligence must be quite extraordinary. On the basis of the facts before us, we are driven to the conclusion that Mr Larmer was denied a fair trial in Rotterdam because he was unaware that proceedings had been reactivated until even the time for an appeal had passed. It may well be that Dutch procedure did not require Mr Maronier to ensure that Mr Larmer received notice of the reactivation of the action. Mr Linssen's letter of 24 July 1998 and Mr de Blik's withdrawal from representing Mr Larmer put Mr Maronier's lawyers on notice that Mr Larmer was probably unaware of the fact that the action had been reactivated. Dutch procedure appears to have permitted the action to proceed without the presence of Mr Larmer or anyone representing him. The consequence is, none the less, that he has manifestly not received the fair trial that art 6 of the convention required.

a [38] On the, happily, unusual facts of this case we are in no doubt that the judge was correct to conclude that it would be contrary to the public policy of this country to enforce Mr Maronier's judgment. Accordingly, this appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CHANCERY DIVISION

12, 24 JUNE 2003

Practice – Application for directions – Right to a fair and public hearing – Trustees of charity applying in private for directions relating to pending proceedings – Whether court entitled to pronounce judgment in private – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6.

In the course of the hearing in private of an application by the trustees of a charity for the directions of the court in relation to certain pending proceedings, the question arose whether the court was obliged by art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to give its judgment in public. Article 6(1)^a provided, inter alia, that in the determination of his civil rights everyone was entitled to a fair and public hearing and that judgment should be pronounced publicly but the press and public might be excluded from all or part of the trial to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice. CPR 5.4(2)(c) provided that any person who paid the prescribed fee might search for, inspect and take a copy from the court records of, inter alia, any judgment or order given or made in public or any other document if the court gave permission.

Held – The court was entitled to pronounce its judgment in private since an application to the court by trustees for directions might well affect but did not normally determine the civil rights of anyone, but even if it did, in the circumstances of a hearing in private, justified by the restriction in relation to the interests of justice, the practical impossibility of producing an anonymised or abridged version of the judgment, and the fact that copies could be made available in accordance with the provisions of CPR 5.4(2)(c) it was permitted by art 6(1) (see [11], [12], below); Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272, Campbell v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 165 and B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221 considered.

Application

In the course of the hearing the question arose whether the court was obliged by virtue of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to give its judgment in public.
- c* 24 June 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

SIR ANDREW MORRITT V-C.

- d* [1] In the course of the hearing in private of an application by the trustees of a charity for the directions of the court in relation to certain pending proceedings, the question arose whether I was obliged by art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to give my judgment in public. I heard argument from, amongst others, junior counsel for the Attorney General. I am most grateful to all of them. I indicated that I was satisfied that I could and should give my judgment in private and would give my reasons for that conclusion later.
- e* I have given judgment on the application. What follows are my reasons for concluding that I was entitled to do so in private.

- f* 'In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.'
- g*

The problem arises from the apparent distinction in the second sentence between the pronouncement of the judgment and the trial.

- h* [3] The hearing of the application was listed to be heard in private as it was an application within the terms of CPR PD 39, para 1.5(10). No application was made for the hearing to be held in public. I was and am satisfied that the nature of the application was such that a hearing in private was 'strictly necessary [as] publicity would prejudice the interests of justice'. In those circumstances it would be surprising if my judgment, which in practice could not be anonymised,
- j* had to be given in public.

[4] I have been referred to three decisions of the European Court of Human Rights which, as provided by s 2(1)(a) of the 1998 Act, I am bound to take into account. The first chronologically is Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272. In that case a Swiss national was convicted by the Divisional Court of insubordination and failure to observe service regulations during his military service. He was sentenced to ten days' imprisonment. His appeal on a point of law to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. The relevant complaint was that the judgment of the Court of Cassation had not been given in public and so infringed art 6(1). a [5] It is apparent (at 275–276, 279 (paras 20 and 34)) that the judgment was available to any member of the public who could demonstrate an interest in obtaining it and it was in fact published. Thus the argument appears to have been that art 6(1) requires the court to read out its judgment in public. This contention was rejected by a majority of 11 to 4. It is stated (at 279 (para 33)):

‘The Court therefore does not feel bound to adopt a literal interpretation. It considers that in each case the form of publicity given to the “judgment” under the domestic law of the respondent State must be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of Article 6(1).’ b

It is unclear from that conclusion whether the majority considered that the restrictions contained in the second sentence of art 6(1) apply to the obligation to pronounce judgment in public as well as to the obligation to hold the trial in public. However the concurring opinion of Judges Bernhardt, Bindschedler-Robert and Matscher (at 281–282) shows that they considered that they do. c

[6] The second decision is Campbell v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 165. In that case two convicted prisoners were injured during a prison disturbance. The board of visitors convicted them of breaches of disciplinary regulations and sentenced them to substantial loss of remission. The decision of the board of visitors was given in private. The European Court of Human Rights held that there had been an infringement of art 6(1) in that respect. But the argument was not that the express restrictions contained in the second sentence should be applied to the obligation to pronounce judgment in public. The submission was that such obligation was subject to some other implied restriction. This submission was rejected. The court stated (at 202): d

‘91. The Court has said in other cases that it does not feel bound to adopt a literal interpretation of the words “pronounced publicly”: in each case the form of publication given to the “judgment” under the domestic law of the respondent State must be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object pursued by Article 6(1) in this context, namely to ensure scrutiny of the judiciary by the public with a view to safeguarding the right to a fair trial. e

92. However, in the present case it does not appear that any steps were taken to make public the Board of Visitors’ decision. There has accordingly been a violation of Article 6(1) on this point.’ f

[7] The third decision of the European Court of Human Rights to which I was referred is B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221. That case concerned applications for residence orders. Each of the applicants applied for the hearings to be in public. The applications were refused and such refusal was upheld on appeal in each case because private hearings were required by r 4.16(7) of the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, SI 1991/1247. Accordingly the hearings were private and the judgments were given in private too. A third party could obtain a copy of the judgments but only with the permission of the court. g

[8] The United Kingdom government submitted that if judgment had to be given in public it would subvert the reasons for the hearing being conducted in private. The applicants relied on the facts that the obligation is expressed in unqualified terms and the court had rejected any implied restriction in Campbell v h a UK (1985) 7 EHRR 165. The court rejected the complaint by a majority of five to two. It recalled its case law (at 235 (para 45)) to the effect that the extent and nature of the requisite publicity depended on the nature of the proceedings and the objectives of art 6(1). It recalled (at 235 (para 46)) that it had upheld the decisions to conduct the hearings in private and expressly agreed with the United Kingdom government 'that to pronounce the judgment in public would, to a large extent, frustrate these aims'. The court noted (at 235 (para 47)) that copies of the judgment could be made available to third parties who could establish an interest and obtain the permission of the court. It concluded (at 235–236):

c '48. Having regard to the nature of the proceedings and the form of publicity applied by the national law, the Court considers that a literal interpretation of the terms of art 6(1) concerning the pronouncement of judgments would not only be unnecessary for the purposes of public scrutiny but might even frustrate the primary aim of art 6(1), which is to secure a fair hearing (see, mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned (Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272 at 279 (para 34)).

d 49. The Court thus concludes that the Convention did not require making available to the general public the residence judgments in the present cases, and that there has been no violation of art 6(1) in this respect.'

[9] Bratza J (at 237–239) concurred in the conclusion but for reasons he set out in a separate opinion of his own. He accepted the proposition advanced by the applicants that the obligation to pronounce judgment in public, unlike that relating to the trial, is expressed in unqualified terms. He drew attention to the distinction in this respect between art 6(1) and art 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (New York, 16 December 1966 TS 6(1977) Cmdr 6702). He expressed sympathy for the dissenting opinion of Cremona J and others in Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272 to the effect that restricted access to judgments falls short of what the convention requires. Nevertheless he decided that there was in those cases sufficient compliance with the requirements of art 6(1). The essence of his conclusion is contained in para (2) (at 238–239) where he said:

g 'It is well established that art 6(1) of the Convention must be read as a whole. There is, as the majority judgment recognises, a logical relationship between the public nature of the proceedings and the public pronouncement of the judgment which is the result of those proceedings. If the public may legitimately be excluded from the hearing for the purpose of protecting the interests of children or the private lives of parties to a matrimonial dispute, the requirement that the judgment should be pronounced publicly should not be interpreted in such a way as to undermine that protection. It seems to me that it is not a satisfactory answer to this point to argue that the judgment could be entirely anonymised so that it contained no details capable of identifying the parties or the children concerned and/or abridged to the point where only the operative part of the court's decision was made public. Even if such a course could be said to be adequate to protect the interests of the children or the parties concerned, it is difficult to see how the publication of a judgment so anonymised and abridged could be said to serve the aim of public scrutability of judicial proceedings.'

[10] Bratza J (at 239) drew attention to the case law of the court to the effect that notwithstanding the apparently unqualified requirement it had been interpreted with 'some flexibility' so that the form of publicity was to be assessed in the light of the nature of the proceedings. He concluded that on the facts of the case the fact that the judgment would be made available to one who could demonstrate a legitimate interest in obtaining a copy and who obtained the permission of the court was enough to satisfy the requirement.

[11] As I have already indicated I was satisfied that the hearing should be held in private because the interests of justice so required. I was also satisfied that it was not a practical possibility to produce an anonymised or abridged version. Copies can be made available in accordance with CPR 5.4(2)(c). In those circumstances there is nothing in the decisions to which I must have regard to suggest that I should have given my judgment in public. It is, I think, clear that the flexible interpretation of art 6(1) to which Bratza J referred does not entitle the court simply to apply by analogy to the obligation to pronounce judgment in public the same restrictions as are available in relation to the obligation to hold the trial in public. This is no doubt for the good reason that the judgment of a court of justice cannot be a wholly private document. Its ultimate availability to the public can no doubt be hedged around with restrictions in appropriate cases but should not be excluded altogether.

[12] There is however another ground on which the pronouncement of my judgment in private was justified. As the opening words of art 6(1) make plain it only applies to 'the determination of civil rights'. An application to the court by trustees for directions may well affect but does not normally determine the civil rights of anyone. Similar procedures exist for the protection of other fiduciaries such as liquidators or receivers. Cf Re Hinckley Island Hotel Ltd, Craig v Humberclyde Industrial Finance Ltd [1998] 2 BCLC 526 at 532–534, [1999] 1 WLR 129 at 135–136 (paras 15–19). This, essentially administrative, jurisdiction is designed to provide guidance to the fiduciary as to the proper exercise of his powers in the problematic circumstances with which he is faced. Only rarely could it be said to determine the rights of anyone.

[13] Counsel for the Attorney General also submitted that the obligation to pronounce judgment in public may be overridden by the consent of all parties to the proceedings. He relied on the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Håkansson v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 1 to the effect that an individual may waive his right to a public hearing. In view of my conclusions on the applicability and ambit of art 6(1) I do not have to reach a final conclusion on this submission. Suffice it to say that I should take a good deal of persuasion to conclude that it is right. To uphold it would seem to me to introduce into art 6(1) an implied restriction contrary to the decision in Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272 and to undermine the policy both domestic and European which requires hearings to be held in public.

[14] In summary I conclude that I was entitled to pronounce my judgment in private because: (a) it did not determine the civil rights of anyone, but even if it did (b) in the circumstances of a hearing in private, justified by the restriction in relation to the interests of justice, the practical impossibility of producing an anonymised or abridged version and the provisions of r 5.4(2)(c) it was permitted by art 6(1).

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

ALDOUS, CLARKE AND JONATHAN PARKER LJ

30 APRIL, 1, 21 MAY 2003

European Community – European Court of Justice – Jurisdiction – Reference to European Court of Justice – Application of guidance given by European Court of Justice on law to findings of fact made by national court.

Trade mark – Infringement – Use of identical trade mark – Non-trade mark use – Whether use affected function of trademark – Trade Marks Act 1994, s 10 – First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104, art 5(1).

The claimant, an internationally-known football club, commenced proceedings against the defendant, in which it alleged, inter alia, that he had infringed certain of its registered trade marks under s 10^a of the Trade Marks Act 1994 (which implemented art 4^b of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 approximating the laws of the member states relating to trade marks). Section 10(1) provided that a person infringed a registered trade mark if he used in the course of trade a sign which was identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services identical with those for which it was registered. The defendant sold souvenirs and memorabilia likely to appeal to the fans of the claimant, including articles bearing the trade marks Arsenal, Arsenal Gunners and certain device marks. The defendant contended that there could be no infringement if the use complained of was not 'trade mark use'. He argued that his products would be perceived as a badge of support, loyalty or affiliation by those to whom they were directed, and not as indicating trade origin. In his first judgment, the judge concluded that the defence raised an issue of construction of the Directive which could not be decided without a reference to the Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ). The ECJ held that the material consideration was whether the use complained of was liable to jeopardise the guarantee of origin, not whether the use was trade mark use. It concluded that where a third party used in the course of trade a sign which was identical to a validly registered trade mark on goods which were identical to those for which it was registered, the trade mark proprietor was entitled, in circumstances such as those in the instant case, to rely on art 5(1)(a) of the Directive to prevent that use, and that it was immaterial that, in the context of that use, the sign was perceived as a badge of support for or loyalty or affiliation to the trade mark proprietor. The case came back before the judge. In his second judgment the judge concluded that the ECJ had disagreed with findings of fact made by him in his first judgment, and that that being so the ECJ had exceeded its jurisdiction, with the result that he was not bound by its

^b Article 5, so far as material, provides: '1. The registered trade mark shall confer on the proprietor exclusive rights therein. The proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade: (a) any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered ...'

final conclusion. He then applied the ECJ's guidance on the law, as he understood it, to the findings of fact made in his first judgment, and concluded that there had been no infringement, a different conclusion from that reached by the ECJ. The claimant appealed. a

Held – Upon a reference for a preliminary ruling on the interpretation of acts of Community institutions the purpose of the ECJ was to decide a question of law, and that ruling was binding on the national court as to the interpretation of the Community acts in question; it was for the national court alone to find the facts. In the instant case, therefore, the judge would have been entitled to disregard any conclusion reached by the ECJ in so far as it was based upon a factual background inconsistent with his judgment. However, the ECJ had not disregarded the conclusions of fact made by the judge in his first judgment. The ECJ had not been concerned with whether the use complained of was trade mark use, but rather whether the third party's use affected or was likely to affect the functions of the trade mark, namely guarantee of origin. The judge had not come to any conclusion on that issue. Whilst the ECJ had concluded as a fact that, in the circumstances found by the judge, use by the defendant was likely to jeopardise the guarantee of origin which constituted the essential function of the trade mark rights owned by the claimant, that finding of fact was inevitable in the circumstances. Unchecked use of the mark by a third party, which was not descriptive use, was likely to damage the function of the trade mark right because the registered trade mark could no longer guarantee origin, that being an essential function of a trade mark. As found by the judge, the trade marks, when applied to the goods, were purchased and worn as badges of support, loyalty and affiliation to Arsenal, but that did not mean that the use by a third party would not be liable to jeopardise the function of the trade marks, namely, to guarantee origin. To the contrary, the wider and more extensive the use, the less likely the trade marks would be able to perform their function. The actions of the defendant meant that goods, not coming from the claimant but bearing the trade marks, were in circulation. That affected the ability of the trade marks to guarantee the origin of the goods. It followed that the judge should have followed the ECJ's ruling and decided the case in the claimant's favour. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [25], [26], [33], [37], [43], [45], [47]–[49], [73], [74], below). b

- e* The claimant, Arsenal Football Club plc, brought proceedings for infringement of trade mark and passing off against the defendant, Matthew Reed. In his first judgment on 6 April 2001 ([2001] IP & T 810) Laddie J referred two questions upon the construction of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1) to the Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ) under art 234 EC.
- f* Following the ruling of the ECJ ([2003] All ER (EC) 1) the matter came back before the judge. In his second judgment on 12 December 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2695 (Ch), [2003] 1 All ER 137) Laddie J dismissed the claim. The claimant appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Aldous LJ.

- h* 21 May 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

ALDOUS LJ.

- j* [1] In January 1999 Arsenal Football Club plc (Arsenal) started proceedings against Mr Matthew Reed in which they alleged that Mr Reed had infringed certain of their registered trade marks and had carried out acts of passing off. Those proceedings came before Laddie J in March 2001.

[2] The judge in his first judgment ([2001] IP & T 810), handed down on 6 April 2001, held that the allegations of passing off had not been established. The judge went on to conclude that the defence raised an issue of construction of the First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1) (the Trade Mark Directive) which could not be decided without a reference to the Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ). He therefore referred the following questions to the ECJ.

‘1. Where a trade mark is validly registered and (a) a third party uses in the course of trade a sign identical with that trade mark in relation to goods which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered; and (b) the third party has no defence to infringement by virtue of art 6(1) of the Trade Mark Directive; does the third party have a defence to infringement on the ground that the use complained of does not indicate trade origin (ie a connection in the course of trade between the goods and the trade mark proprietor)?

2. If so, is the fact that the use in question would be perceived as a badge of support, loyalty or affiliation to the trade mark proprietor a sufficient connection?’

[3] The ECJ ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 31) did not answer those questions in the form posed. They concluded:

‘62. In the light of the foregoing, the answer to the national court’s questions must be that, in a situation which is not covered by art 6(1) of the [Trade Mark Directive], where a third party uses in the course of trade a sign which is identical to a validly registered trade mark on goods which are identical to those for which it is registered, the trade mark proprietor is entitled, in circumstances such as those in the present case, to rely on art 5(1)(a) of the [Trade Mark Directive] to prevent that use. It is immaterial that, in the context of that use, the sign is perceived as a badge of support for or loyalty or affiliation to the trade mark proprietor.’

‘In a situation which is not covered by art 6(1) of the [Trade Mark Directive] where a third party uses in the course of trade a sign which is identical to a validly registered trade mark on goods which are identical to those for which it is registered, the trade mark proprietor of the mark is entitled, in circumstances such as those in the present case, to rely on art 5(1)(a) of that directive to prevent that use. It is immaterial that, in the context of that use, the sign is perceived as a badge of support for or loyalty or affiliation to the trade mark proprietor.’

[5] The case came back before the judge in December 2002. In his judgment of 12 December 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2695 (Ch), [2003] 1 All ER 137) (the second judgment) the judge concluded that the ECJ had disagreed with findings of fact made by him in his first judgment. That being so, the ECJ had ‘exceeded its jurisdiction’ with the result that he was not bound by its final conclusion. He then applied the ECJ’s guidance on the law, as he understood it, to the findings of fact made in his first judgment and concluded that infringement of the trade marks had not taken place. That resulted in the judge coming to a different conclusion from that reached by the ECJ.

[6] Arsenal have not appealed against the findings of the judge that passing off had not been established. Mr Reed also contended that Arsenal’s trade mark was invalid. That contention was rejected by the judge and there is no appeal against that conclusion. Thus this appeal is only concerned with the issue of trade mark infringement.

a [7] The factual background was fully set out by the judge and is not in dispute. I can therefore take from the judgment the salient facts to enable my judgment to be understood.

[8] Arsenal is the internationally-known football club. It is known as 'Arsenal' or 'the Gunners'. Part of the business carried on by Arsenal involves the sale of b products bearing the words 'Arsenal', 'Arsenal Gunners' and the device marks reproduced below:

The Crest Device:

The Cannon Device:

[9] Arsenal alleged infringement of the following trade marks:

g '(a) Registered trade mark number 1383343 for "ARSENAL" in class 25 (registered 9th May 1989); (b) Registered trade mark number 1387461 for the Arsenal Cannon device in class 25 (registered 8th June 1989); (c) Registered trade mark number 1387589 for the Arsenal Crest Device in class 25 (registered 13th June 1989) (d) Registered trade mark number 1393203 for "ARSENAL GUNNERS" in class 25 (registered 27th July 1989).'

h [10] Mr Reed is the self-employed proprietor of a wholesale and retail football merchandise business. Amongst the articles that he sells are souvenirs and memorabilia likely to appeal to Arsenal fans. Such include articles bearing the trade marks Arsenal, Arsenal Gunners and the device marks illustrated above. He accepted that he had, without Arsenal's consent, used in the course of trade signs j identical to the registered trade marks relied on by Arsenal in relation to the goods for which they were registered. He denied infringement. No positive case was pleaded in the defence, but in voluntary particulars it was made clear that he was asserting that there could be no infringement if the use complained about was not trade mark use, and his use was not trade mark use. It was that point which caused the reference to the ECJ.

THE STATUTORY BACKGROUND

[11] The Trade Marks Act 1994 swept away the old law and implemented the Trade Mark Directive. It follows that the provisions of the 1994 Act must be construed so as to reflect the terms of the Trade Mark Directive. a

[12] Section 1(b) defines a 'trade mark' as meaning 'any sign capable of being represented graphically which is capable of distinguishing goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings'. There is no doubt that Arsenal's registered trade marks are signs which have the character required. b

[13] A registered trade mark is a property right (see s 2) which is personal property (see s 22). It can be assigned either in connection with the goodwill of a business or independently (see s 24). Once obtained a registration is prima facie valid (see s 72). It need not be used for the initial five years after registration, but thereafter it is liable to be revoked in whole or in part for non-use under s 46. c

[14] Section 2(1) states that the proprietor of a registered trade mark 'has the rights and remedies provided by this Act'. For the purpose of this case the relevant rights are those contained in s 10 (art 5 of the Trade Mark Directive). The applicable parts of that section are as follows:

'Infringement of registered trade mark.—(1) A person infringes a registered trade mark if he uses in the course of trade a sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which it is registered. d

(2) A person infringes a registered trade mark if he uses in the course of trade a sign where because—(a) the sign is identical with the trade mark and is used in relation to goods or services similar to those for which the trade mark is registered, or (b) the sign is similar to the trade mark and is used in relation to goods or services identical with or similar to those for which the trade mark is registered, there exists a likelihood of confusion on the part of the public, which includes the likelihood of association with the trade mark. e

(6) Nothing in the preceding provisions of this section shall be construed as preventing the use of a registered trade mark by any person for the purpose of identifying goods or services as those of the proprietor or a licensee. But any such use otherwise than in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters shall be treated as infringing the registered trade mark if the use without due cause takes unfair advantage of, or is detrimental to, the distinctive character or repute of the trade mark.' h a in the course of trade' the sign. Subsection (2) deals with use when the goods and/or the signs are not identical. In those circumstances a likelihood of confusion must be shown. That requires the proprietor to establish that there is a risk that the public might believe that the goods in question came from the same undertaking or an economically linked undertaking (see Lloyd Schuhfabrik Meyer & Co GmbH v Klijsen Handel BV Case C-342/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 587, [1999] ECR I-3819).

b [16] Section 11 contains exceptions to s 10. It is in this form:

'Limits on effect of registered trade mark.—(1) A registered trade mark is not infringed by the use of another registered trade mark in relation to goods or services for which the latter is registered (but see section 47(6) (effect of declaration of invalidity of registration)).

c (2) A registered trade mark is not infringed by—(a) the use by a person of his own name or address, (b) the use of indications concerning the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, the time of production of goods or of rendering of services, or other characteristics of goods or services, or (c) the use of the trade mark where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service (in particular, as accessories or spare parts), provided the use is in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters.

d (3) A registered trade mark is not infringed by the use in the course of trade in a particular locality of an earlier right which applies only in that locality. For this purpose an "earlier right" means an unregistered trade mark or other sign continuously used in relation to goods or services by a person or a predecessor in title of his from a date prior to whichever is the earlier of—(a) the use of the first-mentioned trade mark in relation to those goods or services by the proprietor or a predecessor in title of his, or (b) the registration of the first-mentioned trade mark in respect of those goods or services in the name of the proprietor or a predecessor in title of his; and an earlier right shall be regarded as applying in a locality if, or to the extent that, its use in that locality is protected by virtue of any rule of law (in particular, the law of passing off).'

g [17] As I have said Mr Reed did not dispute that he had used signs identical to Arsenal's registered trade marks in the course of his trade. His defence was that the words 'uses in the course of trade a sign' required the use to be trade mark use. By that he meant that the use had to be in a manner that indicated the origin of the goods. It was his case that he used the word 'Arsenal' and other trade marks as badges of allegiance, not in a manner that indicated a connection in the course of trade between the goods and Arsenal. The judge held ([2001] IP & T 810 at [58]) that Mr Reed's use was not trade mark use. He said:

j 'In my view, and consistent with the views expressed at para 42 above, the Arsenal signs on Mr Reed's products would be perceived as a badge of support, loyalty or affiliation to those to whom they are directed. They would not be perceived as indicating trade origin. Therefore I reject Mr Thorley's first answer to Mr Roughton's argument. It follows that for AFC to succeed on trade mark infringement, it has to rely on the non-trade mark use of those signs, that is to say the wide construction of s 10.'

[18] The judge went on to consider the submission of Arsenal that 'non-trade mark' use fell within s 10(1) of the 1994 Act. He referred to other sections of the 1994 Act and the Trade Mark Directive and concluded (at [60]):

'All of these points and others based on the recitals in the Trade Marks Directive might suggest that only use as a trade mark can infringe the rights secured by registration ...'

[19] The judge then noted that Jacob J in British Sugar plc v James Robertson & Sons Ltd [1996] RPC 281 had expressed a contrary view as had the Court of Appeal in Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd [1999] RPC 809. That view was a provisional view expressed prior to the Court of Appeal seeking guidance from the ECJ. It was therefore not binding on the judge. With that background in mind the judge referred to the ECJ the questions set out in [2], above.

THE SECOND JUDGMENT (12 DECEMBER 2002)

[20] The judge went through the judgment of the ECJ and concluded ([2003] 1 All ER 137 at [20]):

'It appears from the above analysis that the ECJ held that where the defendant's use of a mark is not intended by him, or understood by the public, to be a designation of origin, there can be no infringement because such use does not prejudice the essential function of the registered mark. If that is so, then the first question in the reference should have been answered in the affirmative. However, it will be seen that the ECJ did not answer that question in the affirmative or the negative but only stated that "in the circumstances" of this case, the claimant should succeed.'

[21] The judge then came to the submissions advanced on behalf of the parties. Mr Wyand QC, on behalf of Mr Reed, submitted that the ECJ had interpreted the Trade Mark Directive in the way that he had submitted it should be interpreted, but had then come to a conclusion ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 31 (para 62)) (see [3], above) in favour of Arsenal and had so ruled (see [4], above). That, he submitted, was the result of the ECJ embarking on an impermissible determination of fact. In any case the conclusion reached by the ECJ was incompatible with the findings of fact made at the trial.

[23] The judge accepted the submissions of Mr Wyand. He said ([2003] 1 All ER 137 at [27]):

'It appears to me that Mr Wyand's analysis is correct. The ECJ has disagreed with the conclusions of fact reached at the trial and indicated that the claimant should win because Mr Reed's use was such as would be perceived by some customers or users as a designation of origin. If this is so, the ECJ has exceeded its jurisdiction and I am not bound by its final conclusion. I must apply its guidance on the law to the facts as found at the trial.'

[24] The judge went on to consider what should be done. He rejected the idea that there should be a further reference and concluded that he should apply the guidance on the law given by the ECJ to the facts as found by him. That he decided meant that there was no infringement. As I understand his judgment, he believed that the ECJ had upheld Mr Reed's contention that there could not be infringement a unless the use complained about was trade mark use in the sense that it indicated trade origin. He therefore dismissed Arsenal's claim for trade mark infringement.

b [25] There was no dispute between the parties that on a reference under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty), the purpose of the ECJ is 'to decide a question of law and that the ruling is binding on the national court as to the interpretation of the community provisions and acts in question' (see Benedetti v Munari Flli SAS Case 52/76 [1977] ECR 163). Even so, the ECJ has jurisdiction to review the legal characterisation of facts found by the national court (see European Commission v Camar Srl Case C-312/00 (2002) Transcript (judgment), 10 December 2002). Also the ECJ has in the past provided guidance in order to enable the national court to give judgment (see Kutz-Bauer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg Case C-187/00 (2003) Transcript (judgment), 20 March 2003). On occasions it has 'steered' the national court for the purpose of unified application of the law. However, as the House of Lords made clear in R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd [1999] 4 All ER 506 at 927, [2000] 1 AC 524 at 550, the English court is not bound by that steer and therefore, with hesitation, could conclude the case in a different way. It is the national court alone that must find the facts.

d [26] It follows that the judge was entitled to disregard any conclusion reached, in so far as it was based upon a factual background inconsistent with his judgment. Thus, upon his perception of the ECJ's judgment, he was entitled to disregard the conclusion in the ruling and decide the case upon the legal principles stated in the judgment of the ECJ.

f [27] In outline, Arsenal put forward three submissions. First, the ruling (see [3], above) was a ruling as to the law and was binding on the court. Thus the judge's conclusion was wrong. Second, the judge had misunderstood the reasoning of the ECJ judgment. Arsenal accept that the jurisdiction of the ECJ was interpretation, but the ECJ could and do reformulate questions referred. That was what had happened in this case. That was necessary as Yes or No answers could not be given to the questions referred. The court had interpreted the word 'uses' in the Trade Mark Directive (as in s 10(1) of the 1994 Act) as not requiring that the use must indicate trade origin. It was sufficient if the use complained of was liable 'to jeopardise the guarantee of origin which constitutes the essential function of the mark'. That being so, upon the findings of fact made by the judge, no reasonable court could come to a conclusion that differed from the ruling of the ECJ. It was immaterial that the trade mark was perceived as a badge of loyalty as the use complained of was liable to jeopardise the guarantee of origin of the Arsenal trade marks.

j [28] Arsenal also submitted that the judge had in his first judgment wrongly held that the use of signs identical to the registered trade marks by Mr Reed were not such as to indicate trade origin ie a connection in the course of trade between the goods and the trade mark proprietor. It did not follow from the fact that goods bearing the signs were used by fans of Arsenal as badges of allegiance that the use was not use in a trade mark sense and the judge was wrong to believe that it did.

[29] Mr Reed supported the conclusion and reasoning of the judge. He submitted that the ruling was not binding upon the court as it contained within it conclusions of fact contrary to those found by the judge. In any case, it needed to be interpreted in the light of the reasoning that preceded it. He submitted that the judgment of the ECJ provided three principles. First, not every use of a sign identical to the trade mark in respect of identical goods to those for which the mark is registered can be prohibited by the proprietor of the trade mark. Second, only such use as affects or is likely to affect the functions of the trade mark is prohibited. Third, the fact that the use is of a sign which is perceived as a badge of support for or loyalty or affiliation to the proprietor of the mark is immaterial to the issue of infringement. The judge had correctly understood the law as set out in the ECJ judgment and upon his findings of fact in his first judgment was bound to come to the conclusion he did. a

[30] In any case, Arsenal had failed to show that Mr Reed's use was likely to affect the functions of the trade marks. That was clear as they failed to produce any evidence that anybody believed there was a connection in the course of trade between Mr Reed's goods and Arsenal. There was no evidence of confusion. The judge was correct to come to the conclusions of fact that he did. c

IS THE RULING OF THE ECJ BINDING?

[31] Of course the ruling of the ECJ is binding in so far as it is a ruling upon interpretation. However I reject the submission of Mr Thorley that the national court should confine its attention solely to the ruling. Strictly speaking the judgment is the explanation of the ruling, but as Advocate General Warner explained in Robert Bosch GmbH v Hauptzollamt Hildesheim Case 135/77 [1978] ECR 855 at 861: '... the operative part of a Judgment of this Court should always be interpreted in the light of the reasoning that precedes it.' That is particularly apt in the present case as the ruling uses the words 'in circumstances such as those in the present case'. To ascertain what the ECJ believed the circumstances were, it is necessary to have recourse to the preceding paragraphs of the judgment. I therefore turn to consider the ECJ judgment with the submissions of the parties in mind. d

THE ECJ'S JUDGMENT

[32] The ECJ concluded ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 29 (para 42)):

'To answer the High Court's questions, it must be determined whether art 5(1)(a) of the [Trade Mark Directive] entitles the trade mark proprietor to prohibit any use by a third party in the course of trade of a sign identical to the trade mark for goods identical to those for which the mark is registered, or whether that right of prohibition presupposes the existence of a specific interest of the proprietor as trade mark proprietor, in that use of the sign in question by a third party must affect or be liable to affect one of the functions of the mark.' f

[33] The ECJ (at 29 (para 42)) do not set out to answer the questions referred. Their reason becomes clear from the rest of the judgment. The referred questions were based upon the view that the issue of infringement would depend upon whether the use complained about was trade mark use, in the sense that the use indicated the origin of the goods. That the ECJ concluded was not the relevant consideration. In summary the ECJ held that registration of a trade mark gave to the proprietor a property right (see s 2 of the 1994 Act). The relevant consideration was whether the use complained about was likely to damage that property right or, as the ECJ put it, is likely to affect or jeopardise the guarantee of origin which constitutes the essential function of the mark. That did not depend on whether the use complained of was trade mark use. h a [34] The judge in his second judgment ([2003] 1 All ER 137 at [66]) stated that the first of the two alternatives in the ECJ's judgment (at 29 (para 42)) was Arsenal's submission and the second was in substance Mr Reed's argument. That was not correct. The crucial difference between Mr Reed's argument and the second alternative in the reformulated question was that the reformulated question looks at the interest of the proprietor's trade mark right and whether that interest is liable b to be affected: whereas Mr Reed's submission looks at whether his use was of a particular type, namely, did it denote a connection in the course of trade between the goods and the proprietor.

c [35] The ECJ judgment proceeds to determine which of the alternatives (at 29 (para 42)) is correct. Upon the basis of the reasoning (at 29 (paras 43–47)), the ECJ set out (at 29–30 (para 48)) the essential function of a trade mark in these terms:

d 'In that context, the essential function of a trade mark is to guarantee the identity of origin of the marked goods or services to the consumer or end user by enabling him, without any possibility of confusion, to distinguish the goods or services from others which have another origin. For the trade mark to be able to fulfil its essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the Treaty seeks to establish and maintain, it must offer a guarantee that all the goods or services bearing it have been manufactured or supplied under the control of a single undertaking which is responsible for their quality (see, inter alia, Hoffmann-La Roche & Co AG v Centrafarm Vertriebsgesellschaft Pharmazeutischer Erzeugnisse mbH Case 102/77 [1978] ECR 1139 (para 7) and Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] e All ER (EC) 634 at 649, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 30)).'

f '50. For that guarantee of origin, which constitutes the essential function of a trade mark, to be ensured, the proprietor must be protected against competitors wishing to take unfair advantage of the status and reputation of the trade mark by selling products illegally bearing it (see, inter alia, the Hoffmann-La Roche case (para 7) and Loendersloot (t/a FLoendersloot Internationale Expeditie) v George Ballantine & Son Ltd Case C-349/95 [1997] g ECR I-6227 (para 22)). In this respect, the tenth recital of the preamble to the [Trade Mark Directive] points out the absolute nature of the protection afforded by the trade mark in the case of identity between the mark and the sign and between the goods or services concerned and those for which the mark is registered. It states that the aim of that protection is in particular to guarantee the trade mark as an indication of origin.

h 51. It follows that the exclusive right under art 5(1)(a) of the [Trade Mark Directive] was conferred in order to enable the trade mark proprietor to protect his specific interests as proprietor, that is, to ensure that the trade mark can fulfil its functions. The exercise of that right must therefore be reserved to cases in which a third party's use of the sign affects or is liable to affect the functions of the trade mark, in particular its essential function of guaranteeing j to consumers the origin of the goods.'

[37] It is important to note that the ECJ is not concerned with whether the use complained about is trade mark use. The consideration is whether the third party's use affects or is likely to affect the functions of the trade mark. An instance of where that will occur is given, namely where a competitor wishes to take unfair advantage of the reputation of the trade mark by selling products illegally bearing the mark. That would happen whether or not the third party's use was trade mark use or whether there was confusion.

[38] The ECJ explains (at 30 (para 54)) that certain uses for descriptive purposes will not infringe because they cannot affect the registered proprietary rights. That meant that the first alternative posed in para 42 of the ECJ judgment (see [32], above) could not be the law. The judge went further. Having cited para 54 of the ECJ judgment he said ([2003] 1 All ER 137 at [20]):

'It appears from the above analysis that the ECJ held that where the defendant's use of a mark is not intended by him, or understood by the public, to be a designation of origin, there can be no infringement because such use does not prejudice the essential function of the registered mark. If that is so, then the first question in the reference should have been answered in the affirmative. However, it will be seen that the ECJ did not answer that question in the affirmative or the negative but only stated that "in the circumstances" of this case, the claimant should succeed.'

[39] Paragraph 54 of the ECJ judgment has to be read in the context of the judgment in Hölterhoff v Freisleben Case C-2/00 [2002] All ER (EC) 665 at 682, [2002] ECR I-4187 (para 16)). The descriptive use in that case was held not to affect the proprietor's trade mark interest. At no stage did the ECJ suggest that use which was not understood by the public to be a designation of origin could not infringe. The ECJ indicated that the Trade Mark Directive required consideration as to whether the function of the trade mark right was liable to be harmed. That becomes more apparent from the paragraphs of the ECJ judgment that follow.

[40] Two reasons are given ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 30–31 (paras 56–59)) as to why Mr Reed's use of signs identical to the registered trade marks is liable to affect one of the functions of Arsenal's registered trade marks. The first is contained in paras 56 and 57 which are as follows:

'56. Having regard to the presentation of the word "Arsenal" on the goods at issue in the main proceedings and the other secondary markings on them (see para 39, above), the use of that sign is such as to create the impression that there is a material link in the course of trade between the goods concerned and the trade mark proprietor.

57. That conclusion is not affected by the presence on Mr Reed's stall of the notice stating that the goods at issue in the main proceedings are not official Arsenal FC products (see para 17, above). Even on the assumption that such a notice may be relied on by a third party as a defence to an action for trade mark infringement, there is a clear possibility in the present case that some consumers, in particular if they come across the goods after they have been sold by Mr Reed and taken away from the stall where the notice appears, may interpret the sign as designating Arsenal FC as the undertaking of origin of the goods.'

'[42] It seems to me that the use of the Arsenal signs on Mr Reed's products carries no message of trade origin. Although I accept that some fans will want a to purchase official Arsenal memorabilia so as to support their club, it is a non-sequitur to say that this means all Arsenal memorabilia or memorabilia displaying one or more of the Arsenal signs will be taken by them to have come from or be licensed by AFC. Choosing to give your custom to one company by buying goods from it does not mean that that type of goods only comes from that company. What is necessary is some additional sign or circumstance b of trading which says to the customer that the goods come from or are commercially connected with the source he likes and not some other source ...

[58] In my view, and consistent with the views expressed at para 42 above, the Arsenal signs on Mr Reed's products would be perceived as a badge of support, loyalty or affiliation to those to whom they are directed. They would not be perceived as indicating trade origin. Therefore I reject Mr Thorley's c first answer to Mr Roughton's argument. It follows that for AFC to succeed on trade mark infringement, it has to rely on the non-trade mark use of those signs, that is to say the wide construction of s 10.'

[42] Paragraph [42] came in the part of the judgment where the judge dealt with d passing off. The issue was whether Mr Reed had misrepresented that goods sold by him were goods that came from Arsenal. The judge held that he had not done so. There was a finding by the judge (at [58]) that Mr Reed's use was not trade mark use in that it did not indicate the origin of the goods. However the judge did not come to any conclusion as to whether Mr Reed's use was liable to affect or e jeopardise the guarantee of origin which was the essential feature of Arsenal's trade mark rights. No doubt this was not argued as an issue and because of that he did not consider it to be relevant.

[43] Paragraphs 56 and 57 ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 30–31) appear to contain conclusions of fact reached by the ECJ. As such they cannot be binding on the national court. However, the conclusions reached are not inconsistent with the f findings of fact reached by the judge. The crucial sentence in understanding the ECJ reasoning is the last one in para 57. There the court states that there is a clear possibility in the present case that consumers may interpret the sign as designating Arsenal as the undertaking of origin in a case where the goods are taken away from Mr Reed and therefore not subject to Mr Reed's explanation that they do not come from Arsenal. The judge's findings of fact were based upon the balance of g probabilities. He was concerned with the effect of the signs upon Mr Reed's customers, not upon consumers who might not know anything about Mr Reed.

[44] The second reason is contained in paras 58 and 59:

h '58. Moreover, in the present case, there is also no guarantee, as required by the court's case law cited in para 48, above, that all the goods designated by the trade mark have been manufactured or supplied under the control of a single undertaking which is responsible for their quality.

59. The goods at issue are in fact supplied outside the control of Arsenal FC as trade mark proprietor, it being common ground that they do not come from j Arsenal FC or from its approved resellers.' (See [2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 31.)

[45] Mr Wyand submitted that those paragraphs also contained findings of fact contrary to those made by the judge in his first judgment. I reject that submission. The paragraphs contain reasoning and explanation based upon agreed facts. The ECJ looks at the function of a trade mark not whether the use is trade mark use. Unchecked use of the mark by a third party, which is not descriptive use, is likely to damage the function of the trade mark right because the registered trade mark can no longer guarantee origin, that being an essential function of a trade mark. a

[46] There follows in the ECJ judgment the conclusion ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 31 (para 61)):

‘Once it has been found that, in the present case, the use of the sign in question by the third party is liable to affect the guarantee of origin of the goods and that the trade mark proprietor must be able to prevent this, it is immaterial that in the context of that use the sign is perceived as a badge of support for or loyalty or affiliation to the proprietor of the mark.’ b

[47] The judge held that the ECJ had indicated that Arsenal should win because Mr Reed’s use was such as would be perceived by some customers or users as a designation of origin. That in my view was not the basis of the ECJ judgment. The judgment of the ECJ makes it clear that the important consideration is whether the right given by registration is likely to be affected by a third party’s use. That occurs when the use complained about is likely to jeopardise the guarantee of origin which constitutes the essential function of the trade mark right. That was a matter never considered by the judge in his first judgment. He concentrated on whether Mr Reed’s use was trade mark use. c

THE CONCLUSION

[48] For the reasons given, I do not believe that the ECJ disregarded the conclusions of fact made by the judge in his first judgment. However I accept that they did conclude as a fact that, in the circumstances found by the judge, use by Mr Reed was liable to jeopardise the guarantee of origin which constituted the essential function of the trade mark rights owned by Arsenal. That was, I believe, a finding of fact that was inevitable in the circumstances. As found by the judge, the trade marks, when applied to the goods, were purchased and worn as badges of support, loyalty and affiliation to Arsenal, but that did not mean that the use by a third party would not be liable to jeopardise the functions of the trade marks, namely the ability to guarantee origin. To the contrary, the wider and more extensive the use, the less likely the trade marks would be able to perform their function. As the ECJ pointed out, the actions of Mr Reed meant that goods, not coming from Arsenal but bearing the trade marks, were in circulation. That affected the ability of the trade marks to guarantee the origin of the goods. I therefore conclude that the result reached by the ECJ was inevitable once their judgment had made it clear that the material consideration was whether the use complained of was liable to jeopardise the guarantee of origin, not whether the use was trade mark use. The judge should have followed the ruling and decided the case in Arsenal’s favour. d

[49] For those reasons I would allow the appeal and give judgment for Arsenal. That being so, it is not strictly necessary to deal with the second issue, whether the judge was correct that Mr Reed’s use was not trade mark use, but I will do so as it was argued in full. e

WAS MR REED’S USE TRADE MARK USE?

[50] Mr Thorley referred us to the evidence and submitted that there was no basis for the conclusion reached by the judge. I will come to Mr Wyand’s submissions, but before doing so will summarise the relevant evidence. f

[51] Mr Hazell had been the commercial manager of Arsenal since 1989. He explained how Arsenal’s marketing had expanded and had played an important part g a in the club's activities. He said that it was apparent from the turnover that had been generated that demand by members of the public for licensed goods bearing the Arsenal trade mark was high. He believed that people wished to buy Arsenal merchandise partly because they were contributing towards the activities and success of the club. He said that from time to time the club's retail outlets received complaints about counterfeit merchandise displaying one or more of the Arsenal trade marks and he was pressed upon that in cross-examination. He said that since 1989 he had had half a dozen instances of confusion brought to his attention. He was asked by the judge:

c 'Laddie J: ... You said perhaps about half a dozen instances of confusion you've heard about, because everybody is terribly busy, and what you are talking about is what people in your shop report to you? A: I think all, if not all, six or seven or whatever, but all of those customers that came back into the shop were most annoyed, they probably brought a garment the week before and bought it back the following home game. Most of those people have asked to see the commercial manager. I've been brought on match day to speak to those people personally.

d Q: You said it was a bit vague because the shop was so busy? A: Yes.

Q: You also said in answer to an earlier question "I think there is an element of confusion out there. Some customers bought back goods they were under the impression came from us"? A: Yes.

e Q: How—you have never spoken to any of these customers? A: Yes, about half a dozen of them.

Q: You personally? A: They would have called me on a match day to say they wanted to speak to the commercial manager.

Q: You spoke to the customer? A: Yes.

f Q: You say you thought they were under the impression. How did they get that impression? A: Because it had a club crest on. The garment, I think one or more were T-shirts, one or two were sweat shirts.

Q: How do you know it was their impression? A: Because they told me.'

[52] Mr Ireland had held the position of company secretary for Tottenham Hotspur. He explained to the judge that the club's merchandising activities were a major commercial success and the demand for official Spurs' merchandise bearing their trade marks was very high. He said their fans had come to expect the club to market its own range of goods and he believed that the success of Spurs' merchandising activities was partly due to the high quality of the materials being sold. He said that by buying Spurs' branded clothing the fans knew that they were contributing to the club's finances. In cross-examination he was asked about unofficial goods being sold bearing the Tottenham Hotspur trade marks and whether the fans understood the difference between official and unofficial goods. He said:

j 'They understand if they buy something with one of our trade marks, that that indicates that it is a Tottenham Hotspur item of merchandise, because no-one else is allowed to use our trade marks. There is an unofficial market in stalls outside the ground on match days where people sell a blue and white scarf, or they sell T-shirts with images of Sol Campbell, or they sell T-shirts, sadly quite distasteful T-shirts, making comments about Arsenal Football Club.'

[53] He went on to refute the suggestion that fans knew that both official and unofficial goods were on the market. In his view 'any use of our trade marks on any clothing means it's from the club'. a

[54] Mr O'Donovan was the national and international trade mark manager of Manchester United. He had held that position since 1990. He explained how the merchandising of Manchester United goods had expanded over the years and stated that it had become increasingly important to the success of the club. He said that Manchester United supporters were very aware that the success of the merchandising efforts generated the funds available to improve the stadium and its approaches, to provide car parking facilities, to provide academy and training facilities and to provide funds to enable the club to expend money on players as necessary. In cross-examination he was asked whether people wearing Manchester United clothing did so to show that they were supporters. He said that he assumed that to be the position, but also said that it was to show that the person had 'bought the items manufactured by Manchester United'. b

[55] Miss Bouchard had been at Arsenal and was at the time that she gave evidence with West Ham. She was asked by the judge why warnings were given to supporters that there were inferior products about. She said: c

'A: The problem we had, and to some degree still have, is that people assume that something if it is carrying the official club crest or logo on it, it is produced by the club. We have had an instance where people have purchased items outside the shop and have brought them into the official club shop and said this is rubbish we want it replaced. We have said, but it is not an official club product, and they say it is bearing your logo. We say that may be but it is not official club merchandise. The public assume that anything bearing the club logo is often official ...' d

Laddie J: Do you keep a log of these complaints? A: We do at West Ham now. e

Q: At West Ham you do? A: Yes. f

Q: Can you say what is the turn over at West Ham of their club shop?
A: Currently between £4.5 and £5m.

Q: Per annum? A: Yes, per annum.

Q: How many complaints like this, wrongly ascribing non-licensed goods to you, how many of those do you get a year? A: On an average probably about 20. g

Q: Did you keep a similar log when you were with Arsenal? A: No. I mean I was relatively a junior member of staff at that time, and my then shop manager, Jack Kelsey, who is unfortunately deceased now, I do not believe he kept a record. h

Q: Maybe things have changed, but did you receive complaints in those days when you were with Arsenal? A: Yes, we did.

Q: In the same sort of frequency we're talking about? A: Possibly more so. Supporters, somewhat in their naivety do sometimes assume when they are buying something from a market, because it bears the official club crest believe that it is an official club product. Often they are of inferior quality. The clubs do feel that it is not a good reflection.' j

[56] Mr Reed made it clear in his evidence that he sold his goods as badges of allegiance and that everybody who purchased items from him knew full well that if it was marked official then it was a product that originated from Arsenal or an

a approved source and if not, it was not an official product. That was made clear in cross-examination when he identified the difference between official and unofficial goods as being that the official goods had labels or swing tickets whereas the unofficial goods had nothing. He accepted that absent such a label there was no way that consumers could differentiate between his products and those which were official.

b [57] Mr Adams gave evidence that a particular instance of alleged passing off had not occurred as there had been no misrepresentation. He accepted in cross-examination that 'an official product is something produced and sold by the Arsenal Football Club'. When asked how he distinguished between what was an official and unofficial product he explained that he was told which was which by Mr Reed. If he was unsure, he would go and ask, then he would put a sign on the c various goods saying which were official. He explained that the official goods, being those coming from Arsenal, were stated to be official and that a sign was put on them stating that fact. That was the only way that consumers could tell the difference. He knew that Mr Reed would be angry if he sold something as official which was not and that on every occasion a sign was put up to differentiate d between the two.

[58] Mr Matthews also dealt with the alleged instance of passing off. He said in his witness statement that sometimes people did ask if goods on the stall were official. In the main it was foreigners who asked the question, and that it was probably half a dozen times a year that the question was asked. His standard
e answer was that nothing was official unless it actually said so on the product. He also made it clear that if he was in doubt he asked Mr Reed which were official goods and which were not. He would always ask if he was not sure, whether there were tags or not. It was his view that official goods had tags on and they were the means by which they were differentiated.

f [59] Mr Stephens also gave evidence as to the alleged incidence of passing off. In cross-examination he was shown two hats bearing an Arsenal trade mark and was asked which one was official. He accepted that a hat which just had the club crest on it might be official and that if he was working for Mr Reed he would ask him whether it was official or not.

g [60] Mr Reed and those who helped him were in no doubt that there was a market for what they referred to as official goods. Such goods bore the trade marks. In their view what differentiated those goods from the alleged infringing goods were tags or swing tickets which stated that the official goods emanated from Arsenal.

h [61] Mr Wyand submitted that the evidence established that the use by Mr Reed did not indicate a connection in the course of trade between Mr Reed's goods and Arsenal. He submitted that that was the result of the acts of Arsenal over 30 years. As Arsenal had started to expand their merchandising, they needed to distinguish their goods from those of others, in particular those of Mr Reed. It was Arsenal who had educated consumers that if they wished to support the club they should buy their goods from Arsenal. Arsenal themselves had told the public that they
j could not rely upon the word 'Arsenal' on the goods as indicating that they came from Arsenal.

[62] That submission is correct in part. No doubt Arsenal have been at pains to tell the public to purchase goods from them and not to purchase copies. However that message cannot have reached consumers at large. It is those who attend matches who could get the message, not the thousands of others who support or are interested in Arsenal and goods bearing the trade marks. Further the fact that consumers know that there are copies about does not mean that the word 'Arsenal' on goods does not indicate origin. It could do so, but with the worry that it might be a wrong indication. a

[63] As to the instances of confusion, Mr Wyand supported the judge's conclusion that they were de minimis. He also submitted that such instances could have been the result of a false description of a scarf as an official scarf by somebody other than Mr Reed. b

[64] No attempt was made to differentiate between the use of the word 'Arsenal' and the other trade marks. That seems to have been the result of the reputation of the other trade marks. It is therefore acceptable to consider whether Mr Reed's use was trade mark use, taking as an example use of the word 'Arsenal' on a scarf or other item of clothing. c

[65] The use of the word 'Arsenal' on a scarf or other item of clothing could in theory denote three things. First that the owner was a supporter of Arsenal; second that the goods came from Arsenal or third a combination of the two. I suspect that to certain persons the first meaning would be the correct one. Mr Reed is an example of such a person. The crucial question is whether the other two meanings would occur to a substantial number of consumers. d

[66] As Mr Reed's goods are in substance identical to those of Arsenal's, there is nothing to differentiate them from Arsenal's goods once the swing ticket or tag is removed. That was accepted by the witnesses called on behalf of Mr Reed. It was for that reason that they went to the length that they did to differentiate Mr Reed's goods from those coming from Arsenal. e

[67] It is apparent from the evidence that a substantial number of consumers want to purchase goods bearing the sign 'Arsenal' from Arsenal. That was the evidence of Mr Hazell which was supported by analogy by the evidence of Mr Ireland and Mr O'Donovan. Further, there was evidence of instances of confusion. Those instances of confusion were thought by the judge to be de minimis. But it is reasonable to conclude that the instances were just the tip of an iceberg as those that are confused will not complain without ground for complaint. However the importance of the evidence is not that there was confusion, but that consumers seeing the signs identical to the Arsenal registered trade mark on the goods turned to Arsenal to complain. As Mr Hazell said, they complained to Arsenal because the goods had on them the Arsenal crest. Miss Bouchard's evidence was that people assumed that goods carrying the trade marks were produced by Arsenal. That appears to have been the position at Tottenham and Manchester United and there is nothing in the evidence that suggests that their fans think differently to fans of Arsenal as to the meaning of the trade marks on goods. f

[68] Mr Reed takes considerable care to inform his customers that his goods are not official in the sense that they do not come from Arsenal. If the use of the word 'Arsenal' did not carry with it such an indication of origin, there would be no need for Mr Reed to do anything at all. Clearly Mr Reed is suspicious that persons purchasing from him would, absent an explanation, believe that the goods came from Arsenal. Why? The answer must be that they bear the name Arsenal and that it denotes origin. His suspicion supports the evidence of the witnesses called by Arsenal. g

[69] I accept the judge's finding that the trade marks upon the goods are considered to be badges of allegiance, but all the evidence suggests that the trade marks do also designate origin of the goods to a substantial number of consumers. As to Mr Reed's use I accept that he does differentiate his goods from official goods, h

- a but his goods marked with the trade marks were identical to those emanating from Arsenal and therefore his use of the word Arsenal would, absent an explanation carry the same inference as similar use of the trade mark by Arsenal. Certainly the evidence suggests that that would be the inference that consumers would draw, particularly those that received the goods as a present. In my view the evidence is all one way, namely that use of the trade mark on goods such as scarves and hats, whether by Arsenal or others does denote origin.

PASSING OFF

- [70] I realise that there was no appeal on the conclusion reached by the judge on the cause of action traditionally called passing off, perhaps best referred to as unfair competition. However I am not convinced that his reasoning was correct. The traditional form of passing off as enunciated in such cases as Frank Reddaway & Co Ltd v George Banham & Co Ltd [1896] AC 199, [1895–9] All ER Rep 313 is no longer definitive of the ambit of the cause of action.

- c [71] As Cross J said in Vine Products Ltd v Mackenzie & Co Ltd [1969] RPC 1 at 23 of the decision in the Spanish Champagne cases (J Bollinger v Costa Brava Wine Co Ltd [1959] 3 All ER 800, [1960] Ch 262 and J Bollinger v Costa Brava Wine Co Ltd (No 2) [1961] 1 All ER 561, [1961] 1 WLR 277).

- e 'A man who does not know where Champagne comes from can have not the slightest reason for thinking that a bottle labelled "Spanish Champagne" contains a wine produced in France. But what he may very well think is that he is buying the genuine article—real Champagne—and that, I have no doubt, was the sort of deception which the judge had in mind. He thought, as I read his judgment, that if people were allowed to call sparkling wine not produced in Champagne "Champagne," even though preceded by an adjective denoting the country of origin, the distinction between genuine Champagne and "champagne type" wines produced elsewhere would become blurred; that the word "Champagne" would come gradually to mean no more than "sparkling wine;" and that the part of the plaintiffs' goodwill which consisted in the name would be diluted and gradually destroyed. If I may say so without impertinence I agree entirely with the decision in the Spanish Champagne case—but as I see it it uncovered a piece of common law or equity which had till then escaped notice—for in such a case there is not, in any ordinary sense, any representation that the goods of the defendant are the goods of the plaintiffs, and evidence that no-one has been confused or deceived in that way is quite beside the mark. In truth the decision went beyond the well-trodden paths of passing off into the unmapped area of "unfair trading" or "unlawful competition".'

- h [72] I would allow the appeal and give judgment in favour of Arsenal and hear counsel as to the order that should be made.

CLARKE LJ.

[73] I agree.

- j JONATHAN PARKER LJ.

[74] I also agree.

Appeal allowed. Permission to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HUTTON, LORD
RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

Trade mark – Infringement – Unauthorised use of registered trade mark – Criminal offence – Whether essential ingredient of offence use of registered trade mark as indication of trade origin – Whether reasonable belief no relevant trade mark registered a defence – Trade Marks Act 1994, s 92.

The respondent had been involved in making and copying bootleg recordings of performances by well known performers onto compact discs. The compact discs were labelled with the names of the performers. All the performers had registered their names as trade marks under the Trade Marks Act 1994. Sections 9^a and 10 of the 1994 Act provided that the proprietor of a registered trade mark had the exclusive rights in it which were infringed by the use of trade mark without his consent and set out the acts amounting to infringement. Section 11(2)(b)^b provided that a registered trade mark was not infringed by, inter alia, the use of indications concerning the characteristics of goods. Section 92^c created criminal offences of unauthorised use of signs identical to or likely to be mistaken for registered trade marks and sub-s (5) provided a defence of belief on reasonable grounds that the use of the sign in the manner in which it had been used was not an infringement of the registered trade mark. The respondent was charged with offences of the false application or use of trade marks contrary to s 92(1). At trial he submitted that before the Crown could establish one of the offences under s 92 it had to prove a civil infringement of the trade mark in question, in accordance with ss 9–11. He wished to rely on s 11(2)(b) and contend that the performers' names had not been used as indications of trade origin, but merely to identify the artists. Alternatively, he wished to use the defence in s 92(5). The judge held that s 92 was a 'stand alone' provision, and that it was not necessary to prove a civil infringement. The respondent then pleaded guilty to all the offences. His appeal was allowed by the Court of Appeal, which held that s 92(5) presupposed that the illegal unauthorised use amounted to civil infringement; that to establish an offence under s 92(1) the Crown need not prove a defendant's conduct constituted a civil infringement unless the defendant raised a defence under, inter alia, s 11, in which case it would be for the Crown to disprove such a defence; and that the judge's ruling had deprived the respondent the opportunity to have his defence under s 11(2)(b) considered by the jury. The Crown appealed.

Held – (1) Section 92 should be interpreted as applying only when the offending sign was used as an indication of trade origin. That was one of the ingredients of each of the offences created by s 92. It had, therefore, to be proved by the a Sections 9 and 10, so far as material, are set out at [8]–[11], below

c Section 92, so far as material, is set out at [18], [19], below

- a prosecution. Whether a sign had been so used was a question of fact in each case, the test being how the use of the sign would be perceived by the average consumer of the type of goods in question. The respondent would clearly have committed an offence under s 92(1) if he had sold compact discs under a brand name which was the name of a performer who had registered his name as a trade mark for compact discs. Used in that way, the sign would be an indication of trade origin. That was not, however, what the respondent had done. He had included on the labels the names of the artists whose performances had been recorded on the compact discs. As a matter of principle, the position in such a case was that if the name of the artist affixed to the compact disc and displayed on the packaging was exclusively an indication of the name of the performer whose performance was recorded on the compact disc, and if that use of the name of the performer was not likely to be understood as indicating any other connection between the performer and the compact disc, then such use would be descriptive only. It would not be an indication of the trade origin of the compact disc itself. Whether labelling and packaging satisfied that test, and consequently were innocuous for trade mark purposes, was a question of fact in each case (see [31], [35], [36], [56]–[58], [88], below).

- (2) Section 92(5) should be interpreted as furnishing a defence where the reason why a defendant believed his use of the sign did not infringe a registered trade mark was that he reasonably believed no relevant trade mark was registered, as well as where the defendant believed on reasonable grounds that his use of the sign did not infringe a registered trade mark of whose existence he was aware. Accordingly, the Crown's appeal would be dismissed (see [43], [55]–[58], [89], below).
- e

- Per curiam. The burden of proving the relevant facts on the balance of probability placed on an accused person by the s 92(5) defence is compatible with art 6(2) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (see [54], [56]–[58], [90], below).

Appeal

- b The Crown appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 17 October 2002 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Tuckey LJ, Pumfrey and Burton JJ) on 31 January 2002 ([2002] EWCA Crim 194, [2002] All ER (D) 34 (Feb)) allowing the appeal by the respondent, Robert Alexander Johnstone, against his conviction in the Crown Court at Kingston on 28 October 1999, when he had first entered not guilty pleas and then, following a ruling of law by Judge Mitchell which was adverse to him, entered guilty pleas to 12 counts of false application or use of trade marks, contrary to s 92(1)(c) of the Trade Marks Act 1994. The court certified that a point of law of general public importance, set out at [25], below, was involved in its decision. The British Phonographic Industry was granted leave to intervene by the Appeal Committee on 15 January 2003. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- f 22 May 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

- [1] My Lords, counterfeit goods and pirated goods are big business. They account for between 5% and 7% of world trade. They are estimated to cost the economy of this country some £9bn each year. Counterfeit goods comprise cheap imitations of the authentic article, sold under the trade mark of the authentic article, as with imitation 'Rolex' watches. Pirated goods comprise illicit copies of the authentic article which are not sold under the trade mark of the authentic article. This would happen, for instance, when a person makes and sells unauthorised copies of computer software which is the subject of copyright.
- g
- h Thus, in the context of music recordings, a counterfeit compact disc is an unlawful copy of, say, a Virgin compact disc, sold ostensibly as a Virgin product. A pirated compact disc is an unlawful copy of, in my example, a Virgin compact disc which is sold, not as a Virgin product, but under a different brand name.

- [2] Another type of unlawful trading is 'bootlegging'. Like counterfeit records and pirated records, bootleg records are also big business. They comprise copies of an unlawful recording of a performance at a live concert. The recording is made at an auditorium or taken from a radio or television broadcast.
- j

[3] Most bootleg products sold in this country are in compact disc format. They are mainly manufactured abroad and imported into this country without cases or paperwork. The importer then packages the discs, with created paperwork, into locally obtained cases.

[4] So it was with the subject matter of the present appeal. The present appeal relates to copies, in the form of compact discs, of bootleg recordings made of performances by well-known performers. The case concerns the use, in connection with these compact discs, of the criminal sanctions contained in the trade marks legislation. Questions about trade marks arise in this context in the following way. When sold to the public each of these compact discs bears, in the usual manner, the name of the performer whose performance is recorded on the disc: Rolling Stones, or Beatles, or whoever it may be. This name also appears on the accompanying paperwork inside the disc's case. Nowadays leading performers register their professional names as trade marks in respect of recordings. So, it is said, sales of the discs labelled in this way constitute infringements of the performers' registered trade marks. a

[5] The case arises out of the 'bootlegging' activities of Mr Robert Johnstone, the respondent to this appeal. His activities only came to light because of a misdirected parcel. Mrs Luddington lives in Hemel Hempstead. In October 1997 she was surprised to receive a large box. It contained 519 compact discs and associated artwork. The box had been mistakenly posted to her by Mr Johnstone from his home address in New Malden. Mrs Luddington notified Polygram Records, whose head of security retrieved the box and contacted the police. c

[6] Police officers then searched Mr Johnstone's home. They were accompanied by a representative of the trade body, British Phonographic Industry (BPI). Some 500 compact discs and audio cassettes were seized during the search. The investigator from BPI considered that most of the compact discs found, as well as those sent by error to Mrs Luddington, were bootleg recordings. Mr Johnstone was charged with having committed criminal offences under s 92 of the Trade Marks Act 1994. e

THE STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[7] Before elaborating further, and in order to explain the point of law which has arisen, I should refer briefly to the relevant statutory provisions. Part I of the 1994 Act concerns registered trade marks. Section 1 defines a trade mark as any sign capable of being represented graphically which is capable of distinguishing goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings. A trade mark may consist of words, including personal names. The proprietor of a registered trade mark has the rights and remedies provided by the Act (see s 2). f

[8] Sections 9–13 comprise a fasciculus of sections setting out the effect of a registered trade mark. Section 9(1) provides that the proprietor of a registered trade mark has the exclusive rights in the trade mark 'which are infringed by use of the trade mark in the United Kingdom without his consent'. The acts amounting to infringement if done without the consent of the proprietor are stated in s 10. h

[9] Section 10 deals with several different situations. Section 10(1) concerns the case where a person in the course of trade uses a sign identical with a registered trade mark in relation to goods identical with those for which it is registered. Such use constitutes infringement: j

'(1) A person infringes a registered trade mark if he uses in the course of trade a sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which it is registered.'

[10] Section 10(2) addresses cases where either (a) a sign identical with a registered trade mark is used in relation to goods similar to those for which the

- a trade mark is registered or (b) a sign similar to a registered trade mark is used in relation to goods identical with or similar to those for which the trade mark is registered. In such cases user constitutes infringement if there exists a likelihood of confusion on the part of the public. Section 10(3) concerns cases where a sign identical with or similar to a registered trade mark is used in relation to goods not similar to those for which the trade mark is registered. Then, in short, user
- b constitutes infringement where the trade mark has a reputation within the United Kingdom and the sign takes unfair advantage of, or is detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the trade mark.

[11] One of the ingredients of infringement as described in s 10(1)–(3) is the ‘use’ of a sign by a person. Section 10(4) gives some examples of what this means. A person uses a sign if he affixes the sign to goods or its packaging, or if he offers c goods for sale under the sign.

[12] Section 11 specifies some limits on the effect of a registered trade mark. Section 11(2) provides:

- d ‘A registered trade mark is not infringed by—(a) the use by a person of his own name or address, (b) the use of indications concerning the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, the time of production of goods or of rendering of services, or other characteristics of goods or services, or (c) the use of the trade mark where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service (in particular, as accessories or spare parts), provided the use is in accordance with honest
- e practices in industrial or commercial matters.’

TRADE MARK USE: INDICATION OF TRADE ORIGIN

- [13] The message conveyed by a trade mark has developed over the years, with changing patterns in the conduct of business (see the discussion in Scandecor
- f Development AB v Scandecor Marketing AB [2001] UKHL 21, [2001] I & PT 676). But the essence of a trade mark has always been that it is a badge of origin. It indicates trade source: a connection in the course of trade between the goods and the proprietor of the mark. That is its function. Hence the exclusive rights granted to the proprietor of a registered trade mark are limited to use of a mark likely to be taken as an indication of trade origin. Use of this character is an essential
- g prerequisite to infringement. Use of a mark in a manner not indicative of trade origin of goods or services does not encroach upon the proprietor’s monopoly rights. Dillon LJ observed trenchantly in Mothercare UK Ltd v Penguin Books Ltd [1988] RPC 113 at 118–119:

- h ‘... it stands to reason that a Trade Marks Act would only be concerned to restrict the use of a mark as a trademark or in a trademark sense, and should be construed accordingly. If descriptive words are legitimately registered [as a trademark], there is still no reason why other people should not be free to use the words in a descriptive sense, and not in any trademark sense.’

- j In this regard I cannot forbear adding the extreme hypothetical example beloved of trade mark lawyers. If a magazine publisher were to register an ordinary question mark, ‘?’, as a trade mark for magazines this would not prevent the grammatical use of question marks on the covers of other magazines.

[14] This fundamental principle, limiting the scope of the rights of the proprietor of a registered trade mark, was well established under the early trade marks legislation. It was carried forward expressly into s 4(1)(a) of the Trade Marks Act 1938 ('being used as a trade mark'). Section 4(1)(b) muddled the waters a little. The wording of s 4(1)(b) gave rise to an unresolved controversy over whether, and to what extent, this paragraph further extended the rights of a proprietor (see the discussion in Kerly's Law of Trade Marks (12th edn, 1986) pp 263–265 and the authorities cited there). This controversy is now of no more than historic interest.

[15] Against this background I turn to the 1994 Act. Section 10(1)–(3) specifies the acts which constitute infringement, but there is no express statement that the offending use must be use as a trade mark. I would not regard this as sufficient reason to suppose that Parliament intended to depart from such a basic principle. But on this, as so much else in the law of trade marks, it is necessary to look for guidance beyond the confines of the 1994 Act. One of the main purposes of this statute was to implement Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 to approximate the laws of member states relating to trade marks (OJ 1989 L40 p 1). This directive, which I shall call 'the trade mark directive', was concerned with harmonising the trade mark laws of member states. Articles 5 and 6 of the directive made provision regarding the rights conferred by a trade mark and the limits of those rights. Sections 10 and 11 of the 1994 Act give effect to these two articles. So authoritative guidance on the interpretation of s 10 now comes from the Court of Justice of the European Communities.

'... the essential function of a trade mark is to guarantee the identity of origin of the marked goods or services to the consumer or end user by enabling him, without any possibility of confusion, to distinguish the goods or services from others which have another origin. For the trade mark to be able to fulfil its essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the Treaty seeks to establish and maintain, it must offer a guarantee that all the goods or services bearing it have been manufactured or supplied under the control of a single undertaking which is responsible for their quality ...'

[17] The court then considered ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 30, [2003] 3 WLR 450 at 480 (paras 51–54)) the scope of the exclusive right conferred on the proprietor of a trade mark under art 5(1)(a) of the trade mark directive, which corresponds to s 10(2)(a) of the 1994 Act. The court held that the scope of this right is co-terminous with the function of registered trade marks:

'51 ... the exclusive right under art 5(1)(a) of the ... Directive was conferred in order to enable the trade mark proprietor to protect his specific interests as proprietor, that is, to ensure that the trade mark can fulfil its functions. The exercise of that right must therefore be reserved to cases in which a third party's a use of the sign affects or is liable to affect the functions of the trade mark, in particular its essential function of guaranteeing to consumers the origin of the goods.

52. The exclusive nature of the right conferred by a registered trade mark on its proprietor under art 5(1)(a) of the ... Directive can be justified only within the limits of the application of that article ...

b 54. The proprietor may not prohibit the use of a sign identical to the trade mark for goods identical to those for which the mark is registered if that use cannot affect his own interests as proprietor of the mark, having regard to its functions. Thus certain uses for purely descriptive purposes are excluded from the scope of art 5(1)(a) of the ... Directive because they do not affect any of the interests which that provision aims to protect, and do not therefore fall within the concept of use within the meaning of that provision ... (My emphasis.)

c Plainly, s 10 of the 1994 Act is capable of being so construed. In accordance with the Marleasing principle (see Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135), it should therefore be so construed. Non-trade mark use is not within s 10(1)–(3).

SECTION 92 AND MR JOHNSTONE'S CONVICTION

d [18] Part II of the 1994 Act relates to Community trade marks and international matters. Community trade marks were brought into effect by Council Regulation (EC) 40/94 on the Community trade mark (OJ 1994 L11 p 1), which is directly applicable to this country without the need for legislation by Parliament. Part II of the Act makes provision for consequential provisions and other matters. Part III of the Act, ss 62–97, contains administrative and supplemental provisions. Tucked away towards the end of these provisions are four sections which create criminal offences. The material section for the purposes of this appeal is s 92, bearing the heading: 'Unauthorised use of trade mark, &c. in relation to goods.' Section 92(1) provides:

e 'A person commits an offence who with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another, and without the consent of the proprietor—(a) applies to goods or their packaging a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark, or (b) sells or lets for hire, offers or exposes for sale or hire or distributes goods which bear, or the packaging of which bears, such a sign, or (c) has in his possession, custody or control in the course of a business any such goods with a view to the doing of anything, by himself or another, which would be an offence under paragraph (b).'

f h [19] Section 92(2) creates a comparable offence relating to material intended to be used for labelling or packaging goods, or as a business paper in relation to goods, or for advertising goods. Section 92(3) creates a comparable offence relating to making or possessing what can loosely be described as printer's plates. The opening rubric of s 92(2) and (3) is the same as in s 92(1). The activities must be done with a view to gain or with intent to cause loss and, in either case, without the consent of the proprietor. Section 92(4) prescribes two limiting conditions. No offence is committed under the section unless one or other of these conditions is satisfied. I need mention only condition (a): that the goods are goods in respect of which the trade mark is registered. Section 92(5) provides a defence of reasonable belief of non-infringement:

'It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under this section to show that he believed on reasonable grounds that the use of the sign in the manner in which it was used, or was to be used, was not an infringement of the registered trade mark.'

[20] I can now return to the narrative. Mr Johnstone was arraigned at the Crown Court at Kingston on an indictment containing 12 specimen counts. Each count related to one compact disc. In each count the offence comprised the false application or use of trade marks, contrary to s 92(1)(c) of the 1994 Act. The particulars of offence under count 1 read as follows:

'Robert Alexander JOHNSTONE on or before the 24th day of October 1997 with a view to gain for himself or another or with intent to cause loss to another and without the lawful consent of the proprietor had in his possession, custody or control in the course of a business, a compact disc entitled "The B Sides Collection—Volumes One and Two" bearing the trademark Bon Jovi, with a view to the commission of an act by himself or another which would be an offence under s 92(1)(b) of the Trade Marks Act 1994.'

[21] At trial on 25 October 1999 Mr Lane QC submitted on behalf of Mr Johnstone that before the Crown could establish an offence under s 92 the Crown must prove a civil infringement of the registered trade mark in question, in accordance with the provisions of ss 9–11 of the 1994 Act. The defence wished to rely on s 11(2)(b) and contend that the use of the performer's name on each of the compact discs was not as an indication of trade origin. It was merely to indicate who was the performer. Alternatively, Mr Johnstone wished to rely on the honest and reasonable belief defence under s 92(5).

[22] Judge Mitchell, in a preliminary ruling, rejected these submissions. In doing so he followed several other decisions in the Crown Court. Section 92 was a 'stand alone' provision. It was a complete code so far as criminal offences were concerned, and it was not necessary to prove a civil infringement. 'Infringement' in s 92(5) meant unauthorised use as defined in the earlier provisions of the section. Mr Johnstone then pleaded guilty to the offences with which he was charged. He was subsequently sentenced to six months' imprisonment concurrent on each count. A confiscation order in the amount of £130,181.24 was made, together with forfeiture orders.

THE COURT OF APPEAL

[23] Mr Johnstone appealed. On 31 January 2002 the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Crim 194, [2002] FSR 840), comprising Tuckey LJ and Pumfrey and Burton JJ, allowed the appeal. In disagreeing with the judge, the court considered that unless the defences available to a claim for civil infringement of a trade mark were available in criminal proceedings s 92 would embrace behaviour which could not be the subject of a successful civil claim. This is not what Parliament intended. Section 92(5) presupposes that the illegal unauthorised use amounts to infringement as defined in ss 9(1), (2) and 10 (see the definition in s 104).

[24] The Court of Appeal said that to establish an offence under s 92(1) the prosecution need not prove the defendant's conduct constituted a civil infringement unless the defence raises a defence under ss 10–12. Then it will be for the prosecution to disprove such a defence. The court allowed Mr Johnstone's appeal because the judge's ruling had denied him the opportunity to have his defence under s 11(2)(b) considered by the jury. The court did not

- a. order a re-trial. Mr Johnstone had served his sentence of imprisonment, and the alleged offences occurred four-and-a-half years ago.

SECTION 92 AND USE AS A TRADE MARK

- [25] The certified question on this appeal to your Lordships' House is whether it is a defence to a criminal charge under s 92 of the 1994 Act that the defendant's acts do not amount to a civil infringement of the trade mark. On this, although he substantially modified his stance in the course of his reply, Mr Perry's opening submissions to the House were to the following effect. The 1994 Act provides for two separate regimes for the protection of trade marks and consumers. One regime is concerned with civil infringement, the other with criminal unauthorised use of trade marks in relation to goods. As a matter of construction s 92 does not require proof of civil infringement. In keeping with other offence-creating provisions, the ingredients of the offences created by s 92 appear on the face of the section. Parliament intended to create offences which would be simple for local weights and measures authorities to enforce and for magistrates and jurors to understand. Parliament did not intend to introduce questions of civil infringement into the criminal courts, save to the limited extent that an accused's belief he was not infringing a registered trade mark might amount to a defence.

- [26] I agree that the ingredients of the offences created by s 92 are to be found within the section itself. Where I part company with Mr Perry's opening submissions is on the interpretation of s 92. Section 92 is concerned to prohibit the wrongful exploitation of registered trade marks. It replaced s 58A of the Trade Marks Act 1938. Section 58A made the fraudulent use of a trade mark an offence. Difficulties arose in practice in proving the necessary intent in cases where at point of sale the trader disclaimed the authenticity of his goods. The trader would describe his counterfeit products as 'brand copies' or 'genuine fakes'. Section 92 avoids this problem. In particular, intention to infringe a registered trade mark is not an ingredient of the offence. Instead, s 92 focuses simply on unauthorised use of 'a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark' (see s 92(1)(a), (2)(a) and (3)(a)).

Instead, s 92 focuses simply on unauthorised use of 'a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark' (see s 92(1)(a), (2)(a) and (3)(a)).

- [27] In my view it is implicit in these provisions that the offending use of the sign must be use as a trade mark. Take, as an illustration, s 92(1)(a). This prohibits the application to goods of a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark. Apply this to a case where the registered trade mark consists of words capable of being used descriptively. Use of these words in their descriptive sense would be, in terms of trade mark law, unobjectionable. The registration of the word 'Alabaster' as a trade mark would not preclude others from lawfully stating that their product was 'made from alabaster'. Section 92 cannot have been intended to criminalise such conduct.
- g. This prohibits the application to goods of a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark. Apply this to a case where the registered trade mark consists of words capable of being used descriptively. - h. from lawfully stating that their product was 'made from alabaster'. Section 92 cannot have been intended to criminalise such conduct.

- [28] This is my starting point. Within the section there are two clear indications confirming this interpretation. First, a prescribed ingredient of each offence is that the conduct in question is done 'without the consent of the proprietor' of the registered trade mark. This assumes the proprietor could object to the acts in question. Without his consent the acts could not lawfully be done. The section is aimed at criminalising conduct of this character, namely, conduct to which the proprietor could object. This is as one would expect. Parliament cannot have intended to criminalise conduct which could lawfully be done without the proprietor's consent. Parliament cannot have intended to make it an offence to use a sign in a way which is innocuous because it does not
- j. This assumes the proprietor could object to the acts in question. Without his consent the acts could not lawfully be done. The section is aimed at criminalising conduct of this character, namely, conduct to which the proprietor could object. This is as one would expect. Parliament cannot have intended to criminalise conduct which could lawfully be done without the proprietor's consent. Parliament cannot have intended to make it an offence to use a sign in a way which is innocuous because it does not infringe the proprietor's rights. That would be to extend, by means of a criminal sanction, the scope of the rights of the proprietor. a [29] Secondly, s 92(5) presupposes that the conduct of the person charged was an infringement of a registered trade mark. It would make no sense for reasonable belief in non-infringement to provide a defence if infringement was irrelevant so far as the criminal offences are concerned.

[30] Further, and looking more widely, the 1994 Act as a whole must be interpreted so far as possible to give effect to the trade mark directive. This obligation applies to provisions such as s 92, whose terms do not derive from the trade mark directive, as it does to provisions, such as s 10, which derive directly from the directive. Articles 5–7 of the directive embody a 'complete harmonisation' of the rules relating to the rights conferred by a trade mark (see Silhouette International Schmied GmbH & Co KG v Hartlauer Handelsgesellschaft mbH Case C-355/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 769 at 788, [1998] ECR I-4799 at 4831 (para 25)). They define the rights of trade mark proprietors in the Community (see Zino Davidoff SA v A & G Imports Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Tesco Stores Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Costco Wholesale UK Ltd Joined cases C-414/99–C-416/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 55 at 91, [2001] ECR I-8691 (para 39)). If s 92 were to be interpreted as applying in circumstances beyond those within ss 9–11, there might well be inconsistency with the trade mark directive. b

[31] For these reasons s 92 is to be interpreted as applying only when the offending sign is used as an indication of trade origin. This is one of the ingredients of each of the offences created by s 92. It must therefore be proved by the prosecution. Whether a sign is so used is a question of fact in each case. The test is how the use of the sign would be perceived by the average consumer of the type of goods in question (see Sabel BV v Puma AG Case C-251/95 [1997] ECR I-6191 at 6224 (para 23)). e

[32] This should not give rise to practical difficulties for weights and measures authorities or for magistrates or jurors. Despite Mr Perry's submissions, I see no reason to doubt that all those concerned are well able to grasp and apply the notion of a sign being used as an indication of trade origin as distinct, for instance, from a sign comprising words being used descriptively. In the overwhelming majority of cases there should be little difficulty. Ironically, the present case is not so straightforward. I shall mention later why this is so. f

[33] It will be seen, therefore, that I have reached much the same conclusion as the Court of Appeal although by a more confined process of interpretation. On the interpretation of s 92 which commends itself to me the pieces of this little jigsaw, some home-grown, such as s 92, and others imported from the trade marks directive, although not fitting perfectly, fit together tolerably well. In particular, on this interpretation the circumstances in which criminal liability arises are for the most part either the same as, or narrower than, the circumstances in which civil liability arises under ss 9–11. This is as one would expect. Consistently with this, the s 92(5) defence can operate according to its tenor, with infringement bearing the meaning defined in s 104. g

[34] I should mention one possible exception. Civil liability under s 10(1)–(3) arises only in respect of use of a sign 'in the course of trade'. The equivalent phrase 'in the course of a business' appears in s 92 in respect of some, but not all, of the alternative sets of factual ingredients of the offences. For instance, this equivalent phrase appears in s 92(1)(c), (2)(b) and (c). But it is not stated as a necessary ingredient in, for example, s 92(1)(a) or (2)(a). I doubt whether this dissonance between ss 10(1)–(3) and 92(1)–(3) is of practical importance. An j a essential ingredient of all the criminal offences created by s 92(1)–(3) is that a person commits an offence where ‘with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another’ he does the act in question. With this in mind it is hard to think of a realistic example of conduct which would attract criminal liability and yet be excluded from civil liability because it would not be ‘in the course of trade’.

A QUESTION OF FACT

[35] I turn to apply s 92(1)(c) to the facts of the present case, taking count 1 for ease of reference. ‘Bon Jovi’ is, it seems, registered as a trade mark for compact discs. Clearly Mr Johnstone would commit an offence under s 92(1) if he sold compact discs under the brand name ‘Bon Jovi’. Used in this way the sign ‘Bon Jovi’ would be an indication of trade origin, in the same way as household names such as EMI or Sony are used to indicate the trade origin of compact discs marketed under those brand names. This use of the sign ‘Bon Jovi’ would be as an indication that the discs themselves all came from a source known as ‘Bon Jovi’.

d [36] That is not what Mr Johnstone did. What he did was to include on the compact disc labels and, I assume, the accompanying packaging, the name of the group or artist whose performance was recorded on the compact disc in question: Bon Jovi in the case of count 1, U2 in the case of count 2, Rolling Stones in the case of count 3, and so on. Considered as a matter of principle, the position in this type of case is as follows. If the name of the artist or group affixed to the compact disc and displayed on the packaging is exclusively an indication of the name of the performer whose performance is recorded on the compact disc, and if this use of the name of the performer is not likely to be understood as indicating any other connection between the performer and the compact disc, then such use would be descriptive only. By identifying the performer it would be descriptive of the contents of the disc and nothing more. It would not be an indication of the trade ‘origin’ of the disc itself. Whether particular labelling and packaging satisfy this test, and consequently are innocuous for trade mark purposes, is a question of fact in each case.

[37] On this question of fact different minds may sometimes reach different conclusions. This is illustrated by the decision of the Federal Court of Australia, sitting as a Full Court, in Musidor BV v Tansing (trading as Apple Music House) (1994) 123 ALR 593. Tansing manufactured and sold compact discs bearing bootleg recordings of live performances by the Rolling Stones group in the 1960s. The packaging bore a photograph of the Rolling Stones and the name Rolling Stones in prominent lettering. The compact discs also bore the name Rolling Stones. ‘Rolling Stones’ was registered as a trade mark for compact discs. The majority of the court, comprising Gummow and Heerey JJ, held that this use did not infringe the trade mark because it was not use as a trade mark. Use of the words ‘Rolling Stones’ on the packaging and discs would convey to the prospective purchaser that if he bought the disc and played it there would emerge music of the well-known group Rolling Stones. There is no other way of readily identifying the group whose performance was recorded on the disc.

[38] In his dissenting judgment Davies J reached a different conclusion on how this use of the words Rolling Stones would be understood. He expressed himself in quite general terms. If a trade mark is used in relation to sound recordings, and the name is that of a musical group—

'the use of the mark will ordinarily inform the public that the article is a recording of a performance by the group and that its release has been authorised by them or their organisation.' (My emphasis.) (See (1994) 123 ALR 593 at 594.) a

[39] In the present case the Court of Appeal preferred the minority opinion of Davies J, while emphasising that whether a mark is used as a trade mark is a question of fact in every case. I do not understand the Court of Appeal to have been saying that the test applicable when deciding this question of fact is different b from what I have set out above. If they were, I respectfully disagree.

[40] The crucial issue here, as I have said, is one of fact. I add a general comment. Difficulties can be expected to arise if trade mark law is utilised as a means of enforcing performers' rights in respect of recordings of their performances. Trade mark law, as already emphasised, is concerned essentially c with the trade origin of goods. Protection for the rights of performers as such is properly found elsewhere: nowadays, in Pt II of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, as amended by the Duration of Copyright and Rights in Performances Regulations 1995, SI 1995/3297, the Copyright and Related Rights Regulations 1996, SI 1996/2967 and the Copyright, etc and Trade Marks d (Offences and Enforcement) Act 2002. This legislation contains an elaborate code concerning the rights of performers, together with remedies and criminal sanctions for infringements of performers' rights by making, possessing or selling illicit recordings. The code includes like provision for persons having recording rights. I recognise that, given the control performers have over recordings of e their performances, a buyer of a compact disc may expect the recording has been approved by or on behalf of the performer. But that expectation, where it exists, is not necessarily indicative that the performer's name is being used on the compact disc as a trade mark or that the average buyer so understands.

[41] For completeness I add that the decision of the Court of Justice in Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2003] 3 WLR 450, already mentioned, does not assist either way on this point in the present case. f There the defendant sold football club souvenirs and memorabilia, including scarves bearing the name 'Arsenal'. The plaintiff football club had registered the trade mark 'Arsenal' for classes of goods which included scarves. The club claimed the defendant's activities infringed its registered trade marks. Having g stated the applicable legal principles as quoted above, the court expressed its view on the facts of the case. Use of the Arsenal logo was not intended for purely descriptive purposes. The use was such as to create the impression 'that there is a material link in the course of trade between the goods concerned and the trade mark proprietor' (see at 30–31 (para 56)). Whether it was open to the court to reach this factual conclusion has proved controversial (see [2002] EWHC 2695 h (Ch), [2003] 1 All ER 137, [2003] EWCA Civ 696, [2003] 3 All ER 865). The rights and wrongs of this particular controversy are not material to the outcome of the present case.

THE REASONABLE BELIEF DEFENCE: S 92(5)

[42] Mr Johnstone's alternative defence was based on s 92(5). His case was j that he relied upon advice given by a reputable trade marks attorney that possession of the goods in question was lawful. Two points arise here. The first concerns the availability of the s 92(5) defence where the defendant does not know of the existence of the registered trade mark in question. In Torbay Council v Singh [1999] IP & T 54 the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division held that the defence was not available in such a case. The court noted that s 92(5)

- a speaks of a reasonable belief that the 'manner' of use of the sign did not infringe 'the registered trade mark'. Auld LJ held that this presupposes an awareness by the defendant of the existence of the registration against which he can match his manner of use of the allegedly infringing sign. The Court of Appeal followed this interpretation in R v Keane [2001] FSR 63. More recently, a differently constituted Court of Appeal, comprising Kay LJ and Andrew Smith J, doubted the correctness of this interpretation (see R v Rhodes [2002] EWCA 1390 at [21], [22], [2003] FSR 147 at [21], [22]).

- b [43] I share these doubts. The interpretation adopted in Singh's case draws a distinction Parliament cannot have intended. The language of the subsection gives no support to this distinction. Section 92(5) is concerned to provide a defence where the person charged has a reasonable belief in the lawfulness of what he did. Those who act honestly and reasonably are not to be visited with criminal sanctions. It makes no sense to confine this defence to cases where the defendant is aware of the existence of the registered trade mark and exclude altogether those cases where the defendant is not. Section 92(5) provides a defence where the defendant believes on reasonable grounds his use of the sign does not infringe a registered trade mark of whose existence he is aware. It would be extraordinary if the subsection does not equally furnish a defence in the stronger case where the reason why the defendant believes his use of the sign does not infringe a registered trade mark is that he reasonably believes no relevant trade mark is registered. Section 92(5) is to be interpreted as including the latter case as well as the former.

BURDEN OF PROOF

- f [44] The opening words of s 92(5) are that it 'is a defence for a person charged with an offence under this section to show that he believed ...'. This wording gives rise to the second point arising in respect of the s 92(5) defence. It concerns the burden of proof. On this there are conflicting decisions of the Court of Appeal. In the present case the Court of Appeal held that, having regard to the presumption of innocence in art 6(2) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), the burden cast upon the accused is what is often called an evidentiary burden. He must raise an issue sufficient to require the prosecution to disprove it as part of the burden of proof resting on the prosecution. If the accused raises such an issue, and the prosecution fails to disprove the facts raised by the issue, the defence succeeds. It is not necessary for the accused person himself to prove the facts set out in s 92(5).

- g [45] In the present case the prosecution did not argue the contrary view in the Court of Appeal. In the later case of S v London Borough of Havering [2002] EWCA Crim 2558, [2003] 1 Cr App Rep 602 the prosecution took a different line. There the point was not conceded. After what was clearly a much fuller citation of authority and examination of the issue, the Court of Appeal, comprising Rose LJ and Hughes and Davis JJ, reached the contrary conclusion on the proper interpretation of s 92(5). Before your Lordships' House the prosecution submitted that the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case was wrong and the views expressed in S's case were to be preferred.

j [46] In the events which have happened this issue does not call for decision in the present case. But the House should not leave the law on this point in its present state, with differing views expressed by the Court of Appeal. I shall, therefore, state my views as shortly as may be. First, I entertain no doubt that, unless this interpretation is incompatible with art 6(2) of the convention, s 92(5) should be interpreted as imposing on the accused person the burden of proving the relevant facts on the balance of probability. Unless he proves these facts he does not make good the defence provided by s 92(5). The contrary interpretation of s 92(5) involves substantial re-writing of the subsection. It would not be sufficient to read the subsection as meaning that it is a defence for a person charged to raise an issue on the facts in question. That would not be sufficient, because raising an issue does not provide the person charged with a defence. It provides him with a defence only if, he having raised an issue, the prosecution then fails to disprove the relevant facts beyond reasonable doubt. I do not believe s 92(5) can be so read. I do not believe that is what Parliament intended.

[47] The question which next arises is whether this interpretation, namely, that s 92(5) imposes a 'legal' or 'persuasive' onus on the person charged, is compatible with the presumption of innocence contained in art 6(2) of the convention. Prima facie this interpretation derogates from that principle. That much is clear. On this interpretation s 92(5) sets out facts a defendant must establish if he is to avoid conviction. These facts are presumed against him unless he establishes the contrary.

[48] That is not the end of the matter. The European Court of Human Rights has recognised that the convention does not, in principle, prohibit presumptions of fact or law. What art 6(2) requires is that they must be confined within reasonable limits which take into account the importance of what is at stake and maintain the rights of the defence (see Salabiaku v France (1988) 13 EHRR 379 at 388 (para 28)). Thus, as elsewhere in the convention, a reasonable balance has to be held between the public interest and the interests of the individual. In each case it is for the state to show that the balance held in the legislation is reasonable. The derogation from the presumption of innocence requires justification.

[49] Identifying the requirements of a reasonable balance is not as easy as it might seem. One is seeking to balance incommensurables. At the heart of the difficulty is the paradox noted by Sachs J in State v Coetzee [1997] 2 LRC 593 at 677 (para 220): the more serious the crime and the greater the public interest in securing convictions of the guilty, the more important the constitutional protection of the accused becomes. In the face of this paradox all that can be said is that for a reverse burden of proof to be acceptable there must be a compelling reason why it is fair and reasonable to deny the accused person the protection normally guaranteed to everyone by the presumption of innocence.

[50] The relevant factors to be taken into account when considering whether such a reason exists have been considered in several recent authorities, in particular the decisions of the House in R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326 and R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577. And there is now a lengthening list of decisions of the Court of Appeal and other courts in respect of particular statutory provisions. A sound starting point is to remember that if an accused is required to prove a fact on the balance of probability to avoid conviction, this permits a conviction in spite of the fact-finding tribunal having a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused (see Dickson CJ in R v Whyte (1988) 51 DLR (4th) 481 at 493). This consequence of a reverse burden of proof should colour one's approach when evaluating the reasons why it is said that, in the absence of a persuasive burden on the accused, the public interest will be prejudiced to an extent which justifies placing a persuasive burden on the accused. The more serious the punishment which may flow from conviction, the more compelling must be the reasons. The extent and a nature of the factual matters required to be proved by the accused, and their importance relative to the matters required to be proved by the prosecution, have to be taken into account. So also does the extent to which the burden on the accused relates to facts which, if they exist, are readily provable by him as matters within his own knowledge or to which he has ready access.

[51] In evaluating these factors the court's role is one of review. Parliament, b not the court, is charged with the primary responsibility for deciding, as a matter of policy, what should be the constituent elements of a criminal offence. I echo the words of Lord Woolf in A-G of Hong Kong v Lee Kwong-kut, A-G of Hong Kong v Lo Chak-man [1993] 3 All ER 939 at 955, [1993] AC 951 at 975:

c 'In order to maintain the balance between the individual and the society as a whole, rigid and inflexible standards should not be imposed on the legislature's attempts to resolve the difficult and intransigent problems with which society is faced when seeking to deal with serious crime.'

The court will reach a different conclusion from the legislature only when it is apparent the legislature has attached insufficient importance to the fundamental d right of an individual to be presumed innocent until proved guilty.

[52] I turn to s 92. (1) Counterfeiting is fraudulent trading. It is a serious contemporary problem. Counterfeiting has adverse economic effects on genuine trade. It also has adverse effects on consumers, in terms of quality of goods and, sometimes, on the health or safety of consumers. The Commission of the e European Communities has noted the scale of this 'widespread phenomenon with a global impact'. Urgent steps are needed to combat counterfeiting and piracy (see the Green Paper, Combating Counterfeiting and Piracy in the Single Market (COM(98) 569 final) and its follow up (COM(2000) 789 final)). Protection of consumers and honest manufacturers and traders from counterfeiting is an important policy consideration. (2) The offences created by s 92 have rightly f been described as offences of 'near absolute liability'. The prosecution is not required to prove intent to infringe a registered trade mark. (3) The offences attract a serious level of punishment: a maximum penalty on indictment of an unlimited fine or imprisonment for up to ten years or both, together with the possibility of confiscation and deprivation orders. (4) Those who trade in brand g products are aware of the need to be on guard against counterfeit goods. They are aware of the need to deal with reputable suppliers and keep records and of the risks they take if they do not. (5) The s 92(5) defence relates to facts within the accused person's own knowledge: his state of mind, and the reasons why he held the belief in question. His sources of supply are known to him. (6) Conversely, by and large it is to be expected that those who supply traders with counterfeit h products, if traceable at all by outside investigators, are unlikely to be co-operative. So, in practice, if the prosecution must prove that a trader acted dishonestly, fewer investigations will be undertaken and fewer prosecutions will take place.

[53] In my view factors (4) and (6) constitute compelling reasons why the j s 92(5) defence should place a persuasive burden on the accused person. Taking all the factors mentioned above into account, these reasons justify the loss of protection which will be suffered by the individual. Given the importance and difficulty of combating counterfeiting, and given the comparative ease with which an accused can raise an issue about his honesty, overall it is fair and reasonable to require a trader, should need arise, to prove on the balance of probability that he honestly and reasonably believed the goods were genuine.

[54] For these reasons, which are substantially the same as those given by Rose LJ in S v London Borough of Havering [2003] 1 Cr App Rep 602, I consider the persuasive burden placed on an accused person by the s 92(5) defence is compatible with art 6(2). This being so, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether, if this interpretation of s 92(5) were incompatible with art 6(2), s 92(5) might be open to a different interpretation pursuant to s 3(1) of the 1998 Act. a

[55] I would dismiss this appeal. The answer to the certified question is that use of the offending sign as an indication of trade origin is an ingredient of the offences created by s 92 of the 1994 Act. b

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[58] My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, as well as the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe. I respectfully agree with both of them and, for the reasons that they give, I too would dismiss the appeal. e

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[59] My Lords, counterfeiting, piracy and bootlegging of consumer goods (including video and audio recordings, computer equipment, toys and perfume) are big business and have a significant effect on the economies of many countries. A recent Green Paper from the Commission of the European Communities (Combating Counterfeiting and Piracy in the Single Market (COM(98) 569 final)) estimated that counterfeiting and piracy accounted for between 5% and 7% of world trade, with the estimated figure being as high as 25% in the audio-visual industry. Counterfeiting, piracy and bootlegging are not exact terms but all involve deliberate, and generally fraudulent, infringement of various intellectual property rights—notably trade marks, copyright, design right and performing rights. Counterfeiting is generally used to include unauthorised sale, under a well-known trade mark, of goods not made or authorised by the proprietor of the trade mark. Piracy is generally used to include infringement of copyright (including copyright in computer software). Bootlegging is generally used to describe the sale of sound recordings made, without authority, either at live concerts or from broadcasts. Typically, bootleg sound recordings are sold under a manufacturer's name which is unobjectionable but with unauthorised use, on the compact disc and its packaging, of the name of the performers (for instance, the Rolling Stones) despite the fact that their name may be a registered trade mark. f

a [60] The international community has a strong interest in suppressing these dishonest activities by both civil and criminal sanctions. This case is concerned with this country's criminal sanctions against misuse of trade marks used in the popular music industry. Your Lordships have in a sense been looking at only a small part of the total picture of sanctions against these activities, since your Lordships have not been concerned with civil or criminal sanctions against b copyright infringements, or with the far-reaching civil and criminal sanctions provided under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 and the Consumer Protection Act 1987.

c [61] Section 92 of the Trade Marks Act 1994 creates a number of criminal offences punishable (on conviction on indictment) by up to ten years' imprisonment. The principal issue raised on this appeal is whether a person can be convicted of an offence under s 92 for acts which do not amount to a civil infringement of a registered trade mark. There are also some subsidiary and related issues. In order to explain how they arise it is necessary to say something about the background to the 1994 Act and its legislative scheme and purpose.

d [62] The law of trade marks has ancient origins which are preserved in the non-statutory law of passing off. Statutory regulation of trade marks, including a system of registration, was introduced by the Trade Marks Act 1875 and the Trade Marks Registration Act 1875. For much of the twentieth century the operative statute was the Trade Marks Act 1938. In recent times the whole of trade mark law has been re-shaped by the 1994 Act, which was enacted (as its long title states)—

e 'to make new provision for registered trade marks, implementing Council Directive No. 89/104/EEC of 21st December 1988 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks; to make provision in connection with Council Regulation (EC) No. 40/94 of 20th December 1993 f on the Community trade mark; to give effect to the Madrid Protocol Relating to the International Registration of Marks of 27th June 1989, and to certain provisions of the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of 20th March 1883, as revised and amended; and for connected purposes.'

g [63] In construing the 1994 Act your Lordships have to approach it as a new statute, the main purpose of which is to implement the directive. Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks (OJ 1989 L40 p 1) (the directive) aims at the partial approximation (but not the complete harmonisation) of the trade mark laws of the member states. The 1994 Act must be construed accordingly (see Marleasing SA v La h Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135 at 4159 (para 8)). But many of the basic concepts in the directive appear to be the same as, or closely similar to, those which have informed the previous domestic law. That is natural enough, since the basic purpose of a trade mark is the same in any national economic system. The purpose is as a guarantee of commercial j origin. As it was recently put by the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634 at 649, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 30):

'... according to the case law of the court, the essential function of a trade mark is to guarantee the identity of the origin of the marked product to the consumer or end-user by enabling him, without any possibility of confusion, to distinguish the product or service from others which have another origin, and for the trade mark to be able to fulfil its essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the [EC Treaty] seeks to establish, it must offer a guarantee that all the goods or services bearing it have originated under the control of a single undertaking which is responsible for their quality ...'

[64] In order to fulfil this function, a trade mark must be distinctive. That has always been a requirement under English law (although under the 1938 Act two levels of distinctiveness were required for so-called Pt A and Pt B registrations, a complication which has now disappeared). Distinctiveness is in this context to be contrasted with descriptiveness. Words which would be absurdly inappropriate as a description (such as North Pole for bananas: see British Sugar plc v James Robertson & Sons Ltd [1996] RPC 281 at 306) may for precisely that reason be particularly distinctive. The contrast is closely connected with the issue of trade mark use (that is, use of a registered trade mark for its statutory purpose, rather than for some other purpose) to which it will be necessary to return.

[65] Section 92 must be set in its context of the general scheme of the 1994 Act. Its scheme is that Pt I (ss 1–50) deals with registered trade marks. Part II (ss 51–60) deals with Community trade marks and international matters. Part III (ss 62–98) contains administrative and other supplementary provisions. Part IV (ss 99–110) contains miscellaneous and general provisions. For present purposes the most important sections in Pt I are ss 1–3 and 9–12. Section 1 defines 'trade mark' as 'any sign capable of being represented graphically which is capable of distinguishing goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings'. Section 2 provides that a registered trade mark is a property right which gives the proprietor rights and remedies under the Act. Section 3 lists absolute grounds for refusal of registration, including (in sub-s (1)):

'(b) trade marks which are devoid of any distinctive character; (c) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, the time of production of goods or of rendering of services, or other characteristics of goods or services ...'

The general effect of para (c) is to indicate that a proposed trade mark may not perform a purely descriptive function, and its language is echoed by that of s 11(2)(b).

[66] Section 9(1) provides:

'The proprietor of a registered trade mark has exclusive rights in the trade mark which are infringed by use of the trade mark in the United Kingdom without his consent.

The acts amounting to infringement, if done without the consent of the proprietor, are specified in section 10.'

So what amounts to an infringement (sometimes referred to in the course of argument in the appeal as civil infringement) is to be gathered from s 10, as supplemented by ss 11 and 12. These sections are something of an intricate mosaic (no doubt reflecting the difficulties facing the draftsman in amalgamating the old law under the 1938 Act with the directive, and in particular arts 5 and 6 of the directive).

- a [67] The text of ss 10 and 11 is set out either verbatim or in detailed summary in the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, which I have had the advantage of reading in draft (and from which I also gratefully adopt the summary of the facts). I will merely repeat the general effect of ss 10 and 11 (s 12 deals with exhaustion of rights and is not relevant to this appeal).
- b (1) Infringement occurs only if there is unauthorised use in the course of trade (defined in s 103 as including any business or profession). (2) If use is of the same mark for the same goods (referred to in argument as double identity) liability is (subject to the question of trade mark use) automatic (see s 10(1), reflecting art 5(1)(a)). (3) If the allegedly infringing use is a case of identity of mark (only) or of goods (only) with mere similarity in the other element, liability is not automatic but depends on likelihood of confusion (see s 10(2), reflecting art 5(1)(b)). (4) If the mark used is the same or similar, but the goods are not similar, there is liability if the trade mark has a reputation in the United Kingdom, and the alleged infringement takes unfair advantage of, or is detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the trade mark (see s 10(3), reflecting the permissive provision in art 5(2) (which has recently been given a liberal interpretation by the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Davidoff & Cie SA v Gofkid Ltd Case C-292/00 [2003] 1 WLR 1714 at 1719 (paras 17–30))).
- d (5) Use is defined (non-exhaustively) in s 10(4), reflecting art 5(3); s 10(5) extends liability to accomplices; and s 10(6) covers comparative advertising (and similar special uses) provided that they are fair and honest. (6) All these provisions are subject to the specific restrictions and exceptions in ss 11 and 12. For present
- e purposes the most important exception is in s 11(2):

- f ‘A registered trade mark is not infringed by—(a) the use by a person of his own name or address, (b) the use of indications concerning the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, the time of production of goods or of rendering of services, or other characteristics of goods or services, or (c) the use of the trade mark where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service (in particular, as accessories or spare parts), provided the use is in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters.’

- g This provision reproduces, almost word for word, art 6(1) of the directive.

- h [68] Section 92, in Pt III of the 1994 Act, represents the third generation of statutory provisions creating trade mark offences. From the earliest days it was an offence to falsify the register or falsely represent a trade mark as being registered (see now ss 94 and 95 of the 1994 Act) but those provisions are not now in point. Section 58A of the 1938 Act (introduced by the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988) first made fraudulent application or use of a trade mark a criminal offence. Your Lordships are not concerned with the detail of s 58A but it may be noted that it had a relatively demanding test of mens rea and it proved unsatisfactory in practice.

- j [69] It is necessary to set out s 92 in full:

‘(1) A person commits an offence who with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another, and without the consent of the proprietor—(a) applies to goods or their packaging a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark, or (b) sells or lets for hire, offers or exposes for sale or hire or distributes goods which bear, or the packaging of which bears, such a sign, or (c) has in his possession, custody or control in the course of a business any such goods with a view to the doing of anything, by himself or another, which would be an offence under paragraph (b). a

(2) A person commits an offence who with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another, and without the consent of the proprietor—(a) applies a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark to material intended to be used—(i) for labelling or packaging goods, (ii) as a business paper in relation to goods, or (iii) for advertising goods, or (b) uses in the course of a business material bearing such a sign for labelling or packaging goods, as a business paper in relation to goods, or for advertising goods, or (c) has in his possession, custody or control in the course of a business any such material with a view to the doing of anything, by himself or another, which would be an offence under paragraph (b). b

(3) A person commits an offence who with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another, and without the consent of the proprietor—(a) makes an article specifically designed or adapted for making copies of a sign identical to, or likely to be mistaken for, a registered trade mark, or (b) has such an article in his possession, custody or control in the course of a business, knowing or having reason to believe that it has been, or is to be, used to produce goods, or material for labelling or packaging goods, as a business paper in relation to goods, or for advertising goods. d

(4) A person does not commit an offence under this section unless—(a) the goods are goods in respect of which the trade mark is registered, or (b) the trade mark has a reputation in the United Kingdom and the use of the sign takes or would take unfair advantage of, or is or would be detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the trade mark. e

(5) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under this section to show that he believed on reasonable grounds that the use of the sign in the manner in which it was used, or was to be used, was not an infringement of the registered trade mark. f

(6) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—(a) on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both; (b) on conviction on indictment to a fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or both. g

[70] There is no special definition of 'infringement' in s 92(5). Under the index in s 104 it is to be construed in accordance with ss 9(1), (2) and 10. It was not argued that that does not necessarily include ss 11 and 12. h

[71] Section 92 was enacted by Parliament in conformity with international obligations (under art 61 of the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, or 'TRIPS' (Marrakesh, 15 April 1994; TS 10 (1996); Cm 3046)) which take effect as part of Community law. Mr Hobbs QC (for the intervener, The British Phonographic Industry) gave a detailed explanation of the background but it is not necessary to go further into it. j

[72] Much of the argument before your Lordships has focused on sub-s (5) of s 92. It provides a defence if the accused shows that he believed on reasonable grounds that he was not infringing the registered trade mark. This very strongly suggests (but the section does not in terms state) that it must also be a defence if

b 'Put another way, it would provide a defence when a defendant has a reasonable belief that there is no civil infringement, when in fact the absence of civil infringement would be no defence. This is a nonsense.'

[73] Both sides agreed that it is hard to find an example of conduct which would be a criminal offence under s 92(1)–(4), but would not amount to a civil infringement. It was also common ground that if an exceptional case were to be found (such as a single sale of a limited number of articles, such as T-shirts, arguably not amounting to trading) it would in practice be most unlikely to attract prosecution under s 92. Mr Perry (for the appellant) identified six points of substantial difference between s 92 and what I will call the civil infringement sections, and it is useful to examine these. But it must be recognised at once that if the scope or 'footprint' of s 92 is smaller than, and wholly contained within, the 'footprint' of the civil infringement sections, it is at first blush surprising that the linguistic differences between them are so extensive. Their superficial disparity must be explained, I think, by Parliament's natural anxiety to frame the offence-creating provisions of the 1994 Act so as to be as self-contained and as simple a code as possible. Prosecutions under s 92 are heard either in the magistrates' court or in the Crown Court. It would be burdensome if lay magistrates and juries regularly had to go into the intricacies of the law of civil infringement, especially in its present state of flux following the decision of the European Court of Justice in Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2003] 3 WLR 450 (to which I shall return). I respectfully agree with the view of Lord Nicholls that this House should so far as possible adhere to the language of s 92, treating it as being as self-contained as possible, and avoiding any unnecessary elaboration of trade mark law as it falls to be applied in criminal courts.

[74] As the arrangement and language of the two sets of provisions is so different it may be helpful to summarise Mr Perry's six points. (1) Under s 92 the prosecution must prove the special mens rea of 'with a view to gain' (including causing loss to another). There is no civil equivalent. (2) The offence-creating provisions apply only in respect of goods (whereas the civil provisions cover goods or services). (3) The offence-creating provisions refer to a sign 'identical to, or likely to be mistaken for' the registered mark. This is a simpler and narrower formulation than that in s 10(2). (4) Section 92(4) combines the functions of parts of s 10(2) and (3) but differs in substance only if the form of words in sub-s (4) ('goods in respect of which the trade mark is registered') is narrower than that in s 10(2)(a) ('identical with ... or similar to'). (5) Section 92(5) has no civil equivalent: a defendant's belief in his innocence is irrelevant to civil liability. (6) Criminal liability may arise from acts although they are not done in the course of trade (this is, as already noted, the only respect in which the scope of s 92 may be wider, and it seems to be of little practical importance).

[75] In summary, s 92 is clearly narrower on points (1), (2) and (5) above; it may be narrower (and is certainly not wider) on points (3) and (4); point (6) tends to lead to an unprofitable debate as to whether fraudulent activities should be regarded as a trade, and it is easy to see why Parliament avoided language which raised that issue. However Mr Perry's points do not include the issues which lie at the heart of this appeal, that is (i) whether 'trade mark use' is a necessary ingredient of criminal liability under s 92; (ii) if so, what are its proper limits; and (iii) how it should be dealt with in practice, in terms of directions to a jury or self-direction to magistrates, in prosecutions under s 92. To those issues I now turn.

[76] 'Trade mark use' is a convenient shorthand expression for use of a registered trade mark for its proper purpose (that is, identifying and guaranteeing the trade origin of the goods to which it is applied) rather than for some other purpose. It is easy to recognise those cases which fall squarely on one side or other of the line. If a counterfeiter sells a cheap imitation watch under the trade mark OMEGA, he is fraudulently engaging in trade mark use (as he is, as Mr Hobbs suggested, if he uses the mark HOMEGAS but prints the first and last letters very faintly). But if a publisher publishes a book named Mother Care/Other Care (a serious study of the upbringing of young children of working mothers) there is no infringement of the registered trade mark of Mothercare UK Ltd, despite the fact that the trade mark is registered for many classes of goods, including books (see Mothercare UK Ltd v Penguin Books Ltd [1988] RPC 113).

[77] That was a decision of the Court of Appeal on a Pt A registration under the 1938 Act, but the essential point holds good. Dillon LJ said (at 118–119):

'it stands to reason that a Trade Marks Act would only be concerned to restrict the use of a mark as a trademark or in a trademark sense, and should be construed accordingly. If descriptive words are legitimately registered in Part A of the register, there is still no reason why other people should not be free to use the words in a descriptive sense, and not in any trademark sense. [Counsel for the respondent] took the further point, on the trademark aspect of the case, that Mothercare suffers damage because the value and exclusivity of its mark is diminished, by any use by anyone else of the words "mother care", but that, in my judgment, can only be so if those words are used by the offender as a trademark or in a trademark sense; if descriptive words are merely used descriptively, the mark is unaffected. In the present case the words "Mother Care" in the title of the book are not, in my judgment, used as a trademark or in any trademark sense. They are merely used descriptively as describing, with the words "Other Care", what the book is about.'

Similarly Bingham LJ said (of s 4(1)(b) of the 1938 Act (at 123)):

'To conclude otherwise would be to hold (where a trademark consists of an English word or words) that Parliament intended to grant the proprietor of the trademark what would in effect be commercial copyright in that word or those words. Had that been the intention, the drafting of the section could have been a great deal simpler.'

[78] In Bravado Merchandising Services Ltd v Mainstream Publishing (Edinburgh) Ltd [1996] FSR 205, a comparable question arose under the 1994 Act. The petitioner was the proprietor of the trade mark Wet Wet Wet (the name of a popular music group). It was registered for (among other classes of goods) books. The defendant intended to publish a book about the group using 'Wet Wet Wet' as part of the title. In the Court of Session Lord McCluskey found (distinguishing the Mothercare case) that that would be trade mark use, but that it would nevertheless be within s 11(2)(b) (as amounting to an indication of the characteristics of the goods to which the mark was applied) and so would not amount to an infringement. So Lord McCluskey might be thought to have given a with one hand and to have taken away with the other; but that depends on whether ss 10 and 11 of the 1994 Act should be seen as contingent or intersecting circles, a point on which there was a good deal of discussion in the course of argument.

[79] Your Lordships were also referred to the decision of the Federal Court of Australia in Musidor BV v Tansing (trading as Apple Music House) (1994) 123 ALR 593. The Federal Court was divided as to whether the trade mark Rolling Stones (registered in respect of compact discs as well as other goods) was infringed by bootleg discs (using recordings made at live concerts in the 1960s) which used the words Rolling Stones on each disc and its case insert. The insert also stated that the recordings had not been authorised. The majority (Gummow and Heerey JJ) concluded (at 605) that this was not trade mark use:

c '... the words "The Rolling Stones" are not used for the purpose of indicating a connection in the course of trade between him and the discs or any other goods in respect of which the trade marks are registered. Rather, they are used here to identify a recording made many years ago of a live performance by those persons in the United States, which has been reproduced and embodied in the discs manufactured by the respondent.'

Davies J, dissenting, thought that there had been trade mark use, and that the disclaimer of authorisation made no difference:

e 'To exemplify the infringement, assume that "Pierre Cardin" and "Gucci" are registered trade marks and that the Pierre Cardin organisation or the Gucci organisation manufactured goods but declined to put them on sale being not satisfied with their quality. It would, in my opinion, be an infringement for some other person without authority to put the goods on the market with the description that they were manufactured by Pierre Cardin or by Gucci but that the sale had not been authorised. Yet that is what the respondent seeks to do in the present case'. (See (1994) 123 ALR 593 at 598.)

Davies J also expressed the view that the respondent had not used the words 'Rolling Stones' in good faith.

g [80] Comparable problems have recently been considered by the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2003] 3 WLR 450. Arsenal Football Club (AFC) is the proprietor of four trade marks, including two word marks ('Arsenal' and 'Arsenal Gunners') registered for (among other goods) clothing and sports footwear. Mr Reed had since 1970 been selling clothing (especially scarves) marked 'Arsenal'. He displayed prominent notices disavowing 'any affiliation or relationship with the manufacturers or distributors of any other product'. AFC sued him for passing off and trade mark infringement. The claim in passing off failed. The trade mark claim led to a reference to the Court of Justice by the High Court (Laddie J ([2001] IP & T 810)) of the following questions:

j '(1) Where a trade mark is validly registered and (a) a third party uses in the course of trade a sign identical with that trade mark in relation to goods which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered; and (b) the third party has no defence to infringement by virtue of art 6(1) of [the directive]; does the third party have a defence to infringement on the ground that the use complained of does not indicate trade origin (ie a connection in the course of trade between the goods and the trade mark proprietor)? a

(2) If so, is the fact that the use in question would be perceived as a badge of support, loyalty or affiliation to the trade mark proprietor a sufficient connection?’

[81] As already noted, art 6(1) (like s 11(2)) makes an exception for descriptive use, but only if it is use ‘in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters’. It is not entirely clear whether the terms of the reference made by the High Court assumed that art 6(1) provided no defence because of the need for descriptiveness, or because of the proviso as to honest practices. b

[82] In making the reference Laddie J made what he described as findings of fact which are recorded in the judgment of the Court of Justice ([2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 26, [2003] 3 WLR 450 at 476): c

‘21 ... the High Court rejected [AFC’s] argument that the use by Mr Reed of the signs registered as trade marks was perceived by those to whom they were addressed as a badge of origin, so that the use was a “trade mark use”.’

22. According to the High Court, the signs affixed to Mr Reed’s goods were in fact perceived by the public as “badges of support, loyalty or affiliation”.’ d

[83] The Court of Justice recognised (at 30 (para 54)) that—

‘... uses for purely descriptive purposes are excluded from the scope of art 5(1) of the ... Directive because they do not affect any of the interests which that provision aims to protect, and do not therefore fall within the concept of use within the meaning of that provision (see, with respect to a use for purely descriptive purposes relating to the characteristics of the product offered, Hölterhoff v Freisleben Case C-2/00 [2002] All ER (EC) 665 at 682, [2002] ECR I-4187 (para 16)).’ e

The court distinguished Hölterhoff’s case (where a trade mark had been used to describe a method of cutting precious stones, rather than to identify their producer) as being concerned with a transaction in the course of wholesale trade. The court stated that Mr Reed’s use of the Arsenal sign took place in the context of sales to consumers and was obviously not intended for purely descriptive purposes. The use was such as to create the impression that there was a material link in the course of trade between Mr Reed’s goods and AFC. AFC could therefore rely on what Mr Reed had done as trade mark use. f

[84] Laddie J has since ([2002] EWHC 2695 (Ch), [2003] 1 All ER 137) held that the Court of Justice exceeded its jurisdiction by determining issues of fact which were for the national court to decide (and which he had, as he saw it, already decided in a manner favourable to Mr Reed). An appeal to the Court of Appeal seems likely [see [2003] 3 All ER 865]. g

[85] The law is therefore in something of a state of disarray. But even if the Court of Justice exceeded its jurisdiction in the Arsenal case (a point on which I would express no view), its exposition of the general principles is still highly material. The court has excluded use of a trade mark for ‘purely descriptive purposes’ (and the word ‘purely’ is important) because such use does not affect the interests which the trade mark proprietor is entitled to protect. But there will be infringement if the sign is used, without authority, ‘to create the impression that there is a material link in the course of trade between the goods concerned’ h a and the trade mark proprietor' (see [2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 30–31, [2003] 3 WLR 450 at 480–481 (para 56)). There may be such a link, in the view of the European Court of Justice, even though the consumer treats the mark as a badge of support for or loyalty to the trade mark proprietor. As the Advocate General (Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer) put it in a footnote to his opinion:

b 'However much Mr Reed may announce that the goods which he sells neither come from [AFC] nor are authorised by it, he is able to market them—and his customers buy them—precisely because they bear the signs which, under registered protection, identify the club.' (See [2003] All ER (EC) 1 at 17 (n 52), [2003] 3 WLR 450 at 467 (para 66).)

c [86] The difficulty arises, I think, because between cases which are clearly at the opposite extremes of 'distinctiveness' and 'descriptiveness' there is something of a no man's land of debatable cases, and the problem of analysis varies with the character of the mark and the character of the goods to which it is affixed. Disputes about books, and scarves, and compact discs, cannot easily be resolved by a single test. Most people would have an intuitive feeling that to label a d compact disc with the words 'Rolling Stones' is less purely descriptive than entitling a biography 'Wet Wet Wet'. That is no doubt because a group of musicians are in some sense the authors (or at least the performers) of what is on the disc, but are not the authors of an unauthorised book about themselves. But in that case is not their real grievance infringement of their copyright or their e performing rights, rather than of their trade mark? Was not Mr Hölterhoff's real complaint infringement of his design right in two new methods of cutting precious stones (if indeed he had invented those methods) rather than of his trade mark?

[87] These are difficult questions which it is not necessary for your Lordships to determine in order to dispose of this appeal. Whatever uncertainties there are about the decision of the Court of Justice in the Arsenal case, its likely effect is that
f the province of trade mark use has annexed a significant part of the no man's land in which elements of distinctiveness and descriptiveness overlap. But it would be idle to speculate whether the view taken by the Court of Justice in the Arsenal case is reconcilable with the majority view in the Musidor case (1994) 123 ALR 593 because (as Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead has emphasised in his speech, and as I g respectfully agree) trade mark use is essentially a question of fact (of a fairly complex sort). The Musidor case can indeed be seen as turning on whether it was right for the Federal Court to differ from the trial judge on an issue of that sort. The judgments mention some of the factors which may contribute to the eventual conclusion: the prominence and apparent purpose with which the h group's name (and registered trade mark) is used on the disc and its packaging; what other brand marks (registered or unregistered) are used on the disc and its packaging; the terms and prominence of any disclaimer (although a disclaimer, by itself, cannot be conclusive); and any other matters going to the alleged infringer's good faith and honesty.

j [88] I come back to what I described as the issues which lie at the heart of this appeal. First, is trade mark use a necessary ingredient of criminal liability under s 92? On this point I am in respectful agreement with the reasoning and conclusions in the speech of Lord Nicholls. It is a necessary ingredient, and there is no need to go on a circuitous route through art 6(1)(b) or s 11(2)(b) in order to arrive at that conclusion. It is adequately (if not pellucidly) expressed in the language of s 92, which in its three offence-creating subsections requires the defendant, for the purpose of gain, to have applied a sign to goods (or their packaging), or to have engaged in other acts or conduct in relation to goods (or business materials) which bear that sign. I would hold that such acts or conduct must be restricted to acts or conduct amounting to trade mark use. Facts such as those of Mothercare UK Ltd v Penguin Books Ltd [1988] RPC 113 or Hölterhoff v Freiesleben Case C-2/00 [2002] All ER (EC) 665, [2002] ECR I-4187 would not fall within any of sub-ss (1)–(3) of s 92.

[89] On the second issue (the proper limits of trade mark use) I would not go so far as the Court of Appeal went in preferring the minority view in the Musidor case and in inclining to the view that every bootlegging case of this sort would involve trade mark use. It seems likely that Mr Johnstone would have had a difficult task in making good the defences on which he wished to rely. However, he should have been permitted to run them. I agree with the Court of Appeal that his conviction (on his pleading guilty after not being allowed to put forward the defences on which he wished to rely) must be regarded as unsafe. I would therefore dismiss this appeal.

[90] That is sufficient to dispose of the appeal itself, but there remain the issue of the burden of proof placed on the defendant by s 92(5), and further issues, on which your Lordships heard argument, whether R v Keane [2001] FSR 63 and S v London Borough of Havering [2003] 1 Cr App Rep 602 were rightly decided. On all these issues I am in complete and respectful agreement with the speech of Lord Nicholls.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BROOKE, SEDLEY AND HALE LJJ

4, 26 JUNE 2003

Particulars of claim – Service – Extension of time for service – Factors to be considered in deciding whether to grant extension of time – Grant of extension of time subject to conditions – CPR 3.1, 3.9.

The claimant commenced proceedings against the defendant, claiming over £500,000 damages for personal injury. The claim form was issued on 4 April 2001, without any accompanying particulars of claim, medical report or schedule of loss. No particulars of claim were served, and no application for an extension of time in which to serve them was made until 16 July 2002. The main reason behind the delay was that the claimant's solicitors were seeking a second medical opinion, without communicating that fact to the other side, because they did not like the advice given by the expert who had been agreed by the parties. In August 2002 the deputy district judge allowed the claimant an extension of time, having considered whether there was an adequate explanation for the delay and whether the defendant had been significantly prejudiced by the delay. The defendant appealed to the judge, who struck out the claim, taking the view that the claim was plainly one where there had been disgraceful, long delay, all the way through. The judge said that to permit an extension of time in all the circumstances of the case would be an affront to civil justice and to the administration of justice under the CPR. The claimant appealed.

Held – The necessity for a judge to follow the checklist in CPR 3.9^a when considering an application in a complex case for an extension of time applied equally whether the application was for an extension of time in which to appeal or in which to serve particulars of claim. In the instant case, neither the deputy district judge nor the judge had followed the checklist. Although the judge had actually taken many of the matters set out in CPR 3.9 into account, his approach was flawed in that he did not appear to have taken account of the fact that the claimant would be barred from prosecuting what was represented as a valid claim for over £500,000 if he was denied the relief sought. In those circumstances, the judge having left out of account an important feature of the case which he should have considered, the court would have to exercise its discretion afresh. The real question was whether, despite other considerations tending strongly in favour of the defendant, the fact that the claimant was being denied access to the court could drive the balance the other way. In all the circumstances of the instant case, the extension sought would have been refused, but for the fact that, pursuant to CPR 3.1(2)(a) and 3.1(3)(a)^b, there was a route available (which needed to be more widely used on appropriate occasions) by which the court could do effective justice to both sides, ie by extending time for compliance subject to conditions. The appeal would accordingly be allowed by extending the time for the service of particulars of claim for 28 days from the date of the judgment, on condition that no claim were made for special or general damages, other than what might be substantiated by any pre-April 2001 report written by the original expert, which the claimant might care to disclose in support of his claim.

^a Rule 3.9, so far as material, provides: '... the court will consider all the circumstances including—(a) the interests of the administration of justice; (b) whether the application for relief has been made promptly; (c) whether the failure to comply was intentional; (d) whether there is a good explanation for the failure; (e) the extent to which the party in default has complied with other rules, practice directions, court orders and any relevant pre-action protocol; (f) whether the failure to comply was caused by the party or his legal representative; (g) whether the trial date or the likely trial date can still be met if relief is granted; (h) the effect which the failure to comply had on each party; and (i) the effect which the granting of relief would have on each party.'

Appeal

The claimant, Paul Terence Price, appealed from the order of Judge O'Brien made at the Norwich County Court on 19 October 2002 allowing the appeal of the defendant, Rosalind Price (trading as Poppyland Headware), from an order of Deputy District Judge Pugh on 15 August 2002 granting the claimant an extension of time for serving particulars of claim in his personal injury action against the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

^b Rule 3.1, so far as material, provides: '(2) ... the court may—(a) extend or shorten the time for compliance with any rule, practice direction or court order (even if an application for extension is made after the time for compliance has expired) ... (3) When the court makes an order, it may—(a) make it subject to conditions, including a condition to pay a sum of money into court ...'

26 June 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

BROOKE LJ.

[1] This is an appeal by the claimant Paul Terence Price against an order by Judge O'Brien at the Norwich County Court on 19 October 2002 whereby he allowed the defendant's appeal against an order of Deputy District Judge Pugh on 15 August 2002. The deputy district judge had granted the claimant an extension of time for serving the particulars of claim in this personal injuries action. In allowing the defendant's appeal, the judge struck out the action. Permission was granted for this second appeal on the grounds that it gave rise to an important point of practice.

[2] The accident which gave rise to these proceedings is said to have taken place on 5 May 1998. The claimant and the defendant are husband and wife, and at the material time the defendant was employing the claimant as a shop assistant in her hat shop in Cromer at a salary of £60 per week. The claim form was issued on 4 April 2001, without any accompanying particulars of claim, medical report or schedule of loss. It was served on 14 April 2001. The particulars of claim ought to have been served on the defendant on or before 28 April 2001 pursuant to CPR 7.4(1)(b) which provides, so far as is material, that: '(1) Particulars of claim must ... (b) ... be served on the defendant by the claimant within 14 days after service of the claim form.'

[3] At that time there was an unresolved dispute as to whether a court had power in any circumstances to extend the time for serving particulars of claim pursuant to the general power to extend time which is contained in CPR 3.1. In Totty v Snowden, Hewitt v Wirral and West Cheshire Community NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 1415, [2001] 4 All ER 577, [2002] 1 WLR 1384 it was held that this power did exist. However, CPR 7.4(1)(b) contains the mandatory word 'must', from which it can readily be inferred that the longer the period a claimant allows to elapse before he/she applies for an extension of time, the slower a court may be to exercise a favourable discretion. In the event no application for an extension of time was made until 16 July 2002, over 14 months out of time.

[4] By this time this court had made it clear in Sayers v Clarke Walker (a firm) [2002] EWCA Civ 645, [2002] 3 All ER 490, [2002] 1 WLR 3095 that in a case of any complexity, when a court was considering an application for an extension of time made after the time prescribed for the taking of a step in proceedings had expired, the court should follow the checklist given in CPR 3.9. Although the present case is concerned with an extension of time for serving particulars of claim, and not with an extension of time for appealing, the underlying logic is the same. If the court is not willing to extend time, the action will be at an end because the claimant will not be able to proceed with it any further.

[5] Although this judgment had been fully reported in the All England Law Reports on 17 July 2002, the deputy district judge did not, as this court had adjured, approach his task within the structured framework set out in CPR 3.9. He seems to have thought that it was sufficient for him to consider whether there was an adequate explanation of the delay and whether the defendant had been significantly prejudiced by the delay. His approach was reminiscent of the approach forced on the courts in pre-CPR days when an application was made to strike out a claim for want of prosecution. He appears, among other things, to have been influenced by a dictum of Chadwick LJ in Totty v Snowden [2001] 4 All ER 577 at [46] to the effect that once a defendant had been served with a claim form he would be in a position to invoke the assistance of the court if particulars of claim were not forthcoming within due time.

[6] On the defendant's appeal Judge O'Brien, too, did not adopt the CPR 3.9 framework. He overruled the deputy district judge because he took the view that this was plainly a claim where there had been disgraceful, long delay all the way through it. He said that a great deal of the delay was unexplained, and insofar as it was explained it was in circumstances where the conduct of the claimant's solicitors was reprehensible. He therefore found that the delay was deliberate, long and without explanation.

[7] When he came to consider matters of prejudice, he considered what Bingham MR had said in a pre-CPR context in Costellow v Somerset CC [1993] 1 All ER 952 at 960, [1993] 1 WLR 256 at 264:

'Save in special cases or exceptional circumstances it can rarely be appropriate on an overall assessment of what justice requires to deny the plaintiff an extension where the denial will stifle his action because of a procedural default, which even if unjustifiable, had caused the defendant no prejudice for which he cannot be compensated by an order for costs.'

[8] The judge said that for the reasons he had given he did not regard what had been going on, on the claimant's side of the action, as being capable of the description of 'a procedural default'. Having regard to the degree, extent and gravity of the delay in this case and the real reason for that delay he thought it was right that justice did not require the defendant to prove an enormous amount of prejudice to her. It seemed to him that there was prejudice, and that the deputy district judge had somewhat underrated it. He also founded his decision on matters relating to the administration of justice. He said that to permit an extension of time in all the circumstances of this case would be an affront to civil justice and an affront to the administration of justice under the CPR, which he was not going to permit. He therefore held that the deputy district judge was wrong.

[9] The claimant is legally-aided, and it is noteworthy that the deputy district judge and the judge in turn directed that the claimant's solicitors should show cause why they should not pay the defendant's costs of the original application for an extension and the defendant's appeal.

[10] The reasons why the two judges took such a jaundiced view of the behaviour of the claimant's solicitors are not difficult to seek. The first notification the defendant's insurers received about the claimant's accident was when they received a letter on 9 April 1999, 11 months after the accident. A period of six months then elapsed before they agreed to provide indemnity in principle for this claim. On 5 November 1999 they obtained a short statement from the defendant, and on the same day the claimant's solicitors wrote to them for the first time. This letter did not comply with the Pre-Action Protocol for Personal Injury Cases in that it did not contain a clear summary of the facts on which the claim was based, nor any indication of the nature of any injuries suffered nor, most importantly, of any financial loss incurred (Protocol, para 3.2). In these circumstances there was nothing within the letter to enable the insurers to put a broad valuation on the 'risk' (Protocol, para 3.5). Instead, the solicitors

a merely said that they were acting for Mr Price, identified the date of his injury at work, and referred to their understanding that the insurers already had full details of the circumstances of the accident from Mr Price and that an identified firm of loss adjusters had been investigating the circumstances of the accident. At this stage the insurers had received no notice of any claim for loss of earnings. Their initial investigation had revealed that Mr Price had returned to work after the accident and had suffered no loss of earnings as a result of it.

c [12] On 4 January 2000 the claimant's solicitors particularised their allegations of negligence for the first time. They also told the insurers that they wished to instruct a local consultant rheumatologist, Dr Gaffney, to prepare a medical report. Their letter was phrased in such a way as to make it clear that they were familiar with the provisions of the Pre-Action Protocol Relating to the Instruction of Experts (Protocol, paras 3.14–3.19). The defendant's insurers agreed to Dr Gaffney being instructed, and on 2 February 2000 they wrote to the effect that negligence was accepted 'subject to the sight of medical evidence which will confirm causation'. In the ordinary course of things it would have been expected that this admission of liability would have resulted in the disclosure of Dr Gaffney's medical report, once it was ready (Protocol, para 3.21). The defendant's solicitor has said that at this stage up to £10,000 was being allowed by the insurers for the cost of a claim for a moderate back injury, and that their belief that there was no loss of earnings claim influenced their decision on the value of the claim and the extent of any investigations that were required.

d [13] The defendant's insurers knew nothing more about the matter for over 14 months, when the claim form, issued on 4 April 2001, was served by the court. This stated, unexpectedly, that the value of the claim was expected to exceed £50,000. As I have already said, the particulars of claim were not served with the claim form. Nor were they served 14 days afterwards, as required by CPR 7.4(1)(b). It now appears that the claimant's legal aid certificate had not been extended to cover the issue of proceedings, and that his solicitors had no medical evidence to substantiate a claim by their client on the scale which he wished to present. On 8 May 2001 the defendant's insurers wrote to the claimant's solicitors in the following terms:

e 'I note that medical evidence was being obtained by Dr Carl Gaffney, Consultant Rheumatologist, and await this report by return now please.

f If the report is still not available, please confirm when you anticipate being in a position to disclose it, and please provide us with an update as to the Claimant's recovery from his injuries.

h We would also be grateful if you could detail without prejudice if necessary, what Special Damages are being claimed in respect of this claim, although we note that you have issued proceedings on this case.

j What is the situation regarding your Client's employment? If still off work, when is a return to employment likely? From the enquiries we were able to undertake via our insured, it appears that your Client was earning £60 per week, and if this is indeed the case we cannot see how we are concerned with a claim where losses are likely to exceed £50,000 as per your Claim Form, but would appreciate clarification.

We look forward to hearing from you as soon as possible please.'

No reply was received, and on 3 July 2001 the insurers sent a chasing letter.

[14] It now appears that all the necessary notes and records had been made available to Dr Gaffney by 24 May 2000. He then asked for further records, and in September 2000 he recommended a MRI scan, which was performed in November 2000. The claimant's solicitor has said that he did not receive a copy of the scan until January 2001, and, without giving any details at all, he asserts that there followed a further lengthy delay because of the doctor's failure to respond to a request for further comment. The procedure envisaged by the Pre-Action Protocol had completely broken down, presumably because Dr Gaffney was giving unwelcome advice. The claimant's solicitors did not tell the defendant's insurers (or their solicitors, who were first instructed when the claim was served) what was going on. Instead, they told them, by a letter dated 11 July 2001, that counsel had now been instructed to advise the Legal Services Commission as a preliminary to receiving authority to settle particulars of claim. It appears that they had received this advice by 2 August, because they told the defendant's solicitors by a letter of that date that they were now seeking authority for the extension of the legal aid certificate.

[15] There followed a short exchange of correspondence in which the defendant's solicitors were contending, wrongly as it turned out, that it was not possible to obtain an extension of time for service of particulars of claim. This dispute had been cleared up by mid-October, however, and they certainly did not at any time agree expressly or impliedly to any extension. The judge was extremely critical, moreover, of the contents of a letter from the claimant's solicitors dated 4 September 2001 in which they said:

'Having protected the position for limitation purposes we are not yet in a position to serve particulars containing medical evidence and a schedule but we are working towards that end.'

[16] The judge said:

'... it seems to me that giving that reason was not consistent with the present requirements of being open and above board in conducting litigation. The main reason, of course, the reason behind the delay was seeking a second medical opinion. That was not communicated to the other side. In my judgment it plainly should have been. If they were seeking to instruct another doctor, consistent with the way the protocol operates (and I appreciate that the action has now started), it would seem to be the proper course would be to notify the other side, and to notify the name of the doctor and possibly as well give some explanation as to why a second doctor was being instructed, but certainly to provide the name of the doctor proposed to be instructed. That was not done.'

[17] In my judgment, the judge's comments were justified. His thinking coincided with the approach of this court in Carlson v Townsend [2001] EWCA Civ 511, [2001] 3 All ER 663, [2001] 1 WLR 2415, another case in which a claimant's solicitor did not like the advice given by a medical expert whose identity had been agreed with the other side and then sought to instruct a different expert without obtaining the other side's agreement first.

[18] On 12 October 2001 the claimant's solicitors told the defendant's solicitors that as soon as they received the necessary authority from the Legal Services Commission they would issue an application for an extension of time to serve the particulars of claim. After further correspondence the defendant's solicitors inquired on 13 November 2001 why particulars of claim had not been

- a served with the claim form and whether the claimant's solicitors were still attempting to obtain legal aid to cover their application. They received no reply, and had to send a chasing letter five weeks later. This chasing letter appears, at long last, to have prompted the claimant's solicitors to make the requisite application to the Legal Services Commission on 20 December 2001, and the necessary extension of the certificate was granted eight days later. The certificate
- b was formally amended to cover all steps up to trial on 21 January 2002.

[19] At some unspecified date counsel advised in consultation that 'it was deemed essential to commission an up to date medical report'. On 24 January 2002 the claimant's solicitors wrote:

- c 'Our client now has legal aid to enable him to commission a full up to date medical report. Particulars of claim were not served with the claim form because of the absence of medical evidence, and we intend to ask the court to give permission for service of the particulars out of time with medical evidence to be served at a later stage when the reports become available. We confirm we have instructed Counsel to draft the particulars. Your clients have not been prejudiced in any way. There has been a provisional
- d admission of liability subject only to proof of causation, and your clients have been well aware of the circumstances at an early stage.'

[20] The judge commented in these terms:

- e 'Although there is reference to a medical report and medical evidence, and the application being made for medical evidence apparently to be served even later than the particulars, there is not a breath of a hint that what is really going on is that they are not satisfied with the evidence of the doctor whom the defendants have agreed should be instructed, but are in fact instructing another doctor; indeed, the letter would tend to suggest that the
- f delay is that they simply require a further report—an up-to-date report—presumably from Dr Gaffney, if that is the only doctor that was known about.'

[21] The letter dated 24 January provoked an understandable response on 30 January 2002:

- g 'According to our client's file you were proposing to instruct Dr Gaffney to prepare a medical report as long ago as January 2000. Our clients confirmed that they had no objections to you instructing that expert on 6 January 2000. Was a report obtained? If not, why not?

- h We note that you state that our clients have not been prejudiced in any way. Please confirm how you know that to be the case.

- i You will be aware that if this is a multi-track case that our clients are entitled to retract an admission of liability. In view of the close relationship between the owner of the business and the employee, that may well be the case. You should not therefore rely on the pre-proceedings admission when drafting the particulars of claim. Mr Price appears to have been in all respects a joint owner of the business and would therefore be as responsible for safety as Mrs Price.

We note that you are preparing an application for permission for service of the particulars of claim out of time. We are not prepared to deal with that permission ex parte. Please ask for a hearing date with a time estimate of at least one hour.'

[22] The letter received no response. A chasing letter ten weeks later received the following terse reply on 16 April:

'We confirm a report was obtained from Dr Gaffney but our medical evidence is not yet finalised and for that reason we are still not ready to proceed. We note your observations regarding liability and the time to be allowed for a hearing of any application.'

[23] On 22 March 2002, nearly three months after receiving the extension to the legal aid certificate and without notifying the defendant's solicitors, the claimant's solicitors had instructed a different consultant rheumatologist (Dr Hazleman) in place of Dr Gaffney. Against this background the judge made the following comment on their letter dated 16 April: 'I am afraid I have to say that that letter comes as close to a blatant lie as one would ever fear to see in litigation correspondence.'

[24] On 29 April Dr Hazleman issued his report, in which he attributed the claimant's continuing back problem, which he described as chronic and disabling, to the accident four years earlier. The claimant's solicitors did not serve his report on the defendant's solicitors when they received it. Instead the latter had to write a further chasing letter on 28 May. This received a stalling reply on 6 June 2002. Eventually on 29 July 2002 the defendant's solicitors accepted service of an application for an extension of time to serve the particulars of claim, accompanied by a witness statement, Dr Hazleman's medical report and a schedule of special damages, which revealed a claim for £548,170.

[25] The service of these documents, four years and three months after the relevant accident, constituted the first notification that the defendant's solicitors had received. (i) That the claimant was saying that he had sustained a chronic and disabling back problem as a result of the accident. (ii) That he had obtained a report from Dr Hazleman in addition to Dr Gaffney. (iii) That Dr Hazleman supported the claimant's claim. (iv) That the claimant was maintaining that but for the accident he would have returned to the kind of management consultancy work he was doing up to 1994 (when he had moved to Cromer with his wife at the age of 40) and would probably have earned at a gross rate of £60,000 a year (instead of £60 a week) for the rest of his working life.

[26] This, then, was the material round which the claimant's application for an extension of time was centred. In my judgment Judge O'Brien was correct to take the view that the order of the deputy district judge should not stand, even if not for the reasons he gave. It is not sufficient for an appeal court in a case of this kind simply to say that the order made in a lower court was wrong, if the case turned on the exercise of a discretion. I explained the governing principles in my judgment in Tanfern Ltd v Cameron-Macdonald [2000] 2 All ER 801 at 808–809, [2000] 1 WLR 1311 at 1317 (paras 32–33). Another helpful way of describing the appellate function in relation to judicial discretion is to be found in the judgment of Lord Woolf MR in Phonographic Performance v AEI Rediffusion Music Ltd [1999] 2 All ER 299 at 314, [1999] 1 WLR 1507 at 1523:

'Before the court can interfere it must be shown that the judge has either erred in principle in his approach or has left out of account or has taken into account some feature that he should, or should not, have considered, or that his decision was wholly wrong because the court is forced to the conclusion that he has not balanced the various factors fairly in the scale.'

a [27] The defect in the approach of the deputy district judge was that he did not address his mind to a number of the most important considerations set out in the checklist in CPR 3.9, so that he exercised his discretion without taking very material matters into account.

b [28] Mr Heathcote Williams, who appeared for the defendant, sought to show us that Judge O'Brien did take a lot of the matters set out in CPR 3.9 into account, although he did not structure his judgment, which was given immediately the hearing ended, around that framework. In my judgment, however, there was considerable force in the submission made by Miss Studd, who appeared for the claimant, that his approach to items (h) and (i) on the checklist was either superficial or plainly wrong. These items read: '(h) the effect which the failure to comply has on each party; and (i) the effect which the granting of relief would have on each party.'

c [29] It is unnecessary to examine too rigorously the question whether 'the effect of the failure to comply' refers narrowly to the immediate effect of failing to serve particulars of claim within 14 days. The main point which Miss Studd made was that the effect of granting relief would be to allow her client to have access to the court for the trial of his very large claim, which would otherwise be denied to him, whereas the effect on the defendant's side would merely be that her insurers would have the inconvenience of mounting a defence to the claim on issues which were still susceptible of a fair trial, notwithstanding the huge delay. She also argued that any prejudice which might face the defendant's advisers in having to defend this claim once they knew its details would not be significantly greater than those that would have faced them if they had received these details 15 months earlier.

d [30] In my judgment the judge's approach was indeed flawed in this respect. He does not appear to have taken into account the fact that the claimant would be barred from prosecuting what was represented as a valid claim for over £½m if he denied him the relief he sought. Although he weighed in the balance the prejudice to the defendant, he did not clearly weigh in the balance the prejudice to the claimant. In these circumstances he left out of account an important feature of the case which he ought to have considered. In the circumstances this court will have to exercise its discretion afresh.

e [31] On most of the factors enumerated in the CPR 3.9 checklist, the argument tends strongly in favour of the defendant but not sufficiently to warrant the claimant being denied access to the court completely if this was his first default following the institution of proceedings. Thus—(b) The application for relief was not made promptly. It was made disgracefully late. (c) The failure to serve particulars of claim within the prescribed time was intentional: it was not an inadvertent oversight. (d) There was no good reason for the failure to serve particulars of claim within the prescribed time. The claimant's solicitor told the deputy district judge that the trouble with Dr Gaffney's report was not that it did not support a claim for damages for personal injuries but that it did not support a claim on the scale the claimant wished to present. (e) There had been two flagrant breaches of the pre-action protocol. No particulars of the financial loss nor the claimant's injuries were notified in the letter before action, and the claimant's solicitor entirely departed from the protocol once he or his client were dissatisfied by Dr Gaffney's report. (f) We do not know the extent to which the failure to comply was dictated to the claimant's solicitor by his client.

j [32] No point arises about the trial date (g), and I have already explained why it is item (i) rather than item (h) on which our attention should really be focused.

So far as item (h) is concerned, the failure to comply meant that the claimant could no longer proceed with his claim without obtaining the defendant's agreement or a ruling of the court granting him an extension of time, while the defendant was in the converse position that the claim could not proceed against her unless one or other of these events (in reality the second of them) occurred. This is why it is item (i) which is so much more important.

[33] The real tension here, therefore, is between the interests of the administration of justice and the effect which the granting of relief would have on each party. Other relevant considerations tend strongly in favour of the defendant. Can the fact that the claimant is being denied access to the court (with all its art 6(1) implications (art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950, as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)) drive the balance down the other way?

[34] I summarised the effect of relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence in this area when delivering the judgment of the court in Woodhouse v Consignia plc, Steliou v Compton [2002] EWCA Civ 275, [2002] 2 All ER 737, [2002] 1 WLR 2558. I said:

‘[43] Provided that judges make their decisions in these cases within the general framework provided by rr 3.9 and 1.1, they are unlikely to fall foul of the ECHR in this regard. In Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528 at 546 (para 57), the European Court of Human Rights said:

“Certainly, the right of access to the courts is not absolute but may be subject to limitations; these are permitted by implication since the right of access ‘by its very nature calls for regulation by the State, regulation which may vary in time and place according to the needs and resources of the community and of individuals’.”

[44] More recently the court emphasised the need for proportionality when it said in Tinnelly & Sons Ltd v UK (1998) 4 BHRC 393 at 415 (para 72):

“... a limitation will not be compatible with art 6(1) if it does not pursue a legitimate aim and if there is not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved.”

[35] It follows that if this court considers that a refusal of an extension of time in this case would be a proportionate response to the claimant's failure to state clearly what he is claiming and the reasons underlying his claim, despite so many requests by the defendant's insurers, his convention rights would not thereby be imperilled because the concept of a fair trial betokens fairness to both sides.

[36] The interests of the administration of justice can best be identified in the present context by reference to CPR Pt 1. CPR 1.1(2) carries within it the ideas that justice will best be achieved if: (a) the parties are on an equal footing; (b) unnecessary expense is avoided; (c) a case is handled in a way that is proportionate to the matters listed; (d) a case is dealt with expeditiously and fairly; and (e) an appropriate share of the court's resources is allocated to it.

[37] By CPR 1.3 a claimant is required to help the court to further the overriding objective of being able to deal with his case justly. By CPR 1.4 the court is under a duty to further the overriding objective by managing the case actively.

[38] In his seminal judgment in Biguzzi v Rank Leisure plc [1999] 4 All ER 934, [1999] 1 WLR 1926 Lord Woolf MR made it clear that the new Civil Procedure Rules had ushered in a new regime, and that it was no longer useful to look back at decisions under the pre-CPR regime because that was a different regime. We no longer have to succumb feebly to the argument that a defendant was already

- a so prejudiced that any further prejudice caused by a further long delay could not be regarded as significant. On an occasion like this we have to look objectively at the extent to which the defendant would be prejudiced if the case was allowed to continue, whether on the enlarged basis for which the claimant is now contending or at all, and then consider whether and the extent to which the claimant's cumulative defaults have caused that prejudice. Our final duty is to
- b decide whether it would be a disproportionate response to stop the case now by refusing the extension of time outright, or whether it may be possible to fashion a more proportionate response.

- [39] In her respondent's notice the defendant (in reality her insurers) articulated clearly the ways in which they would be prejudiced if the claim would be allowed to proceed. They say that the claimant's conduct has deprived them
- c of the opportunity to investigate at an early stage matters where documents may well be incomplete, lost or inapplicable, and where the recollection of former employers, colleagues and administrators may be crucial. They split their arguments into two parts. In the first they identified not only the issue whether the claimant had complained of back trouble prior to the incident at work
- d (bearing in mind that complaints are not always made to doctors) but also how successful he had been in his management consultancy type work, and why he had left it, allegedly to take a job as his wife's shop assistant at £60 per week. In the second they identified questions relating to the conduct of the Poppyland Headwear business: who was its true proprietor (and the employer), why this business failed (if it did), and whether the claimant had ever expressed any
- e intention or plan of returning to management consultancy type work in due course.

- [40] It is obvious that the parties are not on an equal footing now. All these matters are within the knowledge of the claimant. The defendant's insurers have to start investigating them now, long after the claimant should have explained his
- f claim to them. It is also obvious that the case cannot now be dealt with expeditiously. Nor will it be so easy to deal with it fairly in the light of the delay that has occurred.

- [41] The claimant is in serious default in relation to his duty to help the court to deal with his case fairly. He has also made it impossible for it to manage the case actively because until he served his particulars of claim and the defendant
- g responded to it, there was nothing for the court to manage. Although it would have been open to the defendant's solicitors to incur the expense of seeking directions from the court, as suggested by Chadwick LJ in Totty's case, they were certainly not obliged to incur this expense, especially where the claimant's solicitors were holding them at bay with statements which turned out to be some
- h way distant from the whole truth.

- [42] In my judgment this is a case in which this court has to say 'enough is enough', and like the judge (though for different reasons) to refuse the extension of time sought, unless it were possible to impose conditions on any order for an extension. There are just too many considerations pointing in favour of the
- j defendant to allow the claimant's right of access to a court for the purpose of prosecuting his enlarged claim to trump those considerations on the facts of this case. It is not only that he (or his advisers) failed to comply with the pre-action protocol, and that he (or they) failed to serve the particulars of claim within the time prescribed by the rules or to answer the questions asked of them often more than once. It is also that the defendant's insurers (and, in turn, their solicitors) acted impeccably throughout this history in seeking the information they needed to evaluate the claim properly with a view to resolving it, if possible, without the need for the expense of court proceedings at all. In other words, they complied with their CPR 1.3 duty: the claimant did not. The result was that the court was deprived of the opportunity of managing the case actively in pursuance of the overriding objective by reason of the claimant's defaults, and it would not now be possible to deal with the case in a manner that is fair to both sides if the court simply extended time unconditionally. a

[43] There is, however, a route available by which the court could do effective justice to both sides. The operation of CPR 3.1(2)(a) and 3.1(3)(a) give the court power to extend time for compliance with a rule subject to conditions. In Walsh v Misseldine (29 February 2000, unreported) this court made effective use of this power, which needs to be more widely used on appropriate occasions. b

[44] In that case the claimant was claiming damages for injuries suffered in 1989 in a very serious road traffic accident. His claim was pursued effectively, if very slowly, until 1994, but a four-year delay then ensued. The claimant then sought to enlarge his claim greatly by introducing a lot of new issues of which the defendant's insurers had no notice when they calculated the value of the claim in the early 1990s for the purposes of a payment into court. Four paragraphs in my judgment (with which Stuart-Smith LJ agreed) are relevant in the present context: c

'86. It is also quite clear that it would not be possible or fair to conduct a trial of the additional issues Mr Walsh's advisers sought to introduce into his case in August 1999. Their predecessors had had their opportunity to set out his case in 1993 and early 1994, and they did not take it. It would be wrong to allow them to amend their schedule of loss now to include a whole lot of new issues dating back over the previous seven years. In my judgment the defendant's insurers were entitled to say that it would be unjust to expose them now to an inquiry into the reasons why Mr Walsh was made redundant in June 1992 and to a claim that any loss of income he sustained after that time must be ascribed to the effects of his 1989 accident ... d

89. In deciding what order to make on the defendant's application, we now apply a new procedural code which was designed with the overriding objective of enabling us to deal with the case justly. So far as practicable, we must ensure that it is dealt with fairly. e

90. It would not be fair to expose the defendant now to a claim which incorporates all the additional items the claimant sought to introduce into it for the first time in August 1999. On the other hand, since his claim, as formulated at the time the court gave directions in January 1994, could still be justly assessed today, it would not be fair to dismiss his action altogether. This would entail permitting the negligent defendant to retrieve all the money his insurers paid into court, ordering repayment of the interim payments made between 1991 and 1993, and directing the claimant to pay the defendant his costs of the entire action, as District Judge Rhodes ordered on 22 June 1999. This type of order had to be made under the former "all or nothing" regime. It is no longer obligatory to make such an order today, if it would be unjust to do so. f

91. In my judgment, it would not be just to strike out this statement of case under CPR 3.4(2) in these circumstances. By the same token, it would not be just to allow the claimant to enlarge his pleading or his schedule of special damages in any way, or to allow him to serve a witness statement or to give g

- a any evidence which goes in any way beyond what he is reported to have told his doctors and the other medical experts in the reports which culminated in Mr Shepherd's report in 1994 (if the defendant wishes to rely on that undisclosed report). He may of course rely on his pleaded case, which will sound in general damages, that by reason of his injuries he is at a disadvantage on the open labour market. The action should be allowed to
- b proceed to trial on that basis, and subject to the condition, which will form part of the order of this court, that the judge assesses the compensation which would have been payable to Mr Walsh at a trial conducted on 15 March 1995 and that he is not entitled to any interest on those damages between that date and the date of this court's order allowing his appeal.'
- c [45] It appears to me that it is possible to adopt a similar approach in the present case. It is very important that this court should not relax the disciplinary framework created by the CPR in a case like this. On the other hand to bar the claimant from pursuing his claim as it stood in April 2001, when the particulars of claim should have been served, would be a disproportionate response and would give the defendant's insurers an unjustified windfall.
- d [46] I would therefore allow this appeal by extending the time for the service of the particulars of claim on condition that no claim is made for special or general damages other than what may be substantiated by any pre-April 2001 written report by Dr Gaffney which the claimant may care to disclose in support of his claim. The court will hear counsel as to the precise wording of the requisite condition. The order for costs made by the circuit judge should stand, and I
- e would direct that the claimant pay the defendant the costs of this appeal (on the usual public funding terms), such costs to be available for set-off against any damages the claimant may recover in this action. If the claimant wishes to proceed with his claim on this condition, the particulars of claim must be filed by 24 July 2003 (28 days from the date this judgment is handed down).

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION b

AULD, BROOKE AND SEDLEY LJJ

18 NOVEMBER, 19 DECEMBER 2002

Social security – Income support – Capital limit – Calculation of capital – Income support claimant and another sharing beneficial interest in property as tenants in common in unequal shares – Whether claimant should be treated in calculating value of her capital assets as entitled to beneficial half share in property – Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, reg 52. c

The claimant was the legal owner of her house and she and her son were tenants in common in equity in shares of one-sixth and five-sixths respectively. Regulation 52^a of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987 provided that where a person claiming income support and one or more other persons were beneficially entitled in possession to any capital asset, they should be treated for the purposes of valuing capital for income support as if they were entitled to the beneficial interest in the capital asset in equal shares. In 1993, when the claimant moved into a residential home, the value of the house was £27,000. Shortly after her move, her income support was terminated on the basis that she possessed capital in excess of £8,000 and therefore did not qualify for income support. On appeal, the Social Security Appeal Tribunal determined that for the purposes of her claim for income support she had an equal half-share in the value of the house. The social security commissioner allowed the claimant's appeal from the tribunal's decision, holding that at all material times the value of her capital had been less than £8,000. The Secretary of State appealed. The issue on the appeal was whether, on the proper interpretation of reg 52, the claimant was to be deemed, artificially, to have been the beneficial owner of half the property. d

Held – The natural effect of reg 52 was to treat that unity of interest which was a necessary feature of a joint tenancy as severed, and to treat a claimant as if he or she were entitled to an equal share (with the others) of the whole beneficial interest. With a tenancy in common, however, there was no need to treat a claimant's unity of interest as if it had been severed. A beneficial interest which a claimant owned as a tenant in common was an asset separately disposable by him or her. In the instant case, the son's five-sixths beneficial interest in his mother's house, and her one-sixth interest, represented separate capital assets of which each had been free to dispose in those shares. It was easy to see why Parliament had used the language of reg 52 to enable the Secretary of State to make sensible arrangements governing the treatment of capital held in a joint tenancy. It was unnecessary to conclude that by the use of those words an intention had to be attributed to Parliament to the effect that it contemplated the making of regulations that were manifestly unfair. The Secretary of State's appeal would, therefore, be dismissed (see [16]–[18], [24]–[26], [28], [31], below). g

Appeal

- The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions appealed from the decision of A Lloyd-Davies, sitting as a social security commissioner, on 15 October 2001, e allowing the appeal of James Hourigan, on behalf of his mother, Mary Hourigan (deceased) (the claimant) from the decision of a Social Security Appeal Tribunal on 8 June 1998 determining that the claimant had had an equal half share in the value of her house, which exceeded the capital limit of £8,000 and that she therefore did not qualify for income support. The facts are set out in the f judgment of Brooke LJ.

John Howell QC and Kate Gallafent (instructed by Child Poverty Action Group) for the claimant.

19 December 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

BROOKE LJ.

- h [1] This is an appeal by the Secretary of State from a decision of Mr Commissioner Lloyd-Davies, sitting as a social security commissioner, on 15 October 2001 whereby he allowed the claimant's appeal from a decision of a Social Security Appeal Tribunal on 8 June 1998 which had determined that the deceased claimant Mrs Mary Hourigan had an equal half-share in the value of her
 j house at 53 Lake Road, Stalybridge and therefore did not qualify for income support. The commissioner substituted a determination that at all material times the value of her capital was less than £8,000.

[2] The underlying facts of the case are very straightforward. Mrs Hourigan had bought her home from the local authority with the help of her son James who contributed five-sixths of the purchase price. In 1993 the value of the house was £27,000. In March of that year she moved from her home to a residential home because she was becoming increasingly frail, and she stayed at that residential home until her death in August 1997. a

[3] At all material times her son James has acted as his mother's appointee, and he has continued to pursue her appeal after her death. Her income support was terminated in June 1993, soon after her move, on the basis that she possessed capital in excess of £8,000. A lengthy series of appeals culminated in the matter being remitted to the appeal tribunal which on 8 June 1998 made the findings of fact which I have incorporated into this judgment. It is the appeal tribunal's finding of law which has been the subject of the appeals first to the commissioner and then to this court. b

[4] The effect of the appeal tribunal's decision was that Mrs Hourigan was the legal owner of 53 Lake Road and that she and her son James owned the beneficial interest in that property as tenants in common in a ratio of 1:5. The question of law we have to determine is whether on the proper interpretation of reg 52 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967 Mrs Hourigan is to be deemed, artificially, to have been the beneficial owner of half the property. If she is, then her capital at the material time would have exceeded £8,000 and it would have been correct to refuse her income support after her move to the residential home. c

[5] Miss Lieven, who appears for the Secretary of State, argues that this is the correct result. Mr John Howell QC, who appears for the claimant, submits that reg 52 of the 1987 regulations does not have this artificial effect when the beneficial interests in property are owned by tenants in common. Alternatively, he submits that reg 52 is ultra vires. e

[6] For the purposes of resolving this dispute it is necessary only to consider a few sections of the Social Security Contribution and Benefits Act 1992 which are all included in Pt VII of that Act (entitled 'Income-Related Benefits'), and a few of the 1987 regulations.

[7] Section 124 of the 1992 Act provides, so far as is material: f

'(1) A person in Great Britain is entitled to income support if—(a) he is of or over the age of 16; (b) he has no income or his income does not exceed the applicable amount; (c) he is not engaged in remunerative work ...

(4) ... where a person is entitled to income support, then—(a) if he has no income, the amount shall be the applicable amount; and (b) if he has income, the amount shall be the difference between his income and the applicable amount.' g

[8] Section 134(1) provides: 'No person shall be entitled to an income-related benefit if his capital or a prescribed part of it exceeds the prescribed amount.' h

[9] Section 135(1) provides:

'The applicable amount, in relation to any income-related benefit, shall be such amount or the aggregate of such amounts as may be prescribed in relation to that benefit.' j

[10] Section 136 provides, so far as is material:

'(2) Regulations may provide that capital not exceeding the amount prescribed under section 134(1) above but exceeding a prescribed lower amount, shall be treated, to a prescribed extent, as if it were income of a prescribed amount.'

a (3) Income and capital shall be calculated or estimated in such manner as may be prescribed ...

(5) Circumstances may be prescribed in which—(a) a person is treated as possessing capital or income which he does not possess; (b) capital or income which a person does possess is to be disregarded ...

b [11] The basic rules for valuing capital for the purposes of income support are contained in regs 49 and 50 of the 1987 regulations. In particular reg 49 provides:

c 'Capital which a claimant possesses in the United Kingdom shall be calculated—(a) except in [the case of a National Savings Certificate], at its current market or surrender value, less—(i) where there would be expenses attributable to sale, 10 per cent; and (ii) the amount of any encumbrance secured on it ...'

[12] Regulation 52, which is at the centre of this appeal, provides:

d 'Except where a claimant possesses capital which is disregarded under regulation 51(4) (notional capital) where a claimant and one or more persons are beneficially entitled in possession to any capital asset they shall be treated as if each of them were entitled in possession to the whole beneficial interest therein in an equal share and the foregoing provisions of this Chapter shall apply for the purposes of calculating the amount of capital which the claimant is treated as possessing as if it were actual capital which the claimant does possess.'

e [13] Regulation 51 provides that a claimant is to be treated as possessing capital of which he has deprived himself for the purposes of obtaining income support. Regulation 53 provides for a claimant to be ascribed a tariff income for each amount of capital taken into account.

f [14] In Chief Adjudication Officer v Palfrey [1995] 11 LS Gaz R 39 this court interpreted reg 52 as meaning that a claimant to whom the regulation applied was to be treated as possessing a particular amount of capital (namely, an entitlement in possession to an equal share in the whole beneficial interest), and that the value of that share was to be calculated at its current market value in accordance with reg 49. The court rejected a contention by the Secretary of State g to the effect that reg 52 required the whole beneficial interest to be valued, disregarding the existence of the shares in it and their consequences, and for the claimant to be treated as possessing an equal share of that value.

[15] The critical words in reg 52 which fall for interpretation on this appeal are the words—

h 'where a claimant and one or more persons are beneficially entitled in possession to any capital asset they shall be treated as if each of them were entitled in possession to the whole beneficial interest therein in an equal share ...' (My emphasis.)

j It was common ground on the hearing of the appeal that the words 'entitled in possession' were to be contrasted with 'entitled in expectancy' or 'entitled in reversion'. They can therefore be ignored for the purposes of the problem we have been asked to resolve.

[16] The language of reg 52 lends itself naturally to a situation in which two or more people are jointly entitled to the equitable interest in the same capital asset. They do not each possess a separate share in the equitable interest. They are jointly invested with the whole of that interest together with the other joint tenants. If there are two joint tenants and one dies, the other is solely entitled by survivorship to the whole beneficial interest. Unity of interest is a necessary feature of a joint tenancy. The natural effect of reg 52 is therefore to treat that unity of interest as severed, and to treat the claimant as if he/she was entitled to an equal share (with the others) of the whole beneficial interest. Thus he/she is to be treated as possessing what he/she does not in fact possess (see s 136(5)(b) of the 1992 Act).

[17] With tenancies in common, there is no need to treat a claimant's unity of interest as if it had been severed for the purpose of computing fairly the capital he/she owns for the purposes of Pt VII of the 1992 Act. As Mr Commissioner PL Howell QC observed (in Social Security Decision CIS 7097/95), a beneficial interest which a claimant owns as a tenant in common is an asset separately disposable by him/her, both in English and Scots law. In that case the claimant was not beneficially entitled to nearly 75% of the money, derived from her husband's National Savings, which had only been paid into their joint bank account as a convenience in order to enable their daughter to pay his nursing home bills by direct debit. If this money of his had been paid into a building society account, or a bank account, in his own name, there could have been no suggestion that his wife was entitled to a beneficial interest in half of it.

[18] Similarly, on the facts of the present case, the son's five-sixth beneficial interest in his mother's house, and his mother's one-sixth interest, represented separate capital assets of which each was free to dispose in those shares. It would be a misuse of language to say that the two of them were beneficially entitled to the house within the meaning of reg 52: they were not.

[19] Miss Lieven, in her admirable submissions on behalf of the Secretary of State, called in aid administrative convenience in support of the interpretation for which she contended. She told us that the Department of Work and Pensions' staff do not necessarily have legal acumen, and administrative convenience demands a statutory code which is reasonably simple to administer. When a court has to identify the ownership of beneficial interests between competing parties, it has some hope of reaching a 'true' solution because each party is keen that the court should attribute the maximum interest to their own share. Inside the statutory scheme created by Pt VII of the 1992 Act, on the other hand, there is no such incentive, and experience, she tells us, has showed that the members of a family habitually attribute as low a value as is realistically possible for a claimant's share in shared property in order to maximise the chances of him/her qualifying for an income-related benefit.

[20] Miss Lieven told us that social security benefits staff are not customarily concerned with divided shares in corn or oil or in the other commodities which the members of the court, drawing on their memories of the Roman law concepts of commixtio or confusio, put to her during the course of argument. In the real world of social security she said that it is the ownership of shares in a business, or a house, or money that gives rise to questions of this kind. Those instructing her thought that no difficulties had arisen under this aspect of reg 52 until the Social Security Decision CIS 7097/95 in February 1997. Claimants and their representatives had seemingly been content to allow a claimant's share to be treated for the purposes of this regulation as a half, or a third, or a quarter, or as the case may be, depending on the number of other parties also entitled to a share.

a [21] However that may be, the issue has now been raised and a just answer to it must be found. Justice is not always the handmaiden of administrative convenience. In my judgment it would need very much clearer words in the regulation if a court were to be constrained to interpret it in the unfair way for which the Secretary of State contends. There is, in my judgment, great force in the submission by Mr John Howell, who appeared for Mr Hourigan, in his b skeleton argument:

c '22. Regulation 52 may only apply to require a person to be treated as if he is entitled in possession to an equal share of the whole beneficial interest when in fact he is not so entitled. The obvious case (if the regulation applies to a tenancy in common as the Secretary of State contends) is where individuals have different shares in the beneficial interest. For example, whether a claimant owned only 5% or 95% of the equitable interest, in either case he would be treated as owning 50% of the whole equitable interest if there is only one other person also beneficially entitled in possession to a share. But he would be treated as owning 33% if two others are involved; 25% if three other are; 20% if four other are; and so on. There is no rational d reason in the context of income support why a claimant should be deemed to possess so much more than he actually has and no rational reason why, given the same actual share, the amount that the claimant is deemed to have should depend on the number of others with a share regardless of their actual interest. Indeed the latter would be a standing invitation to abuse. Nor is it e rational, if the number of others involved may be relevant, for those who have an interest in the same equitable interest otherwise than beneficially in possession (such as those interested in it in reversion) to be ignored.

f 23. As Mr Commissioner Howell observed [in Social Security Decision CIS 7097/95], the result of the Secretary of State's interpretation would be to make the system "a lottery ... producing arbitrary answers (on some facts unjustly in favour of claimants, on others against)" and that "the injustice and absurdity" was "obvious".

[22] We have had the opportunity of considering the decision of Mr Commissioner Goodman in Social Security Decision CIS 3283/97 (Appendix to linked cases, at paras 16–18). At the end of this decision he adopted the g interpretation of reg 52 for which the Secretary of State is now contending. He considered that the regulation applied to all kinds of co-ownership because its language was broad enough to cover both joint tenants and tenancies in common. He called in aid of this interpretation the heading to reg 52 ('Capital jointly held') and the reference to 'the other joint owners' of a dwelling which h appeared, fleetingly, in a 1995 amendment to reg 52. (He was to declare the regulation, as amended, to be ultra vires, and it has now reverted to its original form.) He said he did not think it necessary, desirable or practicable to try to distinguish between the various kinds of co-ownership, and if this meant that an owner of an undivided share was regarded as possessing a greater share than in fact he did, then that was in his view an inescapable result of the application of j reg 52.

[23] For my part, I do not consider that such an interpretation of reg 52 is inescapable. In R v Chesterfield BC, ex p Fullwood [1994] 2 FCR 158 at 161 Hoffmann LJ observed that there was no ordinary and generally understood meaning of the words 'jointly occupied', and that the ordinary speaker of English would probably say that he thought one should ask a lawyer to ascertain what these words meant in the context of a statutory regulation. So, too, with the words 'capital jointly held'. A lawyer would furnish the answer given by Mr Commissioner Howell.

[24] Miss Lieven argued that Parliament must have contemplated such a potentially unfair and unreasonable result when it empowered the Secretary of State to prescribe circumstances in which a person was to be treated as possessing capital which he did not possess. It is easy to see why Parliament used that language to enable the Secretary of State to make sensible arrangements governing the treatment of capital held in a joint tenancy. It is unnecessary to conclude that by the use of these words an intention must be attributed to Parliament to the effect that it contemplated the making of regulations which were manifestly unfair. The intention of this statutory scheme is that people should be expected to dip into their capital rather than be reliant on the state for income support. Why should Parliament have expected people to dip into capital which they did not in fact possess? Miss Lieven did not give us any answer other than that encapsulated in the words 'administrative convenience'.

[25] For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal. It is not therefore necessary to consider Mr John Howell's alternative argument for Mr Hourigan, namely that reg 52 is ultra vires if it has to be interpreted in the manner for which the Secretary of State contends.

SEDLEY LJ.

[26] I agree with Brooke LJ's conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed. But since a fresh regulation may well follow our judgment, I will set out my reasons, which are not quite the same as his.

[27] First, I am not persuaded that reg 52 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967 even meets the purpose of administrative convenience which is the foundation of Miss Lieven's case. It does not relieve officials of the Department of Work and Pensions of the sometimes extremely difficult task of deciding whether property is held in shares at all, for if it is not, the regulation does not apply. What it does is cut out the often relatively easy sequel of deciding what the respective shares are.

[28] Secondly, it replaces the true share with a crude calculation which, as Brooke LJ has shown, can be both a source of real unfairness and an incentive to create multiple shares, perhaps spuriously, in order to drive up the divisor and so drive down the imputed value of the claimant's interest. Even in relation to honest arrangements, in fact, the regulation can be counter-productive—notably where the claimant's true share is greater than her deemed share. Thus if a house worth £45,000 is shared as to 50% by the claimant and as to 10% by each of her five children, her real share of £22,500 will be deemed to be a one-sixth share worth £7,500, making her artificially eligible for income support. Such an outcome is unfair not only to other claimants, including people like the present respondent, but to the public who provide the funds.

[29] We have been shown no real need for such an erratic device. Where the Secretary of State is satisfied that there is a genuine division of shares, there can be no difficulty in giving effect to it. Where he is not, it may well be that a default allocation of deemed equal shares is reasonable and practicable. But nothing like this has been attempted in reg 52 of the 1987 regulations as it now stands.

[30] The relevance of the foregoing considerations is not that reg 52 could be a much sharper and fairer instrument than it is. That is a question solely for the Secretary of State. It is that Miss Lieven cannot, in spite of her admirable

- a endeavours, establish the breadth of meaning for which she contends on grounds either of administrative convenience (since the regulation largely misses out on this) or of abuse prevention (since it draws in honest as well as devious arrangements). We are left with a power granted by Parliament which, for the reasons set out by Brooke LJ, cannot be held to have contemplated such an arbitrary form of implementation. To read it down as the commissioner has done is enough to protect Mrs Hourigan. The question of vires remains unaddressed.

AULD LJ.

[31] I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Brooke and Sedley LJJ.

- c [32] Regulation 52 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967 does not apply to this case—one of a tenancy in common where the tenant has no unity of beneficial interest with another or others in the capital in question. It applies only to a joint tenancy where there is such unity of interest and where the entitlement of the claimant is, or may, not be equal to that of the other joint tenant or tenants. In such a case it operates to sever the unity of interest and to treat the claimant as if he were entitled to an equal share with the other or others of the whole beneficial interest.

- [33] Such an interpretation accords with the plain legal meaning of the words used by the Parliamentary draftsman, who must be taken to have had in mind the distinction between a tenancy in common and a joint tenancy. I see no reason why, in this context, the words should be given any other meaning. The clear intention of the provision was to simplify the administrative task of assessing the value of a claimant's interest in jointly held property for the purpose of determining his entitlement to income support. No doubt, it was considered that the exercise of identifying the relative sizes of shares for this purpose would be less difficult in the case of tenancies in common.
- e
- f

- [34] As Sedley LJ has pointed out, reg 52 of the 1987 regulations, in deeming an equal apportionment in cases of joint tenancy, can produce injustice either way—as it also could in cases of a tenancy in common if it applied to it. Whatever the strengths and failings of the device as an aid to administrative convenience, prevention of abuse or overall fairness in application, they do not, in my view, support the interpretation for which the Secretary of State contends.

[2001] EWCA Civ 1721

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BROOKE, HALE LJ AND DAVID STEEL J

25, 26 OCTOBER, 16 NOVEMBER 2001

Tort – Intentional infliction of harm – Claimant having brought private prosecution for assault – Whether claimant entitled to rely on assault to found claim for intentional infliction of harm – Offences Against the Person Act 1861, s 45.

Tort – Harassment – Whether intentional infliction of harassment tort at common law.

The claimant was employed by the first defendant NHS Trust from January 1995. She worked in the same office as the second defendant and another worker. Her fellow workers were rude and unfriendly; they criticised her, locked her out of the office, interfered with her desk and personal effects and hid things that she needed. In February the second defendant threatened the claimant with reprisals from an ex-convict if she told their employer about the second defendant's absences from work. The second defendant was involved in setting off the claimant's car alarm and frightening her by throwing an object against her office window. In March the second defendant assaulted the claimant. The claimant went on sick leave after the assault and remained absent until her employment was terminated. She brought a private prosecution against the second defendant who was convicted of common assault in October 1995. The claimant was diagnosed as suffering physical and psychiatric injuries due to harassment and stress at her place of work. In March 1998 she brought proceedings against both defendants. Her claim against the first defendant was based on negligence and upon its vicarious liability for the torts of its employees. The claim against the second defendant was based upon 'the tort of intentional harassment'. The second defendant applied to strike out the claim against her. The judge granted her application, and adjourned the claim against the first defendant, holding (i) that before the enactment of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, which had put the law of harassment on a statutory basis, there had been no common law tort of harassment; and (ii) that the complaints made against the second defendant could not amount to the tort of intentional infliction of harm. In reaching that decision he had excluded the assault on the claimant from consideration because s 45^a of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 provided, inter alia, that a person who had been convicted of assault should be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause. The judge had also excluded the threat of reprisals made by the second defendant because the claimant had conceded to him that it had not been the cause of her trauma. The claimant appealed.

Held – (1) The effect of s 45 of the 1861 Act was that a victim of an assault who had brought a private prosecution could not rely upon the assault in any other

- a proceedings. The judge had therefore been right to exclude it from his consideration of whether the second defendant's conduct was of a nature which was sufficiently likely to result in harm to the claimant that an intention to produce harm could be imputed to her. The claimant had conceded that the threat made by the second defendant had not caused her illness. The remaining catalogue of rudeness and unfriendliness was not behaviour so calculated to
- b infringe her legal right to personal safety that an intention to do so should be imputed to the second defendant (see [13], [16], [17], below).

(2) Before the 1997 Act came into force the common law had not reached the point of recognising a tort of intentional harassment going beyond the tort of intentional infliction of harm. The appeal would accordingly be dismissed (see [29]–[31], below).

Appeal

The claimant, Minna Wong, an employee of the first defendant, Parkside Health NHS Trust, appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Brooke and Rix LJ) granted on 21 December 2000 from the order of Mr Recorder Talbot QC on 14 December 1999 in the Mayor's and City of London County Court striking out her claim against the second defendant, Susan Mullins, an employee of the first defendant, for harassment and intentional infliction of harm. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Matthew Chapman (instructed through the Bar Pro Bono Unit) for the appellant.
John Greenbourne (instructed by Hammond Bale) for the defendants.

16 November 2001. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

HALE LJ.

[1] This is the judgment of the court in an appeal against the order of Mr Recorder Talbot QC, made on 14 December 1999 in the Mayor's and City of London County Court, striking out the appellant's claim against the second defendant. The appellant complained of a campaign of harassment against her in 1995 by three fellow employees and an inadequate response by the first defendant employers. The second defendant is one of those three employees. The issues raised are: (1) the precise scope of the tort of intentionally causing harm under the principle in Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 and (2) whether there was a tort of harassment at common law before the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 came into force.

[2] The appellant was employed as a wheelchair administrator by the first defendant NHS Trust from 3 January 1995. She worked in the same office as the second defendant, Susan Mullins, and another employee, Josie Lucas. Also there at the beginning was a temporary worker, Carmel Woods, who had applied unsuccessfully for the appellant's position but was now charged with explaining the work to the appellant. The appellant's case was that Susan Mullins and Josie Lucas believed that Carmel Woods should have got the job and were extremely rude and unfriendly to her from the start. Carmel Woods did not explain the work properly to her. They criticised her for arriving on time, told her that she had not mastered the job and should leave, locked her out of the office, interfered with her desk and personal effects, and hid things that she needed. On 20 February 1995 the second defendant threatened her with reprisals from an ex-convict if she told their employers about the second defendant's absences. On 9 March 1995 she was assaulted by the second defendant, who had also been responsible, with Josie Lucas, for setting off her car alarm and frightening her by throwing something against the office window. In all, out of 22 particulars of harassment, 13 applied to the second defendant, although in three further incidents of interference with the appellant's property the perpetrator was unknown.

[3] The appellant went on sick leave after the assault and remained absent until her employment was terminated in August 1996. She brought a private prosecution for assault against the second defendant. On 9 October 1995, in Ealing Magistrates' Court, the second defendant was convicted of common assault, conditionally discharged and ordered to pay £75 compensation and £250 costs.

[4] These proceedings were brought on 6 March 1998. The claim against the first defendant employers was based on negligence and upon their vicarious liability for the torts of their employees. The claim against the second defendant was based upon the 'tort of intentional harassment, for which she is liable for the a foreseeable consequences' (see the amended particulars of claim). It was claimed that the appellant had suffered both physical and psychiatric injuries. Appended to the claim was a report from Dr Elizabeth Tylden, a retired consultant psychiatrist, diagnosing—

b 'chronic post-traumatic stress reaction due to harassment and stress at her place of work with a series of stressful incidents culminating in an assault. Severe disability in arm function due to residual physical and dissociative effects of trauma as specified in F43 and F44 of ICD-10 (the World Health Organisation's International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems (10th rev, 1992–1994)).'

The defendants deny these allegations.

c [5] The case against both defendants was listed for trial beginning on 14 December 1999. At the outset, the second defendant renewed an application to strike out the claim against her, which had been made earlier but not determined. The recorder granted that application and adjourned the claim against the first defendant employers. He held that there was no tort of harassment at common law before the enactment of the 1997 Act, which does not have retrospective effect; he further held that the complaints made against the second defendant could not amount to the tort of intentional infliction of harm under the principle in Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267. In reaching that decision, he excluded the assault on 9 March, because of s 45 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861; he also excluded the threat on 20 February because the appellant conceded to him that it had not been the cause of her trauma.

e [6] At that stage, the appellant was acting in person, legal aid having been withdrawn. Before us, she has been represented under the pro bono scheme run by the Royal Courts of Justice Citizens' Advice Bureau, by Mr Matthew Chapman of counsel. He has argued her case before us as well as it could possibly be argued and we are most grateful to him, and to the bureau and the scheme, for their help with some difficult but important issues of law.

g [7] As every law student knows, the common law distinguished between an action in trespass and an action upon the case. Trespass to the person consisted in the direct infliction of harm (or the threat of the immediate infliction of such harm) upon the claimant. But the law recognised that physical harm might be inflicted indirectly. If intentional, this was the tort recognised by the High Court in Wilkinson v Downton and confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056. If negligent, it was eventually recognised as the tort of negligence in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1.

h [8] In Wilkinson v Downton, the defendant did not intend to cause physical harm to the claimant. He intended to play a particularly nasty practical joke upon her. He told her, knowing that it was not true but meaning her to believe them, that her husband had had an accident returning from the races in a wagonette, had broken both his legs, was lying in a public house in Leytonstone, and wished the claimant to go at once with a cab and some pillows to fetch him home. She suffered a violent shock to her nervous system, producing vomiting and other more serious and permanent physical consequences at one time threatening her reason, and entailing weeks of suffering for her and expense to her husband.

Wright J found in her favour ([1897] 2 QB 57 at 58–59, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 at 269):

‘The defendant has ... wilfully done an act calculated to cause physical harm to the plaintiff—that is to say, to infringe her legal right to personal safety, and has in fact thereby caused physical harm to her. That proposition without more appears to me to state a good cause of action, there being no justification alleged for the act. This wilful injuria is in law malicious, although no malicious purpose to cause the harm which was caused nor any motive of spite is imputed to the defendant. It remains to consider whether the assumptions involved in the proposition are made out. One question is whether the defendant’s act was so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant, regard being had to the fact that the effect was produced on a person proved to be in an ordinary state of health and mind. I think that it was. It is difficult to imagine that such a statement, made suddenly and with apparent seriousness, could fail to produce grave effects under the circumstances upon any but an exceptionally indifferent person, and therefore an intention to produce such an effect must be imputed, and it is no answer in law to say that more harm was done than was anticipated, for that is commonly the case with all wrongs.’

[9] This was approved in the later, and ‘much stronger’, Janvier’s case. In order to persuade the plaintiff to hand over letters belonging to her employer, the second defendant, an employee of the first defendant, pretended to be from Scotland Yard, representing the military authorities who wanted the plaintiff for corresponding with a German spy. The plaintiff suffered a severe shock, resulting in neurasthenia, shingles and other ailments. Although these cases were concerned with words, the same principle would obviously apply to the intentional infliction of physical harm by other indirect means, such as digging a pit into which it is intended that another should fall.

[10] It follows from Wright J’s formulation that, although the tort is commonly labelled ‘intentional infliction of harm’, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant actually wanted to produce such harm. If the conduct complained of was ‘calculated’ to do so, and does so, then that is enough. Much depends, therefore, on what is meant by ‘calculated’.

‘Cases will be rare where nervous shock involving physical injury was fully intended (desired). More frequently, the defendant’s aim would have been merely to frighten, terrify or alarm his victim. But this is quite sufficient, provided his conduct was of a kind reasonably capable of terrifying a normal person, or was known or ought to have been known to the defendant to be likely to terrify the plaintiff for reasons special to him. Such conduct could be described as reckless.’

This might be read to mean that the tort is committed if there is deliberate conduct which will foreseeably lead to alarm or distress falling short of the recognised psychiatric illness which is now considered the equivalent of physical harm, provided that such harm is actually suffered. We do not consider that English law has gone so far.

a [12] For the tort to be committed, as with any other action on the case, there has to be actual damage. The damage is physical harm or recognised psychiatric illness. The defendant must have intended to violate the claimant's interest in his freedom from such harm. The conduct complained of has to be such that that degree of harm is sufficiently likely to result that the defendant cannot be heard to say that he did not 'mean' it to do so. He is taken to have meant it to do so by b the combination of the likelihood of such harm being suffered as the result of his behaviour and his deliberately engaging in that behaviour. This view is consistent with that taken by Dillon LJ in Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669 at 676, [1993] QB 727 at 735–736:

c '... false words or verbal threats calculated to cause, and uttered with the knowledge that they are likely to cause and actually causing physical injury to the person to whom they are uttered are actionable: see the judgment of Wright J in Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57 at 59, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 at 269 cited by Bankes LJ in Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316 at 321–322, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056 at 1059. There was a wilful false statement, or d unfounded threat, which was in law malicious, and which was likely to cause and did in fact cause physical injury, viz illness of the nature of nervous shock.'

[13] There is no allegation in this case that the second defendant intended to cause the harm that Dr Tylden diagnosed. The question therefore is whether her e conduct was of a nature which was sufficiently likely to result in such harm that an intention to produce it could be imputed to her. The recorder held that it was not. But in doing so he left out of account the two most important allegations made against this defendant, the threat and the assault.

f 'If any person against whom any such complaint as is mentioned in s 44 of this Act [ie of assault or battery] shall have been preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved shall have obtained such certificate [ie of dismissal because not proved, or justified or so trifling as not to merit any punishment], or, having been convicted, shall have paid the whole amount g adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment awarded, in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause.'

[15] The claimant brought a private prosecution against the second defendant, which resulted in a conviction, and orders for compensation and costs, h all of which have been paid. Mr Chapman argues that this precludes bringing a civil action for assault or battery relying upon the same allegation, but it does not prevent that allegation being used for the purpose of proving a completely different tort. It is all part of the picture of behaviour 'calculated' to cause the claimant physical harm. However, in the case of Masper v Brown (1876) 1 CPD 97, this court held that 'cause' in s 45 of the 1861 Act meant 'assault': an action by a j husband in respect of the consequential damage to him by reason of an assault upon his wife (presumably the old action per quod servitium or consortium amisit) was therefore prohibited. The fact that it was a completely different cause of action, brought by a different claimant, made no difference. Lord Coleridge CJ referred to the earlier provision in the Criminal Procedure Act 1853 relating to aggravated assaults, which had barred future proceedings for the same 'assault'.

He pointed out that it would be a very strange thing if the legislature, when dealing with aggravated assaults only, should have intended to make the conviction a bar to all further proceedings against the offender for the same assault, and then, when dealing with non-aggravated assaults as well as aggravated assaults, should have intended the conviction to be only a bar to proceedings for the same cause of action.

[16] Thus the victim of an assault has a choice. If the authorities choose to prosecute, there is no problem. But if they do not, she must choose between bringing a private prosecution or a civil action. The former will destroy her right to bring the latter, irrespective of the outcome. The alleged perpetrator is not to be put in double jeopardy for the same cause. This may be an anomalous approach in today's world, given the differences in the burden of proof and sometimes in the level of compensation awarded by criminal and civil courts. But for as long as s 45 of the 1861 Act is on the statute book, the effect in a case such as this is clear: the claimant cannot rely upon the assault in any other proceedings. The recorder was therefore right to exclude it from his consideration.

[17] The threat is different. It is the most serious of the other allegations made against the second defendant. But the claimant herself conceded to the judge that it had not caused her illness. The trigger had been the earlier incidents which had led to her two-day absence in January. Without it, all that is left is a catalogue of rudeness and unfriendliness, behaviour not to be expected of grown-up colleagues in the workplace, but not behaviour so calculated 'to infringe her legal right to personal safety' (see Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57 at 59, [1895-9] All ER Rep 267 at 269) that an intention to do so should be imputed to the second defendant.

A TORT OF HARASSMENT

[18] There was growing public concern and media debate about harassment, at least in the form popularly known as 'stalking', before the 1997 Act. The context was usually obsessive behaviour towards a person with whom the stalker had had or wished to have an intimate relationship. Remedies had been developed within family law but these only gave protection to a limited class of people. Others had to rely upon the law of tort. The case law was developing in such a way that some considered that a new tort of harassment had already been created. However, in all of the cases the question was whether an injunction should be granted to prevent particular kinds of behaviour: there was no case in which damages were awarded to compensate for such behaviour in the past.

[19] Remedies against molestation were first developed in pending matrimonial causes. This was before actions in tort became possible between spouses following the Law Reform (Husband and Wife) Act 1962. The object was to protect the integrity of the legal process, by preventing a wife petitioner for divorce being 'kicked or kissed' out of her remedy. The concept of molestation embraced some behaviour, such as violence and threats of violence, which was obviously tortious, but other behaviour which was not. The classic definition is that of Ormrod LJ in Horner v Horner [1982] 2 All ER 495 at 497, [1982] Fam 90 at 93:

'For my part I have no doubt that the word "molesting" in s 1(1)(a) of the 1976 Act does not imply necessarily either violence or threats of violence. It applies to any conduct which can properly be regarded as such a degree of harassment as to call for the intervention of the court.'

a [20] This was a reference to the Domestic Violence and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1976. Section 1 had given county courts jurisdiction to grant injunctions against molestation, not only between husband and wife, but also between 'a man and a woman who are living with each other in the same household as husband and wife', whether or not any other relief was sought in the proceedings. The House of Lords in Davis v Johnson [1978] 1 All ER 1132, b [1979] AC 264 confirmed that this was not merely a procedural provision. There remained many gaps, for example, where the couple were no longer married or living together, or where they had never lived together, or were related in some other way.

[21] Many of the gaps in the statutory scheme were filled by the new scheme introduced by Pt IV of the Family Law Act 1996. Some of them had already been c filled by the cases decided before then. In Burnett v George [1993] 1 FCR 1012, the plaintiff complained of a series of molestations and assaults by a former cohabitant. An injunction was granted in the then standard form restraining him from assaulting, molesting or otherwise interfering with her. On appeal it was argued that molestation and interference were not actionable wrongs. Sir John d Arnold P agreed (at 1014–1015):

'... I regard that as a conclusive argument unless there be evidence that the health of the plaintiff is being impaired by molestation or interference calculated to create such impairment, in which case relief would be granted by way of an injunction to the extent that it would be necessary to avoid that e impairment of health. That exception is, in my judgment, validly grounded on Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 QB 57 ...'

As there was evidence that the defendant's behaviour was causing injury to the plaintiff's health, an injunction was substituted prohibiting him from 'assaulting, molesting or otherwise interfering with the plaintiff by doing acts calculated to f cause her harm'.

[22] The Court of Appeal may have gone a little further in Pidduck v Molloy [1992] 1 FCR 418 at 421. This was another case between former cohabitants, where an injunction against speaking to the plaintiff was replaced by one against speaking to her 'in an intimidatory, threatening or abusive manner' on the basis that these were all capable of amounting to crimes or torts.

g [23] Then came Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727. The parties had never married or lived together but had been friends. The defendant was unable to accept that the plaintiff wanted nothing more to do with him. She complained of violence, threats of violence, damage to her property, and persecution by telephone calls. The current injunction restrained him from h 'using violence to, harassing, pestering or communicating' with her. Dillon LJ ([1993] 3 All ER 669 at 679–680, [1993] QB 727 at 739–740), with whom Rose LJ agreed, upheld the injunction without qualification, because—j '(i) the campaign of harassment has to be regarded as a whole without consideration of each ingredient in isolation, and viewed as a whole it is plainly calculated to cause the plaintiff harm, and can be restrained quia timet because of the danger to her health from a continuation of the stress to which she has been subjected (ii) threats of violence can be restrained per se, whether or not the threat, without the subsequent violence, is calculated to cause the plaintiff harm; and (iii) telephone harassment is, in my judgment ... an actionable interference with her ordinary and reasonable use and enjoyment of property where she is lawfully present, and thus, on the past history, can be restrained quia timet without further proof or damage.’ a [24] Point (iii) was based upon extending the tort of private nuisance so as to protect a mere licensee. Peter Gibson J, as he then was, disagreed ([1993] 3 All ER 669 at 684, [1993] QB 727 at 745):

‘I know of no authority which would allow a person with no interest in land or right to occupy land to sue in private nuisance. Given that the purpose of an action in nuisance is to protect the right to use and enjoyment of land ... it seems to me to be wrong in principle if a mere licensee or someone without such right could sue in private nuisance.’ b

In this view he was entirely vindicated by the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655. To that extent the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727, was overruled. But Hunter’s case was about the scope of the tort of private nuisance; it had nothing to do with harassment. There is nothing in the speeches in their Lordships’ House to cast doubt upon that part of the decision which was based upon the principle in Wilkinson v Downton. c

[25] However, there was also a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal (Khorasandjian’s case [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727) on that point. Dillon and Rose LJ did not limit the injunction to conduct calculated to cause harm, because taken as a whole, the conduct complained of was clearly so calculated. Peter Gibson J, on the other hand, would have followed the decision in Burnett’s case in including such a limitation. In so far as Pidduck’s case had gone further in restraining conduct which was merely capable of amounting to a crime or a tort rather than conduct which would amount to a crime or a tort, he preferred Burnett’s case, ‘because in principle only conduct amounting to an actionable wrong (including conduct facilitating such a wrong) should be restrained’ (see [1993] 3 All ER 669 at 682, [1993] QB 727 at 742). d

[26] The Court of Appeal took the broader view in Burris v Azadani [1995] 4 All ER 802, [1999] 1 WLR 1372. There had been no relationship between the parties, but the defendant had wanted one. He had indulged in ‘an intolerable history of harassment and molestation’. An injunction was granted against (a) assaulting, molesting, harassing, threatening, pestering or otherwise interfering with the plaintiff, her children or her friend, or (b) communicating with any of them, or (c) coming or remaining within 250 yards of her home. He was committed for breach of para (c). Bingham MR, said ([1995] 4 All ER 802 at 807, [1999] 1 WLR 1372 at 1377): e

‘If an injunction may only properly be granted to restrain conduct which is in itself tortious or otherwise unlawful, that would be a conclusive objection to term (c) ... I do not, however, think that the court’s power is so limited. A Mareva injunction granted in the familiar form restrains a defendant from acting in a way which is not, in itself, tortious or otherwise unlawful. The order is made to try to ensure that the procedures of the court are in practice effective to achieve their ends. The court recognises a need to protect the legitimate interests of those who have invoked its jurisdiction.’ f

He concluded that there was power to make an ‘exclusion zone’ order. But such order should not be made readily or without very good reason. The liberty of the defendant should be respected up to the point at which his conduct infringed or g a threatened to infringe the rights of the plaintiff. He said ([1995] 4 All ER 802 at 811, [1999] 1 WLR 1372 at 1380–1381):

b ‘Ordinarily, the victim will be adequately protected by an injunction which restrains the tort which has been or is likely to be committed, whether trespass to the person or to land, interference with goods, harassment, intimidation or as the case may be. But it may be clear on the facts that if the c defendant approaches the vicinity of the plaintiff’s home he will succumb to the temptation to enter it, or to abuse or harass the plaintiff; or that he may loiter outside the house, watching and besetting it, in a manner which might be highly stressful and disturbing to a plaintiff.’

d [27] The basis of the decision is therefore that an interlocutory injunction may be granted to prohibit conduct which is not in itself unlawful if it is necessary to prevent such unlawful conduct taking place or to protect the claimant’s right to bring the matter before the court. Understandably, Mr Chapman relies strongly upon the reference in the passage just quoted to a tort of harassment. Earlier, Bingham MR had discussed the case of Patel v Patel [1988] 2 FLR 179, in which an exclusion zone order had been removed from an injunction granted to a father-in-law against his son-in-law. May LJ had observed (at 180) that an injunction ‘can only be an appropriate remedy where an actual tortious act has been or is likely to be committed’. Waterhouse J had said (at 182) that ‘in the present state of the law there is no tort of harassment’. Bingham MR commented e in Burris v Azadani [1995] 4 All ER 802 at 809, [1995] 1 WLR 1372 at 1378: ‘Nor, in the light of later authority, can the view be upheld that there is no tort of harassment.’

f [28] The later authority was Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727. Dillon LJ found it difficult to give much weight to what Waterhouse J had said, because the reformulated injunction in Patel’s case had continued to prohibit molestation. Peter Gibson J, however, agreed with his statement, while pointing out ([1993] 3 All ER 669 at 683, [1993] QB 727 at 744) that ‘many forms of molestation, in the wide sense in which it has been interpreted by the courts ... are tortious, but in my view not every form of molestation is a tort’. Both Dillon LJ and Peter Gibson J considered the decision of Scott J, as he then was, in g Thomas v National Union of Mineworkers (South Wales Area) [1985] 2 All ER 1, [1986] Ch 20. He had held that the plaintiffs were entitled to enjoy their right to use the highway to go to work without unreasonable harassment and that picketing by 50 to 70 striking miners shouting abuse was a tortious interference with that right. This decision has been criticised, as interference with the right to use the highway is only actionable in public nuisance on proof of special damage. In News Group Newspapers Ltd v Society of Graphical and Allied Trades ’82 (No 2) [1987] ICR 181, Stuart-Smith J, as he then was, saw force in the criticism but did not find it necessary to express a view. Nor did Dillon LJ in Khorasandjian’s case [1993] 3 All ER 669 at 679, [1993] QB 727 at 738. Peter Gibson J ([1993] 3 All ER 669 at 683, [1993] QB 727 at 744) expressly disagreed with Scott J, to the extent that he was j holding that there was now a tort of unreasonable harassment. It is, however, quite clear that neither the majority nor the minority in Khorasandjian’s case were creating a new tort. They were merely developing existing torts to cover the behaviour complained of and, in the case of the majority, to prohibit conduct which was likely to result in harm being suffered even though it had not yet done so.

[29] Burris' case was decided before the House of Lords' decision in Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655. The speeches there do not lend support to the view that there is now a general tort of harassment at common law. Lord Goff of Chieveley said ([1997] 2 All ER 426 at 438, [1997] AC 655 at 691–692):

'In truth, what the Court of Appeal appears to have been doing was to exploit the law of private nuisance in order to create by the back door a tort of harassment which was only partially effective in that it was artificially limited to harassment which takes place in her home. I myself do not consider that this is a satisfactory manner in which to develop the law ... In any event, a tort of harassment has now received statutory recognition (see the Protection from Harassment Act 1997). We are therefore no longer troubled with the question whether the common law should be developed to provide such a remedy.'

Lord Hoffmann said ([1997] 2 All ER 426 at 452, [1997] AC 655 at 707):

'The perceived gap in Khorasandjian's case was the absence of a tort of intentional harassment causing distress without actual bodily or psychiatric illness. This limitation is thought to arise out of cases like Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 and Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056. The law of harassment has now been put on a statutory basis ... and it is unnecessary to consider how the common law might have developed.'

This gives no warrant for concluding that the common law had by then reached the point of recognising a tort of intentional harassment going beyond the tort of intentional infliction of harm. It is a clear indication that matters should now be left to Parliament.

[30] Lord Hoffmann went on to comment:

'I see no reason why a tort of intention should be subject to the rule which excludes compensation for mere distress, inconvenience or discomfort in actions based on negligence ... The policy considerations are quite different.'

Indeed they are, and Parliament has provided a civil remedy, which includes damages for anxiety, as well as a criminal remedy in the 1997 Act. No doubt the concept of 'a course of conduct ... which amounts to harassment' (see s 1 of the 1997 Act) will be developed in decisions under that Act. Until that Act came into force, there was power to restrain by injunction conduct which might result in the tort of intentional infliction of harm or otherwise threaten the claimant's right of access to the courts, but there was no right to damages for conduct falling short of an actual tort.

[31] As the allegations in this case do not amount to that or any other tort recognised at common law at the time when these events took place, the recorder was right to strike out the claim and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

a Wainwright and another v Home Office
[2001] EWCA Civ 2081

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD WOOLF CJ, MUMMERY AND BUXTON LJ

b 20, 21 NOVEMBER, 20 DECEMBER 2001

Intentional infliction of harm – Invasion of privacy – Visitors to prison who were strip searched suffering distress and humiliation – Whether intentional infliction of harm – Whether invasion of privacy – Whether human rights legislation applicable despite events taking place before implementation of legislation – Human Rights Act 1998, s 3(1).

In 1997, the first claimant and her 21 year old son, the second claimant, went to visit another son of the first claimant in prison. There was a pressing drug problem in the prison and the claimants were told by prison officers that they were to be strip searched because they were suspected of bringing drugs into the prison, and that if they refused they might be denied their visit. The statutory authority to conduct searches provided, inter alia, that any person entering a prison might be stopped, examined, and searched. During the searches both claimants signed consent forms. The searches did not comply with the prison's own procedures for the strip searching of visitors. The circumstances of the searches were such that both claimants felt distressed and humiliated; the first claimant believed that she could be seen by people outside the building while she was semi-naked and the second claimant was physically handled during his search while he was naked. He developed post-traumatic stress syndrome. They brought proceedings against the defendant, the Home Office, claiming damages. The second claimant claimed for battery. The judge found that, even though the first claimant had suffered no physical injury, but only distress and humiliation, her right to privacy had been infringed, basing his conclusion in part on common law and in part on the Human Rights Act 1998. He held that the tort of trespass to the person, consisting of wilfully causing a person to do something to himself which infringed his right to privacy, had been committed against both claimants and that the tort of trespass to the person, consisting of wilfully causing a person to do something calculated to cause harm to him, namely infringing his legal right to personal safety, had been committed against the second claimant. The judge awarded damages and aggravated damages in each case. The defendant appealed. On the appeal there was no dispute that the defendant was liable to the second claimant for battery. The court considered the requirements of a claim in the tort of intentional infliction of harm; the existence of remedies for invasion of privacy at common law; and whether the claimants were entitled to rely on s 3^a of the 1998 Act, which provided that legislation had to be read and given effect in a way which was compatible with the rights contained in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act), either to qualify the interpretation of the statutory authority to conduct searches, or to introduce a right of privacy, notwithstanding that the searches had occurred before the 1998 Act came into force.

Held – (1) Damages could be recovered for the tort of intentional infliction of harm if actual recognised psychiatric illness or bodily injury resulted. A limiting factor was, however, the intention to cause harm, which harm was in fact then caused, or recklessness as to whether that harm would be caused. The judge had not been asked to make, nor had he made any finding that the prison officers were intending to cause or were reckless as to whether they caused harm, and the findings he had made were inconsistent with such a conclusion (see [47]–[49], [51], [55], [56], [84], [85], [124], below); Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57 distinguished. a

(2) There was no existing common law remedy for invasion of privacy; therefore the claimants could not be granted relief on that basis (see [56]–[58], [102], [107], [115], [124], below); Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289 considered. c

(3) Section 3(1) of the 1998 Act did not apply retrospectively to the cause of action in the instant case which arose in 1997. It therefore could not assist on the construction of the statutory authority to conduct searches or by introducing a right of privacy. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [40], [61], [89], below); R v Lambert [2001] 3 All ER 577 followed. d

- h* The Home Office appealed, with the permission of Judge McGonigal, from his judgment given at the Leeds County Court on 23 May 2001 awarding basic and aggravated damage in compensation for the manner in which the claimants, Mary Wainwright and Alan Wainwright (suing as a patient by Mary Wainwright, his litigation friend) were strip searched by prison officers at HM Prison Leeds on
- j* 2 January 1997. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Woolf CJ.

Robin Tam (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Home Office.

David Wilby QC and Ashley Serr (instructed by David A Reston, York) for Mrs Wainwright and Mr Wainwright.

20 December 2001. The following judgments were delivered.

LORD WOOLF CJ.

[1] This appeal relates to a judgment of Judge McGonigal, given at the Leeds County Court on 23 April 2001. The claimants were a mother, Mrs Mary Wainwright, and her son, Alan Wainwright. The judge awarded basic and aggravated damages which were, in total, for the mother the sum of £2,600 and for the son the sum of £4,500. The damages were compensation for the manner in which they were strip-searched by prison officers when they went to HM Prison Leeds in order to visit another son (Patrick O'Neill) of Mrs Wainwright.

[2] The case raises difficult issues of law and the judge gave leave to appeal. The most important of those issues are identified by Mr Tam for the appellant, the Home Office, as being whether a person is liable in tort if he: (i) wilfully causes a person to do something calculated to cause harm to him, namely to infringe his legal right to personal safety; (ii) wilfully causes a person to do something to himself which infringes his right of privacy?

[3] Additional issues were: (i) if such conduct was tortious, whether, on the facts of this case (a) it was negated by consent or (b) protected by statutory authority; (ii) whether the complainants were entitled to rely on s 3 of the Human Rights Act 1998 notwithstanding that the conduct complained of occurred on 2 January 1997, before the 1998 Act came into force.

[4] Judge McGonigal gave a detailed and clear judgment both as to his findings of fact and the legal principles which he applied in this difficult case. It is therefore possible to rely on the judgment in order to explain the factual background and the issues.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[5] At the time of the visit Alan Wainwright was 21 years of age. He suffers from cerebral palsy with a degree of mental impairment. He therefore sues as a patient by Mrs Wainwright, his litigation friend.

[6] On the 2 January 1997 Mrs Wainwright and Alan arrived at the prison at about 6 pm. They went through normal security checks and then waited with the other visitors prior to seeing Patrick. They were then approached by a number of prison officers and asked to accompany them. They then proceeded to the north gatehouse of the prison. On the way there, they were told they were to be strip-searched because they were suspected of bringing drugs in to the prison and if they refused they might be denied a visit to Patrick. At the gatehouse they were taken up to the first floor where they were separated.

[7] Mrs Wainwright was strip-searched by two female prison officers in one room while Alan was searched by two male prison officers in another room. They were then allowed to visit Patrick.

[8] Before a strip-search takes place, the person who is to be strip-searched is required to sign a consent form. There is no dispute that both claimants signed the form which is known as F2141. There was a dispute as to when they signed the form. The form reads as follows:

'Notice for the information of visitors or other persons entering an establishment Strip-search

Please read carefully

The Governor has directed that, for the reasons explained to you, you should be strip-searched.

a The police have been informed but cannot come to deal with the matter. The search will therefore be carried out by prison staff.

The procedure for the search is explained overleaf.

Please sign below if the search is taking place with your consent.

I have read this notice (or it has been read to me) and I understand it.

b I agree to be strip-searched by prison staff.'

[9] The prison officers who gave evidence said that the forms would have been signed prior to the search being undertaken in accordance with proper practice. Mrs Wainwright and Alan both said that they were asked to sign the forms after the search had been substantially completed. The judge preferred their evidence on this issue. He regarded Mrs Wainwright 'as an honest witness who was doing her best to tell the truth as she remembered it'. He felt the circumstances surrounding Alan's search supported his story.

[10] The search was conducted at a time when it was dark outside and Mrs Wainwright believed that she could be seen by those who were in a single storey flat roofed administration block which was on the opposite side of the road or from that road. There were roller blinds on the windows of the room that she was in but the judge accepted her evidence that the blinds were not pulled down. Mrs Wainwright does not allege that she was touched by either of the female officers who searched her, but says that she felt threatened and that she was upset and worried. Alan said (and this the judge accepted) that during his search he was naked, a finger was poked into his armpits and that one prison officer went all round his body, lifted up his penis and pulled back the foreskin. The judge also found that Mrs Wainwright was correct in saying that there was a point when she was naked apart from knickers around her ankle and a vest held above her breasts. The judge also accepted that the officers had not known of Alan's learning difficulties before they had completed the strip-search of him—see para 56 of his judgment. Paragraph 10 as currently drafted might, through ambiguity, give the erroneous impression that they were aware throughout the search procedure of Alan's learning difficulties. We would respectfully ask that consideration be given to clarifying this point. Mrs Wainwright describes how she was crying during the search and there is no doubt that she and Alan were very upset by what happened.

[11] The judge also made the following relevant findings of fact: (i) there was a pressing problem involving the prevalence of illicit drugs within the prison; (ii) visitors in general were a major source of such drugs and that all visitors were suspected of bringing in drugs until it was proved otherwise because all sorts of unlikely visitors had been known to bring in drugs; (iii) there were reasonable grounds for believing that Mrs Wainwright's son, Patrick, had been obtaining illicit drugs; (iv) the claimants each consented to being strip-searched before they were searched although in each case they signed the consent forms after the search was complete or substantially complete; (v) the search of each of the complaints was not conducted in as seemly a manner as was consistent with discovering anything concealed; (vi) the officers honestly believed that they had a legal right to strip-search the claimants; (vii) Mrs Wainwright understood and was intended to understand that the officers had a legal right to strip-search the claimants; (viii) notwithstanding that each claimant consented to the strip-search, such consent was not a real consent because they were expressly told that if they did not consent the defendant would deny the claimants the proposed visit; (ix) further, such consent was not a real consent because it was represented to them that the officers had a legal right to strip-search them, which was untrue, although honestly believed; (x) any search under a power given by r 86 of the Prison Rules 1964, SI 1964/388 was lawful only if it was conducted in as seemly a manner as was consistent with discovering anything concealed; (xi) the strip-search of the claimants was not a proportionate response to the objective of preventing that person from obtaining drugs from visitors and was therefore not permitted by that rule; and (xii) the prison officers had no right to conduct a search. a

[12] The judge on these findings came to the conclusion that a tort of trespass to the person, consisting of wilfully causing a person to do something to himself which infringes his right to privacy had been committed against both claimants. In addition he concluded that the tort of trespass to the person, consisting of wilfully causing a person to do something calculated to cause harm to him, namely infringing his legal right to personal safety, had been committed against the second claimant. c

[13] There is no dispute now that the Home Office is liable to Alan for the physical handling which took place and that this amounted to battery. Nothing was found during the course of the searches. d

[14] As to injuries, the findings of the judge are not so clear. It appears that he accepted in the case of Mrs Wainwright there was exacerbation of existing depression and unpleasant memories of the incident. In the case of Alan, it appears that the judge found that he was suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. e

[15] Both claimants sought exemplary and aggravated damages. The judge did not consider that it was an appropriate case for exemplary damages. He considered that it was an appropriate case in which to award aggravated damages. As aggravated damages, he awarded each claimant £1,000. f

THE STATUTORY AUTHORITY TO CONDUCT SEARCHES

[16] The 1964 rules are made pursuant to s 47 of the Prison Act 1952. The parties accept that these rules applied to the search. The rule which is directly applicable is r 86(1). This rule provides: 'Any person or vehicle entering or leaving a prison may be stopped, examined and searched.' g

[17] The very general terms of r 86 have to be contrasted with the terms of r 39(1) which applies to prisoners. This states: h

- (1) Every prisoner shall be searched when taken into custody by an officer on his reception into a prison and subsequently as the Governor thinks necessary or as the Secretary of State may direct.
- (2) A prisoner shall be searched in as seemly a manner as is consistent with discovering anything concealed.
- (3) No person shall be stripped and searched in sight of another prisoner, or in the sight or presence of an officer not of the same sex.' i

[18] Leeds prison has its own strategy and procedure relating to searches. Part of the strategy applies to visitors to prisons. The following statements are important. Section 1.2.1: j

'Searches will be conducted in as seemly and sensitive manner as is consistent with discovering anything concealed.'

No person will be strip-searched in the sight of anyone not directly involved in the search.

- a A person who refuses to be searched will be denied access to the prison or detained in accordance with s 1.2.7.'

Section 1.2.5:

- b 'Strip-searching of visitors is not permitted except in the circumstances specified in section 1.2.7 and then only if police attendance is not possible. In cases where strip-searches of visitors are necessary it is preferable that this is done by the police.'

Section 1.2.6:

- c 'A visitor who refuses to co-operate with the search procedures will be advised that the failure to comply will result in exclusion from the prison.'

Section 1.2.7:

- d 'If the duty governor sanctions a strip-search, the visitor should be taken to a room which is completely private and informed of the general nature of the suspected article.'

- d [19] After the conclusion of the oral argument our attention was drawn to two recent decisions. At our invitation the parties submitted further written submissions on those decisions.

THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT ISSUE

- e [20] It is convenient to take this issue first. It relates to the judge's finding that the Home Office was under a liability to Mrs Wainwright based on the infringement of her right to privacy, notwithstanding that she suffered no physical injury, but only distress and humiliation. The existence of such a right at common law has never been clearly established but the judge found that she was entitled to the protection of such a right, basing his conclusion in part on the judgment of Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967 that such a right could exist at common law and in part on the 1998 Act. However, as the judge recognised, in that case the acts complained of occurred after the 1998 Act had come into force on 2 October 2000, (Sedley LJ in his most instructive judgment was dealing with the question 'Is there today a right of privacy in English Law?' (see [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 316, [2001] QB 967 at 997 (para 109)), while here the matters of complaint occurred prior to that date.

- g [21] On this appeal Mr Wilby relies on the 1998 Act for a different purpose, namely to qualify the interpretation of r 86 so that it accords with art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act).

- h [22] There has been considerable uncertainty as to whether the 1998 Act can apply retrospectively in situations where the conduct complained of occurred before the Act came into force. The position was considered by the House of Lords in R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545. After the hearing of this appeal the decision was given by the House of Lords in R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69. In R v Kansal the actual decision in R v Lambert was subject to considerable criticism but because R v Lambert had only been recently decided and the decision only concerned a transitional situation the case of R v Lambert was not overruled.

j [23] Mr Wilby QC, on behalf of the claimants, concedes that R v Lambert made clear that convictions by courts before the 1998 Act had come into force cannot be impugned after the 1998 Act came into force on the grounds that the court acted in a way which would be incompatible with convention rights. He therefore accepts, for example, that the Court of Appeal could not on an appeal coming before it after 2 October 2000 differ from a decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal prior to the Act coming into force as to the construction of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, if the construction of the Employment Appeal Tribunal would have been regarded as correct before the 1998 Act came into force. Pearce v Governing Body of Mayfield Secondary School [2001] EWCA Civ 1347, [2001] IRLR 669 was cited in support of this concession. a

[24] However, Mr Wilby argues that this does not apply to s 3 of the 1998 Act. Section 3(1) provides:

‘(1) So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights. c

(2) This section applies to primary legislation and subordinate legislation whenever enacted ...’

[25] It is not necessary to refer to s 3(2) as Mr Wilby does not rely on s 3(2) to support his contention. He accepts the only relevance of that subsection is to make it clear that once s 3 is in force it applies to legislation prior to the 1998 Act coming into force. d

[26] Mr Wilby says looking at the language of s 3(1), it is clear from its unqualified wording that once the 1998 Act was in force the judge and this court are obliged to comply with s 3(1). Mr Wilby stresses that there has been no case in which there is a judgment which is inconsistent with his submissions that once the 1998 Act is in force a court is required to give effect to s 3(1) even though matters complained of (as here) took place before the Act came into force. He submits to do so does not involve giving retrospective effect to s 3 as long as the court, as here, is trying the case after the 1998 Act is in force. e

[27] R v Lambert and R v Kansal do not directly decide this point. They did not concern s 3. In those cases, unlike the position here, the decision under appeal was given before the 1998 Act came into force. In addition there was no appeal by a public authority as there is here by the Home Office. However the decision in both cases is consistent with the general presumption that legislation should not be treated as changing the substantive law in relation to events taking place prior to legislation coming into force. But the whole purpose of this part of the claimants’ argument is to rely on s 3 to assist in establishing a liability on the Home Office for causing humiliation and distress where without s 3 it would not exist. This is therefore an attempt by Mr Wilby to rely on s 3 to achieve an interpretation of r 86 which is then to be applied retrospectively to a situation when the 1998 Act was not in force. g

[28] Of course, legislation can expressly provide that it is to apply retrospectively and if it does so the legislation is retrospective in accordance with the terms of the legislation. This is the position with regard to s 22(4) of the 1998 Act. Section 22(4) provides: j

a [29] Section 22(4) has no application to s 3. However, this does not mean that s 22(4) is not relevant. On the contrary, it is highly significant since it demonstrates that when Parliament wanted the 1998 Act to operate retrospectively it says so.

[30] The speeches in R v Lambert as to the general approach to the 1998 Act commence with that of Lord Slynn ([2001] 3 All ER 577 at [6]):

b 'It is clear that the 1998 Act must be given its full import and that long or well entrenched ideas may have to be put aside, sacred cows culled. Since, however, the 1998 Act did not come into force (apart from limited provisions) until the Secretary of State had appointed a day or days for the Act or parts of it to come into force, and since there is a presumption against retrospectivity in legislation, it is not to be assumed a priori that convention rights, however commendable, are to be enforceable in national courts in respect of past events. The question is whether the 1998 Act has provided for rights to be enforceable in respect of such past events or more precisely whether a court reviewing the legality of a direction to a jury at a criminal trial given before the 1998 Act came into force, which was in accordance with the law at the time, has to be judged by the standards of the convention.'

[31] Lord Slynn was concerned to look at the reality of the situation, as I would suggest we must do here, in order to see whether we are being asked to apply the 1998 Act retrospectively. Lord Slynn's approach is indicated in this passage from his speech (at [12]):

e 'Moreover, even if there is a basis for the contention that the appellant's argument based on ss 7 and 22 do not involve retrospectivity, it seems to me that the obvious effect of s 6 as interpreted by the appellant is to impose on the House the current duty of quashing retrospectively a conviction which was good as the law stood at the time.'

f [32] The speech of Lord Hope is also relevant. Lord Hope says (at [115]):

'... there is nothing in the 1998 Act to indicate that that subsection is to be applied retrospectively to acts of courts or tribunals which took place before the coming into force of s 3(1).'

g [33] Furthermore Lord Hope cited what Sir Andrew Morritt V-C had said in Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74 and then goes on to say:

h 'I agree with Sir Andrew Morritt V-C that the answer to this argument is to be found in s 22(4). Parliament made its choice as to the extent to which the 1998 Act should have effect retrospectively. It did so by express enactment, and in my opinion no other reading of s 22(4) than that which I have indicated is possible.'

j [34] What had been said by Sir Andrew Morritt V-C is ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [20]):

'The effect of s 22(4) is not in doubt. It provides (by the second limb of the section) that, in general, s 7(1) does not apply to an act taking place before 2 October 2000. So, for example, a person who claims that a public authority has acted in a way which is incompatible with a convention right (contrary to s 6(1) of the 1998 Act) cannot bring proceedings against the authority under the 1998 Act (pursuant to s 7(1)(a)) if the unlawful act took place before 2 October 2000.’ a [35] Lord Clyde also dealt with the issue but his approach is neutral so far as the present issue is concerned. He said ([2001] 3 All ER 577 at [142]):

‘In my view s 3 only became obligatory on courts on 2 October 2000. The rule of construction which it expresses applies to all legislation whenever enacted.’ b

[36] However later (at [143]) Lord Clyde indicates his general approach when he adds:

‘In general Acts of Parliament should not be read as operating so as to affect things done prior to their coming into effect. I see no reason why that principle should not apply to the 1998 Act. If a departure from the usual course was intended I would expect that to have been clearly stated.’ c

[37] In R v Kansal Lord Hope again refers expressly to s 3 after referring to my judgment in R v Benjafield [2001] 2 All ER 609 at 625, [2001] 3 WLR 75 at 92. He states ([2002] 1 All ER 257 at [84]): ‘In my opinion however the usual presumption that statutes are not intended to be retrospective in effect applies to s 3(1).’ d

[38] And at the end of [84] he adds: ‘So I would not extend retrospectivity to s 3(1), in the absence of an express provision to that effect.’

[39] In their additional written submissions, counsel on behalf of Mrs Wainwright and Alan submit R v Lambert should be given a very narrow application and confined to its facts. However, the major part of the criticism of the decision in R v Lambert relates to the artificial distinction which was drawn between proceedings involving the trial and the appeal. This distinction has no relevance to the present appeal. The point is also made that not to apply the 1998 Act to what happened to the claimants, will only result in their having to take proceedings in the European Court of Human Rights so as to obtain an effective remedy. This contention would have more force if the claimants were not seeking to rely on the convention to change English substantive law. Where this is what is in issue it is by no means clear that the European Court will provide a remedy when our courts do not do so. e

[40] I would reject Mr Wilby’s argument that the 1998 Act can affect the outcome of this appeal. It certainly cannot be relied on to change substantive law by introducing a retrospective right to privacy which did not exist at common law. The convention, contrary to the conclusion of the judge, is only relevant here as background against which the appeal is to be decided. This undermines one of the foundations for the judge’s conclusions that the claimants were entitled to succeed on an extended form of trespass designed to protect the privacy of the individual. f

[41] The other prop on which the judge relied to find that there was an extended tort of trespass containing the ingredients to which I have referred, is the judgment of Wright J in Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1985–9] All ER Rep 267. The facts of Wilkinson v Downton are different from those here. The case involved a practical joke by the defendant. He falsely represented to the claimant, a married woman, that her husband had met with a serious accident in which his legs had been broken. The defendant made the statement with intent that it should be believed to be true. The plaintiff believed it to be true and in g a consequence suffered a violent nervous shock which rendered her ill. Why reliance is placed on this decision by the claimants is because at the time of the decision Victorian Railways Comrs v Coultas (1888) 13 App Cas 222, as was acknowledged, would have made it difficult, if not impossible, to recover damages for 'illness which was the effect of shock caused by fright'. Such injury was regarded as being too remote in an action for negligence.

b [42] Wright J decided for the claimant and in doing so set out as 'the real ground' of action as being that 'a person who makes a false statement intended to be acted on must make good the damage naturally resulting from it being acted on'. Of this he said ([1897] 2 QB 57 at 58–59, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 at 269):

c 'The defendant has, as I assume for the moment, wilfully done an act calculated to cause physical harm to the plaintiff—that is to say, to infringe her legal right to personal safety, and has in fact thereby caused physical harm to her. That proposition without more appears to me to state a good cause of action, there being no justification alleged for the act. This wilful injuria is in law malicious, although no malicious purpose to cause the harm

d which was caused nor any motive of spite is imputed to the defendant.'

[43] And later Wright J added ([1897] 2 QB 57 at 59, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 at 269):

e 'It remains to consider whether the assumptions involved in the proposition are made out. One question is whether the defendant's act was so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant, regard being had to the fact that the effect was produced on a person proved to be in an ordinary state of health and mind. I think that it was. It is difficult to

f imagine that such a statement, made suddenly and with apparent seriousness, could fail to produce grave effects under the circumstances upon any but an exceptionally indifferent person, and therefore an intention to produce such an effect must be imputed, and it is no answer in law to say that more harm was done than was anticipated, for that is commonly the case with all wrongs. The other question is whether the effect was, to use the g ordinary phrase, too remote to be in law regarded as a consequence for which the defendant is answerable.'

[44] To understand the approach of Wright J it is important to note the emphasis which Wright J places on the act being 'wilfully done'. For this to be

h the position, the act has to be either one which is done with the intention of causing harm or done in circumstances where it was so likely that the harm would be incurred that an intention to produce harm has to be imputed. Certainly nothing less than recklessness would do.

[45] Until the very recent decision of this court in Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 1721, [2003] 3 All ER 932, Wilkinson v Downton had not been considered extensively. Wright J's judgment was approved in Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056. In Janvier's case there was an actual intention to terrify the plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining an unlawful object in which both the defendants were jointly concerned. Wilkinson v Downton was more recently relied on in this court in Burnett v George [1993] 1 FCR 1012. However, that was a case involving the jurisdiction to grant an injunction and is not of any real assistance in determining the ambit or the validity of the principle enunciated by Wright J. a

[46] Our attention was drawn by Mr Wilby to Mullany and Handford Tort Liability for Psychiatric Damage (1993). In ch 14 of that book Wilkinson v Downton is considered in some detail. It points out that Wilkinson v Downton has been followed in a number of Commonwealth jurisdictions and in the United States. In that jurisdiction the approach is confined by the need for the conduct to be 'extreme and outrageous conduct' (see p 299). The editors consider that the argument for the Wilkinson v Downton action, being distinct from the tort of negligence, is that cases based on this principle do involve the intentional or reckless causing of shock 'in that the defendant intends to cause or is reckless as to, the immediate consequences—fright or horror—and that the physical harm which results can be regarded as intended or likely, rather than as merely foreseeable' (see p 290). b c

[47] In Wong's case the judgment of the court was given by Hale LJ. She considered the 'tort' created by Wilkinson v Downton. She did not doubt that there was a tort commonly labelled 'intentional infliction of harm'. She rejected the suggestion that the tort would be committed if there was deliberate conduct which 'foreseeably [led] to alarm or distress falling short of the recognised psychiatric illness which is now considered the equivalent of physical harm, provided that such harm is actually suffered' ([2003] 3 All ER 932 at [11]). She added (at [12]): d

'For the tort to be committed, as with any other action on the case, there has to be actual damage. The damage is physical harm or recognised psychiatric illness. The defendant must have intended to violate the claimant's interest in his freedom from such harm. The conduct complained of has to be such that that degree of harm is sufficiently likely to result that the defendant cannot be heard to say that he did not "mean" it to do so. He is taken to have meant it to do so by the combination of the likelihood of such harm being suffered as the result of his behaviour and his deliberately engaging in that behaviour.' e f

[48] I happily adopt this definition of the 'tort' though I am not sure I would regard it as an action on the case but this is only of historic interest. I accept that an actual recognised psychiatric illness or bodily injury is required in order for damages to be recovered. g

[49] The limiting factor to the 'tort' is the intention to cause harm which harm is in fact then caused or recklessness as to whether that harm would be caused. While the tort is not conventional trespass it is closer to trespass than negligence. I personally have no difficulty with the statement in Salmond and Heuston on Torts (21st edn, 1996) p 215 that 'one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is liable for such emotional distress, provided that bodily harm resulted from it'. This passage accepts that emotional distress by itself does not suffice. It requires bodily harm to have resulted. It presumably is intended to recognise that emotional distress although severe may not be classifiable by psychiatrists as a psychiatric illness. It therefore requires, in lay terms, that the severe emotional distress has caused bodily harm. It also requires that this is what the defendant intended to be the consequence or was reckless as to whether this would be the consequence. h j

- a [50] Both as a matter of principle and authority I regard it appropriate that there should be a right to compensation in these circumstances. We are here concerned with an intentional tort and intended harm. In such a situation, unlike negligence, problems as to foreseeability do not arise. If the conduct is actionable then compensation should be payable for the intended harm. For this general approach there is general support in Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (15th edn, 1998) pp.86–87.
- b [51] In this jurisdiction I consider that Wilkinson v Downton should be so limited. This provides the proper justification for distinguishing the cause of action from negligence. On that basis I would not seek to doubt the correctness of the decision in Wilkinson v Downton. However, so understood Wilkinson v Downton cannot be relied upon by the claimants in the present case. The judge
- c made no finding that the prison officers were intending to cause or were reckless as to whether they caused harm. Furthermore the findings which he did make were inconsistent with such a conclusion. Had the facts been otherwise and harm had been intended or if there had been recklessness then I would have upheld the decision of the judge. I would have concluded that on the judge's
- d findings the complainants had suffered the necessary damage.

JUSTIFICATION

- [52] Mr Tam, on behalf of the Home Office, argued that because of the width of r 86, in any event what the prison officers did was justified. Mr Tam argued that because of the language of r 86, the Home Office was not bound by
- e either what appears on the consent form or what is stated in the policy strategy document which applies specifically to HM Prison Leeds. This cannot be the position. If there are clearly laid down restrictions on how a particular activity is to be conducted, then the conduct of the prison officers cannot be excused merely because those restrictions may not have been observed. The conduct may not be
- f actionable but as we will see the rule cannot justify their conduct if it were otherwise actionable. I would therefore reject this part of the argument on behalf of the Home Office if it had been necessary to do so.

CONSENT

- [53] Mr Tam also argued the judge was wrong to conclude there had been
- g no real consent here. Again I disagree but do so on the grounds that the consent which was given was on the basis that the search would be conducted in accordance with proper practice. It was not and so the consent does not provide the Home Office with a defence.

PROPORTIONALITY

- h [54] As the 1998 Act was not in force, the judge should not have become involved in issues as to proportionality. However, as he expressed the view that to conduct the search in the circumstances which were then existent at the prison was disproportionate, I should make it clear that we would not agree with that view. Each case, of course, depends on its facts but when one has the sort of
- j problem with which the prison service is faced in relation to drugs, clearly it is not sufficient to search the prisoner. There are numerous ways in which drugs can be smuggled into the prison and the most vigorous regime of searching prisoners will not in itself suffice. On the findings of the judge, searching, if it had been properly conducted, was perfectly appropriate. The visitor who is treated in accordance with the instructions laid down was reasonably given the choice of having a visit and submitting to being searched or not being searched.

[55] It follows that the appeal has to be allowed except for the finding of battery which was not subject to appeal. This has the effect that Mrs Wainwright's claim is dismissed and Alan's claim for damages has to be reduced. Unfortunately the parties were unable to agree what should be the proper measure of damages. We are not in a position to do more than give the most limited consideration to this subject and without the figure which we have determined being regarded as any precedent for other cases, I would reduce the damages that Alan receives to £3,750 including £1,000 aggravated damages. a

MUMMERY LJ.

[56] I agree that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by Lord Woolf CJ and Buxton LJ. I shall confine my brief additional comments to the issue of invasion of privacy at common law and in equity and to the applicability of s 3(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998. c

(1) INVASION OF PRIVACY AT COMMON LAW AND IN EQUITY

[57] This claim fails, as there is no tort of invasion of privacy. Instead there are torts protecting a person's interests in the privacy of his body, his home, and his personal property. There is also available the equitable doctrine of breach of confidence for the protection of personal information, private communications and correspondence. d

[58] The common law position remains as stated in the Justice Report on Privacy and the Law (1970) para 30: '... it is generally recognised that at the present time there is no existing common law remedy for invasion of privacy as such.' e

[59] According to a more recent statement of the legal position in Clayton and Tomlinson The Law of Human Rights (2000) para 12.06: 'It is well established that English law does not recognise a right of privacy as such.' f

[60] As to the future I foresee serious definitional difficulties and conceptual problems in the judicial development of a 'blockbuster' tort vaguely embracing such a potentially wide range of situations. I am not even sure that anybody—the public, Parliament, the press—really wants the creation of a new tort, which could give rise to as many problems as it is sought to solve. A more promising and well trod path is that of incremental evolution, both at common law and by statute (eg s 3 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997), of traditional nominate torts pragmatically crafted as to conditions of liability, specific defences and appropriate remedies, and tailored to suit significantly different privacy interests and infringement situations. g

[61] With the benefit of the recent decisions of the House of Lords (R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545 and R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69) and of this court (Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74 and Pearce v Governing Body of Mayfield Secondary School [2001] EWCA Civ 1347, [2001] IRLR 669), I am now convinced that I was wrong in the remarks made by me obiter in JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham [2001] EWCA Civ 117 at [59], [2001] 2 WLR 1293 at [59] on the applicability of the principle of interpretation in s 3(1) to causes of action arising before the section came into effect. Section 3(1) does not apply retrospectively to the cause of action in this case which arose in 1997. j

- a It cannot therefore assist on the construction of r 86 of the Prison Rules 1964, SI 1964/388.

BUXTON LJ.

INTRODUCTION

- b [62] I gratefully adopt the account set out by Lord Woolf CJ of the facts of this worrying and difficult case. If the deplorable treatment meted out to Mrs Wainwright and her son had occurred not in January 1997 but in August 1997, after the coming into effect of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, they would have had a strong case, subject to as yet unresolved difficulties about the definition of 'course of conduct', for relief under s 3 thereof. If the events had occurred in October 2000, they would equally have had a strong case for relief under s 7 of the Human Rights Act 1998, by reason of a public authority's lack of regard for art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). Whether, in either case, that would have led to recovery in respect of the damage claimed is another matter, to which I will in due course have to return.
- d But the issue in this case is whether, before those two alterations in the law, English law provided any private law relief at all in respect of conduct of the type with which we are concerned.

- e [63] I have reached the clear conclusion that the judge, in a difficult and unusual case, was in error in finding that the conduct complained of fell within a tort recognised by English law, subject only to the potential defences of consent and justification. It will first be necessary to examine in some detail the basis on which the judge felt able to proceed, and then set out what in my judgement is the true state of the law, and how that law should be applied to the facts of the present case.

- f AN ANALYSIS OF THE JUDGE'S REASONING

- g [64] In the hope of better explaining some parts of this judgment that follows, I feel constrained to set out the relevant parts of the judge's reasoning verbatim. The judge found that Alan Wainwright had been stripped naked and Mrs Wainwright virtually so, dealt with the additional allegation of battery in relation to Alan Wainwright, and then continued:

- h '70. It is clear that the original tort of trespass to the person, namely battery, has been extended in a number of ways beyond its original scope of protecting the interest of the victim in freedom from bodily harm. In the form of trespass to the person known as assault the interest of the victim which is protected is the victim's interest in freedom from a particular form of anxiety, namely the apprehension of bodily harm. The form of trespass to the person involve in false imprisonment protects the interest in freedom from confinement or freedom of movement. The tort of trespass to the person protects, therefore, a wider range of interests than protection from bodily harm.

- j 71. Another element in the law of torts generally and trespass to the person in particular is the conduct of the defendant. Again the original tort focused on some physical act of the defendant, namely touching the plaintiff or doing something which causes the plaintiff to apprehend physical contact. In Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1985-9] All ER Rep 267 and the subsequent Court of Appeal decision in Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316,

[1918–19] All ER Rep 1056 the courts extended the types of conduct which could constitute the tort of trespass to the person to include words intentionally uttered which caused physical harm. In Burnett v George [1993] 1 FCR 1012 the principle derived from these two cases, namely that there is a good cause of action if A wilfully does something calculated to cause harm to B, namely infringing B's right to personal safety, and does in fact cause physical harm to B, was extended to a case of harassment. The conduct involved in trespass to the person includes conduct which involves no bodily contact with the victim but nevertheless has an effect on the victim by infringing some interest of the victim which the law protects. a

72. In this case the essence of the complaint is that the prison officers caused Mrs Wainwright and her son to take their clothes off and thereby suffer distress and humiliation in the case of both claimants and damage to health in the case of Alan Wainwright. The law of torts already recognises causes of action where the defendant induces the claimant to act to the claimant's detriment. Misrepresentation is one example and intimidation another. It does not, therefore, seem to me to be a significant extension of the principle in Wilkinson v Downton to hold that if A wilfully causes B to do something which is calculated to cause harm to B, namely infringe B's legal right to personal safety, and does in fact cause physical harm to B, that constitutes a valid cause of action unless it can be justified in some way. I would hold, therefore, that if the prison officers caused Alan Wainwright to take his clothes off and that was calculated to cause a physical harm, namely illness, to Alan Wainwright there is a valid cause of action in trespass to the person unless their conduct can be justified ... c

74. The same principle would apply to Mrs Wainwright but in her case the strip-search did not cause any physical illness. This raises the question whether this particular form of trespass to the person should be limited to protecting the victim's right to personal safety or whether it should be extended to other rights, including in particular the right of privacy. In the case of assault the law of trespass protects the victim's interest in being protected from mental distress caused by the apprehension of physical harm. Other forms of trespass to the person protect a victim's interest in freedom of movement or even freedom from harm caused by verbal practical jokes in bad taste. It seems difficult to justify a situation in which the same act (inducing someone to take their clothes off) gives the victim a cause of action if the victim succumbs to some form of illness but denies a remedy to a more robust victim who merely suffers distress and humiliation. f

75. In Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967 the Court of Appeal discharged an injunction granted against Hello! Magazine from publishing unauthorized photographs of a wedding. Another magazine had the exclusive rights to photograph the wedding. Sedley LJ said that a point had been reached where it could be said with confidence that the law recognised and would appropriately protect a right of personal privacy for two reasons. The first reason was that there was a powerfully arguable case that the bride and groom had a right of privacy which English Law would recognise and, where appropriate, protect. The second reason was that the Human Rights Act 1998 required courts to give appropriate effect to the right of respect for private and family life set out in art 8 of the convention. Keene LJ said that it seemed unlikely that Kaye's case, which held that that there was no actionable right of privacy in English Law, would be decided h a the same way on that aspect today. These dicta show how the attitude of the courts to invasions of someone's privacy have developed in recent years. There seems to me to be no valid objection to extending the tort of trespass to the person to protect an interest in privacy ...

b 77. ... [Counsel for the claimants] pointed out that in Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 696 the House of Lords had held in 1991 that any provision in domestic legislation which was capable of a meaning which either conformed to or conflicted with the convention would be construed in conformity with the convention on the basis that Parliament was to be presumed to have intended to legislate in accordance with the convention. On analogous reasoning it appears to me that it was right to apply and, so far as appropriate, extend the common law so that it is also in conformity with the convention even before the passing of the 1998 Act. Sections 2 and 3 of that Act strengthen the force of that reasoning.

c 78. I conclude therefore that the tort of trespass of the person extends to situations where A causes B to do something to himself which infringes B's right of privacy. The defendant is liable to Mrs Wainwright and Alan Wainwright unless the defendant can set up a valid defence. The two defences put forward are those of consent and legal justification.

d [65] This reasoning contains the following elements. (i) The tort of trespass to the person extends to interests other than protection from bodily harm. (ii) One example of such extension is to 'words intentionally uttered which caused physical harm', as in Wilkinson v Downton (para 71). (iii) However, 'physical harm' in that formulation means illness, which was proved in the case of Alan Wainwright but not in the case of Mrs Wainwright. Alan Wainwright could therefore recover under this head of tort, but Mrs Wainwright could not (para 72). (iv) English law however recognises a tort of breach of privacy, independent of any change introduced by the 1998 Act, and therefore applicable to events occurring in January 1997. That tort, described as an aspect of trespass to the person, had been committed in relation to Mrs Wainwright, and also, in addition to the Wilkinson v Downton tort, in relation to Alan Wainwright (para 78).

g THE INAPPROPRIATENESS OF TRESPASS

[66] Whatever torts the Wainwrights may be able to complain of, none of them are, or are properly derivatives of, the tort of trespass to the person, and only confusion was caused by the attempt to force what occurred in this case into that straitjacket. That objection is not merely an obsolete recourse to the forms of action, nor a reflection of a mediaeval distinction between trespass and case. As I shall demonstrate, it reflects fundamental principles by which modern English law, rightly or wrongly, limits the ambit of tortious liability.

h [67] Leaving aside false imprisonment, which is sometimes, though not very happily, categorised as a trespass to the person, trespass in this sense consists of battery and of assault. Battery is physical interference with the person of the plaintiff. That will normally consist of direct touching of the person, but has also been extended to acts directly likely to cause such interference, such as hitting the plaintiff's horse, causing him to fall off; and more controversially, in the criminal understanding of battery, to the creating of a dangerous situation from which physical interference naturally results, such as putting sulphuric acid into a hot air dryer that when used by others blew out and caused them injury (DPP v K (a minor) [1990] 1 WLR 1067); or locking the doors of a theatre and then causing a panic, with injury occurring to persons in the resulting crush (R v Martin (1881) 8 QBD 54, [1881–5] All ER Rep 699). The unifying factor in all these cases is an invasion of the physical person of the plaintiff. a

[68] An assault has long been defined as an overt action, by word or by deed, indicating an immediate intention to commit a battery and with the capacity to carry the threat into action: see Clerk and Lindsell on Torts (18th edn, 2000) para 13-13; or, as it is sometimes expressed, to put the plaintiff in fear of an immediate assault. This tort is therefore parasitic upon, and protects the interests protected by, battery. b

[69] The importance that the law attaches to protecting citizens from direct physical interference with their persons is demonstrated by two particular features of the tort of battery, both of which sharply distinguish it from the tort of negligence. The first, expounded in further detail in the judgment of this court in Wilson v Pringle [1986] 2 All ER 440, [1987] QB 237, is that any intended 'hostile' touching founds an action for battery, even if there is no intention thereby to cause injury or actual physical harm. The second is that battery is actionable per se. That in turn implies two things: first, damages are recoverable for the act of interference itself, even if it causes no injury and no loss; but, secondly, if damage is caused by a trespass it is recoverable simply on the basis of causation, and does not additionally require foreseeability to be established. c

[70] These rules show the basis of the tort of trespass, in the protection of interference with the person of the plaintiff by direct contact with him. Once the defendant causes such contact, without justification, he is not only liable for damages even if no quantifiable loss results; but also liable for any loss that is in fact caused by the interference. These rules are strikingly different from those obtaining in negligence. Liability in negligence is limited to the type of damage that the defendant should have foreseen as liable to result from his acts: authority is hardly needed for that proposition, but I would venture to refer to the recent exposition by Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough, speaking with the agreement of a majority of the House, in Platform Home Loans Ltd v Oyston Shipways Ltd [1999] 1 All ER 833 at 847, [2000] 2 AC 190 at 209. e

[71] There are therefore powerful reasons why a claimant will be well advised to seek to categorise his claim as sounding in trespass. Once he has passed through that door, he not only is able to recover for unforeseeable damage, but also is relieved of the issues of duty of care and of fairness, justice and reasonableness that are applied to limit recovery in negligence. And on the other side of the coin there are strong policy reasons why the tort of trespass to the person should be limited to its proper sphere. It was these considerations that Lord Denning MR had in mind when he said in Letang v Cooper [1964] 2 All ER 929 at 932, [1965] 1 QB 232 at 239 that an unintentional but negligent battery must be pleaded in negligence and not in trespass. g

[72] But our case goes further than that. It is not a case of direct interference, battery, at all, but of causing the claimants to do something to themselves that led to humiliation and illness. Nor was the case argued to be a case of trespass, nor was it seen as such by the judge. Rather it was presented as an extension of the tort of trespass into the areas covered by Wilkinson v Downton and privacy. Such an extension of trespass is unsupported by authority, entirely unprincipled, and if adopted would severely undermine the policy reasons for limiting the ambit of trespass that are referred to above. i

- a [73] It does not, however, follow from that that the appeal must necessarily succeed. It is possible to read the judgment as a decision that the Home Office is liable on the basis of separate and independent torts, outside the law of trespass, of Wilkinson v Downton in the case of Alan Wainwright, and of breach of privacy in respect of both of the Wainwrights. If, as the judge thought, the requirements b of those torts were in fact fulfilled, I would not permit the argument to fail just because of the inappropriate pleading in terms of trespass. I therefore turn to those torts.

WILKINSON V DOWNTON

[74] In Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57 at 58–59, [1985–9] All ER Rep 267
at 269 Wright J said:

- c 'The defendant has, as I assume for the moment, wilfully done an act calculated to cause physical harm to the plaintiff—that is to say, to infringe her legal right to personal safety, and has in fact thereby caused physical harm to her. That proposition without more appears to me to state a good d cause of action, there being no justification alleged for the act. This wilful injury is in law malicious, although no malicious purpose to cause the harm which was caused nor any motive of spite is imputed to the defendant ...
One question is whether the defendant's act was so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant, regard being had to the fact e that the effect was produced on a person proved to be in an ordinary state of health and mind.'

- [75] The greatest respect is always paid to anything that fell from Wright J:
see for instance Goddard LJ in Peters v Prince of Wales Theatre (Birmingham) Ltd [1942] 2 All ER 533 at 537–538, [1943] KB 73 at 77. However, one cannot escape f from the observation that Wilkinson v Downton has puzzled generations of tort lawyers. No little part of the difficulty has sprung from a tendency to quote Wright J's reference to acts 'calculated to cause physical harm' divorced from the rest of his formulation of the cause of action: as indeed the judge did in our case, in para 72 of his judgment. That is particularly unfortunate, because the word g 'calculated' is ambiguous between acts subjectively intended to cause harm and acts objectively very likely to cause harm. And Wright J's extension of 'physical harm' into infringement of the 'legal right to personal safety' carries difficulties of its own, since it again is ambiguous between the actuality of physical harm and a threat of such harm.

- [76] Wright J provided further explanation by his later reference, in a passage h much less often quoted, to an 'act so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant'. That, however, raises further difficulties, since although using the concept of intention it stops short of requiring actual intention, and rather speaks of 'imputed' intention, in terms that would nowadays be analysed as j referring to gross (objective) negligence.

[77] This court took up the matter in Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316. Much of the judgments is addressed to the question in issue in that case of whether it was possible to recover at all for 'nervous shock'. That had been doubted in the Privy Council case of Victorian Railways Comrs v Coultas (1888) 13 App Cas 222, but the Court of Appeal recognised that if they were to accept that argument they would have to differ from Wilkinson v Downton, which they declined to do. The judgments are, however, less clear as to the acts and intentions leading to the nervous shock that are sufficient to found the tort. While not differing from, indeed adopting, the formulation of Wright J, both Bankes LJ and Duke LJ laid stress on the fact that the plaintiff in Janvier v Sweeney had put the plaintiff in a state of terror, Duke LJ saying in terms that the defendant had intended to produce that condition.

[78] The learned editor of the Law Reports report of Janvier v Sweeney synthesised the effect of the judgments thus:

‘False words and threats calculated to cause, uttered with the knowledge that they are likely to cause, and actually causing physical injury to the person to whom they are uttered are actionable.’

This statement is important, because in Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669 at 676, [1993] QB 727 at 735 the majority in this court accepted it as a correct expression of the doctrine of Wilkinson v Downton and Janvier v Sweeney; and would have granted quia timet relief against such words that could be expected, if continued, to result in a recognisable psychiatric illness: which is how the majority ([1993] 3 All ER 669 at 676–677, [1993] QB 727 at 735 at 736) considered that ‘nervous shock’ should now be understood. These observations were obiter, in view of the majority’s placing of liability on the basis of private nuisance; but they were fully considered and, because of their obiter nature have, as Mr Wilby QC urged upon us, escaped the condemnation by the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd, Hunter v London Docklands Development Corp [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655 of the nuisance aspects of Khorasandjian’s case.

[79] I respectfully consider that the headnote in Janvier v Sweeney, adopted in Khorasandjian’s case, comes as close as it is possible to do to a general statement of the rule in Wilkinson v Downton. If that is not correct, then the rule must be limited to the statement in the latter part of Wright J’s observations cited in [13], above, that the defendant’s act was so clearly likely to produce a result of the kind that occurred that an intention to produce it should be imputed to him: that is to say, objective recklessness. I do not find helpful in this connection the only other Court of Appeal case shown to us, Burnett v George [1993] 1 FCR 1012, since there the court simply read the ‘calculated’ formula of Wilkinson v Downton into the form of an injunction, without further investigating the implications of that language.

[80] It follows that I cannot agree with the formulation adopted in Salmond and Heuston on Torts (21st edn, 1996) p 215 from the American Law Institute Restatement of the Law, Torts 2d (1965) para 46 that—

‘one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is liable for such emotional distress, provided that bodily harm results from it.’

No doubt the outrageous nature of the defendant’s conduct was not far from the minds of the judges in Wilkinson v Downton and, in particular, Janvier v Sweeney. However, moral condemnation is not enough. What is required by the Khorasandjian formulation is knowledge that the words are likely to cause, that is to say subjective recklessness as to the causation of, physical injury in the sense of recognisable psychiatric illness. Intention or recklessness merely as to severe emotional distress, from which bodily harm happens in fact to result, is not enough.

a [81] It also follows that, with equal respect, I am unable to adopt as a complete statement of the law the observation in Clerk and Lindsell on Torts (para 13-17) that—

‘It would appear that any act deliberately designed to “infringe [the] legal right to personal safety”, albeit falling outside the torts of assault and battery, will now readily be classified as tortious.’

b The authority cited for this proposition is Burris v Azadani [1995] 4 All ER 802, [1995] 1 WLR 1372. Since that case largely relied on that part of Khorasandjian that was disapproved in the Canary Wharf case; and in any event was an injunction case in which this court was of the view that conduct could be enjoined even if it was not in itself tortious; its authority in the present context
c must be open to question. And while it is correct that Clerk and Lindsell’s formulation does quote the ipsissima verba of Wright J, it leaves unresolved the uncertainties as to the ambit of the ‘right to personal safety’ to which I have ventured to draw attention in [75]–[76], above.

d [82] After the close of argument in the present appeal, and after the substance of the foregoing paragraphs of this judgment had been drafted, there came to our attention the judgment of this court in Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 1721, [2003] 3 All ER 932, in which another division of this court was, like ourselves, called upon to consider the correct ambit of Wilkinson v Downton.

e [83] This court said in Wong’s case (at [12])—

‘The damage is physical harm or recognised psychiatric illness. The f defendant must have intended to violate the claimant’s interest in his freedom from such harm. The conduct complained of has to be such that that degree of harm is sufficiently likely to result that the defendant cannot be heard to say that he did not “mean” it to do so. He is taken to have meant it to do so by the combination of the likelihood of such harm being suffered as the result of his behaviour and his deliberately engaging in that behaviour’

g and then referred in support of that formulation to the observations of Dillon LJ in Khorasandjian’s case [1993] 3 All ER 669 at 676, [1993] QB 727 at 735. The court accordingly saw as equivalent in their effect the two formulations between which a distinction was drawn in the first two sentences of [79], above.

[84] The decision in Wong’s case, to the extent to which it differs from the analysis earlier in this judgment, binds us as an earlier decision of this court. However, in the present case it does not matter which of these various detailed formulations is adopted, because it is plain that the claimants can bring
h themselves within none of them. Because the case proceeded on the basis of the formulaic expression of ‘calculated to cause physical harm’, without further examination of what that meant, the judge was not asked to make, and did not make, any finding as to actual intention to cause, or imputed intention to cause, or recklessness, either objective or subjective, as to physical injury, recognisable
j psychiatric illness, or even severe emotional distress. Mr Wilby gallantly sought to argue that some such findings could be extracted from the last two sentences of para 72 of the judgment, but with respect to him all that the judge did there was to recite in abstract terms what he considered the law to be, rather than analyse the facts of the case in the light of that law.

[85] A claim based on Wilkinson v Downton must therefore fail. I should however perhaps make it clear that, although the claim fails because of the absence of findings necessary to support it, I do not regard that as a merely technical or formalistic objection. Had the judge been asked to make any of the findings referred to in [84], above it seems to me that he would have found it difficult or impossible to do so: however much the prison officers ought to have realised, and perhaps did realise, that what they asked the Wainwrights to do would and did cause them offence and distress. a

[86] It is therefore necessary to turn to the alternative basis on which the judge decided the case in favour of Alan Wainwright, and the only basis on which, because the search did not cause her physical illness, he decided the case in favour of Mrs Wainwright: the tort of invasion of privacy. b

PRIVACY: INTRODUCTION

[87] The present case is important, not only because it appears to be the first case in which recovery has been achieved simply for a breach of the right to privacy; but also because, as Brooke LJ pointed out in the important case of Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 307–308, [2001] QB 967 at 988 (para 71), previous investigations of this area have all been in cases where, in one way or another, confidence can be said to have been broken. That was of course the case in Douglas's case itself. The difficulty arises, as Brooke LJ foresaw, in a case where privacy alone is in issue; and that is this case, since whatever else the Wainwrights may be able to complain of, they cannot and do not say that any right of confidence has been infringed. c

[88] It will therefore be necessary to examine whether there was in 1997 a tort of breach of privacy, and if so what was its ambit. That will require attention both to authority and, since this is an area in which it has been suggested that the judges should take the initiative in extending the law; also to some issues of policy. First, however, it is necessary to dispose of a series of issues that relate to the convention. e

PRIVACY: THE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS f

[89] First, since the events complained of took place in 1997, the tort of privacy that is relied on, if it exists, must have an existence independent of the 1998 Act. I respectfully agree with what is said by Lord Woolf CJ at [39]–[40], above: g

‘the claimants [are] seeking to rely on the convention to change English substantive law ... [the 1998 Act] certainly cannot be relied on to change substantive law by introducing a retrospective right to privacy which did not exist at common law.’

[90] Second, that implies that the tort must indeed be a tort, that is, sounding in damages in private law, and available against any kind of defendant: however much in the present case the complaint is about the conduct of a public authority in the performance of its public functions. h

[91] Third, however, is the judge's reasoning in para 77 of his judgment that, by analogy with the approach to legislative construction that was adopted in Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 696, the common law should be read as being ‘in conformity with the convention’ even before the passing of the 1998 Act. While courts before the 1998 Act were alert to the importance of the United Kingdom's treaty obligations, there was never any suggestion of an approach as broad as that of the judge, and positive authority against it, specifically in the context of privacy, in the judgment of Megarry V-C j

- a in Malone v Comr of Police of the Metropolis (No 2) [1979] 2 All ER 620, [1979] Ch 344. And that is quite apart from the more general principle, enunciated for instance by Lord Templeman, speaking for a majority of the House, in Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry, Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v International Tin Council [1989] 3 All ER 523 at 526–527, sub nom Rayner (JH) (Mincing Lane) Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry [1990] 2 AC 418 at 476–477, that international treaties, such as was the status of the convention in England before 2 October 2000, cannot confer rights enforceable in English courts. Indeed, if the judge were right, it would be difficult to understand why Parliament thought it necessary to pass the 1998 Act at all.
- b

- [92] And further, quite apart from that fundamental difficulty, the judge's approach does not face up to the fact that the convention by its terms creates obligations only against the state, and not against other private individuals. That point was plainly in the mind of Megarry V-C in Malone's case [1979] 2 All ER 620 at 648, [1979] Ch 344 at 379:
- c

- 'It seems to me that where Parliament has abstained from legislating on a point that is plainly suitable for legislation, it is indeed difficult for the court to lay down new rules of common law or equity that will carry out the Crown's treaty obligations, or to discover for the first time that such rules have always existed.'
- d

- Some have argued that, with the advent of the 1998 Act, it is possible to use the recognition of the courts as 'public authorities' by s 6(3)(a) thereof to create private law rights broadly in the same verbal terms as the wording of the articles of the convention. There are many difficulties about that contention: I readily adopt the observation of Sedley LJ in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 320, [2001] QB 967 at 1001 (para 128) that this also is not the place, at least without much fuller argument, in which to resolve such a large question. But the present importance of that issue is that it is seen to be the terms of the 1998 Act, and not, as the judge thought, the direct application of the terms of the convention, that render it even arguable that the convention creates new torts in English private law.
- e
- f

- [93] Fourth, it may be convenient to say that, if the events in question had occurred after 2 October 2000, they would in my view have grounded a right to relief for the Wainwrights under s 7(1)(a) of the 1998 Act, by reason of the prison authorities' breach of art 8 of the convention. That does not, however, engage a private law right in tort, such as the Wainwrights must establish in relation to events occurring before 2 October 2000, because s 7(1)(a) makes the defendants liable on the basis of, and only on the basis of, their status as public authorities. I would consider that the right to privacy in art 8(1) had been infringed, and that that breach could not be offset under art 8(2). That would not be because, as the judge seems to have thought, at paras 107–108 of his judgment, that something like a 'blanket' policy of searching visitors to suspected drug dealers was not justified: in the context of the threat of drug abuse in prisons that policy was well within the reasonable, and if it is relevant the proportionate, actions of the prison authorities. Rather, the failure was in the manner in which this particular search was conducted, a matter to which I return when considering the defence of consent.
- g
- h
- j

[94] It does not, however, follow from that that the Wainwrights could recover in respect of the injuries on which their present claim is based, as opposed to recovering some amount, perhaps not dissimilar to the aggravated damages awarded in this case, to mark the unlawful invasion of their privacy. That is because it is wholly unclear what are the rules of remoteness attaching to a claim under s 7; whether breaches of the convention by public authorities are actionable per se; and if they are, what heads of damage and amounts of damages are recoverable. I mention these matters because they are difficulties that equally attach to the private law tort of breach of privacy that is asserted in this case.

[95] I have ventured to address these matters in some detail because, when considering the implications for private law torts of a case such as Douglas's case that was decided after 2 October 2000, it is necessary to be clear as to what springs from the effect of the 1998 Act, and what from the application of the common law as it stood before that date. To the latter question I now turn.

PRIVACY: AUTHORITY

[96] Mr Wilby relied very heavily upon an observation of Sedley LJ in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 320, [2001] QB 967 at 1001 (para 126). This observation was obiter, since the court was satisfied that recovery was available in respect of breach of confidence, in which circumstances it is unnecessary to go on to the wider category of acts argued to ground liability for breach of privacy. Nevertheless, the passage indubitably demands the closest attention. Sedley LJ said:

'What a concept of privacy does, however, is accord recognition to the fact that the law has to protect not only those people whose trust has been abused but those who simply find themselves subjected to an unwanted intrusion into their personal lives. The law no longer needs to construct an artificial relationship of confidentiality between intruder and victim: it can recognise privacy itself as a legal principle drawn from the fundamental value of personal autonomy.'

It will be noted that this formulation of the basis of recovery is distinctly different from that adopted by the judge, and discussed in [91]–[92], above. Sedley LJ saw the tort as one existing in English private law, independently of the convention. True it is that he referred to the 1998 Act as 'arguably [giving] the final impetus to the recognition of a right of privacy in English law' (see [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 317, [2001] QB 967 at 998 (para 111)): which may of course raise some questions about the status of the tort in 1997. But in truth the process is seen as one of judicial development of the common law, with the convention serving as, at most, a catalyst for that development.

[97] This is at first sight an attractive prospect and, if I may very respectfully say so, it could not have been put more attractively than it was by my brother in Douglas's case. However, authority in this court precludes our taking that course; and in addition there are serious difficulties of principle in the way of the judges creating a tort in the terms now suggested.

[98] With one exception, all of the previous cases that are seen as providing the germ of a tort of breach of privacy were decided on the basis of breach of confidence. That is clear from the exposition by Brooke LJ in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 305–308, [2001] QB 967 at 985–988 (paras 64–71), as indeed from the exposition of Sedley LJ ([2001] 2 All ER 289 at 317–319, [2001] QB 967 at 998–1000 (paras 116–122)). And that is true even of the well known observation of Laws LJ in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 4 All ER 473 at 476, a [1995] 1 WLR 804 at 807, which was strongly relied on by Sedley LJ in Douglas's case:

b 'If someone with a telephoto lens were to take from a distance and with no authority a picture of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure of the picture would ... as surely amount to a breach of confidence as if he had found or stolen a letter or diary in which the act was recounted and proceeded to publish it ...'

c [99] These cases therefore do nothing to assist the crucial move now urged, that the courts in giving relief should step outside the limits imposed by a requirement of a relationship of confidence, artificial or otherwise. This court was called on to consider making that move in Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62. It declined to do so.

d [100] The conduct of the defendants in that case, in breaking into the plaintiff's hospital ward, taking a photograph of him in a distressed state, and then seeking to publish it in their newspaper, was, in the words of Bingham LJ (at 70) a monstrous invasion of his privacy. Glidewell LJ said however that there was no right of action in English law for breach of a person's privacy, and both Bingham LJ and Leggatt LJ expressed, in extremely strong terms, their profound regret that English law provided no remedy on that basis. In Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 317, [2001] QB 967 at 998 (para 113) Sedley LJ argued that Kaye did not in fact decide that point, since the court 'adopted—for it plainly shared—counsel's assumption that there was [no tort of breach of privacy]'. However, first, if a court not only adopts but says that it actively shares a concession or assumption by counsel, that assumption then becomes part of its reasoning, whatever may have been the origin of the point. And, second, even if, on a very narrow view of ratio, it is possible to say that the court's observations about privacy were obiter, the language of Bingham and Leggatt LJJ shows, in what Brooke LJ characterised in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 304–305, [2001] QB 967 at 984 (para 61) as uncompromising terms, that they had directed their minds to the possibility of relief for breach of privacy, and had rejected that possibility. Even if, which I doubt, it is in technical terms open to us to do so, it would be a very strong thing indeed for a subsequent division of this court to say that they were wrong.

g [101] Kaye's case was consistent with the only other clear authority in this field, the judgment of Megarry V-C in Malone's case. The issue that Kaye's case addressed was reverted to again in Khorasandjian's case. Counsel argued in that case that the defendant's behaviour was an actionable interference with privacy. h That, if correct, would have provided the court with a ready-made basis for achieving the result that they plainly, and rightly, sought, of protecting the plaintiff from the unwanted attentions of the defendant, without becoming entangled either in the obscurities of Wilkinson v Downton or in an unprincipled extension of the law of private nuisance. However, Dillon and Rose LJJ did not even mention this potential right of action. The assumption that that was because they thought the claim was without foundation in law is given force j when one turns to the judgment of Peter Gibson J. He said ([1993] 3 All ER 669 at 684, [1993] QB 727 at 744):

[Counsel] submitted that the respondent has a right of privacy with which the appellant was unreasonably interfering. But that argument is not open to him in the light of the decision of this court in Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, confirming that English law has recognised no such right.' a

[102] In my respectful view, the combination of the judgments in Khorasandijan's case comes very close indeed to establishing as a matter of ratio that there is no English law tort of breach of privacy. Certainly, they are a formidable barrier to this court now declaring that such a tort had in some way come into existence by 1997. b [103] That view is reinforced by a number of further considerations.

[104] First, one of the situations that was, rightly, thought to be most in need of protection on the ground of privacy was the causing of distress by harassment, besetting and intrusive telephoning, often in a sexual context: the very conduct that engaged the concern of this court in Khorasandijan's case. After an exhaustive analysis of the authorities before 1997 this court concluded in Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2003] 3 All ER 932 at [30], that before the passing of s 3 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 there had been no tort of harassment in English law. Two comments follow. First, nowhere in any of the cases reviewed in Wong's case was it suggested that the matter might be regulated on the basis of a tort of invasion of privacy which, if it had existed, would have been an obvious solution to the problems of harassment. Second, if the tort of invasion of privacy now contended for had always been in existence the statutory tort of harassment, introduced in 1997, would appear to be substantially redundant: granted in particular that by s 7(2) of the 1997 Act 'harassment' includes the causing of distress, the very circumstance that most attracts demands for the protection of privacy. c d e

[105] Second, in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 319–320, [2001] QB 967 at 1001 (para 124) Sedley LJ drew attention to the ruling of the European Commission on Human Rights in Earl Spencer v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105; commented that that ruling had been the considered view of a body of distinguished jurists; and said that it would not be a happy thing if the national courts were to go back without cogent reason on the United Kingdom's successful exegesis of its own law. I respectfully agree. But the law expounded by the United Kingdom and accepted by the commission was indeed that there is no law of privacy, as such, in England and Wales, citing Kaye's case. That submission cannot of course affect us if it was wrong; but at the lowest it represents a respectable strand of construction of the current state of English law. f g

[106] Third, and further in that respect, I have not been able to find any commentator who thought, at least before the coming into effect of the 1998 Act, that there was a tort of invasion of privacy in English law, as opposed to thinking that there should be such a tort. Paragraph 1–34 of Clerk and Lindsell the leading authority, says of the law in 2001, and thus a fortiori of the law before 1998: h

'Privacy remains an interest unprotected by the English law of torts. However gross the invasion of the claimant's privacy, that violation of privacy is not itself a tort.'

That English law provides no direct action for invasion of privacy is also the view of the learned editor of the fifteenth edition of Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (15th edn, 1998) pp 464–465; and of Sir Brian Neill in his essay in the important collection Protecting Privacy (ed Markesinis) (1999) p 17. j

[107] I am therefore plainly of the opinion that it is not open to us to grant relief to the claimants on the basis of an invasion of their privacy. Since, however,

- a the protection of privacy has been seen by some as nonetheless a proper field for the exercise of judicial activism, I venture to go further and draw attention to some difficulties that stand in our way.

PRIVACY: POLICY

- b [108] 'Privacy' covers a very wide range of cases, which are affected by a very wide range of policy considerations. What occurred in our case is perhaps one of the simpler examples. The right not to have another stare at one's naked body, save by consent or in clearly defined situations of necessity, would be unambiguously regarded as a matter of privacy. But what of the obtaining of information that (on the assumptions made to justify the extension of the law of tort into new situations of privacy) is not covered by the law of confidence? What c of the making of true statements about others, hitherto rigorously excluded from the law of defamation? What of the whistle-blower? And, indeed, what of a preference to have photographs of your wedding in one publication rather than another?

- d [109] As is well accepted, in none of these cases can a right to privacy be absolute. But that is only the start. What needs to be worked out is the delicate balance; particularly in the area of the publication of information, between the interests on the one hand of the subject and on the other of someone entering his private space, or of the publisher and the latter's audience. It also has to be borne in mind that what is necessarily proposed is a general tort, available not only to private citizens who simply want to get on with their own lives, like the e Wainwrights; but also to corporate bodies that want to keep their affairs private. That plainly adds a further dimension of considerable difficulty to attempts to formulate the proper ambit and balance of the tort.

- f [110] That even without those complications, and while remaining within the ambit of private individuals, differing views can be held on the issue of protection of privacy, and that such views can change over time, can perhaps be illustrated from the classic article that first investigated a right to privacy, and which is still viewed as a significant intellectual source of the proposed tort: see the judgment in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 318–319, [2001] QB 967 at 999–1000 (para 120). The article is by Samuel Warren and Louis Brandeis 'The Right to Privacy' (1890) 4 Harv L Rev 193. Its point of departure is believed to g have been the behaviour of the press in Boston on the occasion of the wedding of Mr Warren's sister. The learned authors commented (at 196):

- h 'Gossip is no longer the resource of the idle and of the vicious, but has become a trade, which is pursued with industry as well as effrontery. To satisfy a prurient taste the details of sexual relations are spread broadcast in the columns of the daily papers. To occupy the indolent, column upon column is filled with idle gossip, which can only be provided by intrusion upon the domestic circle ... When personal gossip attains the dignity of print, and crowds the space available for matters of real interest to the community, what wonder that the ignorant and thoughtless mistake its relative importance.'
- j

It may be doubted whether a judge in 2001 would feel able to advance quite that justification for awarding damages for breach of privacy.

[111] All these considerations indicate that not only is the problem a difficult one, but also that on grounds not merely of rationality but also of democracy the difficult social balance that the tort involves should be struck by Parliament and not by the judges: as Megarry V-C urged in Malone's case, in the passage quoted in [92], above, and Legatt LJ urged in Kaye's case. And that is rendered the more, not the less, the case by reason of the fact that Parliament, and those who advise it, have themselves found the problem of the limits of tort of invasion of privacy to be one of profound difficulty. The Law Commission has had the issue of a tort of invasion of privacy on its agenda since the 1960s. No proposals have emerged. The Younger Committee on Privacy (1972) (Cmnd 5012), considered in detail whether there should be 'a general right of privacy' protected by law, and rejected that proposal, on grounds, amongst others, of uncertainty: see in particular the discussion at paras 660–666 of the report. Subsequent initiatives, summarised by Brooke LJ in Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 312, [2001] QB 967 at 993 (paras 89–90), have borne no further fruit.

[112] Whatever sympathy may be felt for the particular position of the Wainwrights, we have to remember that laws are not made for particular cases but for men in general: R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP [2001] UKHL 61 at [29], [2002] 1 All ER 1 at [29], [2002] 1 AC 800, per Lord Bingham of Cornhill. And I have no doubt that in being invited to recognise the existence of a tort of breach of privacy we are indeed being invited to make the law, and not merely to apply it. Diffidence in the face of such an invitation is not, in my view, an abdication of our responsibility, but rather a recognition that, in areas involving extremely contested and strongly conflicting social interests, the judges are extremely ill-equipped to undertake the detailed investigations necessary before the proper shape of the law can be decided. It is only by inquiry outside the narrow boundaries of a particular case that the proper ambit of such a tort can be determined. The interests of democracy demand that such inquiry should be conducted in order to inform, and the appropriate conclusions should be drawn from the inquiry by, Parliament and not the courts. It is thus for Parliament to remove, if it thinks fit, the barrier to the recognition of a tort of breach of privacy that is at present erected by Kaye's case and Khorasandjian's case.

PRIVACY: REMOTENESS OF DAMAGE

[113] Mr Wilby said confidently that once a tort of breach of privacy was established, all damage caused by that breach was recoverable simply on the basis of causation. There may have been some echo in that formulation of the original claim in trespass: see [70], above. However, the claim, and in particular the claim on the basis of the facts of the present case, illustrates a further uncertainty about a tort of breach of privacy. It is entirely unclear why the illness that in the event overtook Alan Wainwright should be recoverable just because it followed upon a breach of privacy: a tort whose values do not include prevention of physical injury. And even more difficult questions can easily be hypothesised: for instance, if non-confidential and true, but private, information is published about someone, with the result that he loses his job, or his marriage.

PRIVACY: CONCLUSIONS

[114] Even, therefore, if the Wainwrights could bring themselves under the protection of a tort of invasion of privacy, I would find it difficult to see how they could recover for special damage claimed in this case. But in the event that issue does not arise, since it is still the law of England that there is no tort of invasion of privacy.

[115] That suffices to reverse the finding of the judge and to allow the appeal. However, in deference to the arguments that we received, and also to the a importance of the issue, I do go on and consider the two defences upon which the Home Office sought to rely, on the assumption that otherwise it would have been liable. Those defences are consent and justification. I do not consider that either of them could be made out in this case.

CONSENT

b [116] The judge held, at para 82 of his judgment, that the Wainwrights 'consented to the strip-search' because they were told that, if they did not, they could not visit Mr O'Neill; but because the consent was obtained by a show of authority it was not real consent in law.

c [117] The question of the distinction between consent and submission, and of the concepts of 'social' or 'forced' consent, is a subject of considerable difficulty in relation to crimes involving offences against the person, and for the same reasons difficult also in the law of tort. Some account of the subject in the former context is given in Law Commission Consultation Paper Consent and Offences Against the Person (1993) (Law Com No 134) paras 24.1–31.1. It may be mentioned in passing that the authority relied on by the judge, the judgment of Willes J in Warner v Riddiford (1858) 4 CBNS 180 at 206, is not a case on consent.

d These issues do not however arise in the present case, because the Home Office's argument, and the judge's acceptance of it, was mistaken on the facts.

e [118] What the Wainwrights, and all other visitors to Armley Gaol, were asked to consent to was not 'a strip-search' in general terms; with the result, as the Home Office appeared to argue, that they had forfeited their right to complain about anything that was done as part of an activity that could be so described. Rather, the search that was proposed and for which consent was sought was that described in the prison's procedure document, and set out on the back of the consent form. The relevant procedures have already been set out by Lord Woolf CJ, but it will be convenient to repeat the prison's own public statement of the limits of the search:

f '1. Two officers will be present. No person of the opposite sex will be present.

2. You will not be required to be fully undressed at any stage.

g 3. You will be asked to remove clothes from one half of your body, and pass them to an officer so that they may be examined. Your body will then be examined briefly so that the officers can see if anything is concealed. The clothes will then be returned to you without delay and you will be given time to put them on.

4. The procedure will then be repeated for the other half of your body.

h 5. The soles of your feet will be checked.

6. When your upper body is undressed, you may be required to hold your arms up.

i 7. When your lower body is undressed, you may be required to position yourself in such a way as to enable staff to observe whether anything is hidden in the genital and anal areas. Your body will not be touched during the process.

j 8. If you have long hair, it may be necessary for an officer to search it. It may also be necessary for an officer to check your ears, and mouth. You will not be touched otherwise.'

[119] Since Alan Wainwright was required wholly to undress, and Mrs Wainwright effectively so, items 2 and 3 of these rules were flagrantly departed from. So effectively was item 1 in the case of Mrs Wainwright, to the extent that she may have been visible from outside the office. If the Wainwrights had been shown the consent forms before the procedure and had them explained to them, then it would have been impossible thereafter to contend that they had consented to what in the event occurred. I reject as entirely unreal Mr Tam's contention that they could nonetheless have caused the search to be interrupted; and in any event the point does not arise on the facts, because the Wainwrights had not been told what the rules of the search were. The Home Office cannot be in a better position because it did not follow its own procedure that required it to present the forms before the search began. I would therefore hold that no consent was given to what actually occurred; so the defence would fail on that ground alone.

JUSTIFICATION

[120] This defence was based on a comparison between r 86(1) of the 1964 rules, which says, but says no more than, that 'Any person or vehicle entering or leaving a prison may be stopped, examined and searched' and r 39(2), relating to searches of prisoners, which provides that 'a prisoner shall be searched in as seemly a manner as is consistent with discovering anything concealed'. Expressio unius, said the Home Office, exclusio alterius. The search of a visitor does not have to be seemly.

[121] I regret that this point was ever taken. A rule as broad as r 86, giving power over persons who have committed no crime, and who attend as part of the accepted social policy that prisoners' families are entitled to contact with them, cannot have been intended by Parliament, and cannot be justified, in terms that give largely unlimited powers to the prison authorities. And, as Mr Wilby acutely pointed out, the prison authorities themselves did not think that to be the case, as evidenced by their own rulebook, already quoted, and by their internal strategy document that is set out by Lord Woolf CJ at [18], above. This is not a question of limitation on Wednesbury grounds, as the Home Office submitted and the judge accepted; rather, it is a question, to be determined by the court, of what the legislation is to be taken as authorising. In company with the rulebook, I hold that it did not authorise the search that in fact took place.

[122] The judge did not take that view. Rather, the case became involved before him in a long inquiry into whether the form of the search could be justified in terms of art 8(2) of the convention. The basis for this inquiry was the contention that r 86, even in its application before 2 October 2000, had by reason of s 3(1) of the 1998 Act to be read by a court after that date in terms that if possible complied with the convention. I respectfully agree with what Lord Woolf CJ says on that subject in [29], above and following. I would also venture to add that in my view any liberty for this court to hold that s 3(1) of 1998 Act has retrospective force has been put to rest by the decision in Pearce v Governing Body of Mayfield Secondary School [2001] EWCA Civ 1347, [2001] IRLR 669, as expressed in the judgment of Judge LJ (at [79]). Nothing in R v Kansal undermines the binding authority for this court of Pearce's case.

[123] None of this, however, affect the result of this appeal. A defence of justification would fail for the reason set out in [121], above, and not because of any implication of the convention.

DISPOSAL OF THE APPEAL

a [124] I would allow the appeal, because the claimants cannot make out any claim in either trespass, 'Wilkinson v Downton' or breach of privacy. If a prima facie claim had been made out, it would not have been defeated by a defence either of consent or of justification.

b [125] I respectfully agree with Lord Woolf CJ as to the disposal of the further outstanding matter of the measure of damages to be awarded to Alan Wainwright in relation to the separate battery committed upon him.

Appeal allowed. Permission to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Trust and trustee – Judicial trustee – Remuneration – Common form of order – Judicial Trustees Act 1896, s 1(5) – Judicial Trustees Rules 1983, r 11.

[1] When dealing with the assignment of remuneration to a judicial trustee under s 1(5) of the Judicial Trustees Act 1896 and r 11 of the Judicial Trustee Rules 1983, SI 1983/370, the court will consider directions as to remuneration based on the common form of order set out below, subject to such modifications as may be required in any particular case.

[2] In general the court when considering reasonable remuneration for the purposes of r 11(1)(a) will need to be satisfied as to the basis upon which the remuneration is claimed, that it is justified and that the amount is reasonable and proportionate and within the limit of 15% of the capital value of the trust property specified in the rule.

[3] The court may, before determining the amount of remuneration, require the judicial trustee to provide further information, alternatively refer the matter to a costs judge for him to assess remuneration.

[4] When an application is made to the court for the appointment of a judicial trustee or when the court gives directions under r 8 practitioners should produce to the court a draft order which should take account of the common form of order.

c Landlord and tenant – Leasehold enfranchisement – Valuation – Improvement – Former lessee converting property from single house into flats – Current lessee converting property back into single house and thereby increasing value of property – Whether lessee’s works an ‘improvement’ for purposes of leasehold valuation if merely reversing work done by previous lessee that had depressed value of property – Leasehold Reform Act 1967, s 9(1A)(d).

d The Leasehold Reform Act 1967 gave a qualifying tenant a statutory right to buy the freehold of the house of which he was the leaseholder. Section 9(1A)^a of the Act provided that, in the case of houses over a certain rateable value, the price was to be the amount which, at the time when the tenant gave notice of his desire to purchase, the freehold of the house and premises might be expected to realise on the open market. Section 9(1A)(d) required that the price be diminished by the extent to which the value of the house and premises had been increased by ‘any improvement’ carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title at their own expense. The appellant was the tenant of a large house. It had originally been one dwelling for family occupation, but had been converted into five flats in 1947.

e While the 1947 works had originally increased the value of the house, the converted state made it worth less in the 1980s than it would have been in its original state. In 1987 the tenant’s predecessor converted the house into two dwellings. In 1991 the tenant made further alterations. By 1997, when he gave notice of his desire to buy the freehold, the house was again arranged for single family occupation, more or less as it had originally been constructed. In g subsequent proceedings, the Lands Tribunal held that both the conversion and the reconversion were improvements, but that the reconversion works did not entitle the tenant to pay a diminished price because their effect was to reverse the conversion works carried out and return the house to its original configuration. That decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. On the tenant’s appeal to the h House of Lords, their Lordships considered the correct approach to s 9(1A)(d).

Held – For the tenant to secure a reduction under s 9(1A)(d) of the 1967 Act, he had, first, to identify improvements which he or his predecessors had carried out at their own expense and, secondly, satisfy the tribunal that, but for those improvements, the house and premises would have been worth less. In general terms, the word ‘improvement’ meant additions or alterations to the house and premises which were not mere repairs or renewals. It referred to the works themselves and not to the effect, if any, which they had had on the value of the premises. In considering whether an improvement had added to the value of the house, the comparison was between the value of the house as it stood and what its value would have been if the improvement had not been made. The words 'any improvement' meant that each improvement relied upon by the tenant had to be separately considered in comparison with what the house would otherwise have been worth. If it had added nothing to the value, it was disregarded. In the instant case, the Lands Tribunal had correctly held that the conversion and the subsequent reconversion were both improvements, even though the 1947 improvements had been stripped out before the valuation date and, even if they had remained intact, would have reduced rather than increased the value. However, the 1947 improvements made no difference to the value of the house at the valuation date because they had ceased to exist. On the other hand, if the reconversion had not taken place, the 1947 improvements would still have existed and the house would have been worth less. To the extent that it was worth more, the tenant was entitled to a reduction in the open market value. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [7], [8], [17]–[20], [24], [28], [45], [46], below).

Appeal

Peter Shalson, the tenant of a property known as 98 Hamilton Terrace, St John's Wood, London, NW8, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 14 October 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Thorpe, Buxton LJ and Moses J) on 15 April 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 538, [2002] 3 All ER 1119, [2003] Ch 110) dismissing his appeal from the decision of the Lands Tribunal (NJ Rose FRICS) on 19 April 2001 dismissing his appeal from the decision of the Leasehold Valuation Tribunal (J McGrandle B Sc (Est Man), ARICS, MRTPI (chairman), SE McGrath and DZ Myer-Smith LLB) on 2 November 1999 that certain works carried out by Mr Shalson and his predecessors in title did not constitute an 'improvement' to the property for the purposes of s 9(1A)(d) of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 and were therefore not to be disregarded in determining the price to be paid for the freehold by Mr Shalson to the respondent landlord, the Keepers and Governors of the Free Grammar School of John Lyon. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Edwin Johnson (instructed by David Conway & Co) for Mr Shalson.

Kenneth Munro (instructed by Pemberton Greenish) for the landlord.

a Their Lordships took time for consideration.

12 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

b [1] My Lords, I am in complete agreement with the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann, and I gratefully adopt his account of the facts and issues in this appeal.

c [2] The Leasehold Reform Act 1967 as amended gives to a qualifying tenant a statutory right to buy the freehold of the house of which he is the leaseholder. The effect is that the owner, instead of recovering his property on the expiry of the lease in the ordinary way, receives a capital sum representing the value of the house at the date when the tenant gave notice of his wish to buy. The calculation of that value is governed by a statutory formula clearly intended to yield a fair result as between tenant and owner, conferring no undue benefit on either. Thus the value is based (s 9(1A)) on the amount which at the relevant time the house, if sold in the market by a willing seller, might be expected to realise on certain assumptions, among them (s 9(1A)(a)) that the vendor is selling for an estate in fee simple subject to the unexpired term of the existing tenancy.

d [3] A further assumption, with which alone this appeal is concerned, is (s 9(1A)(d))— e ‘that the price be diminished by the extent to which the value of the house and premises has been increased by any improvement carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title at their own expense.’

This statutory language makes plain that the price will be diminished under this head if and only if it is found: (i) that works of improvement (meaning works other than renewals and repairs) have been carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title; (ii) that the tenant or his predecessors in title have carried out these works at their own expense; and (iii) that these works have increased the value of the house. To the extent of the increase attributable to those works the price payable for the house is diminished. The fairness of this provision is obvious. It would not be fair if the tenant were obliged to pay an enhanced price to the extent that such enhancement was attributable to works done by him or his predecessors in title (probably voluntarily) at their own expense: the tenant would in effect be paying twice. It would not be fair if the owner received a price inflated as a result of works done by the tenant or his predecessors in title (probably voluntarily) at their own expense: the owner would be reaping an adventitious gain as a result of works which he had had no right to require.

h Thus in each case where this assumption is in issue the question must be asked: has the value of this house been increased by any improvement carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title at their own expense? If the answer to this question is Yes, the market price must be reduced so as to discount the increase attributable to that improvement (or improvements, if there are more than one).

j [4] It has been common ground between the parties to this appeal that when this question is asked with reference to the extra storey and mansard roof built in the 1920s, the answer is Yes, and they are agreed on the extent to which the price should be reduced on account of those works. The controversy has centred on the works, admittedly done by the appellant (Mr Shalson) and his predecessors in title, and admittedly done at their own expense, to reconvert the house from five flats to a single dwelling as it was when originally let.

[5] It seems to me plain that these works were improvements within the statutory language, since they were not works of repair and renewal and the statutory language makes plain that whether such works cause an increase of value raises a separate question; it is not a defining characteristic of an improvement that it has the effect of increasing the value of the house. In the present case it is common ground that the improvements in question (the reconversion works) increased the value of the house as compared with its value had those works not been done. Thus the question posed in [3], above, must be answered Yes, and there is agreement on the extent to which the price must be diminished on that basis. a

[6] The Leasehold Valuation Tribunal and the Lands Tribunal held that the reconversion works did not entitle Mr Shalson to pay a diminished price because their effect was to reverse the conversion works carried out in the 1940s and return the house to its original configuration. The Court of Appeal upheld those decisions ([2002] EWCA Civ 538, [2002] 3 All ER 1119, [2003] Ch 110). I would accept that those conversion works were, within the statutory language, improvements. It seems very questionable whether they were improvements carried out by Mr Shalson's predecessor in title at his own expense, since the 1947 tenant was contractually bound to carry out the works and it seems likely (although there is no finding on this) that the rent payable under the lease was abated to reflect the expense to which he was committing himself. But even if it were accepted that the conversion works were improvements carried out by Mr Shalson's predecessor in title at his own expense, it is quite plain that they did not (as of the valuation date, which is the only date that matters) increase the value of the house. The effect of the reconversion works voluntarily undertaken by Mr Shalson and his predecessors in title was to undo the conversion works and so render them wholly irrelevant for purposes of the statutory calculation, as having no effect on the market value of the house. b

[7] I would accordingly allow the appeal and make the order which Lord Hoffmann proposes. c

LORD STEYN.

[8] My Lords, I have read the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Millett. For the reasons they have given I would also make the order which Lord Hoffmann has proposed. d

LORD HOFFMANN.

[9] My Lords, this appeal concerns the principle upon which the price which a tenant has to pay pursuant to s 9 of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 for the freehold interest in a house should be adjusted to reflect any increase in its value attributable to improvements which he or his predecessors in title have made at their own expense. e

[10] Section 9(1A) of the 1967 Act provides that, in the case of houses over a certain rateable value, the price shall be 'the amount which at the relevant time the house and premises, if sold in the open market by a willing seller, might be expected to realise' on various assumptions. The 'relevant time' means the time at which the tenant gives notice of his desire to buy the freehold: see s 37(1)(d). For present purposes, the only relevant statutory assumption is para (d) of s 9(1A): f a 'on the assumption that the price be diminished by the extent to which the value of the house and premises has been increased by any improvement carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title at their own expense ...'

b [11] The appellant Mr Shalson was tenant of a large house in St John's Wood under a lease dated 19 May 1947 for a term of 99 years from 25 March 1947 at a yearly rent of £140. The lease had been granted in consideration of the covenants which it contained and the surrender of a 50-year lease of the same premises granted in 1921. That lease in turn had been granted in consideration of the surrender of a 95-year lease granted in 1843. The history is relevant because s 3(3) of the 1967 Act provides that if a tenant of property under a long tenancy, on the coming to an end of that tenancy, becomes tenant under another long tenancy, c the 1967 Act is to apply as if there had been a single tenancy for a term beginning with the commencement of the earlier tenancy and expiring with the term of the later tenancy. Mr Munro, who appeared for the landlord, wanted to keep open the question of whether this provision could apply more than once and unify all three long tenancies. But, subject to that point (which need not be decided) all tenants since 1843 count as predecessors in title of Mr Shalson.

d [12] The house was originally a villa constructed for family occupation. At some time in the 1920s it was enlarged by the addition of an extra storey with a mansard roof. Under the 1947 lease, the tenant covenanted to carry out certain alterations to convert the house into five self-contained flats. It may be assumed that this reflected the weak demand for big Victorian houses in London just after e the Second World War. The work was done and for the next 40 years or so the house was in multiple occupation. The lease also contained a tenant's covenant (cl 2(21)) not to make any further alterations without the landlord's licence in writing. During the 1980s the market changed. There was a demand for big f family houses in good areas of London. The result was that while the 1947 works had originally increased the value of the house, the converted state of the house made it worth rather less in the 1980s than it would have been in its original state. Pursuant to a licence granted in 1983, the upper part of the house was converted into one dwelling with a self-contained basement flat beneath. In 1991 Mr Shalson acquired the lease and made further alterations, pursuant to a further licence, to convert the basement flat into a swimming pool, sauna, gym and g maid's quarters. By the time Mr Shalson gave notice of his desire to buy the freehold on 19 November 1997, the house was once more arranged for family occupation, more or less as it had originally been constructed.

[13] There is no dispute that Mr Shalson is entitled to a deduction for the extent to which the value of the house was increased by the addition of the mansard h storey. The issue is over whether he is entitled to a deduction for the value which he and his predecessors in title have added to the house by reconvertng it from five flats into a single dwelling, or whether the comparison should be with what the house would have been worth if it had remained in the state in which it had been let in 1843, 1921 or 1947. It is agreed that on the first assumption, the price produced by the statutory calculation is £275,298. On the second, it is £398,200.

j [14] The Leasehold Valuation Tribunal, which has jurisdiction under s 21(1)(a) of the 1967 Act to determine the price payable under s 9, considered that the correct comparison was with the house as originally let. This decision was upheld by the Lands Tribunal (Mr NJ Rose FRICS). He said:

'Both the original conversion from a house to flats and the subsequent re-conversion from flats to a house were equally tenant's improvements and there is no requirement for the valuer to restrict his analysis to the effect of only one of them.’ a

[15] The Court of Appeal (Thorpe, Buxton LJ and Moses J) upheld this decision ([2002] EWCA Civ 538, [2002] 3 All ER 1119, [2003] Ch 110). But the reasoning of Buxton LJ, who gave a judgment with which the other two members agreed, was not quite the same as that of the Lands Tribunal. He said ([2002] 3 All ER 1119 at [9]) that works done to the house cannot constitute an improvement increasing its value if they consist— b

‘only of reversing work done by a predecessor in title (or even, more remarkably, by the instant tenant) that depressed the value of the house and premises; which, as at the valuation date, the conversion into five flats indeed would have so done.’ c

[16] Buxton LJ was unwilling to accept that in principle the increase in value must be by reference to the state of the house and premises at the time of the grant. That might give rise to practical difficulties in discovering exactly what the state of the house then was. In the present case, it might require an inquiry going back to 1843. So Buxton LJ (at [16]) limited the principle to a case in which— d

‘the alleged works of improvement are doing no more than altering previous works to the property that, in the market as it existed at the valuation date, would have been a depressing rather than an increasing factor in the market price.’ e

[17] In my opinion the language of s 9(1A)(d) is clear. A diminution in the open market value is to be allowed only by the extent to which that value has been increased by ‘any improvement’ which has been carried out by the tenant or a predecessor at their own expense. For the tenant to secure a reduction, he must therefore, first, identify improvements which he or his predecessors have carried out at their own expense, and secondly, satisfy the tribunal that but for those improvements the house and premises would have been worth less. f

[18] The first of these two conditions requires consideration of any changes which have been made to the premises during the term of the lease, or the period which s 3(3) deems to have been the term of the lease. ‘Improvement’ is a word of ancient lineage in the law of landlord and tenant and land law generally: see, for example, s 25 of the Settled Land Act 1882. In general terms it means additions or alterations to the house and premises which are not mere repairs or renewals: see Hague on Leasehold Enfranchisement (3rd edn, 1999) pp 198–199 (para 9-30). It is important to bear in mind that an improvement is a physical and not an economic concept. It refers to the works themselves and not to the effect, if any, which they have upon the value of the premises. It is the second condition which deals with the effect on value. So the Lands Tribunal was in my opinion quite right to say that the 1947 conversion and the subsequent reconversion were both improvements, even though the 1947 improvements had been stripped out before the valuation date and, even if they had remained intact, would have reduced rather than increased the value of the house and premises. g

[19] The issue in this appeal turns upon what I have called the second condition. What does it mean to say that the value of the house and premises has been increased by the improvement? In my opinion, it signifies a simple causal relationship: but for the improvement, the house and premises would have been h a worth less. The comparison is between the value of the house as it stands and what its value would have been if the improvement had not been made.

[20] The hypothetical house envisaged by this comparison is in my opinion one which has all the features of the real house, including its history, save for one: that the improvement in question had not been made. By that test, the 1947 improvements made no difference to the value of the house at the valuation date, because they had ceased to exist. On the other hand, if the reconversion had not taken place, the 1947 improvements would still have existed and the house would have been worth less. To the extent that it was worth more, the tenant was entitled to a reduction in the open market value.

[21] I can see no room in the statutory language for a comparative hypothesis which assumes, as the Court of Appeal did, that the improvement in question had not been done and also that there had been no earlier changes which the improvement reversed. In considering whether an improvement has added to the value of the house, the comparison is simply with the house as it would otherwise have been. This seems to me fair to both parties. If the tenant had not carried out the reconversion, the landlord's interest would have been the reversion on a house converted into five flats. The tenant was under no obligation to reinstate. If the tenant increases the value of the landlord's interest by expenditure on reconversion, it would not seem fair that he should have to pay a second time when the landlord's interest is valued for the purposes of a sale of the freehold.

[22] It seems to me no answer to this unfairness that the value of the landlord's interest had been depreciated by the improvements made by the tenant's predecessor in title in 1947. The landlord cannot complain of those changes. As it happens, he actually covenanted that they should be made. But even if he had not done so, he would have been in no position to complain; for example, if the lease had simply contained no covenant against alterations or the landlord had granted a licence. If the tenant had waited to serve his notice desiring the freehold before commencing the reconversion, he would have had to pay only for the landlord's interest in the unimproved house. It seems to me contrary to the purpose of para (d) that the price should be increased because he does the improvements first.

[23] The position might have been different if the 1947 lease had contained a covenant to reinstate the premises as a single dwelling before the end of the tenancy. It is unnecessary to express a concluded view, but it would seem to me arguable that in such a case the reinstatement was pursuant to the bargain for which the tenant had received consideration by the grant of the lease and was therefore not at his own expense for the purposes of para (d): compare Rosen v Trustees of Camden Charities [2001] 2 All ER 399, [2002] Ch 69.

[24] Similarly, I see no justification for taking the approach of the Lands Tribunal and aggregating the net effect of all improvements made during the course of the lease, so as to compare the house as it stands at the valuation date with the house as it was let in 1843 or 1921 or 1947. If that was what Parliament had meant, it would have said that the price was to be diminished by the extent to which its value had been increased by 'all the improvements' carried out by the tenant or his predecessors at their own expense and not 'any improvement' so carried out. The words 'any improvement' mean that each improvement relied upon by the tenant must be separately considered in comparison with what the house would otherwise have been worth. If it has added nothing to the value, it is disregarded; it does not play a ghostly role in the calculation of the value added

[25] Both sides produced examples, of varying degrees of realism, of how the construction favoured by the other would produce unfair results. On one side was the case, mentioned by Buxton LJ, in which the tenant made radical alterations which reduced the value of the premises and soon afterwards restored them to their original state. On the other was the tenant who built an expensive conservatory in 1995 only to find that the site had been occupied from the grant of the lease in 1830 until 1870 by an elaborate conservatory which the then tenant had demolished (with the consent of the landlord) but would, if it still existed, have made the house worth even more than with the new one. b

[26] In the case mentioned by Buxton LJ, it seems to me that a landlord who has allowed his tenant to make alterations which reduce the value of his reversion without any covenant for reinstatement has only himself to blame if he finds that the value of his reversion has been reduced. I do not think that he can recoup the consequences of his folly by making the tenant (or a new tenant) pay a price for the reversion which is higher than he would have had to pay if he had enfranchised while the house was still in its ruined state. On the other hand, taking the other example, it does not seem to me fair that an accident of history which has left no trace upon the property or the obligations of landlord or tenant should result in the tenant having to pay the landlord for an increase in the value of the reversion which his own expenditure has created. c

[27] There may of course have been more than one improvement which has increased the value of the house. In the present case, both the mansard storey and the reversion had increased the value and the Lands Tribunal, when valuing the property on the assumption that the tenant's contentions were right, took both into account. In making this calculation, there cannot be any double counting. The amount by which improvement A (made in 1981) has increased the value of the house over what it would have been worth only with improvement B (made in 1991) and the amount by which improvement B has increased the value over what it would have been worth only with improvement A cannot add up to more than the increase in what the house would have been worth without either A or B. But that presents no problem in the present case, because the 1947 improvements added nothing to the value at the relevant date and fell to be altogether disregarded. d

[28] I would therefore allow the appeal and determine that the amount payable by the tenant is the agreed figure of £275,298. The landlord must pay the costs of the tenant in this House, the Court of Appeal and the Lands Tribunal. e

[29] My Lords, this appeal is concerned with the determination of the price payable by a tenant of a house held on a long tenancy for the right to enfranchise his property. Some time before the relevant date for valuation the tenant had at his own expense converted the property from a house divided into flats to a single house. This significantly increased the value of the property at the valuation date. The question is whether that increase should be left out of account in determining the enfranchisement price. Normally it should. The problem in the present case is due to the fact that the property was formerly a single house which had been converted into flats by a previous tenant, so that the enfranchising tenant had merely reconverted the property to its former condition as a single house. g a [30] The tenant's right to acquire the freehold of his house arises under the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. The purchase price payable for the freehold interest is ascertained in accordance with s 9. The subject matter to be valued is 'the house and premises' as at the relevant time, that is to say the time when the tenant gave notice of his desire to acquire the freehold. At that time 'the house and premises' consisted of a single undivided house. Section 9 requires the property to be valued at the amount which it might be expected to realise if sold subject to the tenancy in the market by a willing seller to a willing purchaser. In arriving at the amount of the price, however, the valuer must make a number of assumptions. The present appeal is concerned with the assumption required by sub-s (1A)(d) (the subsection):

c '... that the price be diminished by the extent to which the value of the house and premises has been increased by any improvement carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title at their own expense.'

The Court of Appeal held ([2002] EWCA Civ 538, [2002] 3 All ER 1119, [2003] Ch 110) that works which merely reversed work done by a previous tenant and restored the property to its former condition were not works of 'improvement' within the meaning of the subsection.

d [31] My Lords, there is no warrant for this conclusion in the wording of the subsection. In order to lead to a diminution in the price the works must: (i) consist of an 'improvement'; (ii) be carried out by the tenant or a predecessor in title at his expense; and (iii) increase the value of the house and premises at the relevant time. Nothing more is required. All three conditions were satisfied by the work of reconverting the property to a single undivided house. The work was an improvement, that is to say it was not merely a work of repair or renewal. It was carried out by the tenant at his expense. And it increased the value of the property at the relevant time, in that the property would have been worth less if the work had not been carried out and the house had remained divided into flats. There is no further condition that the work should not consist only of reversing some earlier work or merely restore the property to an earlier state.

e [32] Such a condition would frustrate the purpose of the subsection. It is designed to avoid the tenant having to pay a price which reflects a value in the property for which he has already paid: see Hague on Leasehold Enfranchisement (3rd edn, 1999) pp 198–199 (para 9-30). If the tenant carries out alterations to the property which enhance its value he thereby increases the value of the landlord's reversionary interest which he afterwards claims to acquire. The subsection prevents his own expenditure resulting in an increase in the price he has to pay. This would be the case whether or not the work consisted of merely reversing the effect of some earlier work. If the tenant in the present case had served his notice before commencing the work of reconversion, he could not have been required to pay a price which represented more than the current value of a house divided into flats. There is nothing in s 9 to enable the landlord to require the depreciatory consequences of the subdivision to be ignored; nor would this be appropriate when the reduction in the value of the property was due to works to which he had consented or at least not objected (and in the present case for which he had stipulated). It would make no sense to require the tenant to pay a higher price for the property because he served the notice after completing the work of reconversion instead of before commencing it. It would also be unfair when the increase in the value of the property was the result of works which he had carried out at his own expense.

[33] The Lands Tribunal and the Court of Appeal were troubled by examples given in argument of cases where it was said that it would be unfair to take account of work to the extent to which it merely restored the property to its former state. Most of such cases were cases of demolition and reconstruction. An example was given of a house with an Edwardian conservatory in a conservation area. The tenant demolishes the conservatory and, after a lapse of some time spent in obtaining planning permission and listed building consent, erects a modern home extension in its place. It would be unfair to the landlord to reduce the price to reflect the value of the house with neither the conservatory nor the home extension. I agree. The price must be diminished by the extent to which the house with the home extension is more valuable than the house with a conservatory. But this is not because part of the value attributable to the construction of the home extension is to be ignored on the ground that it merely reversed the demolition of the conservatory. It is because the relevant improvement consisted of works of demolition and reconstruction. Whether works carried out independently at different times consist of a single improvement or two separate improvements is a question of fact. It is not one which is likely to cause difficulty in practice. The answer will often be found in the terms of the landlord's consent or a relevant planning permission. In the example given, it is highly unlikely that the tenant would ask for or that the landlord be prepared to grant consent to the demolition of the conservatory without its replacement by the home extension. a

[34] In my opinion, the reconversion of the property to a single undivided house was unquestionably an improvement carried out at the expense of the tenant which increased the value of the property and which should therefore result in a diminution of the enfranchisement price. But the subsection refers to 'any improvement carried out by the tenant or his predecessors in title' (my emphasis). It is not sufficient to have regard only to the most recent improvement. The tenant is entitled to have account taken of any relevant improvement which satisfies the statutory criteria. The real question is whether the earlier work of subdividing the house into flats also constituted an improvement; and if so what effect if any it should have on the price. e

[35] My Lords, the concept of an 'improvement' is a very familiar one in the law of landlord and tenant. It connotes additions or alterations which are not merely repairs or renewals. Whether an 'improvement' really improves the property is considered from the point of view of the tenant alone, so that work may constitute an improvement although it does not increase the value of the property at all or even reduces it: see Balls Brothers Ltd v Sinclair [1931] 2 Ch 325, [1931] All ER Rep 803. As my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann observes, the concept is a physical and not an economic one. g

[36] Accordingly the works by which the house was divided into flats constituted an 'improvement' within the meaning of the subsection. And they were carried out by a predecessor in title of the enfranchising tenant. But they do not fall to be taken into account in determining the amount of the enfranchisement price for two separate and independent reasons: (i) they were not carried out at the tenant's expense; and (ii) had the house still been divided into flats at the valuation date they would not have increased the value of the property as at that date but reduced it. i

[37] The subdivision of the house into flats was carried out by the tenant as a term of the grant of the 1947 lease. It was, therefore, carried out not merely pursuant to a contractual obligation in that behalf but in consideration for the

a grant of the tenancy. Had the work been carried out by the landlord, he would either have charged a premium or an increased rent. Thus the work must be taken to have been carried out by the tenant in return for the grant of the tenancy at a reduced rent and without a premium, in other words at the expense of the landlord: see Rosen v Trustees of Camden Charities [2001] 2 All ER 399, [2002] Ch 69.

b [38] Even if this had not been the case, however, and the work had been carried out by the tenant at his own expense, the result would have been the same. It may be assumed that, when the work of subdivision was originally carried out, it did increase the value of the property. As the years passed, however, market conditions changed; and the extent to which the subdivision increased the value of the property gradually dwindled and eventually vanished altogether. By the valuation date, it would have reduced the value of the property.

c [39] Had the tenant served an enfranchisement notice at any time when the property was still worth more subdivided into flats than as a single house, he would have obtained a reduction of the price to reflect the remaining value attributable to the work of subdivision. But by the time he began the work of reconversion to a single house, the property was worth less as a house subdivided into flats than it would have been as a single house. He could not have obtained the benefit of a diminution of the enfranchisement price by virtue of the subsection, since his predecessor's expenditure was no longer reflected in an increase in the value of the property at the relevant time. He would still have obtained a diminution of the price as the result of the expenditure, of course, but by a different means; had it not been carried out the house would have remained undivided and worth more, so that the price would have been higher.

f [40] The Lands Tribunal compared the property at the valuation date with the property as it was when originally let. But there is no warrant for this approach in the wording of the subsection either. The 'extent to which the value of the house and premises has been increased' by an improvement is simply the difference between the value of the property with the improvement in question and the value of the property without it. The problem to which the approach of the Lands Tribunal gives rise is that it may take account of improvements in the distant past which have long since ceased to have any effect on the value of the property, and accordingly do not satisfy the conditions of the subsection. If the tenant constructs a home extension on a part of the lawn backing onto the rear wall of his house, for example, it will not help the landlord to show that a conservatory had originally stood on the site but had long since been pulled down.

g [41] On the other hand, the tenant is entitled to take advantage of any improvement, however ancient, which satisfies the conditions of the subsection. It must have the effect directly or indirectly of increasing the value of the property at the valuation date, but it need not have physically survived to that date. If a former tenant had increased the value of the house by adding a conservatory, and the enfranchising tenant increased the value of the house still further by demolishing the conservatory and erecting a home extension in its place, he would be entitled to a reduction in price which reflected the combined effect of both improvements. His own improvement would consist of works of demolition and reconstruction; but it would not be fair to reduce the price by an amount which reflected only the difference between the value of the house with a conservatory and the house with the benefit of the home extension. Had he not demolished the conservatory and built the home extension, he would still have been entitled to a diminution in the price to reflect the increase in the value of the house brought about by the construction of the conservatory. a

[42] This, of course, presupposes that the earlier work also increased the value of the property and did not reduce it. There is no question of netting off an increase against an earlier reduction. The landlord gets the worst of both worlds; he receives a lower price if the tenant carries out alterations which reduce the value of the property, and does not receive the benefit if the tenant carries out alterations which increase it. The Court of Appeal were troubled by this. They took the case of a tenant who, for his own eccentric reasons, significantly altered the property in a way which materially reduced its value. They did not think that it would be sensible for a later tenant, let alone the same tenant, to obtain a reduction in the enfranchisement price merely by 'putting that right'. b

[43] But with respect it is not a question of putting anything right. The landlord must have consented or at least not objected to the earlier works which reduced the value of the property. Any diminution in the price which he receives is the result of the tenant's having lawfully carried out works which reduced the value of his reversionary interest. The landlord can avoid this result by taking a covenant in the lease that the tenant should obtain his prior consent to any works of improvement, and either refusing his consent or imposing a condition that the tenant restore the property to its former state at the termination of the tenancy. Even if the works of restoration should still fall to be treated as being carried out at the tenant's expense, as to which I prefer to express no opinion, the obligation would severely limit and perhaps eliminate any effect the works would have on the value of the landlord's reversionary interest. c

[44] The Court of Appeal expressed caution about taking account of works carried out in the distant past, on the ground that this would only be possible if a reliable history of the property was available. This is true, but it does not, with respect, affect the principle that every improvement, however ancient, which satisfies the statutory criteria and has the effect of increasing the value of the property at the valuation date may be taken into account. It must be remembered that the landlord is prima facie entitled to the full value of his interest in the property as it stands at the valuation date. If the tenant claims a diminution in the price he must establish the facts which entitle him to it. d

[45] For these reasons, and also for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann whose speech I have had the advantage of reading in draft, I would allow the appeal. e

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[46] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann and am in agreement both with his conclusion that this appeal should be allowed and with his reasons for reaching that conclusion. I, too, would make the order that he has proposed. f

Appeal allowed.

[2003] EWCA Civ 110

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD WOOLF CJ, HALE AND LATHAM LJJ

28 JANUARY 2003

Conflict of laws – Jurisdiction – Challenge to jurisdiction – Agreement between English company and Polish company providing for non-exclusive jurisdiction of Polish courts – English company commencing proceedings against Polish company in England – Whether Polish courts having exclusive jurisdiction – Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, Sch 3C, art 17(1).

By a written agreement, the claimant, an English-registered company which was domiciled in the United Kingdom, agreed to supply certain services to the defendant, a company domiciled in Poland. Under the agreement, each party agreed to the 'non-exclusive jurisdiction' of the courts of Poland in connection with any disputes arising out of it. The agreement also provided that it should be interpreted according to English law. Both the United Kingdom and Poland were contracting states of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982). Article 17(1)^a of the convention provided that if the parties, one or more of whom was domiciled in a contracting state, had agreed that the court or courts of a contracting state were to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which had arisen or which might arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts were to have 'exclusive jurisdiction'. After the Polish company failed to meet its obligations to make payments under the agreement, the English company commenced proceedings against it in England. The Polish company successfully applied to the master for an order that the English courts had no jurisdiction to try the claim, but the English company's appeal against that order was allowed by the judge. On its appeal to the Court of Appeal, the Polish company relied on art 17(1) in contending that the Polish courts had exclusive jurisdiction.

Held – The Polish courts did not have exclusive jurisdiction. The interpretation of the agreement between the parties had to be the starting point. That agreement had to be construed against the provisions of the convention; however, if the matter were approached as one of English interpretation (which was what the contract expressly required), it seemed that the parties had intended that Polish courts were to have jurisdiction, but that that jurisdiction was not to be exclusive. The agreement should be regarded as expressly conferring jurisdiction on a number of contracting states, the identity of those contracting states, apart from Poland, being provided by the convention itself. The express reference to Poland meant that the Polish courts were to have jurisdiction, even if they would not have had jurisdiction under the provision of the convention in the absence of an express reference to Poland. There was no difficulty in fitting that interpretation into the language of art 17(1). The agreement by implication conferred jurisdiction upon more than one contracting state. It identified one state expressly, but the other states were brought into consideration because of the very important words included, making the Polish jurisdiction non-exclusive. The language of art 17(1) had to be given effect in a manner which took into account the intentions of the parties and should not be construed in a way which involved the courts having to come to a conclusion which would be directly contrary to that which the parties intended. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [8], [9], [13], [14], [20]–[22], below).

Appeal

- The appellant, Elektrociepłownia Tychy SA, appealed with permission of Aldous LJ granted on 19 August 2002 from the order of Sir Oliver Popplewell,
- c sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, on 21 June 2002 allowing an appeal by the respondent, Insured Financial Structures Ltd, from the order of Master Eyre on 3 May 2002 declaring that the courts of England and Wales had no jurisdiction to try the claim brought by the respondent against the appellant. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Woolf CJ.
- d Guy Philipps QC (instructed by Nicholson Graham & Jones) for the appellant.
John Higham QC of Stephenson Harwood for the respondent.

LORD WOOLF CJ.

- e [1] This is a second appeal by the appellant, Elektrociepłownia Tychy SA, against an order of Sir Oliver Popplewell, sitting as a judge of the High Court of Justice of the Queen's Bench Division, of 21 June 2002. The judge allowed the appeal of the respondent against the order of Master Eyre dated 3 May 2002. The master had declared that the English courts had no jurisdiction to try the claim which had been brought by the respondent.
- f [2] On the appeal the sole issue is whether a contract which provides that the parties agree on the non-exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of Poland have thereby, because of the provisions of art 17(1) of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982), in fact conferred exclusive jurisdiction on Poland.

g THE FACTS

- [3] The respondent company is registered and carries on business in England and Wales. The appellant is a state-owned Polish company. On 23 October 2000, by an agreement in writing between the parties, it was agreed that the respondent
- h in connection with the financing of electricity generating plants in Poland. Clause 11 of the agreement states: 'Each party agrees to the non-exclusive jurisdiction of the courts [of Poland] in connection with any disputes arising out of this agreement.' The appellant failed to meet its obligations to make payments under the agreement. On 20 April 2001, it gave notice of termination.
- j [4] Article 17 of the Lugano Convention provides, so far as material:

'1. If the parties, one or more of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, have agreed that a court or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen or which may arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction ...

2. The court or courts of a Contracting State on which a trust instrument has conferred jurisdiction shall have exclusive jurisdiction in any proceedings brought against a settlor, trustee or beneficiary, if relations between these persons or their rights or obligations under the trust are involved. a

3. Agreements or provisions of a trust instrument conferring jurisdiction shall have no legal force if they are contrary to the provisions of Article 12 or 15, or if the courts whose jurisdiction they purport to exclude have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16. b

4. If an agreement conferring jurisdiction was concluded for the benefit of only one of the parties, that party shall retain the right to bring proceedings in any other court which has jurisdiction by virtue of this Convention.'

[5] It is common ground that both parties are domiciled in contracting states and that they have agreed that the court of a contracting state, namely Poland, is to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which may arise in connection with the contract between them. It is not common ground, so far as the respondent is concerned, that Poland has exclusive jurisdiction. For reasons which will become apparent hereafter, in indicating what is not common ground I refer only to the respondent. c

[6] Given the parties' express agreement that the jurisdiction of the Polish courts should be non-exclusive, Sir Oliver Popplewell came to the conclusion that the jurisdiction of the Polish courts was, as the agreement states, in fact non-exclusive. That is not a surprising conclusion. However, Mr Guy Philipps QC, in his very clear submissions to this court, argues that the proper application of art 17 of the Lugano Convention requires this court to come to the conclusion that the only courts which have jurisdiction in respect of a claim by the respondent are indeed the Polish courts. e

[7] Initially, before I received assistance from Mr Philipps, it occurred to me that the simple explanation for the apparent tension on which Mr Philipps relies is that art 17(1), when it refers to a 'Contracting State', meant a contracting state and not more than one contracting state. However, such a view of art 17(1) was not advocated by Mr Higham QC for the respondent, and Mr Philipps has satisfied me that that is not the proper approach to art 17(1). Furthermore, if it were the right interpretation, it could lead to undesirable consequences because it would have the effect that the parties could not agree to two states having exclusive jurisdiction. At first sight the expression that a contracting state has exclusive jurisdiction implies that no other state has jurisdiction. It is therefore necessary to inquire further into the effect of art 17 of the Lugano Convention on the simple facts that have been placed before this court. f

[8] The starting point, in my judgment, must be the interpretation of the agreement which was made by the parties. I accept Mr Philipps' contention that the agreement has to be construed against the provisions of the Lugano Convention. However, if the matter is approached as one of English interpretation (which is the appropriate approach to adopt because that is what the contract expressly requires), then it seems to me that the parties undoubtedly intended by the words that they used that Poland was to have jurisdiction, but that that jurisdiction was not to be exclusive. Its effect was to be that Poland was to have jurisdiction in any event, but under the rules governing jurisdiction, where there was no express conferment of jurisdiction, jurisdiction should be applied in accordance with the provisions contained in the Lugano Convention which identify the relevant jurisdiction. In other words, the agreement should be h

a regarded as expressly conferring jurisdiction on a number of contracting states, the identity of those contracting states (apart from Poland) being provided by the Lugano Convention itself.

[9] The benefit of the express reference to Poland meant that that country was to have jurisdiction, even if it was not one which would have jurisdiction under the provision of the Lugano Convention in the absence of an express reference to Poland.

b [10] In coming to that view, I am helped by the authorities to which we were referred in the course of argument. The general intention of the convention appears from the decision in Ets A de Bloos SPRL v Société en commandite par actions Bouyer Case 14/76 [1976] ECR 1497 at 1508, where the European Court of Justice said, in relation to the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1982 Act), which is in the same terms as the Lugano Convention:

c '8. As stated in its preamble, the Convention is intended to determine the international jurisdiction of the courts of the contracting States, to facilitate the recognition and to introduce an expeditious procedure for securing the enforcement of judgments.

d 9. These objectives imply the need to avoid, so far as possible, creating a situation in which a number of courts have jurisdiction in respect of one and the same contract.'

e That decision of the European Court of Justice specifies the general purpose of the Brussels Convention, which is commendable.

[11] In Meeth v Glacetal SARL Case 23/78 [1978] ECR 2133 at 2141–2142, the European Court of Justice said:

f '5. According to the first paragraph of Article 17 [of the Brussels Convention] "if the parties ... have agreed that a court or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen or which may arise in connexion with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction". With regard to an agreement conferring reciprocal jurisdiction in the form in which it appears in the contract whose implementation forms the subject-matter of the dispute, the interpretation of that provision gives rise to difficulty because of the fact that Article 17, as it is worded, refers to the choice by the parties to the contract of a single court or the courts of a single State. That wording, which is based on the most widespread business practice, cannot, however, be interpreted as intending to exclude the right of the parties to agree on two or more courts for the purpose of settling any disputes which may arise. This interpretation is justified on the ground that Article 17 is based on a recognition of the independent will of the parties to a contract in deciding which courts are to have jurisdiction to settle disputes falling within the scope of the [Brussels Convention], other than those which are expressly excluded pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 17. This applies particularly where the parties have by such an agreement reciprocally conferred jurisdiction on the courts specified in the general rule laid down by Article 2 of the [Brussels Convention].'

[12] I find those passages of assistance. First, they indicate that there can be more than one state that has jurisdiction for the purposes of art 17. Second, they clearly convey to me the fact that when it is possible to do so it is necessary to give effect to the intention of the parties when applying art 17, even though this may create a tension with the language of art 17. a

[13] If the interpretation of the agreement to which I have referred earlier is the correct interpretation, how can that fit in with the language of art 17(1)? I find no difficulty in fitting it into the language of art 17(1). The agreement by implication confers jurisdiction upon more than one contracting state. It identifies expressly one state, but the other states are brought into consideration because of the very important words that are included in the agreement, making the Polish jurisdiction non-exclusive. b

[14] Mr Philipps says that that approach is not appropriate because art 17(1) expressly refers to an exclusive jurisdiction, so making inclusive what is stated to be an exclusive jurisdiction is contrary to the language of art 17(1). Once it is appreciated that more than one state can have exclusive jurisdiction, I do not accept that that consequence follows. It seems to me that the language of art 17(1) has to be given effect in a manner which takes into account the intentions of the parties, and certainly should not be construed in a way which involves the courts having to come to a conclusion which would be directly contrary to that which the parties intended. c d

[15] The interpretation of art 17 which Mr Philipps submits the court should apply, depends upon the language of art 17(4). He recognises that some effect must be given to the use of the words 'non-exclusive jurisdiction'. He submits that that can be accommodated by regarding Poland as having exclusive jurisdiction so far as the respondent is concerned, but not exclusive jurisdiction so far as the appellant is concerned. He submits that art 17(4), together with the reference to 'non-exclusive jurisdiction', means that the appellant is in the fortunate position of being entitled to bring proceedings either in Poland or in any other appropriate state identified by the Lugano Convention, but that the respondent is confined to Poland because it should be inferred that the reference to 'non-exclusive' is for the appellant's benefit alone. With the greatest respect to the elegant manner in which Mr Philipps advanced that argument, I find it difficult to believe that that is an appropriate approach to adopt in relation to a commercial matter. I cannot conceive that any party to an agreement of this sort would be agreeable to the state of the other party being able to be selected when that is what the party from that state wishes, but that the party who is not from that contracting state has no such flexibility and has always to use the jurisdiction of the specified state. I prefer the interpretation that I have already indicated to that argued for by Mr Philipps. e f g

[16] I am encouraged to adopt the interpretation that I have adopted because it accords with a judgment of Hoffmann J (as he then was) in Kurz v Stella Musical Veranstaltungen GmbH [1992] 1 All ER 630, [1992] Ch 196. This is a case which has been followed at first instance in a series of authorities to which it is not necessary to refer. I do not propose to refer to the facts of that case. The following passages point clearly to the conclusion which I regard as being the correct one here. Hoffmann J said ([1992] 1 All ER 630 at 637, [1992] Ch 196 at 203–204): h

"This argument in my judgment misinterprets what art 17 means when it says that the chosen or "prorogated" jurisdiction is to be exclusive. It does not mean "unique", that the parties are limited to choosing a single jurisdiction. It means only that their choice, whatever it is, shall (subject to the exceptions made in sentence 5) have effect to the exclusion of the jurisdictions which would otherwise be imposed on the parties by the earlier articles of the j a [Brussels Convention]. Once the parties have availed themselves of art 17 by the prescribed method, jurisdiction becomes a question of the intention of the parties. But (subject always to sentence 5) the article does not limit their choice or the language in which it can be expressed. Nor does it prevent them from including in their choice, expressly or by implication, courts which would otherwise have had jurisdiction under the [Brussels

b Convention]. Jurisdiction thus conferred is still based exclusively on the intention of the parties rather than imposed by the general law and is therefore within the terms of art 17. Although one of the objects of the [Brussels Convention] is to harmonise the jurisdiction rules of the contracting states, one cannot discern a strong general policy in favour of having only a single jurisdiction available to the parties for any particular dispute. There are many cases in which concurrent jurisdictions may exist under different articles and this possibility is expressly contemplated by art 21. There is of course such a policy in the exceptional cases mentioned in sentence 5, but, outside of these, the desirability of a single jurisdiction cannot in my judgment override the principle of freedom of contract.'

d Later, Hoffmann J said ([1992] 1 All ER 630 at 638, [1992] Ch 196 at 205):

e 'But the important principles are, first, that art 17 should be interpreted to give effect to the intention of the parties, and secondly, that the parties may if they choose confer jurisdiction upon two or more courts and their choice may include or exclude courts which would otherwise have had jurisdiction under the earlier articles of the convention. Let us assume that the place of performance of the payment obligations under the subscription agreement was Germany, so that either party could have sued the other in Germany under art 5(1) but only Stella M could have brought an action in England under art 2. If the parties wanted Mr Kurz to be able to sue in England as well, [Meeth v Glacetal SARL Case 23/78 [1978] ECR 2133] shows that they could have expressly provided that the courts of England and Germany were to have jurisdiction in any proceedings brought by either party. But (in the courts of a convention country) this has exactly the same effect as a provision that the English courts are to have non-exclusive jurisdiction. The latter

f formula is simply another way of saying that the parties confer general jurisdiction on the English courts in addition to the jurisdictions which would have existed under the convention if there had been no art 17 choice.'

g [17] That approach does achieve, as I see it, the purpose of the Lugano Convention. It is true that in many situations the identification of the state with jurisdiction will not be as clear or obvious as it would be if a specific state was identified without the qualification that exists here and art 17(1) clearly applies. However, the Lugano Convention recognises that clarity cannot always be achieved. There will be many situations where the principles which are set out in the Lugano Convention have to be applied, as here, to the particular facts before the court. The approach which I have adopted has also the advantage that it accords with the approach which was adopted by Keane J in GPA Group plc v Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland and the European Organisation for the Safety of Air Navigation (EURO-CONTROL) [1992] 2 IR 408.

j [18] The only other authority to which it is necessary to refer is a decision of the Paris Court of Appeal in Hantarex SpA v SA Digital Research [1993] IL Pr 501, on which Mr Phillips rested considerable weight. That case, however, is one which it is necessary to approach with a degree of caution when applying it to the situation with which we are faced here. First of all, as is submitted by Mr Higham, we have the disadvantage that we do not know the actual terms of the jurisdiction clause. It is true that in the judgment it is referred to as a clause which confers 'non-exclusive jurisdiction'. But those words can have a number of meanings; they may be saying no more than that the courts did not expressly say that the jurisdiction of the Paris courts was to be exclusive. It could have said that it was non-exclusive, but the position is not clear. Furthermore, having set out the contentions of the parties, the court went on to say:

'[15] The jurisdiction clause enables Digital Research [the respondent], if it is the plaintiff, to bring an action before "the Paris courts", or any other competent court under the rules of the [Brussels Convention].

[16] The clause, which in this way gives one of the parties a wider choice of courts, is in conformity with Article 17(4) of the [Brussels Convention].'

In view of those remarks, it may be, depending upon the language of the clause, that this is no more than a case where art 17(4) of the Lugano Convention applies in accordance with the tenor of its terms. Without in any way seeking to suggest that the decision of the Court of Appeal of Paris was incorrect, I find nothing in that judgment, having regard to our limited knowledge as to the circumstances, which interferes with the views that I have expressed so far.

[19] Finally, the parties are agreed that in this case it is not possible to obtain any benefit in directly construing art 17 of the Lugano Convention from Council Regulation (EC) 44/2001 (on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (OJ 2001 L12 p1)), which has replaced the Brussels Convention. The two conventions are in parallel, and it is obviously desirable that the courts should not strain to come to a different interpretation of the Lugano Convention from that which applies in the case of the Brussels Convention. Article 23 in its current form, which came into effect last year but which was agreed in 2000, provides:

'1. If the parties, one or more of whom is domiciled in a Member State, have agreed that a court or the courts of a Member State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen, or which may arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have jurisdiction. Such jurisdiction shall be exclusive unless the parties have agreed otherwise. Such an agreement conferring jurisdiction shall be either ...'

It then goes on to set out the choices.

[20] As it seems to me, the approach which I regard as being appropriate to art 17 of the Lugano Convention happily coincides with the clear language of art 23 of Regulation 44/2001. I would therefore dismiss this appeal. I consider that the judge was right in the conclusion to which he came. This court has jurisdiction, as he indicates.

HALE LJ.

[21] I agree. This began as a case on the interpretation of art 17(1) of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982), but in the course of argument it has turned into a case about the interpretation of this particular contract. It is common ground that the

- a* parties may agree to confer jurisdiction on more than one contracting state for the purpose of art 17(1). It is also accepted by Mr Philipps that they could agree to confer jurisdiction on, for example, Poland and any other contracting state having jurisdiction under the terms of the Lugano Convention. In other words, they do not have to exclude any such jurisdiction for their agreement to fall within the terms of art 17(1). Once that has been conceded, it becomes a pure
- b* question of what was meant by the terms of this particular contract and by the words 'non-exclusive'. Did they mean that only one party could benefit from the other jurisdictions, or did they mean that both parties could do so? As the clause in the contract concerned starts 'each party agrees' the answer to that question seems to me to be tolerably obvious. I, too, would dismiss this appeal.

c LATHAM LJ.

[22] I agree with both judgments.

Appeal dismissed.

Equity – Breach of confidence – Confidential information – Publication of unauthorised photographs – Celebrity couple entering into agreement with magazine for authorised wedding photographs – Rival magazine publishing unauthorised wedding photographs – Freedom of expression – Respect for private and family life – Whether publication in breach of confidence – Human Rights Act 1998, s 12, Sch 1, Pt I, arts 8, 10. c

The first and second claimants, well-known film stars, were married in New York. Extensive security arrangements were put in place for the wedding intended to confine the event to family and friends, to ensure that only authorised photographs were taken, and to preserve the exclusivity of the photographic rights, which had been sold to the third claimant, the publisher of OK! magazine. However, a photographer eluded security and surreptitiously took photographs which were then bought for publication in OK!'s rival magazine, Hello! Hello! published the unauthorised photographs, knowing them to be unauthorised, on the same day as that on which OK!, having had to bring its arrangements forward, published the first set of the authorised photographs, which had had to be hurriedly approved by the first and second claimants. The first and second defendants published and distributed Hello! in the United Kingdom and the third defendant was a director of and controlling shareholder in the second defendant and editor-in-chief of Hello! (the Hello! defendants). There were three other defendants. The claimants brought proceedings against the defendants alleging, inter alia, breach of confidence and breach of privacy. Under s 6^a of the Human Rights Act 1998 it was unlawful for a public authority, which included a court, to act in a way incompatible with a right contained in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). The issue arose as to the relation between the right of the first and second claimants to respect for private and family life under art 8^b of the convention and the right of the media to freedom of expression under art 10^c of the convention. Section 12^d of the 1998 Act provided that when the court was considering whether to grant any relief which might affect the right to freedom of expression, and the proceedings related to journalistic material, it had to have d

a Section 6, so far as material, provides: 'It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right ...'

b Article 8, so far as material, provides: 'Everyone has the right to respect for private and family life.'

c Article 10, so far as material, provides: '(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to receive and impart information ... (2) The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such ... conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law ...' j d Section 12, so far as material, provides: '(1) This section applies if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which ... might affect the exercise of the ... right to freedom of expression ... (4) The court must have particular regard ... where the proceedings related to ... journalistic ... material ... to ... (b) any relevant privacy code ...'

- a regard to any relevant privacy code. The relevant code was the Press Complaints Commission code which stated, inter alia, that a publication would be expected to justify intrusions into any individual's private life without consent and that the use of photography to take pictures of people in private places without their consent was unacceptable.
- b Held – The equitable jurisdiction in confidence was based on the duty to be of good faith and on the moral principle of fair dealing. But while breach of confidence was an established cause of action, its scope had to be evaluated in the light of obligations falling upon the court under s 6(1) of the 1998 Act. That could be achieved by regarding the often opposed rights conferred respectively by
- c arts 8 and 10 of the convention as absorbed into the action for breach of confidence. The right to freedom of expression described in art 10(1) was expressly made subject not only to the right under art 8 for respect to private and family life but also to rights recognised by the law as to confidence, even where those latter rights were not themselves convention rights. Freedom of expression
- d on the media's part, as a counter-force to privacy, was not invariably the ace of trumps but it was a powerful card to which the court had to pay appropriate respect. There was no presumptive priority given to freedom of expression when it was in conflict with another convention right, or rights under the law of confidence. The effect of s 12 of the 1998 Act was that the court had to have particular regard to any relevant privacy code, in the instant case that of the Press
- e Complaints Commission. In the absence of any public interest the court was bound to pay particular regard to the code and a newspaper which flouted the code might have its claim to freedom of expression trumped by art 10(2) considerations of privacy. In the instant case, the claimants had a valuable trade asset, a commodity the value of which depended upon its content at first being
- f kept a secret and then being made public in a controlled manner. Moreover, OK!'s right to exclusivity of photographic coverage was even more plainly a right in the nature of a trade secret: what the first and second claimants looked like at the exceptional occasion of their wedding had the quality of commercial confidentiality. The private character of the event and the elaborate security
- g arrangements all conduced to that conclusion. Further, the Hello! defendants had not acted in good faith nor by way of fair dealing, the publication of the unauthorised photographs was unconscionable and the claimants had thereby suffered detriment. There had been an unjustified intrusion into individuals' private lives without consent of which the Hello! defendants knew or ought to
- h have known. It followed that, regarding the case as one of either commercial confidence, the claimants being in a position akin to that of holders of a trade secret, or a hybrid in which, by reason of it having become a commodity, elements that would otherwise have been merely private became commercial, the Hello! defendants had acted unconscionably and by reason of breach of
- i confidence were liable to all three claimants to the extent of the detriment which was thereby caused to them. The claims under the law of confidence would, accordingly, be allowed (see [181], [186], [196]–[198], [205], [227], [228], [279], [280], below).

c Claim

- The claimants, Michael Douglas, Catherine Zeta-Jones and Northern & Shell plc, the publisher of OK! magazine, brought proceedings for, inter alia, breach of confidence against the first defendant, Hello! Ltd, the second defendant, Hola SA, of which the first defendant was a subsidiary, the third defendant, Eduardo Sanchez Junco, director and controlling shareholder of the second defendant and editor-in-chief of Hello! magazine (the Hello! defendants), the sixth defendant, the Marquesa de Varela, the fifth defendant, Neneta Overseas Ltd, a company owned by the fourth defendant and the sixth defendant, Philip Ramey, a photographer, in respect of photographs published in Hello! magazine taken of the first and second claimants' wedding. A split trial was ordered and accordingly the instant proceedings were on liability only. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- Michael Tugendhat QC and David Sherborne* (instructed by Theodore Goddard) for the claimants.
- f* James Price QC and Giles Fernando (instructed by Charles Russell) for the Hello! defendants.
- Helen Mulcahy* of Reed Smith for the fourth and fifth defendants.
- The sixth defendant did not appear.

Cur adv vult

- g* 11 April 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

LINDSAY J.

AN OUTLINE

- h* [1] The well-known film stars Mr Michael Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones married at the Plaza Hotel in New York on 18 November 2000. It was, said one witness, the event of the year. Extensive security arrangements had therefore been made, intended to ensure that access to the ceremony and reception would be denied to all but the family members and friends who had been invited and the attendant staff, who had been put on terms to keep the wedding confidential.
- j* The bride and groom hired their own selected photographers and it was made plain that other photography was not to be permitted. In making such arrangements the bride and groom were doing as they were bound by contract to do as they had sold exclusive photographic rights of the event to OK! magazine, although they had retained control over the selection of such pictures, taken by their own photographers, as they should choose to release to OK!. The security arrangements thus were intended to serve the three-fold purposes of confining the event to family and friends, of ensuring that only authorised photographs were taken and of preserving the exclusivity of the photographic rights for which OK! had paid £1m. a

[2] The wedding passed off as a great success, enjoyed by all present but, unknown to any as the events unfolded, it soon thereafter transpired that one intruder, a photographer, had eluded security and had surreptitiously taken relatively poor photographs which were then bought for publication in OK!'s rival magazine, Hello!. The Douglasses and OK!, then, as now, represented by Mr Tugendhat QC and Mr Sherborne, quickly moved in England for an injunction to restrain publication and they obtained that relief. However, the Court of Appeal acceded to Hello!'s arguments and lifted the injunction, leaving the claimants to claim in damages. b

[3] In the result, Hello! published the unauthorised photographs on the same day as that on which OK!, having had to bring its arrangements forward, published parts of the full authorised portfolio of photographs covering the event, approved by the Douglasses, for which it had paid.

[4] As the litigation developed other parties were added as defendants and other causes of action beyond the initial claims were added. The parties to the action now, as claimants, are, as they were from the outset, Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones (now Mrs Douglas) as first and second claimants and the publishers of OK!, Northern & Shell plc, as third claimant. It will be convenient to refer to the third claimant simply as OK!. d

[5] On the defendants' side, Hello! Ltd, the first defendant, is a subsidiary of the second defendant, Hola SA; the second defendant publishes Hello! magazine and the first defendant distributes it in the United Kingdom. The third defendant is Eduardo Sanchez Junco, a director of and controlling shareholder in Hola SA and editor-in-chief of Hello! magazine. I will call the first three defendants the Hello! defendants. They appear by Mr James Price QC and Mr Fernando. The fourth defendant, the Marquesa de Varela, is a person who has frequently supplied features for use in Hello! magazine and in Hola, its Spanish sister publication. The fifth defendant is a company owned by the Marquesa de Varela. They appear by Miss Mulcahy. The sixth defendant, Philip Ramey, is a paparazzo photographer who also has a photographic agency in California. He was not the photographer of the unauthorised photographs but it was he who sold them to the Hello! defendants. He has not been represented and has taken no part before me. The claimants propose to move against him later and do not seek relief against him at this stage. e

[6] A split trial was ordered so at this stage I am concerned only with whether there is liability in one or more of the first five defendants to one or more of the claimants. If I find there to be such a liability I shall not be concerned with attempting to ascribe some monetary figure to that liability or even with determining how that should be done. h

THE PROCEDURAL HISTORY j

[7] The procedural history is more complicated than one might expect as, quite apart from collateral skirmishes, there have been, as I shall relate below, two interlocutory hearings at first instance followed by one abortive appeal to a two-man Court of Appeal and then a successful appeal to a three-man Court of Appeal ([2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967). Then, a good deal later and only shortly before the trial began, there was an unsuccessful application to

- a Sir Andrew Morritt V-C ([2003] EWHC 55 (Ch), [2003] 1 All ER 1087n) for the striking out of the defences of the Hello! defendants, an application on which Senor Sanchez Junco and three witnesses for the Hello! defendants were cross-examined.

- b [8] As I shall explain in the course of the narrative, the photographer who took the unauthorised photographs, a Mr Rupert Thorpe, was in some form of loose association, the details of which are not known, not only with the sixth defendant, Mr Ramey, but also with two others, Frank Griffin and Randy Bauer. All carry on business as paparazzi, a term especially used and which I shall use to include those photographers whose business it is to take photographs of events
- c and celebrities where access to photographers generally to the event is forbidden or limited and where the consent of the celebrities to be photographed is known or likely to be refused and is thus dispensed with by the paparazzi concerned. In varying degrees, as may become necessary for them to obtain the photographs they seek, they turn to deception, to intrusion and, occasionally, to unlawful
- d behaviour. Mr Ramey, in particular, has a reputation of being able to get in where others were unlikely to be able to.

INTRUSION, IN CONTEXT

- [9] These proceedings have already attracted a good deal of public and press attention such that there are two points that I should mention as to be borne in
- e mind. The first is the extent to which celebrities of the status of Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones, whilst, of course, welcoming much of the publicity that surrounds them, can also find their privacy or ordinary life severely curtailed. Thus the undisputed evidence before me includes, for example, that
- f Miss Zeta-Jones has been frightened by a photographer jumping out of a doorway at night to photograph her, that on another occasion she swerved her car into a lamp post trying to escape from a paparazzo and that the press got hold of and published the fact of her pregnancy even before she had had all the medical tests she had wanted to take and before even she had told her close family of it, including her mother. When she was in hospital after the birth of her son,
- g journalists tricked their way into the hospital by pretending to be members of her family. When she was wheeled from the delivery room back to her room in the hospital she was covered by a sheet to avoid being photographed by the photographers who had tricked their way in. In one remarkable incident when her son was only one week old he, with his nanny, was in a car driven in California by Miss Zeta-Jones. Photographers for a British tabloid newspaper
- h deliberately ran into the car. Under Californian law Miss Zeta-Jones had to get out of the car to exchange details. Her evidence continues, of the photographers:

‘They immediately jumped out of their car and took photographs of me looking furious at the side of the road. They then published them in an article about me being consumed by road rage.’

- j Hardly surprisingly, her evidence continued: ‘This incident made me very angry.’ It is easy to see, against such a background, how celebrities may become especially defensive, though I add that this case is nothing to do with photography of either Mr Douglas or Miss Zeta-Jones in public.

[10] The other point I make is that whilst the claimants’ case is now chiefly for money it was not always so and it was not by their choice that it became so. What all claimants first moved for was an injunction to restrain publication. The case only became chiefly for monetary compensation after the three-man Court of Appeal had ruled that the existing injunction was to be undone and that the claimants would have to be satisfied with claims in damages. a

THE MAGAZINES

[11] Hola has been published in Spain for over 50 years and the three versions, 'Hola' in Spanish, 'Hello!' in English and 'Oh La' in French are sold in almost 60 countries. Hello! has been circulated weekly in the United Kingdom for some 12 years and is bought by an average of some 456,000 people per week, leading, it is said, to a readership of some 2.2 million people per week. It is sold through about 55,000 outlets in the United Kingdom, going on sale on Tuesdays in London and on Wednesdays in the rest of the country. It is printed in Spain and published by Hola SA. The cover price in 2000 was £1.55. b

[12] OK! is printed in England and published weekly by the third claimant. It is a more recently-established magazine than Hello!, that being broadly reflected in the issue numbers at the time of the Douglas wedding, namely no 639 for Hello! and no 241 for OK!. Its cover price in 2000 was £1.85. It normally comes out on Thursdays in London and on Fridays throughout the rest of the United Kingdom. In November 2000 OK! sold about 455,000 copies per issue on average. d

[13] Whilst, no doubt, each magazine has especial characteristics which commend it to particular prospective customers, less discerning readers will find much that is common to both. Indeed, there is some strong feeling amongst London staff at Hello! that OK! is a copycat. Both magazines are of similar size and shape and provide a regular diet of photographs and text of and about Royal but, more usually, entertainment, sporting and social celebrities, with photographs taking precedence over text. Many of the main features are in the highest degree posed and show, for example, the celebrity's yacht or home or show his or her engagement or wedding. Many such features will have been commissioned by arrangement with the subjects and paid for by the magazine in question, the more celebrated or newsworthy celebrities being able to command, should they wish, higher fees than the less celebrated. Other photographs, whilst such that the subjects can be seen to be very aware of and, as it would seem, content with the camera, are far less formal and record, for example, arrivals at a party or at the opening of a film. Each magazine includes from time to time photographs taken, so far as one can judge, without the subject's knowledge or consent but they represent a minority overall. e

[14] There are brief passages about travel, cooking, 'lifestyle' and health advice and as to current television programming. There are short features on particular celebrities in the news in the current week. The texts generally are, if not unquestioning or flattering, at least warm as to the celebrities featured, no doubt for the practical reason that if that were not so the supply of willing celebrities might dry up. h

[15] The two magazines are plainly keen rivals in the same market and were so in 2000. j

EVIDENCE

[16] On the claimants' side I heard oral evidence from Miss Zeta-Jones, Mr Michael Douglas, Mr Allen Burry (Mr Douglas' executive assistant and publicist), Miss Simone Martel Levinson (the event planner engaged by the Douglasses to organise their wedding), Ms Cece Yorke (Miss Zeta-Jones' a publicist), Mr Martin Townsend (formerly editor of OK! magazine, in office at the time of the wedding) and Mr Paul Anderson (picture editor of OK! magazine). The evidence of Miss Levinson and Ms Yorke was given by video link to and from the United States.

b [17] So far as the claimants' expert evidence was concerned, I heard oral evidence as to New York law by video link from Professor Arthur J Jacobson, Max Freund Professor of Litigation and Advocacy at the Benjamin N Cardozo School of Law in New York City. The claimants' evidence as to Spanish law was given orally by Senor Enric Enrich, senior partner of the Barcelona firm of advocates, Enrich Amat I Vidal-Quedras, former co-chairman of the Committee of Intellectual Property of the International Bar Association and currently the chairman of the Copyright and Image Rights' section of the Barcelona Bar Association.

c [18] All of the above-described witnesses were cross-examined, each having supplied one or more witness statements or reports.

d [19] On the defendants' side the main body of evidence came from the Hello! defendants. Senor Eduardo Sanchez Junco gave his oral evidence by way of an interpreter as he speaks little or no English. Senor Javier Riera, managing director of Hola SA, did the same; he has sufficient command of written English to comprehend untechnical and straightforward documents. His personal assistant, Senora Elisa Sanchez-Ferragut Arnau (conveniently and, as I hope, without offence, usually referred to during the hearing as Senora Elisa) gave her oral evidence through the interpreter. Mr Anthony Luke, co-ordinating editor of Hello! magazine, who works in Madrid and has fluent Spanish, spoke in English. Hello!'s publishing director, Sally Amanda Cartwright, who also has good Spanish, gave oral evidence, as did Maria José Doughty, a native Spanish speaker but whose English is impeccable. She is administration and financial controller at Hello! Ltd in London. Mr Christopher Mark Hutchings, solicitor, a partner in Charles Russell, solicitors to the Hello! defendants, also gave oral evidence, as did Margaret Koumi, the editor of Hello! in 2000. All of these witnesses had supplied one or more witness statements and all were cross-examined.

e [20] The Hello! defendants' expert evidence consisted of the evidence of Professor Diane L Zimmerman on New York law and of Senor Miguel Engel Rodriguez on Spanish law. Professor Zimmerman, Professor of Law at New York University, gave oral evidence by video link and Senor Rodriguez, a member of the Madrid Bar and until recently Associate Professor of Constitutional Law at Universidad Autonomia at Madrid, gave his oral evidence here in London through an interpreter. Both had put in one or more written reports.

f [21] Oral evidence on behalf of the fourth and fifth defendants consisted of the evidence of the fourth defendant herself, Maria J Marin, also known as the Marquesa de Varela (the Marquesa), and her personal assistant, Pirjetta Mildh, both of whom had a complete command of English despite it being the mother tongue of neither. No expert evidence was put in on behalf of the fourth and fifth defendants. Each of the Marquesa and Miss Mildh put in one witness statement; a second was prepared for the Marquesa but did not find its way into evidence.

j [22] In a category of her own amongst those who gave oral evidence was Sue Neal, no longer an employee of Hello! or Hola SA but formerly a picture editor working in London for Hello!. She had prepared two witness statements; one was prepared by the solicitors for the fourth and fifth defendants, one by the solicitors to the claimants. Neither the fourth and fifth defendants nor the claimants chose either to call Miss Neal or to put in either or both of her witness statements but at a late stage in his case Mr Price chose to put in her witness statements as hearsay evidence under CPR 32.5(5). That led Mr Tugendhat to apply to cross-examine on her statements under CPR 33.4(1). I ruled that he could do so and the Court of Appeal, in an interlocutory ruling, upheld that decision. Accordingly Miss Sue Neal was cross-examined by Mr Tugendhat and re-examined by Mr Price.

[23] Mr Philip Ramey, the sixth defendant, a photographer well-known as a paparazzo and who also conducts a photographic agency, has put in a defence (with a statement as to its truth) and a witness statement but otherwise, as I have mentioned, has taken no part in the proceedings. Much of his witness statement is uncontroversial or is confirmed by other evidence but in the absence of his having submitted himself for cross-examination I do not feel able to attach weight to his assertions that he offered European rights to the unauthorised pictures to the Marquessa or that she bought them from him, either on arms' length commercial terms or at all.

[24] There have been several other witness statements by or on behalf of individuals who have not given oral evidence, some on topics which do not yet need to be pursued, and notice as to hearsay evidence has been given in respect of some but I have not felt that any either displaces or adds significantly to conclusions formed on the basis of the other documentary evidence and the evidence given by witnesses whose evidence has been tested by cross-examination.

THE NARRATIVE BEGINS

[25] A chronological order will occasionally have to be departed from but I shall attempt, as far as practicable, to set out the facts I find in that order.

[26] Miss Zeta-Jones and Mr Douglas met in September 1998. A relationship developed. Later they had a holiday together. Articles began to appear in the press about them as a couple. That they might become engaged and marry began to occur to OK! as, doubtless, it did to Hello!. Such events would be exactly the kind each would want to cover. On 6 September 1999, before any engagement had been announced, OK! offered £1m 'subject to contract' for exclusive photographic rights for the engagement, wedding, honeymoon and for Miss Zeta-Jones' thirtieth birthday party.

[27] In September 1999 OK! acquired exclusive photographic rights by contract to the wedding in California and honeymoon of the television presenter Jenny McCarthy and John Asher for $100,000. A term of the contract was that the bride and groom should, at their own expense, provide such reasonable security at the wedding as was reasonably necessary to ensure that unauthorised photographers, journalists and members of the public would be unable to gain access to the grounds and premises so as to minimise the risk of photographs of the wedding being made available to the media. OK! was to make a full feature of the events. None the less, Hello! acquired and published photographs of the wedding, one at least of which has the appearance of being an out-of-focus shot, surreptitiously taken from a low level by a camera of which the bride and groom appear ignorant. Invoices sent to Hello! in respect of the pictures it used were from, respectively, Messrs Ramey, Griffin, Bauer and Thorpe, all photographers to whose names I shall need to return. The invoices bear words, added in handwriting at Hello!'s office, such as 'Ordered by Marquessa and Eduardo' and 'Commissioned by Marquessa and Eduardo'. Mr Ramey makes reference to a

- a 'Day Rate' in his invoice and does not identify the event photographed, referring instead to a 'Special Project'. The others openly refer to the McCarthy wedding. Mr Bauer's invoice refers to '2 days'. The invoices bear marks indicating that they were processed in London. These details came to light only in the course of the trial, after the Marquesa's evidence was concluded. There was no application for her recall. That she had (with Senor Sanchez Junco) an involvement in the
- b arrangements made for the unauthorised photographs is plain not only from the superscriptions on the invoices but also from the fact that Hello! paid her a 'fee for Jenny McCarthy wedding' of £5,000. Although such photographs of paparazzi type were not her usual style, that she could and would take a hand in arrangements for them is plain. OK!'s big feature on the wedding in their issue of 24 September 1999 had some, at least, of its exclusiveness diminished by the
- c unauthorised photographs in Hello!'s issue 579. The Marquesa was able to crow to Anthony Luke, the co-ordinating editor in Madrid: 'My paparazzi spoiled OK!'s Jenny McCarthy wedding.' In respect of aspects of the handling of the Douglas wedding, both sides made reference back to the McCarthy wedding, to emphasise similarities (as did the claimants) or differences (as did the Hello!
- d defendants).

- [28] In December 1999 Miss Zeta-Jones became pregnant with Mr Douglas' child. At a millennium party they agreed they would marry. They started to plan their wedding. They picked New York as a venue roughly central between the
- e United Kingdom to the east and California to the west. The Plaza Hotel was chosen as it had a proven track record for hosting large-scale events which required security. It was also a place where guests could stay and, as Miss Zeta-Jones planned to stay there, she could procure that her arrival at the wedding would not (as she put it) be turned into a media circus.

- f [29] Miss Zeta-Jones did not want to be forced to have her wedding in secret. She had always wanted it, she said, to be a very special day and it was important to her that her family, in particular, would be there to share it with her. There was concern that media intrusion might destroy the intimacy and joy of the event. Miss Simone Martel Levinson was brought in, an experienced event planner. She was told that the bride and groom wanted the wedding to be
- g personal, romantic, intimate and unforgettable.

- [30] Miss Zeta-Jones' pregnancy was thought to be a closely-guarded secret but in January 2000, only some seven to eight weeks into the pregnancy and, as I have touched on already, before Miss Zeta-Jones had either had all of the medical tests which she wished to have or had told her close family, she found that the
- h Sun newspaper had learned of the pregnancy and was going to publish the story. She was forced into announcing the pregnancy to her family before she was ready to do so. As this was to be her first child she had particularly wanted to have every possible test before giving the news to her family. Her inquiries suggested that paparazzi had obtained the information from an assistant in the office of the
- j lawyers then acting for her. Her pregnancy became public knowledge.

[31] OK!'s offer for an exclusive was accordingly modified to include a sum for photographs of both parents and the baby. From about March 2000 Hello! was also in contact with Mr Allen Burry, Mr Douglas' publicist, but Mr Burry had not found it easy to deal with Senor Sanchez Junco's calls because of the language difficulties. The prospective bride and groom had not yet decided whether to permit a feature to be published either of the baby or of the wedding.

APRIL 2000

[32] The Marquesa entered the lists in April 2000. Her personal assistant, Pirjetta Mildh, was in contact with Mr Burry, from whom she heard of his dissatisfaction with his dealings with Madrid. Mr Burry was not averse, though, to dealing with the Marquesa, who made contact with him. The Madrid office of Hello! and Senor Sanchez Junco continued to approach Mr Burry but to no effect save that Mr Burry's displeasure with Madrid grew. The Marquesa felt strongly that Senor Sanchez Junco was mishandling matters, that Hello!'s bid would be far better conducted by her and that, left to itself, Madrid was likely to drive any 'exclusive' into the hands of OK!. The thing that Mr Burry had not been able to get Madrid to grasp, as he put it to Miss Mildh and as she related to the Marquesa, was:

'Money is not the point! The point is doing it with the magazine they like and trust and have a good working relationship with so they can have a lovely wedding without any worries.'

Both OK! and Hello! continued to make offers but Miss Zeta-Jones and Mr Douglas remained undecided not only as between those offerors but as to coverage of the prospective events at all, the events, by May, being, of course, not only the wedding but the earlier birth of Miss Zeta-Jones' first child, expected in August 2000.

[33] On 3 May 2000 the Marquesa, for Hello!, wrote to Mr Burry to say that Senor Sanchez Junco offered $500,000 for exclusive pictures of the mother and father with their baby and £1m for the wedding. Mr Burry, though, had wanted clear written proposals from Hello!. That elicited a further offer from Senor Sanchez Junco, now put at $1.5m for the wedding alone. His proposals, which he described as '[t]he biggest investment ever made by our magazine', included that Hello!'s own photographers should cover the event as well as those selected by the bride and groom. He was also keen to ensure that the one approved picture, which the couple were going to release generally and gratis to the media on the day, should not be released until Hello! had appeared on the market. He also wanted that free picture to be 'a medium shot' rather than a close-up or full-length photograph. Neither of those provisions was likely to commend itself to the couple.

[34] At Hello! it was felt, rightly as it transpired, that negotiations were going OK!'s way. The Marquesa felt that if the exclusive for the baby was lost to Hello!, it would be likely to lose the wedding as well. Hello!, by way of the Marquesa, on 21 July increased its offer to $600,000 for the baby pictures and £1m for the wedding but to no avail.

[35] On 8 August 2000 Senor Sanchez Junco, disappointed and feeling that Hello! would not get the exclusive, telephoned the Marquesa, who was in New York trying to encourage Mr Burry to deal with Hello!. She told Senor Sanchez Junco that if the couple would not deal with Hello! then the only option was to contact, and buy pictures from, paparazzi. There was nothing new about that as a possibility to Senor Sanchez Junco; he has bought pictures from paparazzi including the two I shall next mention, for years. Senor Sanchez Junco told her that Sue Neal, the Hello! pictures editor in London, was already in contact with two paparazzi, Phil Ramey and Frank Griffin. In so holding I have preferred the evidence of the Marquesa to that of Senor Sanchez Junco. Of the two

- a photographers, both had wide reputations as paparazzi. Mr Ramey, in particular, a difficult man to deal with, was renowned as an aggressive photographer; as the Marquesa put it: 'You know, he can get into anyone's house and do the pictures.' Sue Neal described him as a confident gatecrasher. Senor Sanchez Junco knew of his reputation. The Marquesa volunteered to get in touch with the paparazzi and did so. It suited both Senor Sanchez Junco and the Marquesa that it should be the
- b Marquesa who should contact the paparazzi. Senor Sanchez Junco might well have felt disappointed at his own handling so far of the Douglas wedding and would in any event have been willing to pass it to the Marquesa but more probable was it that he, in this respect a cautious or even fearful man, saw it to be unwise to be seen to be in direct contact with paparazzi whose means of obtaining photographs, certainly any inside the wedding, might well be at best
- c dubious or at worst unlawful. The Marquesa, whose star had been waning at Hello!, was not unwilling to have the chance of emerging as the 'fixer' who could come up with some solution where all others had failed, thus hoping to restore herself more fully to Senor Sanchez Junco's favour.

- d [36] The Marquesa told each of Ramey and Griffin that Senor Sanchez Junco was keen to get first refusal on any pictures that might be obtained of the Douglas wedding. Each said that he already dealt with Sue Neal and that the wedding had already been discussed with her.

THE $10,000

- e [37] Mr Ramey asked the Marquesa whether Senor Sanchez Junco would be prepared to pay $10,000 as a sign of goodwill, because expenses would be incurred. In her witness statement the Marquesa says: 'I assured Mr Ramey that I did not think this would be a problem but I would ask Eduardo if he was willing to accept Phil Ramey's request.'

- f [38] It has since suited Mr Ramey to describe that conversation to Hello!, including to Sue Neal, as a promise of $10,000 in any event and it is likely that the Marquesa did express herself to him with some assurance as to the $10,000 being paid. In an e-mail much later, of 17 December 2000, she wrote, of the $10,000, 'that I could assure him of that'. But I accept also that when she spoke to Senor Sanchez Junco on the point he told her it would not be paid and that she passed the message on to Mr Ramey, but coupled with the encouraging addition that
- g Senor Sanchez Junco would pay (meaning pay well) for good pictures. If there had been a clear promise of $10,000 in advance either for pictures or for a right of first refusal it was, I hold, soon supplanted by Mr Ramey being left in no doubt, instead, that Hello! was very keen to acquire pictures, however they might be taken, and, as the Marquesa put it, 'there's nobody who has paid like
- h Mr Sanchez'.

- j [39] On 16 August 2000 the Marquesa sent a draft contract to Mr Burry under which the deal would not be with Hello! but with a company of hers, Marquesa Productions Ltd of the British Virgin Islands. She had not appreciated that Mr Burry would not recommend any contract other than directly with a magazine publisher.

[40] Hello! further harmed its cause when it bought paparazzo pictures of the mother, father and baby after the birth of Dylan Douglas to the couple in August 2000. OK! had succeeded in obtaining exclusive picture rights to photographs of the parents with their new baby. The 'shoot' went well and the parents developed a trust in Martin Townsend, OK!'s editor. The money for the photographs was put into a trust for the infant Dylan Douglas.

[41] By contrast, as the couple, the three-week-old baby and their nurse left the hospital, paparazzi managed to take photographs without the parents' consent nor, so far as one can tell, with their even being aware that they were being photographed. Similar photographs were taken of the mother, father and baby without the nurse. Hello! bought those pictures and published them. When the Marquesa pressed Hello!'s case by referring to how vulgar, she said, had been OK!'s coverage of another celebrity wedding, Mr Burry's response was: 'At least OK! was smart enough to turn down the hospital departure pictures when they were offered to them.'

[42] Hello! was not prepared to give up. It attempted to make fresh contact by other intermediaries; desperation was setting in, with Senor Sanchez Junco not only having in mind, of course, payment to the bride and groom but even payment of substantial sums to an intermediary who might restore contact with them. It was to no avail; on 6 November Mr Burry indicated that the couple had decided that they would offer the wedding for publication, but to OK!. Mr Burry turned to giving Mr Townsend details of the event.

[43] The plan, in outline, was for a wedding in New York at the Plaza Hotel with a dinner the night before at the Russian Tea Room for the guests from out of town. The ceremony itself was to be conducted by a judge and was to be non-denominational. There were to be some 360 or so guests, of whom 84 were to be the bride's relatives and friends flying in from the United Kingdom and the rest were the groom's family and mutual friends of bride and groom.

[44] That was the plan but, for the moment, it lay in the future. In the meantime, Sue Neal, in London had almost daily contact with Phil Ramey and Frank Griffin, part of a clique which included Rupert Thorpe and Randy Bauer. Sometime around August 2000 Mr Ramey told Miss Neal that 'Your Marquesa' had told him that Senor Sanchez Junco had asked her to see if it was possible to get photographs of the Douglas wedding. Mr Ramey told Miss Neal that he preferred to deal with someone he knew. By that he meant Miss Neal. Miss Neal got the impression that the Marquesa had had only one or two conversations with Mr Ramey. Mr Luke told Miss Neal that Senor Sanchez Junco was seeking to obtain pictures of the wedding from any source. Miss Neal told Mr Ramey that if he wanted to send pictures of the wedding to Hello! that that was up to him but she did tell him that Senor Sanchez Junco was extremely interested in obtaining them. She left it on the basis that Mr Ramey was not obliged to supply any, nor was Hello! to accept any. Her understanding was that Senor Sanchez Junco was dealing with the Douglas wedding himself instead of the Marquesa.

[45] In his frequent calls to Miss Neal on other subjects Mr Ramey would try to find out whether Hello! had managed to get exclusive rights to the wedding. He wanted to know so as to target whichever magazine had not got the exclusive. Sue Neal at that stage knew nothing and told him nothing; it was left as a subject to be reverted to nearer the time of the wedding.

[46] Miss Martel Levinson did her best in the course of her arrangements for the wedding, to ensure that the venue of the wedding was kept secret. Suppliers or prospective suppliers of goods and services were asked to sign confidentiality agreements. Many are in the evidence. After the wedding it was found that a few people had not signed such agreements but her evidence, which I accept, was that—a [e]veryone whom I hired to deal with some aspects of the wedding knew from my discussions with them that the plans for the wedding were confidential and were not to reach the public arena.'

[47] Unfortunately one of the florists who had tendered for the work, albeit unsuccessfully, told the New York Post, who then published, that the wedding was going to be held at the Plaza Hotel. The original plan had been to tell invitees only that the wedding was to be in New York City on 18 November 2000, the precise venue and time then to be given only at the last minute. The florist's breach required a change of plan. The invitations went out in their original form but on acceptance a second notice was sent indicating that the wedding was to be at the Plaza at 7.00 pm, coupled with a request from the bride and groom that no photographic equipment should be brought. The message—'We would appreciate no photography or video devices at the ceremony or reception'—whilst not an outright prohibition, was as nearly so as one might reasonably address to family and friends. An entry card was required to be produced at the entrance to the Rose Room on the evening of the wedding. Entrance to the hotel was to be by way of the Rose Room.

A STRATEGY FOR THE WEDDING

[48] Whilst reflecting on their possible arrangements for the wedding, Miss Zeta-Jones and Mr Douglas looked back on the successful event that had been the presentation to the public of their baby, Dylan. The exclusive rights sold to OK! had led to excellent photographs being published without any real media intrusion. Miss Zeta-Jones' witness statement says, and I accept, as follows:

f 'When considering how to deal with the inevitable media interest in our wedding we ultimately decided to go down the same route that we had chosen in respect of Dylan's birth. We decided that, with a view to reducing the media frenzy for photographs of the wedding and protecting our wedding day from the inevitable media intrusion, we would reach an agreement with a magazine which we would allow to publish a limited number of our wedding photographs. We hoped that once the rest of the media found out that we had entered into such an arrangement they would be less interested in trying to infiltrate our wedding. This would leave us and our guests free to enjoy the day without worrying about the media. Both Michael and I also accept that as celebrities we have an obligation not to ignore those people who make us celebrities, the people who pay money to watch our movies. One of the reasons that we decided to reach a deal with a magazine was to make contact with our fans and to avoid the accusation that we had shunned them or were too aloof. We wanted to do so in a context where the choice was ours as to what was and was not published about our wedding, not left to a media free-for-all.'

j [49] Mr Douglas' evidence in the same area was to similar effect though more emphasising control. He said:

'Eventually, we decided that the best way to control the media and to protect our privacy would be to reach an agreement with a single magazine or newspaper who would have the rights to publish photographs of, and text about, our child and our wedding, and to syndicate the photographs and text to specified and pre-agreed publications around the world.'

[50] Miss Cece Yorke, Miss Zeta-Jones' publicist, thought the strategy a good one. She said: a

'I really felt that if other publications knew that one magazine was going to have an exclusive story with beautiful photographs and access to Michael and Catherine they would think there was no point in publishing poor quality photographs with no quotes from the bride and groom or the family. It seemed to me that the public would want to see the beautiful photos and to hear the real story and that would be the calculation that the media would also make. I believed that the exclusive arrangement with OK! was the best option in the circumstances. We decided that we would also release one official photograph to everyone else on the actual day of the wedding (since the official photographs would not be published in OK! for a little while).'

[51] An initial view, that there should be no press involvement at all and that the media would have to be satisfied with one released authorised photograph, was thought to be unrealistic. The media would try to get their own photographs. Other celebrity weddings had been spoilt by intrusions. Having the wedding at the Plaza eliminated the risk of helicopters that had intruded in other cases but Mr Burry said: d

'Having seen the determination and lack of scruples of the media at earlier celebrity weddings, we became more and more convinced that we should provide, on an exclusive basis, official photographs of the wedding personally selected by the bride and groom to a single media organisation who would then syndicate those photographs to other publications of our choice. It was our hope that the rest of the world's media would be discouraged from trying to infiltrate the wedding as they would know that the official photographs would be published and syndicated exclusively elsewhere. We thought that by providing a limited number of "authorised" pictures of the wedding we would reduce the price that illicitly-obtained photographs of the wedding could command and therefore reduce the incentive of any photographer to take such photographs. In the past I have found that if you give an exclusive to one magazine its rivals tend to be philosophical, hoping that they will get the next exclusive. They will act accordingly, not wanting to damage their chances of an exclusive in the future. We all thought that this would be the best way for Catherine and Michael to retain their privacy and the intimate and private nature of the wedding.'

[52] Mr Price cross-examined as to this strategy, broadly suggesting that it was more for money than for privacy, could not be expected or be believed to work and was aimed at control of the media. That it involved control was plain. But, as to money, Mr Douglas pointed out that neither bride nor groom nor publicist approached the magazines but the magazines had approached them. Nor had the bride and groom or their agents negotiated about price. Indeed, they could very readily have organised transactions so as to have received more than they did. As for the strategy, it worked (as will transpire) for all but one paparazzo and, as Mr Douglas said: h

'... it was not that we did not think that the public would not be interested, we thought that the paparazzi's desire would be lowered because they would not have very many outlets, and therefore they personally would not

- a be able to make as much money selling them individually, so that they said, "Oh well, I don't think its worth it".

On the evidence I hold that the notion of an exclusive contract as a means of reducing the risk of intrusion by unauthorised members of the media and hence of preserving the privacy of a celebrity occasion is a notion that can reasonably be believed in as a potentially workable strategy to achieve such ends and was
b honestly believed in by Miss Zeta-Jones, Mr Douglas and their advisers. The fact that, because of one lapse, the strategy failed does not disprove its reasonableness, still less that it was believed in. Whilst I would not hold the £1m on offer to be other than a real blandishment even to a couple as rich as Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones, I see their expectation that an exclusive contract to one selected c publisher offered the best strategy for obtaining a wedding of the kind they both wanted and offered also the certainty of fair coverage of it as their chief reason for making such a contract.

THE CONTRACT WITH OK!; 10 NOVEMBER 2000

- [53] On 10 November 2000 basic terms of a contract under Californian law
d between OK! and Mr Burry on behalf of the bride and groom were agreed in writing. £500,000 was to be paid to each of 'MKD' and 'CZJ' not later than a week before the wedding. OK! was given exclusive rights to publish photographs selected for the purpose by 'MKD' and 'CZJ'. Each of 'MKD' and 'CZJ' was given 'copy caption and headline approval over any syndication of the photographs', e such approval not to be unreasonably withheld. The photographs were to be in colour and were to be taken by photographers chosen and paid for by 'MKD' and 'CZJ', who were required (cl 6) to—

- [u]se their best efforts to ensure that no other media ... shall be permitted f access to the wedding and that no guests or anyone else present at the wedding (including staff at the venues) shall be allowed to take photographs.'

- [54] Copyright in the photographs was to be in 'MKD' and 'CZJ', who were to approve such photographs as they chose to release not later than 22 November 2000. Text approval was also given to 'MKD' and 'CZJ'. The Douglasses could, had they wished, have chosen to release no photographs or too few to make a g feature, but on pain of repayment to OK! (cl 9). If syndication brought in more than £1m the excess was to be split 50% to OK! and 25% each to 'MKD' and 'CZJ', but OK! was to have the first £1m. Clause 16 provided:

- 'MKD and CZJ will take all reasonable means to provide such security
h (approved by OK magazine) during the entirety of the wedding proceedings at the wedding venues as is necessary to ensure that third party media ... and/or members of the public and/or staff hired or employed for the wedding are unable to gain access to the relevant wedding grounds and the venues in order to minimise the risk of photographs and/or footage of the wedding (including but not limited to photographs/footage of the wedding j dress, the ceremony and the party) may be made available to third party media.'

[55] In the week beginning 13 November, the week before the wedding, Hello! was alive to a prospect of getting photographs from inside the wedding. Mr Luke told Sue Neal: 'We might be getting something.' Senor Sanchez Junco said so to Mr Luke, as did Maggie Koumi, the London editor. Both Phil Ramey and Frank Griffin told Sue Neal: 'Don't forget the weekend.' On Thursday 16 or

Friday 17 November Mr Ramey told Miss Neal that he was trying to get someone into the wedding to take pictures. She told that to Mr Luke, who asked her to go into work over the weekend. That was so that technical incompatibility problems could be overcome by pictures from the United States of America going to Madrid via London. There was confidence that at the very least there would be pictures from outside the wedding, of the guests arriving.

THE RUSSIAN TEA ROOM; 17 NOVEMBER 2000

[56] As planned, a dinner was held the night before the wedding at the Russian Tea Room. The photographs of this event, later spread over some eight or nine pages in Hello!'s issue 639, show the press to have been there in massive strength. Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones paused to pose frequently for photographs, as did members of the respective families and their friends.

HELLO! MAKES ARRANGEMENTS

[57] In the meantime, Hello! was planning the issue (no 639) of Hello! due to appear next after the wedding, on Saturday 18 November 2000. It was scheduled to be distributed in London on Tuesday 21 November and in the rest of the United Kingdom on Wednesday 22 November. It was not unknown in 2000 and earlier for the greater part of the magazine to be printed (in Spain, as then was the case), section by section, over the Thursday and Friday of a given week but with the final centre pages and, if appropriate, the cover and back page to be either re-cast or left to the last convenient time, either so as to cover an unexpected event or some event likely to happen at the weekend concerned. Late changes to the magazine shortly before or even after first going to print had been made on occasions such as the deaths of Jackie Kennedy Onassis and Princess Diana and upon John Kennedy Jr and his wife going missing. A late special edition added photographs of Madonna's wedding and her baby's christening. The Tuesday distribution date could not be postponed. Hello! had begun to plan for an issue 639 which would have on its cover Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones outside the Russian Tea Room in New York on the Friday evening of 17 November. Neither OK! nor anyone else had exclusive rights as to that and it could be expected that there would be ample opportunity for photographs of the couple, their family and friends, as they arrived and left. At least photographs for the cover showing the couple could be expected to be obtained (leaving the centre to be filled with a different feature) but even that would leave a tight timetable because of the time difference between Madrid and New York and the time necessarily taken up with processing, selection, printing and movement to London for distribution by the Tuesday. Such movement was, in ordinary course, by lorry.

[58] The photographs of the Russian Tea Room event arrived in Spain on Saturday 18 November. Mr Luke said at first that they arrived on Saturday morning but he settled into saying that they arrived late on Saturday. On that basis, printing of the cover and final section (leaving aside any prospect of later paparazzo photographs taken at the wedding itself) would probably not have started until Sunday 19 November. On the question of whether, on that basis, lorries could not be used but recourse would have had to have been made to aircraft, Mr Luke said:

'Yes it would have to have flown I think at that stage, because we were getting really late, and being in direct competition with OK! we could not lose any days on the [news] stand.'

a On that basis (which I accept) special arrangements would have needed to be made for airfreight even if only the Russian Tea Room photographs had been awaited.

[59] Airfreight was arranged, additional copies of Hello! were ordered to be printed and staff were called in, both in London and Madrid, to deal with the preparation of the magazine over the weekend. Mr Tugendhat argues that all this shows that Hello! was anticipating a high-selling issue and that it points to Hello!'s having commissioned in advance a breach of OK!'s exclusivity and an intrusion upon the Douglasses' privacy. He argued that Hello! had been assured of obtaining unauthorised photographs of the wedding. There is, I would accept, some documentary support for such a view. The Hello! print records show that the print order was greatly increased; an invoice shows that a freight aircraft was chartered on 17 November for 173,950 Euros (part of which sum had to be paid whether the plane transpired to be used or not) and there is no doubt but that staff had been called in or retained to work at the weekend. There is, though, a good deal of contrary evidence indicating that there had been no assurance that paparazzo photographs would be available from inside the wedding or even that a right of first refusal had been given to Hello!. Senor Sanchez Junco in cross-examination was emphatic that there had been no prior commitment to any paparazzi to buy any photographs. I have already indicated that there was no unsupplanted agreement even that Hello! should have a right of first refusal (though it would be an obvious course for a paparazzo to approach Hello! first). Mr Luke's evidence was that Senor Sanchez Junco was 'a very visual man'; he would not pay anything, he said, for a picture before he had seen it and never paid paparazzi advance fees. Mr Luke also described the Douglas wedding as 'an amazing event' for people who read magazines such as Hello! and OK!. It was, he said, the event of the year. Even if no photographs had been obtained from inside the wedding itself and Hello! had had to rely on the Russian Tea Room pictures or ones of guests arriving at the wedding, the publishers could thus be expected to arrange for greater sales than usual. Moreover, as I have indicated, an aircraft and weekend working would have been necessary even if only the Russian Tea Room photographs had been used. Nor have I any evidence that even an aggressive paparazzo such as Mr Ramey could be sure that the elaborate security surrounding the wedding could be overridden and that photographs within the wedding would assuredly become available. These events do not, in my judgment, indicate that Hello! had commissioned the breach and intrusion which I shall come on to describe. The fact that a second freight aircraft was chartered on Monday 20 November, only after the unauthorised pictures had arrived, does nothing to support a view that even before they arrived it was known that they would.

[60] To the same end a comparison was made with the material relating to the McCarthy wedding. That material, not put to the Marquesa for an explanation, seems to show the Marquesa in a closer relationship with the very same paparazzi as were used in the Douglas case than her own evidence suggested. It also shows creditors' descriptions and the debtor's written additions on the McCarthy invoices to be in some respects like those found on one invoice in the Douglas case. But there are differences; the McCarthy invoices include daily rates payable to the photographers, a system more likely to be indicative of a true pre-commissioning of the paparazzi than is shown on the invoices as to the Douglas wedding, which have no daily rates. Indeed, so little was said in evidence about the role of the paparazzi or of the Marquesa in the McCarthy case that I cannot hold that in that case the paparazzi were commissioned in advance and, in turn, cannot hold that, because of the similarities in the two cases, the paparazzi were therefore also so commissioned in the Douglass case. a

ARRANGEMENTS FOR SECURITY AT THE PLAZA HOTEL

[61] On 17 November 2000, the day before the wedding, entry cards were hand-delivered to all guests staying in New York and were sent by courier to guests out of town, to arrive on 17 November. This late delivery was to reduce the risk of their being copied. Miss Martel Levinson had marked each card with a code that indicated to her (but only to her) the identity of the guest related to that card and with an invisible ink design on the back which only she knew. The entry cards indicated whether they were for one or two guests. b

[62] There was a fear that the Plaza's fire alarm system might be tampered with (driving everyone into the street, where they then could be photographed at will) so a specialist fire firm that worked in conjunction with the New York Fire Department was brought in and a technician monitored the fire alarm system of the hotel throughout the wedding. c

[63] Three private security companies were employed and there was consultation with the New York Police Department and the Fire Department. The Plaza's own security staff had the task of ensuring that other guests staying at the hotel did not stray from the public areas of the hotel into those reserved for the wedding. The rooms used for the wedding were regularly 'swept' until an hour before the ceremony to ensure there were no hidden sound or video devices. Special arrangements were made for exclusive use of the lifts in the hotel. Guests arriving by car were required to enter a special car tent where the invisible ink on the entry card could be inspected. The car tent was secured at all access points by police. Barriers were erected so that the press could take photographs of guests entering the hotel but could not get too near the entrance. d

[64] Guests had to enter the Rose Room of the hotel. There was a sign there reminding them that photography was not permitted. Entry cards were then checked against the code to ensure that appearances corresponded with the invitation. If all was well, on the entry card being handed in a gold wedding pin was given to the guests, the design of which had been commissioned by the bride and groom and had, so far as practical, been kept secret. e

[65] Arrangements were made so that if it was found at entry that any guest had brought a camera, it would be required to be checked in at the cloakroom and the guest would be reminded that there was to be no photography. If the camera was discovered inside the wedding, security staff were to remove the film, develop it at the Douglasses' expense and return all photographs save for any of the wedding. A computer was on hand so that digital films could be processed so as to obliterate any shots of the wedding but not any other pictures on the film. In some six or eight cases a guest or other person present, without having tried to conceal it, had been found to have a camera or video with him or her and the arrangements I have described were then implemented. In one of the cases the camera had been held quite openly by a member of the Welsh choir which was to entertain the guests and that led to the whole choir being 'frisked'. No other camera was found on them. Comprehensive arrangements were also made to ensure that the copyright in the photographs taken by the official photographers (selected and paid for by the Douglasses) belonged to the bride and groom and that no unauthorised copies could be made from their films, which were taken off for processing and processed under the eyes of security staff. f

- a [66] Miss Martel Levinson gave oral evidence of how every corridor on the relevant floor in the hotel was, as she put it, 'locked down'; to ensure that other hotel guests could not stray into the wedding she blocked off some 30 to 40 rooms and put security staff in for the entire weekend beginning on the Friday night, even in stairwells. It was arranged that only one bank of elevators would serve the floor in question and that was reserved for the bride and groom to move from
- b the suite which they were occupying to the ceremony and, after it, to the reception in the ballroom immediately above. Her evidence in her cross-examination by Mr Price included:

- c 'Everyone felt confident that it would be as locked down as we could and that with the presence of security people at all of these posts, it was very clear that this was a private function.'

- To which Mr Price replied: 'Oh, I am sure it was.' She had been careful to look at all possible situations, she said, having had security teams and meetings looking at every possible situation and scenario. To Mr Tugendhat's question as to whether Mr Thorpe (the one paparazzo who got in and took photographs, as
- d I shall come on to describe) could have got in to any of the rooms where the wedding or reception was taking place without his realising that he was forbidden to be there, she replied: 'Absolutely not.' I accept her evidence. To the extent that privacy consists of the inclusion only of the invited and the exclusion of all others, the wedding was as private as was possible consistent with its being a
- e socially pleasant event. Equally, the arrangements made to ensure that only authorised photographs could emerge, after their approval by the bride and groom, of the ceremony and reception, were as comprehensive in design and execution as could be made in relation to such an event. The security bill alone was for $66,006. Mr Thorpe, it transpires, was not the only person to have succeeded in making some unauthorised visual or sound recording of the events
- f on the day but no one else's record has led, as it would seem, to any form of publication and, perhaps for that reason, little was said about these other forms of record and I do not hold their existence to be indicative of the security arrangements not having been reasonable.

THE WEDDING; THE EVENING OF 18 NOVEMBER 2000

- g [67] There are undoubtedly some events not otherwise of interest to the public that become of such interest by reason of the celebrities who attend. Minor celebrities may thus aggrandise their events by inviting major ones. When that is done an intrinsically private event might come to be regarded and be intended to be regarded as a public one. But the Douglas wedding was not such
- h an event. The guest list, which was not publicised at the time, has been made available and there, amongst or alongside the 120 or so members of either the bride's or groom's family, are many names that anyone would recognise as famous or celebrated. However, it was not successfully shown to me that anyone who was not truly family or friend was invited (although, inevitably, there were
- j some cases, where a guest and his or her partner were invited, in which only the guest could be truly described as a direct friend). In that sense the wedding was not a celebrity event and I accept Miss Zeta-Jones' evidence that it was not intended to be one.

[68] Further, the Douglasses had no need to and did not themselves take any steps to stir up publicity for the event. Even without any 'hype' it was going to be, as Hello! later described it, 'the showbiz wedding of the year'. I accept

Mr Douglas' evidence that '[w]e issued absolutely no press releases at all concerning the wedding and none of the pre-wedding press coverage was initiated by us'.

[69] In the Court of Appeal, Brooke LJ ([2001] 2 All ER 289 at 304, [2001] QB 967 at 984 (para 57)), after referring to the wedding as a private occasion, later said of the bride and groom ([2001] 2 All ER 289 at 314, [2001] QB 967 at 995 (para 95)) that—

'[t]hey did not choose to have a private wedding, attended by a few members of their family and a few friends, in the normal sense of the words "private wedding".'

I would be uneasy at characterising a wedding as not private simply on the basis of numbers, especially where the means of the parties were so ample that even a lavish wedding for 350 to 360 would not make real inroads, where the couple was popular enough to have many friends and where elaborate security arrangements were in place. But, amongst the evidence which I have had but which was not available before the Court of Appeal, is not only Miss Martel Levinson's as to security arrangements and the guest list itself but also Mr Douglas' which includes:

'Out of our guest list, approximately 125 of our guests were family members. Both Catherine and I have very extensive families. My mother, for instance, has six brothers and sisters. My father has six sisters. It was therefore impossible for us to invite all the members of my family that I would have liked to have invited. If we had invited all the members of our families that we had wanted to then we would have needed a considerably larger venue or would not have been able to invite any of our friends.'

It was, in my judgment, a private wedding.

[70] The wedding, a 'black tie' event, began on 18 November at around 7.30–8 pm New York time. It was a great success. It went off, as it seemed, without a hitch. The cake was cut at about midnight and the reception ran on until 5 or 6 am in the morning of Sunday 19 November. Miss Zeta-Jones' evidence is that—

'[i]t was exactly the wedding I wanted—a homely wedding not withstanding the fact that it was on a large scale. We had managed to have a private wedding for our family and friends without suffering the intrusion of the media into our special day. We spent the first day of our "honeymoon" reminiscing about what a wonderful time we and our guests had had.'

There had been speeches, entertainers, music and dancing. The bride, as one might expect, danced with the groom. Mr Douglas' evidence is that—

'[t]he wedding was a great success. I believe that all of our guests had a wonderful time and the atmosphere was tremendously warm and family-oriented. We could not have asked for a more wonderful wedding.'

A PAPARAZZO GOT IN

[71] Although this was not known at the time, a paparazzo photographer, Rupert Thorpe, had infiltrated the wedding and, without anyone's consent or knowledge, had surreptitiously taken photographs that included the bride, the

- a groom, the wedding dress and the cake. Whilst, as will appear, it soon became apparent that unauthorised pictures had been taken, Thorpe's identity was not discovered until shortly before trial. When all the authorised pictures were duly examined, a man standing in a dinner jacket was seen in one photograph holding a small camera cupped in his hands, below waist level. The camera is tilted, presumably in the hope (as no viewfinder could be used) that it was pointed in the intended direction. The photograph of him does not reliably show whether or not he was wearing one of the small identifying gold pins, if only because the photographs of guests who would undoubtedly have had pins do not invariably show that the pin has caught the light and so had shown up on the photographs. The man in the photograph was later identified as Rupert Thorpe, who is normally based in California. Later still inquiries have suggested that he attended with his then fiancée, Michelle Day, and that both had stayed at the Plaza. How he got into the wedding has not been established. As I shall show, he seems to have been working in some loose association with Phil Ramey and others but whether some others tried to get in but failed or got in but failed to be able to take any photographs is unknown. The trial has proceeded on the tacit assumption that Mr Thorpe was the only paparazzo intruder and that the unauthorised photographs were taken by him.

THE UNAUTHORISED PHOTOGRAPHS ARE PURCHASED

- [72] At about 11 pm, London time, on 18 November photographs connected with the Douglas wedding began to arrive by ISDN line from the United States to Sue Neal in London. Some were from agencies but, later, some were from paparazzi including Frank Griffin, who had received them in Los Angeles in digital form from New York. Sue Neal called them up on her screen in London and then forwarded them by ISDN line to Mr Luke in Madrid for him to show them to Senor Sanchez Junco. Mr Luke had spoken to Mr Ramey to be sure the latter had the appropriate address for Hello! so that he would be able to send the photographs in electronic form. Some of these photographs were presumably of guests arriving outside the wedding, as to which no complaint is made, but these first photographs to arrive could not yet have included the cutting of the cake at midnight New York time.
- e
- f

- [73] At some stage photographs on the inside of the wedding, so to speak, of the bride walking down the aisle to the ceremony and then at the reception must have begun to come through. Sue Neal called them up on her screen in London and Mr Luke printed them out in Spain to show them to Senor Sanchez Junco. Mr Ramey telephoned Sue Neal to ask whether she had received the photographs. Running into the early hours of Sunday 19 November she had as many as some 10 to 15 telephone calls. At some point, I assume when as many of the 'inside' photographs had been passed to Madrid as there were likely to be, the telephone calls turned to how much would be paid for them. Mr Ramey in California was on one line to Sue Neal in London; she was at the same time on another telephone to Mr Luke on his mobile in Madrid and, standing alongside Mr Luke, only a couple of feet or so away, was Senor Sanchez Junco, who could speak and understand little English. Ramey spoke to Neal, Neal spoke to Luke, Luke translated into Spanish for Sanchez Junco. The process was then reversed.
- g
- h
- j

[74] Ramey began by demanding £200,000 but after a number of calls Senor Sanchez Junco, by the means I have described, agreed to pay Ramey £125,000, the Dollar equivalent of which was then $188,000. By now it was well into Sunday 19 November. Sue Neal had been able to hear Luke speaking to Sanchez Junco and he speaking to Luke. In the last of the calls Ramey asked Sue Neal to confirm the fee in writing, which she did by fax to Ramey Photograph Agency from 'Sue Neal—Picture Editor' on Hello! writing paper. Her fax records agreement at £125,000 for exclusive rights 'to the above pictures' (not otherwise identified): 'For Hello! UK, Hola Spain and Oh La France; it is agreed that you will invoice in US Dollars for US $188,000.' Sue Neal signed the fax. She expected to receive an invoice for $188,000, an expectation which confirms that the invoice was to be directed to Hello! and that Hello! and not the Marquesa was the purchaser. a

[75] There is no suggestion in the evidence that the Marquesa knew of, took any part in or even had her name mentioned in these dealings with Ramey, nor could anyone party to the dealings have thought that she was any part of them. She was asleep in Sotogrande.

[76] The photographs received, of the order of some 15 in all, included the six whose publication is complained of. The composition is generally poor and two are well out of focus. None shows any awareness on the part of the subject that a photograph was being taken and it can be assumed none used flash. The photograph of the bride going down the aisle towards the wedding ceremony on the arm of her father cuts off all of him but his arm. Two show the bride eating, one of which has the groom holding a fork down into her mouth. In one she playfully holds up a cake knife at her husband. In one taken from a very low level she dances, but not with the groom. Another, hopelessly out of focus, shows the bride and groom kissing. The bride's dress is shown to a greater or lesser extent in all six and parts of the very elaborate wedding cake are visible in three. In one the foreground seems to consist of the arm of, and lighting held by, an authorised photographer. c

[77] Having received the photographs Senor Sanchez Junco set about arranging a layout, his usual task. The ISDN line at Hello!'s office in Madrid had been installed prior to 1998. In Madrid some thin lines appearing on the unauthorised photographs as they had arrived were processed out by the printers, using a computer program. The photographs had been sent to the printers in Spain from Hello!'s Madrid office in electronic form. Senor Sanchez Junco telephoned the Marquesa at about 4 am Spanish time on the Sunday morning to tell her that he had got some wedding pictures after all. He was very pleased. He mentioned that Mr Ramey had taken them. She had incurred telephone call charges in connection with her earlier unsuccessful efforts on Hello!'s behalf and she took the opportunity to raise with him whether she could raise an invoice for them. He said she could. f

[78] Senor Sanchez Junco completed the layout; the front cover was changed to include an amalgam of one of the unauthorised pictures and an insert of a Russian Tea Room picture; parts of an earlier layout were discarded and the revised format was sent to the printers some time on Sunday morning. h

[79] As he set about arranging the unauthorised photographs into a layout for an issue of Hello!, Senor Sanchez Junco well knew that OK! had obtained an exclusive contract for coverage of the Douglas wedding. He knew of Ramey's reputation and the kind of work that Ramey handled and the intrusive systems which paparazzi such as Ramey employed. It was a kind of journalism he and Hello! did not like, he said, and usually tried to avoid. At least a part of the reasons for Senor Sanchez Junco's insistence that Ramey should not be commissioned in advance, was in my judgment, that he, as a cautious man, was uncomfortable in being seen, as a commission would involve, to be procuring the sort of unpredictable and possibly unlawful activity that a paparazzo of Ramey's j a reputation might get up to. Whilst he would not have known of the specific language used, Senor Sanchez Junco knew that a feature of OK!'s 'exclusive' would have been that security arrangements were required by contract so far as was reasonable to ensure that only those invited or duly employed would be present at the wedding and that no photographs were to be taken other than the authorised ones. For example, Hello!'s own pleaded exclusive contract for b coverage of the wedding of Gloria Hunniford required reasonable security to be enforced. Such arrangements had to be contemplated by those in the trade as an inevitable concomitant of an 'exclusive', certainly where as much as £1m was at stake.

[80] It was obvious to him that the photographs were unauthorised. He said in cross-examination that he had no doubt but that the person who did the c photographs was trying to hide himself. He was then asked:

'Mr Tugendhat: Did you ask Mr Ramey any questions about how the photographs were taken? Witness: No.

Mr Tugendhat: Is that because you did not care whether they were taken d legally or illegally? Witness: No, it was because I didn't want any information. I didn't want to know anything about it. I wasn't curious about it. I didn't want to know.'

Similarly, to Mr Luke, co-ordinating editor in Madrid, it was a matter of indifference how the photographs had been obtained. Senor Sanchez Junco e knew from his contacts with Mr Burry that the Douglasses had been insisting on control over what photographs would be released and his own proposals to Mr Burry of May 2000 had accordingly offered the Douglasses full picture approval rights.

[81] In my judgment Senor Sanchez Junco knew and ought to have known, as he selected the unauthorised photographs for publication, that what he was
f doing would or might significantly diminish the benefits which OK! would otherwise derive from its exclusive contract with the Douglasses, that it would deny the Douglasses the picture approval which he knew they wanted and which he would have expected them to have procured in their contract with OK! and that the taking of the unauthorised photographs, which he had been careful not g to commission, would have involved at least a trespass or some deceit or misrepresentation on the photographer's part in order for the photographer to overcome the security arrangements which, in outline, he knew or must be taken to have known to have been in place at a wedding which he had no reason to think was other than private. It was obvious, agreed Sue Neal, Hello!'s picture editor at the time, that the photographs had been taken by someone 'who had no h business to be there'. Mrs Cartwright's evidence was that they had to have been taken surreptitiously.

THE CLAIMANTS LEARN OF THE UNAUTHORISED PHOTOGRAPHS

[82] At some time on Monday morning (London time), 20 November, OK!'s j editor, Mr Martin Townsend, and picture editor, Mr Paul Anderson, learned, in London, that unauthorised photographs of the wedding were on the market. Nine low resolution photographs, understood at that time to have been taken by Mr Ramey, were faxed to OK! by an agency in Holland. Mr Anderson telephoned Mr Ramey who called back in the afternoon. Mr Ramey said that he was merely Eduardo Sanchez's agent for selling the photographs in the United States. Mr Anderson had been told to buy the photographs if he could so as to take them off the market. Later still—evening, London time—Mr Ramey a telephoned Mr Anderson to say that he was withdrawing the photographs from all the United States magazines to which he had distributed them. He said it was not worth his sticking his neck out for Eduardo Sanchez. Mr Anderson was left with a clear impression that Senor Sanchez Junco owned the unauthorised pictures taken inside the Douglas wedding. Mr Townsend telephoned Mr Allen b Burry to tell him all this, only to find that he was with Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones and all four then had a conversation on a speaker telephone. Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones were, said Mr Townsend, devastated by the news. Miss Zeta-Jones uses the same word; she says:

‘It was an appalling and very upsetting shock to discover that our wedding c had been invaded in that way. Our peace and happiness evaporated. I felt violated and that something precious had been stolen from me. Our distress and anger at what Hello! did to us continues to this day.’

[83] Mr Douglas says:

‘We were devastated and shocked by the news. We felt as if our home had d been ransacked and everything taken out of it and spread in the street. It was a truly gut-wrenching and very disturbing experience which left both of us deeply upset.’

[84] It is easy to regard such language as exaggerated but it has to be e remembered that the Douglasses were speaking of a time when their joy at how successful their wedding plans had proved to be was at its height. They crashed down from a relatively euphoric height. Mr Price cross-examined Mr Douglas to the effect that, in comparison with, say, the loss of a limb, their distress was minor and Mr Douglas accepted, against such a comparison, that that was so but he also said:

‘When we spent as much time as we had preparing this wedding, and f making all the efforts that we had, one of which was deciding between the two publications that are here today, and when that wedding turned out as wonderful as we ever could have anticipated, it was a magical, magical night, and it was great, so when you go from that euphoric high of having such a special, special event turn out as well as it did for all of our family and friends, g and then to find that somehow somebody, either one of the members of our wedding party or, as it turned out, a spy, a paparazzi person snuck into to take pictures which were going to be released, we thought it was one of the most vindictive and mean-spirited acts we could have imagined and were deeply deeply offended. Again I think it has to do with the diametrics of h coming so soon after our wedding.’

I have no doubt but that Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones both suffered real distress, though it is no present task of mine to attempt to put some compensatory cash value upon it. An aspect of their distress, which led Miss Zeta-Jones to tears, was their wondering, if it was a guest, which of their j guests it was that had betrayed them.

[85] On the same day, 20 November, the Marquesa’s assistant at the Marquesa’s request sent an invoice to Hello! in London for £1,000 plus VAT described as ‘invoice for telephone expenses for arranging photographs of Douglas/Zeta-Jones wedding’. This was the claim which the Marquesa had cleared with Senor Sanchez Junco in their 4 am telephone call. At that stage, before any problems

a had arisen, the Marquesa was only too happy to enlarge her role in the apparently successful use of paparazzi which she had suggested back in August but it is not possible to infer from this invoice, modest in amount relative to the Marquesa's usual operations, that she had played any greater role so far than as already described. It is, though, possible that the invoice, addressed to Mrs Doughty, did later conduce to acceptance in London that the unauthorised photographs (and, b perhaps, the accompanying text) represented a Marquesa feature, perhaps with the main invoices being intended to follow this opening one.

[86] The printing of the centre section of Hello!'s issue 639, now featuring the unauthorised photographs, as did the cover, was completed and the magazines, in greater numbers than usual to cope with the expected unusually heavy demand, were bundled, loaded into the specially chartered aircraft and flown on c Monday 20 November to England for distribution in the usual way on the Tuesday and the Wednesday.

[87] Until the news arrived of Hello!'s acquisition of unauthorised pictures OK! had planned not to put wedding pictures in issue 241, due to go on general sale on Friday 24 November, but to spread Douglas wedding items over to later d issues, no 242 for publication on 30 November (London) and 1 December (the rest of the United Kingdom) and no 243 a week later. Now, simultaneously, two decisions were made; one was to bring forward some wedding coverage into issue 241. That meant that the Douglasses would have to select which photographs they approved for publication very quickly.

[88] The Douglasses set about that task. It had been thought that it would be e a leisurely unhurried and pleasant process; now it had to take place in priority to everything else and in some haste. They spent hours and hours sitting on the floor going through photographs in a mad rush, said Miss Zeta-Jones. Eventually the agreed photographs were taken by Mr Burry to London. Expenses were incurred by reason of the need for expedition, expenses that would not have been f incurred otherwise.

AN INJUNCTION IS GRANTED; 20 NOVEMBER 2000

[89] The other decision was to move the court in England for an injunction. On the evening of Monday 20 November Buckley J, the Queen's Bench duty judge, was moved ex parte and (despite attempts to tell Hello!) without notice, g by telephone. At that stage there were already all three claimants but only Hello! Ltd was a defendant. The relief sought was an injunction to restrain publication by Hello! of any photographs of the wedding and reception. Buckley J granted relief over the following day with a view to there then being an inter partes hearing on short notice on 21 November.

h 20–21 NOVEMBER 2000

[90] It was about midnight on the night of 20–21 November that Mrs Cartwright, Hello!'s publishing director in London, learned of the injunction. She rang Mrs Doughty, administration and financial controller of Hello! in London, to get the number of Mr Christopher Hutchings, solicitor, of j Charles Russell, and then told him what she knew. She speaks Spanish and hence was able to speak to Senor Sanchez Junco after getting his number from Javier Riera. It was agreed that an attempt should be made to get the injunction lifted. The following day, Tuesday 21 November, she made a written note which read:

I rang our owner, Eduardo Sanchez in Spain and alerted him to what had happened. He told me we had bought 10 or 11 photos of ceremony and reception through normal channels in which the Press work, and photographer who took them did not wish his name revealed. Hola SA who bought the pix, bought them for three countries, UK, Spain and France. It is our understanding that they will be sold throughout the world ... I rang Phil Ramey in LA. Sue Neal involved. Ramey very cagey, said dealt with Marquesa. Did not want to be involved.' a

[91] Although the note speaks of acquisition of the photos 'through normal channels in which the Press work' and although Senor Sanchez Junco may at first have used some such expression, the note only makes sense if he had gone on to mention Mr Ramey by name and to ask her to phone Mr Ramey as otherwise Mrs Cartwright would have had no reason to telephone him, as she did. Indeed, in her oral evidence Mrs Cartwright said that Senor Sanchez Junco had told her to ring Ramey 'as the supplier of the pictures' as opposed to his being the photographer. When she spoke to Ramey he was guarded; he did not know Mrs Cartwright and wanted to be sure to whom he was speaking. He suggested that Sue Neal, whom he well knew, should identify Mrs Cartwright to him. Sue Neal was awakened in the middle of the night. A three-way telephone conference call ensued during which Sue Neal could hear what was being said and in which she first identified Mrs Cartwright to Mr Ramey. Mrs Cartwright's evidence was that Ramey said 'I dealt with the Marquesa', as her note recorded. Quite why Ramey was to be telephoned and what he was to be told is unclear. Miss Neal, who heard the conversation, was able to give no reason why Ramey, who was agitated, should have been phoned. She did not think there had been any speaking about the Marquesa during the conversation. However, in her supplementary evidence-in-chief Mrs Cartwright said that Ramey had said 'I dealt with the Marquesa' and, continuing the quotation from her evidence, she went on to say: b c d e

'And I just assumed, which if one had been in the company for some time, was a very reasonable assumption, that it was a Marquesa feature, which she had done the fixing.' f

It is possible that Sue Neal was not on the line or within earshot for the whole of the conversation and may have been drowsy as she was broken from her sleep. I accept Mrs Cartwright's evidence that Ramey had said that he had dealt with the Marquesa. I accept also that she 'just assumed' that the Douglas wedding photographs amounted to 'a Marquesa feature'. g

[92] By that time it would already have become apparent that it might not be inconvenient to put some distance between Hello! and Ramey, who was himself exhibiting signs that some distance between himself and the photographs would not be unwelcome. If Mrs Cartwright had thought about what 'a Marquesa feature' usually consisted of and if she had raised direct questions with either Senor Sanchez Junco, Mr Ramey or the Marquesa she would soon have had to accept that the wedding had not been 'a Marquesa feature'. However, Ramey's description that he had dealt with the Marquesa gave her a peg just sufficient to support the assumption she then made and upon which she thereafter acted. h j

[93] On Tuesday 21 November Mr Tugendhat and Mr Sherborne (as they had on 20 November) represented the claimants as they sought an extension of the injunction from Hunt J. The single defendant was represented by Mr Silverleaf QC and Mr Fernando. Hunt J, after a short hearing, extended the injunction over trial or earlier further order.

a [94] Hello! immediately appealed and the hearing of the appeal began on the afternoon of 21 November before Ward and Walker LJ. Mr Silverleaf and Mr Fernando again represented the (then) sole defendant, Hello! Ltd. At the close of argument the court indicated that its members could not agree and arrangements were made for a hearing before a three-man court the very next day, Wednesday 22 November.

b [95] Hello!, having learned of the injunction of 20 November, took immediate and largely successful steps to ensure that the injunction was not breached. Only a relatively few copies—some 15,750 out of a total print run of 755,900—were put on sale. How many were sold to members of the public is not known. The rest were embargoed to await the outcome of the litigation.

c THE THREE-MAN COURT OF APPEAL; MRS CARTWRIGHT'S SECOND WITNESS STATEMENT

d [96] Mr Silverleaf had been unable to represent the defendant at the hearing on 22 November and its representation was by Mr Henry Carr QC and Mr Fernando. On the Hello! side evidence was collected for the appeal hearing. That included a draft second witness statement of Mrs Cartwright. After dealing with evidence as to attempts by OK! earlier to spoil Hello!'s 'exclusives' (a subject referred to during the trial as for tit for tat evidence) Mrs Cartwright continued, in the unsigned draft faxed to the claimants' solicitors at 1.57 pm on 22 November during the short adjournment on the first day of the three-man appeal hearing as follows:

e '10. On a separate matter it has been alleged that Hello! knew well in advance that the pictures complained of would be available for publication in the issue of the magazine subject to this injunction. In fact they were offered on the open market around the world on Sunday 19 November and that is when Hello! purchased them and we were able to fit them in the magazine which was by then substantially ready.

f 11. Hello! had no previous knowledge whatsoever that these pictures were going to be taken or offered. I believe that the facts stated in this witness statement are true.'

g [97] A signed but undated version of this witness statement exists, still containing paras 10 and 11, but the last page of it, which bears Mrs Cartwright's signature, says nothing save that she believed the facts in the statement to be true. Mrs Cartwright was unable to shed any light on how, in the circumstances I next describe, the page had come to be signed.

h [98] An unsigned version of that witness statement containing those paras 10 and 11 was handed in to the three-man Court of Appeal. When that version of her draft second witness statement had been put to Mrs Cartwright for her signature she says that she had indicated that she could not sign as it was not true. Whilst it was literally true that it was not known in advance that the very pictures complained of would become available and that those particular pictures ('these pictures') would be taken or offered, Mrs Cartwright had rightly felt that to assert the truth of paras 10 and 11 would mislead. Accordingly the draft was at her request, she said, amended to take out paras 10 and 11 to which she felt unable to subscribe. She signed but did not date the last page of a version from which the offending paragraphs had been omitted. Unfortunately, as I have mentioned, that did not stop a signed version still containing paras 10 and 11 from being used in court. Paragraphs 10 and 11 were later referred to in the judgments of the Court of Appeal, which had plainly relied on them.

[99] The Hello! defendants waived privilege in connection with the preparation and service of Mrs Cartwright's second witness statement but despite that and despite intense study by Mr Tugendhat of word-processing and associated costing records and the availability of Mrs Cartwright and Mr Hutchings to give oral evidence, it was, through no fault of the claimants, never established in the evidence who had framed the words that became paras 10 and 11 of that unsigned second witness statement which I have cited above. Nor, apart from a somewhat desperate plea that all that been done at speed, was it ever explained how it came about that the incorrect version, including paras 10 and 11, had come to be handed to the Court of Appeal rather than the corrected and signed version.

[100] A particular difficulty in the way of the credibility of Mrs Cartwright's evidence (that she was not willing to sign the misleading version) is that no version of the corrected version exists which has, as its last page, only a statement as to truth. On the face of things her signature to a sheet merely having a statement of truth on it could therefore only be an acceptance of the misleading version. Unfortunately, though, the collection of evidence was not being carefully or properly handled and it is at least possible that Mrs Cartwright was asked to sign a backsheet whilst understanding that it would come to be affixed to the corrected front sheets and was then asked to sign afresh once it was found that the corrected version had more than a statement of truth on its last page.

[101] It is, of course, possible to devise a scenario in which Mrs Cartwright paradoxically affected a strict regard for the truth in order to mask that she had lied, by creating the corrected version of her second witness statement to explain away the presentation to the court of the uncorrected version. That, though, seems to me to be improbable. Anyone devious enough to do that would surely have ensured that the corrected version was edited so as to have had a last sheet that had nothing but a statement of truth on it and the plan would have depended on the claimants not promptly spotting that there were two different versions despite their being sent both. Further, as to Mrs Cartwright's state of mind at the time, I have had no evidence that paras 10 or 11 were read aloud to the Court of Appeal either at all or in Mrs Cartwright's hearing or that she had reason during the hearing to know that it was not the corrected version which was in the court's hands.

[102] Whatever else the incident shows it shows that whoever was given the task of collecting the views of the witness was content to assume what Mrs Cartwright would say rather than first questioning her to find out to what she could subscribe.

[103] Mr Hutchings, speaking of the fact that the Court of Appeal had had before them a version of her evidence which included paragraphs Mrs Cartwright would not have wished to have laid before them, said:

'It certainly was very regrettable. I believe it was a terrible clerical error, but I think that obviously the first version should have been torn up, and it did not happen. There were obviously various versions floating around.'

He described it as 'very much an administrative blunder rather than anything else'. On balance I accept that that was the case. Mr Hutchings, although the solicitor having the conduct of the case on behalf of the Hello! defendants, escapes direct personal blame as he was in court whilst the impugned document was being prepared but, whilst I accept, having heard and seen Mrs Cartwright giving her evidence, that there was, lying behind the production of the document, no intent to mislead the court, the unfortunate incident reflects poorly on the a broad class of Hello! defendants and their advisers without my being able to pin blame more particularly within that broad class.

[104] Nor, despite it being quite visible in the three judgments of the Court of Appeal that reliance had been put on the misleading paras 10 and 11 and despite that the judgments were then read, no doubt with some care, by and on behalf of the Hello! defendants, was it ever volunteered by them that something had gone wrong and that it might, at lowest, be prudent so to inform the claimants or the court.

[105] As to that, I would exculpate the lay individuals such as Mrs Cartwright and Mrs Doughty, who might well have not focused sufficiently on the mistake in evidence and, even if they had, might not have realised that, procedurally, the matter could be corrected. In particular Mrs Cartwright has grounds on which she is to be exonerated as there is evidence both from her and from Mr Hutchings that she raised the question with Mr Hutchings in the New Year. As to others, it was urged upon me that by the time the Hello! defendants had put in their defence (para 30) in May 2001, it was made plain by then that some degree of prior knowledge on the part of the Hello! defendants had existed and that thereby the defence had undone whatever misrepresentation the witness statement had caused. That, though, fails to explain the inactivity on the issue on the Hello! defendants' part between the giving of the judgment in the Court of Appeal in late December 2000 and the service of the defence in May 2001. The whole incident was lamentable, as also is the fact that, despite privilege having been waived, material questions remain incapable of answer.

THE MARQUESA IS ASKED TO HELP; 23 NOVEMBER 2000

[106] Also on 22 November 2000 Senor Sanchez Junco telephoned the Marquesa. He told her there was a problem with the magazine. He said something about an injunction: He told her he wanted her to help him but did not say how. She said: 'Well, you know, if I can help, I will be of help, and he answered: "Well thank you very much. I will not forget this one."' I accept that things were left generally in that way; I do not hold that Senor Sanchez Junco indicated that a letter would be required of her or that she would be asked to compromise herself or lie. She held strong views, especially on the subject of how beneficial would be the tit for tat evidence which she would be able to give to assist in Hello!'s case for the lifting of the injunction. Nor was she averse to ingratiating herself with Senor Sanchez Junco as Hello!'s editor-in-chief, with whom her relations had been erratic and were not then as good as they had earlier been.

[107] In his oral evidence Senor Sanchez Junco at first said that he could not remember asking the Marquesa for help; then he turned to avoiding a direct answer by questioning in what way she could in any event have helped him. Finally he became firmly of the view that he had not asked her to help him. I prefer the Marquesa's evidence which, from her witness statement on, was constant on the point. 'I will help you in any way that you need' said the Marquesa to Senor Sanchez Junco and she added: 'You can count on me always.'

[108] On the same day Mr Hutchings telephoned the Marquesa. He explained to her that he was asking for a statement from her which might help clarify what had taken place. He explained that he understood that she had arranged and purchased the Douglas wedding feature. That is a view which was consistent with the loose assumption of the wedding having been 'a Marquesa feature' which Mrs Cartwright had made and which it is likely Mr Hutchings formed after speaking either to Mrs Cartwright or to Mrs Doughty, who was of the same view. Mr Hutchings said to the Marquesa that if it was the case that she had arranged and purchased the feature it would be helpful to have this explained in a letter. His eleventh witness statement, not made until 20 February 2003, continues:

'The Marquesa confirmed that this was correct and agreed to provide a letter to this effect. Had she said anything at all to cause me to question my understanding or raised any concerns whatsoever, I most certainly would have discussed these with her, until I was satisfied as to the actual position.'

[109] He was not cross-examined on that lately-given evidence.

[110] Because that important evidence arrived so late it was never put to the Marquesa that she had confirmed to Mr Hutchings that she had arranged and purchased the feature but, given the lack of challenge to his evidence on the point, I accept that she did confirm as Mr Hutchings indicates. It was not asked of the Marquesa, either, again because of the lateness of the evidence that Mr Hutchings gave, whether she realised that his request was, unknown to Mr Hutchings and unmentioned by him, the first step in a working-through of her indication to Senor Sanchez Junco that she would give to him such help as she could. However, given her later behaviour, it is hard to see how her failure to deny that she had arranged and purchased the feature can otherwise be explained. Mr Hutchings was, innocently on his part, asking her to provide a letter which she would have known would be untrue. Consistently with her willingness to help, she would have not protested to him that she was being required to lie. She would not, I expect, have felt safe indicating to a solicitor that he was procuring false evidence.

[111] The Marquesa then tried to telephone Senor Riera, managing director of Hola SA, with whom her relations were poor. Not getting through to him, she sent an e-mail. She described herself, in relation to the Douglas wedding, as 'the one person who has been involved in the matter from the beginning'. In the sense that she had long before tried to gain an 'exclusive' for Hello! and, after Senor Sanchez Junco's intervention and upon that failing, had spoken to Senor Sanchez Junco about paparazzi, that description was true but it ignored the absence of any real active role of hers since August 2000 or thereabouts and that it was Senor Sanchez Junco who had bought the pictures on 19 November. Her e-mail both criticised the past handling by Hello! of the Douglas wedding opportunity and suggested that she had a role to play for the future. She did not mention that Senor Sanchez Junco had asked for her help.

[112] Senor Riera did not telephone the Marquesa but his secretary, Senora Elisa, began frequently to telephone the Marquesa or the latter's assistant, Miss Mildh, indicating what it was that was required from the Marquesa. The Marquesa's understanding of that and Miss Mildh's led to Miss Mildh typing out a letter which was never sent but which read:

'I confirm that this company [Marquesa's Production Ltd] was offered the photographs relating to the wedding of Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones. This company accepted the offer and payment was made accordingly for such photographs.'

Miss Mildh was an impressive and intelligent witness and I do not doubt but that that draft letter was an accurate reflection of what Madrid, by way of Senora Elisa, had been indicating it required, namely a letter showing that the Marquesa's company had bought and paid for the unauthorised photographs, a

- a complete fiction. Miss Mildh knew that the function of the letter that was being requested was to help in a lifting of the injunction. As she knew that I do not doubt that the Marquesa knew that too.
- [113] The Marquesa felt she was in a difficult position. Miss Mildh's witness statement said:
- b 'I remember a great deal of telephone traffic that day, back and forth. The Marquesa felt very strongly she could not decline to "help" Senor Sanchez Junco in this way if she wished to retain his good opinion of her and, more importantly, her job! I felt she was being unfairly pressurised. She was very upset.'
- c The Marquesa, hoping that the position might resolve itself without her finally being obliged to lie, left her office early on 22 November, despite what were, said Miss Mildh, 'frantic phone calls' from Madrid.

THE MARQUESA'S LETTER

- d [114] In the meantime, in London, Mr Hutchings discussed with Hello!'s counsel, Mr Carr and Mr Fernando, as to what, in the light of the confirmation which the Marquesa had given to Mr Hutchings, a letter from the Marquesa should state. At one point it had seemed that Mr Fernando had been thought to have proposed a form of words but it was not written down on paper and quite how the form was finally arrived at was never resolved in the formal evidence.
- e Leaving aside how the words came to be composed (another subject on which privilege was waived), Mr Hutchings then spoke to Mrs Cartwright, who put the words by telephone to Senor Riera with the intent that he should then write to the Marquesa. Why it was Senor Riera who was selected to play this part and who made the selection of him for the task has not been satisfactorily explained.
- f The Marquesa could have been approached directly or by way of Senor Sanchez Junco. Instead the managing director, with whom her relations were poor, was invited to contact her. There is a very real suspicion that he was used as he, above others, represented in person the ability of Hello! to deny the Marquesa any work for the group in the future. He could not be charmed by her; unless he chose, he could not be contacted by telephone except by way of his secretary and the
- g Marquesa could not negotiate with him or protest to him. He was the embodiment of the pressure that was put upon her.

[115] The form of words proposed by London was then sent by Senor Riera to the Marquesa. The suggested form of words was in English, the rest in Spanish; putting the whole in English it read as follows:

- h 'We need to receive by tomorrow at [10] a.m. at our Barrister's Mr. Giles Fernando fax number 0207 742 4282, a document signed by you in a headed paper with the name of your company with the following text: I confirm that my company sold exclusive UK rights in the photographs of the wedding of Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones to Hola SA for use in Hello!
- j magazine. The agreement was concluded on the telephone between me and Eduardo Sanchez, the proprietor of Hola SA, on Sunday November the 19th.'

The letter was signed by Senor Riera. The letter went by fax late on the evening of 22 November. The reference to [10 am] was to ensure her letter could be produced at the hearing before the Court of Appeal.

[116] On the next day, 23 November, the second day of the hearing before the three-man Court of Appeal in London, the Marquesa saw for the first time the fax from Senor Riera. By the time Miss Mildh arrived late at her office she said: a

‘I found the Marquesa in high dudgeon as she had earlier found in her office a fax from Madrid, containing the exact proposed wording of this sought-after document. Furthermore, she told me that she had already received several semi-hysterical phone calls from Madrid, demanding that the document be written and faxed to the High Court before 10 am. The Marquesa had by now resolved to sign this document.’ b

Miss Mildh typed out the required form of words on the writing paper of Neneta Overseas Ltd, another Marquesa company. The Marquesa, having fervently hoped overnight that the requirement that she should sign a letter would go away, had found that it had not; at the very last minute she signed it and it was faxed to the number that had been given by the Madrid office. Both the Marquesa and Miss Mildh recognised that no such transaction as the letter described had ever taken place. c

[117] Mr Hutchings exhibited the letter from Neneta Overseas Ltd to a witness statement of his and it was produced to the Court of Appeal. d

[118] Also on the morning of 23 November Mr Hutchings telephoned the Marquesa and asked her whether she had prepared a letter to confirm her involvement. By then the Marquesa would have had Senor Riera’s draft before her. Mr Hutchings says: ‘I recall very clearly that the Marquesa said absolutely nothing to the effect that the letter she was providing to us was in any way incorrect.’ e

[119] Senora Elisa’s evidence was that in the course of the several telephone calls that were made between her and the Marquesa before, finally, the Marquesa faxed off to London, at the last possible moment, the letter which Senor Riera had asked for (the Marquesa’s letter), the Marquesa had protested about her being asked to provide it but that she had never said the letter was untrue. The point is finely balanced as, given, as Senora Elisa accepted, the Marquesa did not protest about any of the component parts into which the letter could be broken, on her evidence the Marquesa would seem to have had nothing to protest about save for the untruth of the letter. However, in her oral evidence the Marquesa, after some hesitation, said that she had also told Mr Hutchings that what was being required of her was an untruth. Given that Mr Hutchings’ evidence that she had said absolutely nothing to the effect that the letter was incorrect was not challenged, I prefer the evidence of Senora Elisa and Mr Hutchings on this issue to that of the Marquesa. I hold that she did not complain of the untruth of the Marquesa’s letter either to Senora Elisa or to Mr Hutchings. It is, of course, not inconsistent with her willingness to help Senor Sanchez Junco and to help Hello! procure the lifting of the injunction that she should have kept from Senora Elisa and Mr Hutchings the fact that her letter was untrue. f

[120] I turn to Senor Riera’s state of mind in respect of the Marquesa’s letter. He knew it was very important. One might therefore have expected him to speak directly to the Marquesa about it. However, so far from doing so, and despite the Marquesa’s having asked Senora Elisa to get him to telephone her, he did not do so. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that he had deliberately made himself unavailable to her. His evidence was that he had received the form of words from either Mrs Cartwright or Mrs Doughty in London and had no reason to believe it was untrue. On the other hand, he was the senior man in Madrid as to j a administrative matters. He was the person consulted, he said, on economic matters and commercial and legal ones. He was content to describe himself as a stickler for good order, a fairly rigorous sort of person. He knew that the Marquesa's letter was to be used in court and that it had to be truthful and very accurate. None the less, he did not inquire, in relation to the letter, as to which of her companies was being asked to say that it had sold the rights, nor what title b it had to the rights, nor did he make any inquiry of the Marquesa or, he said, of Senor Sanchez Junco.

[121] So far one would have to conclude that he was so incurious as to have been indifferent to the truth or falsity of the letter but had he spoken to Senor Sanchez Junco before sending it to the Marquesa for her signature he would inescapably have learned that it was false; the least discussion with Senor c Sanchez Junco would have disclosed to him that it was not the Marquesa who had made any agreement with Senor Sanchez Junco on 19 November. It is thus important to look into whether, despite his denial of this, he had in fact spoken to Senor Sanchez Junco in relation to the letter. I am driven to holding that he had. A good deal later, on 18 September 2002, he sent a fax to the Marquesa that said: d 'Following the instructions from Mr Sanchez Junco I sent you the fax dated 22nd November 2002 ...' a reference to the Marquesa's letter. In oral supplementary evidence-in-chief he said that that passage was incorrect. When Mr Price asked him why, then, had he sent it he said: 'The Marquesa does not really pay any attention to me and, in any event, this is not true.' As an explanation that is quite hopeless. He had a further opportunity to explain himself on the point when e Mr Tugendhat cross-examined him on it but his answer did not improve. When asked 'Why did you write it if it was untrue?' he answered: 'If I'm sincere, I don't know. Probably it was possible to emphasise my own letter.'

[122] I am left with no reason to disbelieve what Senor Riera had said in his fax of 18 September 2002; he had, indeed, spoken to Senor Sanchez Junco and it f was on the latter's instructions that the request for the Marquesa's letter was made. Although they worked in different offices in Madrid, in ordinary course they spoke together nearly every day. Senor Riera knew, too, that, in relation to the letter, the Marquesa had been complaining to Senora Elisa. Moreover, as Mr Luke said, Senor Sanchez Junco was a 'hands-on' proprietor; 'he likes to get a grasp of everything'. He was a strong figure; as Mr Luke said: 'I promise you, if g you've been on the wrong side of Mr Eduardo Sanchez, its an experience you will never forget.'

[123] It was inherently likely, on the important questions that arose in relation to the Marquesa's assistance in the lifting of the injunction, that Senor Riera would have consulted Senor Sanchez Junco. Senor Riera's denial of having made h contact with Senor Sanchez Junco is not true. In all the circumstances Senor Riera must have known that the letter being required of the Marquesa was untrue.

[124] That conclusion invites me to look into Senor Sanchez Junco's position in relation to the Marquesa's letter. He said at the trial that he had not seen it j before. He said Senor Riera had not spoken to him beforehand but he added: 'It may have happened.' He thought Senor Riera had made a reasonable assumption that he, Senor Sanchez Junco, had come to an agreement with the Marquesa on the day of the wedding. He said of that that it was 'what Mr Riera believed was the reality of the matter'. In an attempt to explain how he knew what Senor Riera had believed he relied on the Marquesa having been known to have handled the feature from August 2000 on. But her role had not been akin to her normal role and she had had little or no contact with the Douglas wedding feature after August 2000. There were no grounds for a reasonable assumption by Senor Riera save, perhaps, one derived from the message that he had received through either Mrs Cartwright or Mrs Doughty in London, but those were grounds on which Senor Sanchez Junco, claiming to have had no discussion with Senor Riera on the point, could not rely. Senor Sanchez Junco's answers provide no reason not to accept the truth of Senor Riera's own written assertion, albeit one that he later resiled from, that he had sent the request to the Marquesa for her to complete the Marquesa's letter on the instructions of Senor Sanchez Junco. I do not accept Senor Sanchez Junco's evidence that he had no prior knowledge of the Marquesa's letter and no knowledge that it was untrue. Still less was I impressed with his assertions, firstly, that the Marquesa's letter was not false and then, secondly, '[i]t is closer to the truth than [to] an untruth'.

SENOR SANCHEZ JUNCO'S STATEMENT

[125] Another piece of evidence which was used by the Hello! defendants before the Court of Appeal was a witness statement of Mrs Maria José Doughty, Hello!'s administration and financial controller. Mr Anderson, picture editor for OK!, had put in a witness statement as to his telephone calls to Mr Ramey in which the paparazzo had left the impression on Mr Anderson that Senor Sanchez Junco owned the unauthorised pictures. Mrs Doughty, whose first language is Spanish, was given the task of getting Senor Sanchez Junco's observations on the point. She telephoned him and took down his reply which, in English, was:

1. I have never commissioned the disputed photographs, nor have I financed them or agreed a price for them in advance. I have never had any contacts with the provider of these photographs except on Sunday the 19th November to agree a price for them once the photographs were delivered to me that day. This was done through one of my employees.

2. I do not have any agents representing me or my company in the United States or anywhere else and anyone pretending to do so does it under false pretences.

3. Neither I nor my company have ever owned the copyright in the photographs with the exception of the exclusive rights of publication in the United Kingdom, Spain or France.'

[126] In the light of the Marquesa's letter, also produced to the court, 'the provider of these photographs' would have been read, by anyone reading both it and Senor Sanchez Junco's statement, as intended to refer to the Marquesa but whilst the claimants would have known that it was nonsense to suggest that Senor Sanchez Junco had not had previous contact with the Marquesa, the Court of Appeal would not have known that and the claimants had no immediate proof to the contrary. After hearing cross-examination of Senor Sanchez Junco on the issue, as I shall explain, in January 2003 Sir Andrew Morritt V-C concluded that Senor Sanchez Junco's statement was false and misleading. He said ([2003] EWHC 55 (Ch) at [25], [2003] 1 All ER 1087n at [25]):

'First, it is clear that he had contact with Mr Ramey on a regular basis through members of the staff of his companies, notably Ms Neal. Second, he had contact specifically with regard to the wedding photographs through the Marquesa and Ms Neal. In each case the contact was indirect. But contact does not have to be direct. The third sentence of para 2 of his statement suggests that his reference to contact included indirect contact. If he sought a to confine the preceding sentence of his statement to direct and personal contact then he should have said so. Third, his statement was misleading in implying, in the context of the statement of Mr Anderson, that Mr Ramey was not the provider of the photographs. In my judgment Senor Sanchez-Junco knew that his statement was false and misleading in these respects.'

b [127] I have had a good deal more evidence than had Sir Andrew Morritt V-C. I am unable to find fault with the first sentence of para 1 of Senor Sanchez Junco's statement. As for contacts with Mr Ramey, Sir Andrew Morritt V-C pointed out that the third sentence suggested that Senor Sanchez Junco's reference to contact included indirect contact. For what it is worth, Sir Andrew Morritt V-C had had
c different evidence as to the telephone calls during which the price was agreed with Mr Ramey; he was told of a three-person call involving Mr Ramey on the line to Mr Luke with Mr Luke then translating to Senor Sanchez Junco. The evidence I have heard and which I have accepted is of a four-person call, Ramey to Sue Neal on one line, and Neal to Luke's mobile, with Luke translating to d Sanchez Junco only a couple of feet away. In the context of the four-person call it is, in my view, a not unfair reading of Senor Sanchez Junco's statement that the phrase 'this was done through one of my employees' was intended to refer not to vicarious contact through an employee of the usual kind of which a director or manager of a company might have no direct personal knowledge but was, in effect, saying that even such contact as he had had with Mr Ramey on e 19 November was, albeit by way of another, none the less direct, within his personal knowledge, by way of the four-person dealings which he had through Sue Neal and Mr Luke. In evidence before me Senor Sanchez Junco said:

f 'I imagine that at that time, because what I was being accused of was having bought photographs from Senor Ramey as a commission, I wanted to give the clear impression that I have never had any contact with Mr Ramey in that sense.' (My emphasis.)

[128] It is with diffidence that I come to a different conclusion than Sir Andrew Morritt V-C but I acquit Senor Sanchez Junco of knowing that his statement was false and misleading as to contact. By the use of the word 'contact' he was, I hold, g intending to refer only to such contact with Mr Ramey relating to the Douglas wedding of a kind of which he was able to speak to from his own personal knowledge. He was intending to say that such contact occurred only the once, on 19 November. So limited, both his first and second sentences in his para 1 were not, I hold, known by him to be misleading. However, given that I have held that h he had spoken to Senor Riera about the Marquesa's letter and had instructed him to request it of her, and given that he knew both were for production to the court in England, I cannot acquit Senor Sanchez Junco of intentionally misleading the court by his reference to 'the provider of these photographs' rather than, if he meant Mr Ramey, saying so. There was no sufficient reason for not identifying j Mr Ramey, certainly once Mr Anderson had done so. On this issue, Sir Andrew Morritt V-C's third count, I hold that Senor Sanchez Junco did know that his statement was misleading.

[129] Given that Mrs Cartwright's paras 10 and 11 did not represent what she wished to have as any part of her evidence and were misleading, that the Marquesa's letter was untrue and that Senor Sanchez Junco's statement to Mrs Doughty as put before the Court of Appeal was, as to part, misleading, I can only echo Sir Andrew Morritt V-C's conclusion that the case advanced by Hello! to that court was a false one. a

THE INJUNCTION IS LIFTED; 23 NOVEMBER 2000

[130] After argument had concluded before the Court of Appeal on Thursday 23 November the court indicated that the appeal would be allowed and the injunction lifted. Although the evidence before the court had included that Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones had been upset to learn of the possible publication of the unauthorised photographs, Hello! elected to go forward and publish. It informed the distributors that the embargo was lifted and its issue 639 went on full sale to the public on Friday 24 November without any further changes to text or photographs. b

ISSUE 639 OF HELLO!

[131] The text in issue 639 relating to the wedding itself, as opposed to the Russian Tea Room event the night before and to descriptions of arrivals before the wedding, has been said to have been composed by way of brief interviews with guests as they left the wedding. It was inaccurate in many respects as, indeed, had been the description of the Russian Tea Room event and the arrivals there but Mr and Mrs Douglas complain, in particular, of a reference to Mr Douglas having given Miss Zeta-Jones a £1m yacht as a wedding present and to a caption to a photograph of Miss Zeta-Jones dancing which read: 'The vivacious bride took to the dance floor but not, at any time, with her groom.' c

[132] There had been no gift of a £1m yacht and the bride and groom had not only led the dance but had danced several times. As Mr Douglas, whom Hello! described as a rich man with a fortune to protect, was marrying a woman less rich and some 25 years younger, the combination of Hello!'s untruthful comments was hurtful to the Douglasses. Exactly who had arranged with whom and when as to the text and by whom the various passages of it were written were questions only partly and unsatisfactorily explored in evidence but when Mr Luke was questioned as to innuendi in the text he sought to explain them away by reference to the sub-editors, called in at the weekend and required to work long hours, having been overtired. I cannot accept that evidence; I see no likely link between tiredness and the mean-spiritedness of Hello!'s comments. If anything, one would expect tiredness to lead to an adoption of Hello!'s familiar eulogistic and flattering tone, the usual nature of which served only to mark a contrast with the comments I have described. However, the evidence, whilst giving rise to real doubt, has not, in my view, been sufficient to amount to proof of an instruction having gone out that snide or hurtful comment would, unusually, be welcomed in the text in order to repay the Douglasses for having given the exclusive to OK!. d

HELLO! AND OK! BOTH PUBLISH

[133] OK! had successfully striven to bring forward Douglas wedding coverage into its issue 241 (bearing date 1 December 2000) and it went on public sale on the very same day as Hello!'s issue 639. Issue 241, with a full family wedding group on the cover and boasting that OK! was first for celebrity weddings, bore the banner 'the first real wedding pictures'. Issue 242 (dated 2 December), with a close-up of bride and groom on the cover, came out later and together issues 241 and 242 completed the whole coverage of the wedding by OK!. The authorised photographs of the wedding were very widely syndicated by OK! and some or all appeared in many publications at many points throughout the world. e a [134] As she left court on 23 November Mrs Cartwright telephoned Hello!'s London editor, Maggie Koumi, to tell her that the injunction had been lifted. She said that, following a common practice, the national and daily press could be authorised to use the whole of the cover of issue 639 but not pictures from its inside pages. News of the overturning of the injunctions spread fast and within 15 minutes or so Ms Koumi was telephoned on behalf of the Daily Mirror, the b Daily Mail, the Mail on Sunday and the Daily Telegraph. Ms Koumi told them that it was alright for them to use the cover of issue 639 but not the pictures inside. The editor of the Sun also telephoned her. He had earlier asked whether, if the injunction were to be lifted, he could use pictures from the inside of issue 639. She had earlier said that that might be possible. Now she told him that the lawyers had advised that it was not to be done. He said: 'But I've already laid c out four pages.' She reiterated that inside pictures were not to be used but only the cover and then in its entirety (thus, of course, advertising Hello!). It was not then too late for the Sun to have withdrawn from its print run any pictures from the inside of Hello! which the Sun had proposed to use.

d [135] By the time Mrs Cartwright and Mrs Doughty arrived, after court, at Hello!'s offices, the legal advice had changed; not even the cover was now to be authorised. Ms Koumi rang to tell those to whom she had earlier spoken that not even the cover could be used. At some stage between 6–8 pm she tried to ring the Sun's editor. She was told he was in a meeting. She made clear that the cover was not to be used and insisted that the message should be taken to him immediately. A 'picture kill' had been circulated by the Press Association and e Hello!'s solicitors had circulated newspapers to like effect.

f [136] At about 10.45 pm on Thursday 23 November Ms Koumi was telephoned on behalf of the picture desk at the Daily Mirror. She was asked if Hello! had made a deal with the Sun. She said that that was not the case. She was told that she had better get a copy of tomorrow's Sun. The man at the Mirror by then had a copy of the following day's issue of the Sun in front of him and told her that the whole of the front page barring one column featured photographs published in Hello!.

[137] Mrs Koumi bought a copy of the Sun on the following morning, Friday 24 November. She says in her witness statement:

g 'I then realised why the Mirror had assumed we had made a deal with the Sun. This was because of the following phrasing used by them: "But yesterday a judge overturned the ruling, allowing Hello!—and the Sun—to show the sensational snaps."

h [138] She telephoned Mr Hutchings of Charles Russell. Ms Koumi's evidence, which I accept, was that it was totally untrue that permission had been given to the Sun to republish the Douglas wedding pictures.

OTHERS PUBLISH THE UNAUTHORISED PHOTOGRAPHS

j [139] The issue of the Sun published on 24 November contained five of the unauthorised pictures. It included also, but compressed into a very small size, a reproduction of the cover of Hello!, including the magazine's name. The unauthorised pictures of Miss Zeta-Jones eating or being fed wedding cake had attracted the headline 'Catherine Eater Jones'. The Daily Mail on the same day published a formal authorised picture of the couple and also reproduced Hello!'s cover in legible form. That picture of the couple had been the picture that the couple had released to the press generally. The Daily Mail also published four of the unauthorised photographs on Saturday 25 November. a [140] After a hesitant start Hello! had, in my judgment, acted with reasonable speed to stop publication by others either of the cover or of the inside of Hello!. I hold that the publication that I have described in the Sun and the Daily Mail had not been authorised by Hello!. It has not been shown, either, that the newspapers ever paid Hello! for any right to publish as they had. b

INVOICES ARRIVE

[141] On or about 28 November 2000 Sue Neal, as Hello!'s picture editor, received four invoices addressed to her. They were respectively from Mr Ramey for $75,200 and marked 'Agreed Fee Special Project Eduardo Sanchez', from Rupert Thorpe marked 'Agreed Fee—Royals on holiday' for $56,400, from Frank Griffin Photography marked 'Photo Sales—November 2000' for $29,000 and from Randy Bauer Photo marked 'Special Project—New York (as per Frank) $29,000'. All, despite anonymous and false descriptions, were for the unauthorised photographs or work in connection therewith but they totalled $189,600 and not the $188,000 which had been agreed. Consistently with the only agreement made with respect to the unauthorised photographs, it was to Hello! and not to the Marquesa that they were addressed. Sue Neal had no reason not to approve them for payment and thus, as she had been asked by Mrs Doughty to do, she quickly passed them to Mrs Doughty, which was the ordinary course of dealings with invoices. Mrs Doughty spotted that they did not add up to the $188,000 and Sue Neal, after speaking to Mr Ramey, with his agreement adjusted his down to $73,600. c

[142] At the same time as the four invoices I have described above there also arrived an invoice for $10,000 addressed to 'Hello! Magazine Picture Desk, Marquessa De Varella' (sic) from Mr Ramey. It was for 'Story—Agreed Fee Special Project $10,000'. Sue Neal wrote upon it 'Zeta/Douglas Wedding Guarantee Fee Issue 639'. Mr Ramey had told her that that was what it represented. Her evidence is difficult to understand on this issue. At one stage she agreed that Mr Ramey had said words to the effect: 'The 10,000 is what the Marquesa promised me.' Her witness statement had also asserted that the sum had been promised. However, in oral evidence there was the following exchange: f
g

Mr Tugendhat: Did he say that the Marquesa had agreed to pay it? Ms Neal: No, he did not say that. He did not say the Marquesa had agreed to pay it. h

Mr Tugendhat: What did he say, then, to justify the invoice? Ms Neal: He said that he had said to the Marquesa that he wanted a fee of $10,000.

Mr Tugendhat: [Correctly] But in your statement you say he said he had been promised the $10,000 ... by the Marquesa. Ms Neal: That is what he said. j

Mr Tugendhat: Yes and that is right, is it? Ms Neal: Yes.'

[143] Ms Neal was in my judgment a truthful witness despite such internal contradictions and I hold the case to have been that on occasions both before and after the wedding Mr Ramey had asserted to her that a guarantee fee had been indicated by the Marquesa to be payable, as Ms Neal put it:

- a '... if they had not taken as good a photograph as they were hoping to take, and did not come up with material which would warrant a higher sales figure. A guarantee would be to offset some of their expenses.'

Even that was, in my judgment, a more firm indication of prospective payment than the Marquesa had actually given to Mr Ramey (see [38], above) but it was in such terms that Ms Neal understood the position from Mr Ramey. Of course, by this time, Mr Ramey had 'come up with material' that had fetched a good price so the $10,000 on such a contingency would not have been payable. Ms Neal said that she had suggested to Mr Ramey that he should '[j]ust forget about the invoice' and that he had accepted that. As far as it goes, his accepting that supports a conclusion that the $10,000 was never promised or at any rate never promised unconditionally as the evidence about Mr Ramey has not suggested that he would easily give up $10,000 to which he was entitled.

[144] I accept Ms Neal's evidence that she handed all five invoices to Mrs Doughty, who asked her to ask the photographers to readdress them to the Marquesa's company, Neneta Overseas Ltd. That she did.

- d [145] When all five invoices were passed to Mrs Doughty (and not the four only, as she asserted), her understanding was that they were not payable by Hello!. She faxed copies of them to Senor Riera and he rang her back to say that she was right and that they should be readdressed to the Marquesa, which, as I have just mentioned, Mrs Doughty then asked Sue Neal to set about.

- e [146] Mrs Doughty is susceptible to an attack on the lines that she knew full well that the Marquesa had had only little to do with the unauthorised photographs, that they could not be described as a typical Marquesa feature or indeed any Marquesa feature but that in asking, as she did, for the invoices to be readdressed, she was attempting to bolster the untruthful tale, that the Marquesa had sold the pictures to Hello!, that Hello! was now asserting.

- f [147] However, at that time, whilst she did know of the Marquesa's letter, she had no certain reason to believe that it was untrue or that the Marquesa would have put her name to it if it had been. As invoices were in ordinary course passed to her she would probably have had the Marquesa's invoice of 20 November, the heading of which suggested that the Marquesa had arranged photographs of the Douglas wedding. She would have spoken to Mrs Cartwright who was of the view that it was the Marquesa who had dealt with Mr Ramey. She may well have heard counsel on the Hello! side asserting that in court. She would have known from the McCarthy case that, although such work was outside her usual run, the Marquesa would quite gleefully stoop to paparazzi work to help Hello! against its rival. It was Mrs Doughty's habit to clear the Marquesa's and other large invoices with Madrid so a telephone call to Senor Riera was quite natural. She had taken down Senor Sanchez Junco's statement that he had not had any contact with

- g '[t]he provider of these photographs' save to agree a price once they had been delivered but she, in her mind, drew a distinction between the photographer and the provider of the unauthorised photographs. She did not understand an agreement between Senor Sanchez Junco and Mr Ramey, perhaps as photographer, as excluding that the photographs represented a Marquesa feature of which the Marquesa was provider. When she telephoned Senor Riera, with whom practically all her dealings with Madrid were conducted, he confirmed, as I have mentioned, that the invoices were for the Marquesa.
- j [148] My impression is that she was and is a loyal employee. 'If I am to believe somebody, I believe my own company' she said. She was content to act on what Senor Riera told her to do without testing her belief as to the Marquesa's involvement by, say, telephoning the Marquesa or Miss Mildh. There was in any event little love lost between the senior figures at Hello!'s London office and the Marquesa. I have heard and seen her give evidence and, on balance I do not hold Mrs Doughty to have knowingly embarked upon a course intended to put false and extra distance between Hello! and the paparazzo incursion in New York.

[149] On 15 December 2000 Senor Riera sent a fax to the Marquesa. He told her that Hello! had received invoices for a total of $188,000 from the four photographers. The fax continued:

'For us there is no intermediary other than you, as it was your company who offered to us and managed this matter. Therefore, we are puzzled by these invoices and I would be grateful if you take control of them as we are not going to pay them. In this regard either you get in touch with them or we will ask them to contact your company, whose name I would ask you to let me know. You will, of course, invoice us for your fees.'

[150] Senor Riera's own evidence was that on 14 December he had been told by Senor Sanchez Junco that the agreement to acquire the unauthorised photographs had been with Mr Ramey and had been made by Senor Sanchez Junco. He sought to say that none the less it was for the Marquesa to pay the photographers. He also said that on 14 December he had told Senor Sanchez Junco that he was going to bill the Marquesa but that Senor Sanchez Junco had said: 'No, the agreement was with Mr Ramey.' Despite that and, as he put it, to stick to the rules, it was, he thought, for the Marquesa to pay the photographers. Hence the fax of 15 December. Except as part of a conscious and false pretence on his part as to a deeper involvement of the Marquesa in the unauthorised photographs than had been the case, the fax is inexplicable. The word translated as 'intermediary' had, in Spanish, been 'interlocutor'.

[151] The Marquesa, still willing at that stage to help, faxed back twice the same day to Senor Riera saying, ruefully, 'I am obviously a "todo terreno"', an all-terrain vehicle, meaning that she was being called upon to do anything demanded of her. But she gave him the name and address of her company and inquired what invoice was it that she had to pay, hardly a question that would have been likely to have needed to be asked had her company been the person who had contracted to buy the photographs. She also asked Mrs Doughty at Hello! to send her copies of the invoices. Mrs Doughty did fax the Hello! invoices to the Marquesa who, on seeing that they were addressed to Hello!, telephoned Mrs Doughty to ask for it to be arranged that fresh invoices should be prepared addressed to Neneta Overseas Ltd.

[152] The Marquesa was puzzled by the fact that there were as many as five invoices, including ones other than from Mr Ramey, but she telephoned Senor Sanchez Junco on the evening of 15 December and he told her that the whole $188,000 should be paid to Mr Ramey. She did not care for that advice and said that she would pay each invoice separately.

[153] On 17 December the Marquesa faxed Senor Riera and in the course of a long and rather meandering fax made, in effect, five points. Firstly, that Senor Sanchez Junco had told her to pay the whole sum to Mr Ramey; secondly, that that was not possible as he would be unlikely to share the money with the other three photographers who had sent her invoices but who needed to be dealt with; thirdly: 'It is true that Phil Ramey asked me to assure $10,000 for the

- a photographs that might be taken at the Douglas wedding and I told him that I could assure him that' and, fourthly, that that had not been compromising because the photographs she had referred to could equally have been photographs outside the wedding and that she had been careful to tell him to do as he wanted. Ramey had sent her an invoice for the $10,000, she said, presumably a reference to the one addressed to her at 'Hello! Magazine Desk
- b Marquessa De Varella' at Hello!'s London office. Fifthly, she said she would like to pay that invoice.

[154] The next day her assistant Miss Mildh, pointing out that the Marquesa was about to leave for Uruguay, e-mailed Mr Luke saying that she must speak to him, adding, in reference to Hello! and the photographers: 'They are now sending invoices to us re: the photographers—stuff we never had anything to do with, things that were actually arranged by Sue Neal.' No one called back. On c 21 December Miss Mildh faxed Senor Sanchez Junco's secretary asking her to get in touch with the Marquesa, saying: 'You cannot just drop the lawyers onto her and then leave her with it as in fact she never had anything to do with these pictures in the first place.' There was no answer.

d FRESH INVOICES

[155] Around this time, in December 2000 or early January 2001, the photographers submitted fresh invoices, now addressed to Neneta Overseas Ltd at its address in the British Virgin Islands. They had adjusted the respective sums so that the aggregate was $188,000 but had done so in a different way than had e Sue Neal when they had been received by Hello!. Amongst the invoices addressed to Neneta Overseas Ltd was a fresh one from Mr Ramey for $10,000, still bearing the description 'Agreed Fee Special Project of the Marquesa De Varella', now with her title correctly spelt.

THE COURT OF APPEAL'S REASONED JUDGMENTS

f [156] On 21 December 2000 the Court of Appeal ([2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967) gave the reasons for its earlier decision to lift the injunction. I shall be citing passages from the decision later but, in outline, the court held that despite there being sound arguments for confidence or even for a case in privacy, the balance of convenience tipped the matter in favour of there being no prior g restraint.

THE $10,000 AGAIN

[157] On 29 December the Marquesa e-mailed Senora Elisa saying that Phil Ramey wanted to be paid the $10,000 'which we promised no matter what happened'. She was asking that so that when Hello! came to pay her in order that

h she, in turn, could pay the photographers, the invoice for $10,000 from Phil Ramey should be added 'otherwise he is going to continue pestering with the subject'.

[158] It might be thought that the contemporary indications from the Marquesa that the $10,000 had been promised 'no matter what happened' and j that she 'could assure him of that' are reliable indications that that had, indeed, been the case. However, on balance I am unpersuaded that that is so; it suited the Marquesa to say so to Hello! in order that she would be put in funds to pay the $10,000 so that she would not be 'pestered' by Mr Ramey on that score. But when she spoke of her dealings in August 2000, when were given whatever promises or indications as were given, she had told Mr Ramey that he could be sure that if he got good pictures Senor Sanchez Junco would pay him more than the $10,000 so that expenses he had incurred would be covered. She had said: 'You will have your expenses back because probably if you get the pictures it would be more valuable than $10,000.'

[159] Senor Sanchez Junco had said to her, as to $10,000 being paid in advance or in any event: 'Absolutely not. I am not going to fund anyone going to New York. I don't want to know.' The Marquesa had had no authority to offer the $10,000 from Hello! and had retracted such assurances that she had given but had added the consolation that, if pictures were obtained, Hello! would pay well.

[160] Still the photographers had not been paid. Hello! had passed the subject of their payment to the Marquesa and the Marquesa had not been put in funds to pay them. The photographers were in frequent contact with Sue Neal. She pressed the case for their payment upon Mrs Doughty. They had, she said, done a good job under difficult circumstances and if a squabble developed regarding their payment it would damage the very good relationship which the Hello! picture department had with them.

[161] The Marquesa, in the meantime, was getting cold feet. She got in touch with the lawyers who administered her British Virgin Islands company and told them that she had had to declare that the unauthorised photographs had been bought by Neneta Overseas Ltd and that that company therefore had to issue an invoice to Hola in Madrid. She asked for advice. On a practical level, Miss Mildh told Senora Elisa on 10 January that the Marquesa could not pay the photographers until Hello! had paid her and that an invoice to Hello! from Neneta Overseas Ltd was being prepared. She indicated that the Marquesa would be adding $5,000 to it to cover expenses and asked for clarification as to the amount of the larger Ramey invoice.

INVOICES AND THE MARQUESA ARE PAID

[162] On the same day Neneta Overseas Ltd sent to Senor Riera at Hola, an invoice headed 'Douglas/Zeta-Jones Project New York; $205,000'. The photographers' invoices sent to the Marquesa had totalled either $189,600 (uncorrected down to $188,000) or $188,000, to which could be added the disputable $10,000 'Guarantee Fee' and the $5,000 indicated as the Marquesa's expenses. The total thus would either have been $204,600 or $203,000. On either footing the Marquesa's request for $205,000 was including the $10,000 'Guarantee Fee' and was rounding up her expenses. Yet Hello! paid the full $205,000 to Neneta Overseas Ltd without further ado on 15 January 2001 under the signature of Senor Sanchez Junco.

[163] The $205,000 paid was in addition to the £1,175 paid to the Marquesa for telephone expenses on 27 November. Senor Riera never accepted that a $10,000 'Guarantee' had ever been paid; he said he had no knowledge of that $10,000. Senora Elisa told him that the sums did not tally but none the less he passed a bank transfer for the full $205,000 to Senor Sanchez Junco for him to sign it, as he did. Senor Riera claimed that the difference or inclusion of the $10,000, was commission for the Marquesa but there is no hint that that was ever suggested or agreed. The Marquesa, having been put in funds, promptly paid Mr Thorpe, Mr Griffin and Randy Bauer but a difficulty arose as to the payment to Mr Ramey. He asked for his amount to be paid into a bank account not in his own name but in the name of someone else. Miss Mildh sensibly insisted that a letter should be received from Mr Ramey authorising the payment of the amount to the other account. She explained that to Senora Elisa. Senora Elisa's response was that it was for the Marquesa to get in touch with Mr Ramey and that a Senor Riera had insisted that it was the Marquesa that must pay him. Miss Mildh found a way out; she spoke with Sue Neal and Sue Neal had said that she would talk to Mr Ramey on the subject. By this time it would seem that the Hello! defendants were almost paranoid (Sue Neal apart) about avoiding being seen to be in contact with Mr Ramey. But when Mr Ramey telephoned Sue Neal he indicated that he did not want to cause any trouble, he just wanted his money.

b He made an extraordinary suggestion.

[164] It was that Hello! should create a fictitious job for him, paying him a retainer of, say, $5,000 a month until the sum he was claiming, $75,200, should be paid. From the sale of them on 19 November onwards, Mr Ramey had been anxious to conceal or not to reveal his connection with the unauthorised photographs and his willingness to be paid over so long a time again illustrates his defensive, if not guilty, state of mind. The proposal for the retainer was, said Sue Neal, Mr Ramey's idea; he did not wish to be identified with the unauthorised pictures in any way. Miss Mildh, after speaking to Sue Neal, reported the proposal to the Marquesa although describing the plan (mistakenly, as I hold) as Sue Neal's idea. Sue Neal told Mr Ramey she would consult the new editor on his idea but did so in a tone that suggested that it was doubtful that Mr Hall, the incoming editor of Hello!, would adopt it. Nothing further came of the proposal but the Marquesa, without in terms saying that the Marquesa's letter had been a lie, began to warn Senora Elisa of the difficulties inherent in Hello!'s position, plainly intending the message to be passed on to Senor Riera. Mr Ramey had told her (and she had believed) that he had taped his conversation with Senor Sanchez Junco. She warned Senora Elisa: 'I do not think it will be a good idea to go to court to lie. The truth will prevail.'

[165] On 7 March 2001 there was received from Mr Ramey a note authorising payment of his invoices that had been sent to the Marquesa to the account of 'John Phillipp'. The Marquesa or her company paid $US 75,200 to Mr Ramey in that indirect way on or about 30 March 2001. She did not pay the $US10,000 invoice, nor repay it to Hello!, nor was she asked to refund the $10,000.

THE PROCEEDINGS DEVELOP

[166] In the meantime the claimants had served particulars of claim on 22 February 2001 and a defence was then served on 16 May 2001. Paragraph 30 of the defence asserted that Senor Sanchez Junco had bought the unauthorised pictures from Mr Ramey in the early hours of 20 November 2000. Differences between Charles Russell for Hello! and Theodore Goddard for the claimants began to appear in relation to the adequacy or otherwise of disclosure. Mr Hutchings turned to the Marquesa for help in the production of the invoice for $188,000. Senor Riera faxed her to say that he would be grateful if she would comply with the request. The Marquesa, again without in terms saying that the Marquesa's letter had been a lie or that Mr Hutchings knew that it was, warned Mr Hutchings that it would be useless to deny that a conversation between Senor Sanchez Junco and Mr Ramey had taken place. She did not identify, either, which particular conversation between them she had in mind.

[167] On 2 May 2002 Jacob J gave leave for an amendment to the claim form to add Senor Sanchez Junco, the Marquesa, Neneta Overseas Ltd and Philip Ramey as defendants. At first it was contemplated, at least by the Marquesa, that Charles Russell would act for the Marquesa and they went on the record in that regard but instructions were given from Madrid that brought to an end any further representation of the Marquesa by Charles Russell and such papers as she had given that firm were returned. Mr Hutchings warned her on 22 May that time for her defence was close to expiring. On 18 July the Marquesa, using her nickname Neneta, faxed Senor Sanchez Junco saying: a

'Thanks to the mess that Riera has put me into I am spending the whole day from lawyer to another one!! And on top of it nobody pays them?? This is too much ... I hope everybody will say the truth of how Hello! bought the M. Douglas pictures. I am fed up of problems and of nastiness.' b

[168] In para 13.9 of her defence of 22 July 2002 she admitted and averred, for the avoidance of doubt, that the contents of the Marquesa's letter were untrue. By 23 August 2002 she was faxing Senor Riera saying:

'The jam you have put me in with the Zeta-Jones/Douglas trial when you asked me to sign a letter knowing that I could not possibly have bought these photographs, is something that is akin to evil. Anthony Luke knows the truth, like Eduardo Sanchez knows the truth, like Sue knows the truth, like the photographers know the truth. I did not buy those pictures. I just spoke a few times in August 2000 with Mr Ramey and once with F. Griffin and then, in December, I spoke to the writer who lives in New York about the text which was not even published in the end. If the case goes to Court the truth will come out and it will be damaging to Hello!'s reputation. One day the truth will be known and it will come out that in all these years I have been the victim of several injustices and of a continuous persecution.' c

A little later she adds: 'I cannot continue telling lies, I am sorry.' e

[169] It was in answer to that fax that Senor Riera made the important response, to which I have earlier referred, that it was '[f]ollowing instructions from Senor Sanchez Junco' that he had sent the fax of 22 November 2000 to her. Senor Riera in this fax continued in a self-serving way. He said, of the Marquesa's participation in the purchase of the photographs of the Douglas wedding: f

'This participation was to a lesser or greater degree the same as your other collaborations with Hello! for more than 15 years. Meaning that you offered to Mr Sanchez Junco the possibility of a story, you negotiated its execution with the means you consider appropriate, you choose the photographer and the journalist that will execute it and in most of the cases you take responsibility for their expenses in order to later invoice Hello! for all your services, including the total of the story itself. As far as all of us in this company, including myself and all our lawyers, understand this was your involvement, the same as in all other features, and that's the reason for your note, even though we later came to know the photographer, in this case Mr Ramey, chosen by you to co-ordinate the delivery of the feature, contacted Mr Sanchez Junco in the last moments, who with Mr Anthony Luke acting as translator, agreed on a final fee for this story. Fee that was told to you later via phone.' g

[170] I cannot accept that Mr Riera thought that was the truth. It is impossible to see the agreement of the price for the unauthorised pictures between Mr Ramey and Senor Sanchez Junco, Sue Neal's acknowledgment of the price of $188,000 and the photographer's invoices sent direct to Hello! in the first instance, coupled with the absence of any fee for the feature payable to the Marquesa as even 'to a lesser ... degree' the same as her usual collaborations with Hello! over 15 years or so. Moreover to speak of Mr Ramey's contact and j a agreement with Senor Sanchez Junco as merely being something which '[w]e later came to know' is absurd. Further, Senor Riera's assertion later in the fax that '[w]hen we asked you to certify your actions regarding this feature ... you gave freely your help' is not possible to square with his oral evidence that he knew that the Marquesa had been complaining about being required to sign the Marquesa's letter. The Marquesa in a fax of 20 September 2002 told Senor Riera:

b 'I had nothing to do with the relationship between Phil Ramey and Griffin and Hello! or the purchase of the photographs or their publication. Hola and Hello! have published their pictures for so long that it is childish to believe that I was the one to discover them or that I dealt with the matter. Phil Ramey has been selling his features for over 15 years through agencies like c Keystone Nemes. The night of the wedding all the photographs were sent electronically to Hello!. How could I buy something if I was in Sotogrande, where I do not even have a fax. Why was Eduardo going to allow me to buy these pictures? It is ridiculous and it is not true.'

[171] A little later she said:

d 'I would love to be able to continue helping Hello! (but now I know that the truth has to be told). I only signed that letter you sent me to help Hello! and I cannot go on lying. I signed in such a hurry that I had no time to realise what I was signing. Elisa hurried me because they had to send it in order to lift the injunction.'

e I do not accept that she did not realise that what she was signing was untrue but I do accept that she had little to do with the unauthorised photographs and nothing to do with their purchase.

f 'I felt coerced into signing something that was not true and now I can be in contempt of Court for having lied. A few days ago Eduardo asked me "And why did you sign it?". I told him "I signed it because otherwise Riera would have told you that I failed you when you most needed me".'

BEFORE SIR ANDREW MORRITT V-C; JANUARY 2003

g [173] As the proceedings unfolded (Hola SA having been added and then, in May 2002, the third, fourth and fifth defendants) the claimants became increasingly concerned at what they regarded as the inadequacy of disclosure on the part of the Hello! defendants, which had been given on 18 February, 19 March, 30 May and 29 October 2002. They also had very real doubts about h Mrs Cartwright's second witness statement, Senor Sanchez Junco's statement as given to Mrs Doughty and the Marquesa's letter as evidence handed to the Court of Appeal. On 13 December 2002 they applied for an order that the defences of the Hello! defendants should be struck out. That application came on, with others, before Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, on 16 January 2003. He heard oral j evidence from Senor Sanchez Junco, Senor Riera, Mrs Cartwright and Mrs Doughty.

[174] That hearing concluded on 21 January 2003 and Sir Andrew Morritt V-C gave judgment on 27 January ([2003] 1 All ER 1087). He held (at [25]) that Senor Sanchez Junco's statement was false and misleading and that he had known that it was, that it was admitted that the Marquesa's letter was false (at [26]) and that on her own admission, Mrs Cartwright's second witness statement was false as to the paras 10 and 11 included within it. As I have already noted, Sir Andrew Morritt V-C concluded (at [34]) that the case advanced by Hello! before the Court of Appeal, based, as it was, on those false statements, was itself false. Of the three makers of the false documents Sir Andrew Morritt V-C said: 'Each of them knew that his or her statement was false or misleading in the respects I have mentioned.' I accept that Mrs Cartwright knew that paras 10 and 11 in her second witness statement were likely to mislead but I am not satisfied that she knew before the court gave its judgment that a form of her witness statement with those paragraphs in it was going to be used or had been used.

[175] Sir Andrew Morritt V-C also dealt with an allegation of inadequate disclosure. He gave (at [36], [37]) details of documents missing from the Hello! defendants' disclosure or destroyed by them (see also [38], [39], [41] and [42]). The Hello! defendants (at [43]) did not dispute the claimants' table of the respects in which, the claimants said, the disclosure had been defective. Sir Andrew Morritt V-C held (at [87]) that he had no evidence that any pre-action documents had been destroyed in an attempt to pervert the course of justice. He said:

[88] Thus the material disposals or destructions are those made after the effective commencement of proceedings on 20 November 2000. These comprise, the photographs sent by Mr Ramey in electronic form, all the documents later disclosed by the Marquesa and the transmission data relating to the faxed memorandum from Ms Neal to Mr Ramey sent on 19 November 2000 and referred to in [16], above. Such destruction was plainly deliberate in the sense that it is not suggested to have been accidental. But was it more than that?

[97] ... What is not available are the originals or copies of the documents destroyed which had been in the possession of the Hello! defendants. Such documents may or may not have had notes on them made by the recipient or sender respectively. Equally, there is not now available any other document destroyed or disposed of. But what evidence is there that there were any?

[98] This is the conundrum. I have given anxious consideration to whether I should, on a balance of probability, infer from the conduct of the Hello! defendants to which I have referred that there were further material undisclosed documents. I consider that I should.'

[176] However, Sir Andrew Morritt V-C continued (at [101]):

'... I do not consider that there is a real risk that there cannot be a fair trial on those issues, given the documentary evidence and the ability of the judge to draw inferences.'

He held, notwithstanding conduct attributable to the Hello! defendants which had left a very great deal to be desired with regard to the veracity of their evidence and the adequacy of their disclosure, that he was not persuaded that a fair trial was no longer possible. Re-amendment was at the same time permitted of the particulars of claim.

[177] A draft defence was put in on behalf of sixth defendant, Mr Ramey, and, as I have mentioned, a witness statement was received from him but he has taken no further part in the action. As between the claimants and the Hello! defendants, after further amendments, the hearing proceeded on the basis of re-re-amended particulars of claim from the claimants and a re-amended defence on the part of the Hello! defendants.

SE OG HØR

- a [178] At a very late stage Mr Price produced, but not by way of formal evidence verified by anyone, a copy of a Danish magazine, Se Og Hør of 14–18 December 2000, which included a number of the authorised pictures of the wedding. It was an unseemly attempt, by reference to the unedifying surroundings in which the wedding photographs were to be found in Se Og Hør, b to lower any estimation of the quality of the publicity for the wedding which the claimants were willing to authorise. As it was not put into evidence and was produced so late, there was no opportunity to the claimants to inquire into whether Se Og Hør had duly acquired photographic rights from OK! or whether, if they had, that had been done in compliance with OK!'s obligations to Mr and Mrs Douglas. In the circumstances I pay no attention to Se Og Hør; it should not c have been produced as and when it was.

[179] Whilst there have been several procedural skirmishes and many allegations of fact which I have not found it necessary to deal with, that suffices as the factual background against which the claimants raise their several causes of action.

d THE PARTICULARS OF CLAIM

- [180] Although the re-re-amended particulars of claim are at points, unclear as to whether a claim already mentioned is being repeated or a fresh claim is being made, in broad outline the particulars of claim appear to me to raise claims of the following kind: (i) on the basis that the wedding ceremony and reception was
e private, Mr and Mrs Douglas claim in confidence, a duty, in that circumstance, owed only to them (paras 6, 15, 18 and 19 of the re-re-amended particulars of claim); (ii) further, or alternatively, on the basis that the wedding had become an event which was exploited for gain, then all three claimants raise claims in confidence, the case being that photographic representation of the events was, in effect, a commercial or trade secret (paras 6(a) and 30); (iii) breaches of the Data
f Protection Act 1998 by which Mr and Mrs Douglas suffered damage (para 27); (iv) a claim under the laws as to privacy, a claim available only to Mr and Mrs Douglas (para 28); (v) infringement of Mr and Mrs Douglas's rights under Spanish law (para 29(a)); (vi) deliberate interference by all defendants with the rights or businesses of all three claimants, by unlawful means; (vii) conspiracy by g all defendants save Mr Ramey to injure all the claimants by unlawful means; (viii) conspiracy by the Hello! defendants to injure all claimants by unlawful means; (ix) conspiracy by the Hello! defendants with the predominant purpose of injuring all claimants (para 32(b)); (x) that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be set aside as having been procured by false evidence; (xi) exemplary damages for all claimants (para 33(a)); (xii) aggravated damages for the distress
h caused to Mr and Mrs Douglas (para 35); (xiii) injunctive and ancillary relief (para 37). I shall deal first with the law of confidence.

THE LAW OF CONFIDENCE

- j [181] At the broadest level of generality it can be said that equity offers remedies where a breach of an appropriate confidence, personal or commercial, is threatened or has occurred. There is nothing new about the availability of remedies in either type of confidence—see, for example, Prince Albert v Strange (1849) 1 Mac & G 25, 41 ER 1171, a case as to personal confidence but in which authorities on commercial confidence are cited. The jurisdiction in confidence 'is based, not so much on property or on contract, but rather on the duty to be of good faith' (see Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER 8 at 11, [1969] 1 QB 349 at 361 per

Lord Denning MR). It is based 'on the moral principles of loyalty and fair dealing' (see A-G v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 649, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 269 per Lord Griffiths. There is a public interest in the maintenance of confidences—per Lord Goff of Chieveley in the Guardian Newspapers case [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 658, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 281 where he said:

'I start with the broad general principle (which I do not intend in any way to be definitive) that a duty of confidence arises when confidential information comes to the knowledge of a person (the confidant) in circumstances where he has notice, or is held to have agreed, that the information is confidential, with the effect that it would be just in all the circumstances that he should be precluded from disclosing the information to others. I have used the word "notice" advisedly, in order to avoid the (here unnecessary) question of the extent to which actual knowledge is necessary, though I of course understand knowledge to include circumstances where the confidant has deliberately closed his eyes to the obvious.'

And see the passage from the judgment of Bingham LJ in the Guardian Newspapers case [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 624–625, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 215–216 emphasising, upon a wide basis of citation, that the law of confidence rests on an obligation of conscience—see also R v Dept of Health, ex p Source Informatics Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 786 at 793–796, [2001] QB 424 at 436–439 (paras 24–31). Lord Griffiths, in relation to the case where not the confidant but a third party is the defendant said, in the Guardian Newspapers case ([1988] 3 All ER 545 at 649, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 268):

'The duty of confidence is, as a general rule, also imposed on a third party who is in possession of information which he knows is subject to an obligation of confidence: see Prince Albert v Strange (1849) 1 Mac & G 25, 41 ER 1171 and [Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll [1965] 1 All ER 611, [1967] Ch 302]. If this was not the law, the right would be of little practical value; there would be no point in imposing a duty of confidence in respect of the secrets of the marital bed if newspapers were free to publish those secrets when betrayed to them by the unfaithful partner in the marriage. When trade secrets are betrayed by a confidant to a third party it is usually the third party who is to exploit the information and it is the activity of the third party that must be stopped in order to protect the owner of the trade secret.'

And ([1988] 3 All ER 545 at 652, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 272 respectively):

'In a case of commercial secrets with which the development of the law of confidence has been mostly concerned, a third party who knowingly receives the confidential information directly from the confidant, which is the usual case, is tainted and identified with the confidant's breach of duty and will be restrained from making use of the information.'

[182] The necessary components of a successful claim in confidence were conveniently collected by Megarry J in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41 in a passage which has been repeatedly used ever since although occasionally refined in the light of particular considerations, see Smith Kline & French Laboratories (Australia) Ltd v Secretary to the Dept of Community Services and Health, Alphafarm Pty Ltd v Secretary to the Dept of Community Services and Health (1990) 95 ALR 87 at 102 per Gummow J in the Federal Court of Australia. After tracing the a origins of equity's concern with confidence back to a couplet attributed to Sir Thomas More, Megarry J continued to say:

b 'In my judgment, three elements are normally required if, apart from contract, a case of breach of confidence is to succeed. First, the information itself, in the words of Lord Greene, M.R. in [Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 413n at 415], must "have the necessary quality of confidence about it." Secondly, that information must have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence. Thirdly, there must be an unauthorised use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it.' (See [1969] RPC 41 at 47.)

c It is important to note, though, that the citation from Lord Greene MR as to the information having to have 'the necessary quality of confidence about it' is a citation that stops mid-sentence. Lord Greene MR's sentence in full read:

d 'The information, to be confidential must, I apprehend, apart from contract, have the necessary quality of confidence about it, namely, it must not be something which is public property and public knowledge.' (See [1963] 3 All ER 413n at 415). (My emphasis.)

e [183] The 'necessary quality of confidence' which Megarry J contemplated, by his adoption of Lord Greene MR's dictum, was and was only therefore a quality of that particular kind—see also Lord Griffiths in the Guardian Newspapers case [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 648–649, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 268. I mention this as there is a suspicion that in some later cases the phrase the 'necessary quality of confidence' has been regarded as including factors other than such as Lord Greene MR had had in mind. Instead, at the point at which Megarry J was considering it, in the first of his three requirements, the question, to adopt the neat phrase from Gurry Breach of Confidence (1984) p 70 which attracted the notice f of Bingham LJ in the Guardian Newspapers case in the Court of Appeal ([1988] 3 All ER 545 at 624, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 215) is whether the information has 'the basic attribute of inaccessibility'.

g [184] As for the second component, that the information must have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence, Megarry J in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41 at 48 said:

h 'It seems to me that if the circumstances are such that any reasonable man standing in the shoes of the recipient of the information would have realised that upon reasonable grounds the information was being given to him in confidence, then this should suffice to impose upon him the equitable obligation of confidence.'

j Included within that description are cases in which a third party defendant has received information with notice that he received it by way of a breach of confidence by the confidant to whom it was given and includes also cases where that third party has deliberately closed his eyes to the obvious (see the Guardian Newspapers case [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 658, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 281 per Lord Goff of Chieveley and [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 649, 652, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 268, 272 per Lord Griffiths respectively in the passages cited above, and see also Campbell v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 1373 at [66], [2003] 1 All ER 224 at [66], [2003] QB 633 at [66]).

[185] As for the third element, detriment, I need say nothing further on it at this stage before turning to four recent cases, three in the Court of Appeal, which have all included significant consideration of the modern law of confidence in relation to personal confidence. The cases are the interlocutory stage in this case in the Court of Appeal, namely Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967, a judgment delivered on 21 December 2000, Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 908, [2001] 2 WLR 1038, a judgment delivered on 8 January 2001 by Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P, A v B (a company) [2002] EWCA Civ 337, [2002] 2 All ER 545, [2003] QB 195, a judgment delivered on 11 March 2002 and Campbell's case, a judgment delivered on 14 October 2002. a

[186] These cases, as it seems to me, represent a fusion between the pre-existing law of confidence and rights and duties arising under the Human Rights Act 1998. The relevant general principles which I derive, chiefly from these recent cases, are as follows. c

(i) Breach of confidence is an established cause of action but its scope now needs to be evaluated in the light of obligations falling upon the court under s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 (see Douglas's case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 330, [2001] QB 967 at 1011–1012 (para 166) per Keene LJ). That can be achieved by regarding the often opposed rights conferred respectively by arts 8 and 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) as absorbed into the action for breach of confidence and as thereby to some extent giving it new strength and breadth (see A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at [4], [6]). The convention thus comes into play even in private law cases (see Venables's case [2001] 1 All ER 908 at 917–918, [2001] 2 WLR 1038 at 1049 (para 25)). It will be necessary for the courts to identify, on a case by case basis, the principles by which the law of confidentiality must accommodate arts 8 and 10 (see Campbell's case [2003] 1 All ER 224 at [43]). The weaker the claim for privacy, the more likely it will be outweighed by a claim based on freedom of expression (see A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at 11). A balance between the conflicting interests has to be struck (see A v B at [12]). d

(ii) The right to freedom of expression described in art 10(1) of the convention is, by art 10(2), 'subject to such ... conditions ... as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society ... for the protection of the ... rights of others [and] for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence ...' The art 10(1) right to freedom of expression is thus expressly made subject not only to the art 8 right for respect to private and family life but also to rights recognised by the law as to confidence, even where those latter rights are not themselves convention rights. In consequence, privacy rights under art 8 may not, as such, require to be considered in a particular case but none the less there can be an internal conflict within art 10 between the art 10(1) freedom and the art 10(2) rights under the law of confidence to which art 10(1) is made subject. g

(iii) The Council of Europe Resolution 1165 of 1998 gives some guidance which includes a recognition that information about some people's lives has become a highly lucrative commodity for certain sections of the media and that protection is to be given against interference by the media (see A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at 11). Thus even a public figure, which includes those in the arts, is entitled to a private life although he or she may expect and accept that his or her circumstances will be more carefully scrutinised by the media (see A v B at 11). That is not to say, though, that the fact that an individual has achieved prominence on the public stage means that his private life can be laid bare by the media (see Campbell's case [2003] 1 All ER 224 at [41]). j a (iv) If public attention has been courted by a claimant then that may lead that claimant to have less ground upon which to object to intrusion (see A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at 11).

(v) Freedom of expression on the media's part, as a counter-force to, for example, privacy is not invariably the ace of trumps but it is a powerful card to which the court must always pay appropriate respect (see Douglas' case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 302, [2001] QB 967 at 982 (para 49) per Brooke LJ). Put another way, there is no 'presumptive priority' given to such freedom of expression when it is in conflict with another convention right—see Douglas' case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 323–324, [2001] QB 967 at 1004–1005 (paras 135 and 136) per Sedley LJ. Nor, as it seems to me, is there any such presumptive priority where the conflict is with rights under the law of confidence; it would be pointless of art 10(2) to make freedom of expression subject to such rights if it invariably overrode them.

d (vi) Where the court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the convention right to freedom of expression, then the court, where the proceedings relate to material which is claimed or appears to be journalistic, must have particular regard, inter alia, to any relevant privacy code (see s 12(1) and (4) of the Human Rights Act 1998 and Douglas' case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 313, [2001] QB 967 at 994 (para 92), A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at 11).

(vii) There is such a code in place, that of the Press Complaints Commission (the PCC code), the relevant edition of which is that last modified in December 1999. Under the heading 'Privacy' one finds:

e '3.—(i) Everyone is entitled to respect for his or her private and family life, home, health and correspondence. A publication will be expected to justify intrusions into any individual's private life without consent. (ii) The use of long lens photography to take pictures of people in private places without their consent is unacceptable. Note—Private places are public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy.'

Under the heading 'Misrepresentation' one finds:

g '11.—(i) Journalists must not generally obtain or seek to obtain information or pictures through misrepresentation or subterfuge. ... (iii) Subterfuge can be justified only in the public interest and only when material cannot be obtained by any other means.'

h Under the heading 'The Public Interest' the PCC code provides that there may be exceptions to, inter alia, the provisions as to privacy and as to misrepresentation where they can be demonstrated to be in the public interest. The public interest is defined to include:

'(i) Detecting or exposing crime or a serious misdemeanour, (ii) Protecting public health and safety, (iii) Preventing the public from being misled by some statement or action of an individual or organisation.'

j Under the same heading at (iii) one finds:

'There is a public interest in freedom of expression itself. The Commission will therefore have regard to the extent to which material has, or is about to, become available to the public.'

It has not been said by Mr Price that, for the purposes of that code, any material public interest existed in relation to the publication of the unauthorised pictures by Hello! and, no doubt, in not contending for any such public interest he is likely to have had in mind that in any event even fuller coverage of the wedding was intended to be published by OK! within a matter of days. In the absence of any public interest the court is especially bound to pay particular regard to the PCC code and a newspaper which flouts the code may have its claim to freedom of expression trumped by art 10(2) considerations of privacy (see Douglas' case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 313–314, [2001] QB 967 at 994 (para 94) per Brooke LJ and A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at 11). Given the shape of art 10(2) I take the relevant considerations to include also such as are protected by the law of confidence although I recognise that a right of confidence on a subject not protected as a convention right is likely to have less weight than a convention right.

(viii) The regard which the PCC code requires to be had to whether the material is about to become available to the public is an echo of s 12(4)(a)(ii) of the Human Rights Act 1998, where that is a feature to which the court, in a journalistic matter, is to pay particular regard. However, that someone else—for example a complainant—is about to publish is not to be taken as necessarily justifying publication by the defendant; that authorised publication is due in a moment may, on the contrary, make it harder for the unauthorised publisher to justify his breach—see e.g. Times Newspapers Ltd v MGN Ltd [1993] EMLR 443 (where authorised publication of the full Thatcher memoirs was due in ten days' time).

(ix) If there is an intrusion in a situation in which a person can reasonably expect his privacy to be respected then that intrusion will be capable of giving rise to liability in an action for breach of confidence unless the intrusion can be justified (see A v B [2002] 2 All ER 545 at 11).

(x) It is still the case that a duty of confidence arises whenever the party subject to the duty is in a situation where he either knows or ought to know that the other person can reasonably expect his privacy to be protected (see A v B at 11).

(xi) The existence of a relation such as may create a duty of confidence may, and in personal confidence cases commonly will, have to be inferred from the facts (see A v B at 11 and (x)).

(xii) The fact that the information at issue is obtained by unlawful activity does not mean that its publication will necessarily be restrained but that unlawful means have been used to obtain the information may be a compelling factor when a discretion comes to be exercised (see A v B at 11).

(xiii) It can be right to regard unauthorised photographs as 'information' for the purposes of the law of confidence. In the case before me the unauthorised photographs have been said to convey the information 'This is what the wedding and the happy couple looked like' (see Douglas' case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 324, [2001] QB 967 at 1005 (para 138) per Sedley LJ). The law of confidence can well encompass photographs of such an event and no less so because the event could have been described in words or by drawings. The photographs—

'conveyed to the public information not otherwise truly obtainable, that is to say, what the event and its participants looked like. It is said that a picture is worth a thousand words. Were that not so, there would not be a market for magazines like Hello! and OK! The same result is not obtainable through the medium of words alone, nor by recollected drawings with their inevitable inaccuracy. There is no reason why these photographs inherently

- a could not be the subject of a breach of confidence.’ (See Douglas’ case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 329–330, [2001] QB 967 at 1011 (para 165) per Keene LJ.)
- b (xiv) It is a familiar course for chancery judges to grant injunctions to restrain the publication of photographs taken surreptitiously in circumstances such that the photographer is to be taken to have known that the occasion was a private one and that the taking of photographs by outsiders was not permitted (see Douglas’ case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 306–307, [2001] QB 967 at 986–987 (paras 68–69) citing Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444 and Shelley Films Ltd v Rex Features Ltd [1994] EMLR 134).
- c (xv) It is well settled that equity may intervene to prevent a publication of photographic images taken in breach of confidence. If, on some private occasion, the prospective claimant makes it clear, expressly or impliedly, that no photographic images are to be taken of them, then all those present will be bound by the obligation of confidence created by their knowledge (or imputed knowledge) of that restriction (see Douglas’ case [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 307–308, [2001] QB 967 at 988 (para 71) per Brooke LJ).
- d [187] So far, the general principles I have been concerned to set out have mainly related to cases of personal or individual confidence but as I shall need to consider also commercial confidence I need to add some further matters. Thus:
- e (i) The Hello! defendants accept, of course, that trade secrets can be sold and it is common enough in commercial confidence cases for the benefit of the confidentiality to pass to be shared with others. The confidentiality of a trade secret, for example, may be shared between, and be enforceable by, the inventor and the manufacturer to whom he had granted licence for the secret to be turned to account. Thus in Gilbert v Star Newspaper Co Ltd (1894) 11 TLR 4, WS Gilbert had found that, in breach of the implied obligation upon cast members and theatre employees not to disclose the plot of the play in respect of which they
- f were engaged, the plot of his comic opera ‘His Excellency’ had been disclosed to the newspaper. Without proof, as it seems, of any particular document of assignment or as to joint ownership but simply relying upon the factual situation Chitty J required the joinder of the theatre manager as a co-plaintiff and granted an appropriate injunction in favour of both plaintiffs. (ii) So also in O Mustad & Son v S Allcock & Co Ltd and Dosen, a case of 1928 not reported until [1964] 1 WLR 109 and then only as a note. There the confidence had originally been owed by
- g Dosen to his employer, Thoring & Co, which went into liquidation. The benefit of that company’s trade secrets was bought by the plaintiffs, O Mustad & Son. The report is not entirely clear as it sometimes speaks of Dosen having acquired information whilst in ‘their service’, ie that of Mustad, yet speaks also of what
- h Dosen had learned in the service of his ‘former Master’, a reference to Thoring & Co. The better view, as it seems to me, is that Dosen was never in Mustad’s employ and never acquired the relevant knowledge whilst in Mustad’s employ. On that footing the case shows that the benefit of a confidence can pass, in that case by purchase from the liquidator of Thoring, and, if that is so, then it is hard
- j to see why it should not be shared between and be enforceable by co-owners or by a successor in title, at any rate where the defendant knew or could be taken to have known of the co-ownership or sharing before acting in breach and where all entitled to the confidence assert it. It remains the case, of course, that it is only the person or persons to whom confidence is owed that can assert the confidence—see eg Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER 8 at 11, [1969] 1 QB 349 at 361 per Lord Denning MR. Despite the Hello! defendants’ argument, I find nothing in Rickless v United Artists Corp [1987] 1 All ER 679, [1988] QB 40 that suggests that, while surrounding circumstances can create the enforceability of a confidence by the original confider, they cannot also create an enforceability shared between more than one, the original confider and another or others, where the facts require that such others should be protected. a

[188] In my approach to the law I have had to consider a passage from the judgment of Gleeson CJ in Australian Broadcasting Corp v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 185 ALR 1, a passage cited by the Court of Appeal both in A v B (a company) [2002] 2 All ER 545, [2003] QB 195 and in Campbell v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd [2003] 1 All ER 224, [2003] QB 633. The passage reads (at 13 (para 42)): b

‘There is no bright line which can be drawn between what is private and what is not. Use of the term “public” is often a convenient method of contrast, but there is a large area in between what is necessarily public and what is necessarily private. An activity is not private simply because it is not done in public. It does not suffice to make an act private that, because it occurs on private property, it has such measure of protection from the public gaze as the characteristics of the property, the nature of the activity, the locality, and the disposition of the property owner combine to afford. Certain kinds of information about a person, such as information relating to health, personal relationships, or finances, may be easy to identify as private; as may certain kinds of activity, which a reasonable person, applying contemporary standards of morals and behaviour, would understand to be meant to be unobserved. The requirement that disclosure or observation of information or conduct would be highly offensive to a reasonable person of ordinary sensibilities is in many circumstances a useful practical test of what is private.’ c

[189] In Campbell’s case at first instance ([2002] EWHC 499 (QB), [2002] IP & T 612) Morland J had turned to this dictum whilst considering (for the purposes of the first limb of the three-part test suggested by Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41) whether the details published about the model Naomi Campbell had ‘the necessary quality of confidence about them’ (see Campbell’s case in the Court of Appeal [2003] 1 All ER 224 at [19], [20]). She was claiming only in confidence ([2003] 1 All ER 224 at [7]). Morland J held, in the light of Gleeson CJ’s dictum, that that test was satisfied. It is not clear to me whether the Court of Appeal in Campbell’s case also used the dictum as a yardstick appropriate for judging whether the first test in Coco’s case was satisfied—consider Campbell’s case ([2003] 1 All ER 224 at [48] and [51])—but when one looks at the matter more closely it seems to me that cannot have been intended. The first limb in Coco’s case as to the necessary quality of confidence is to do and to do only, as the full citation from Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 413n shows (see [182], above), with whether the information is already public property and public knowledge. It is not concerned with whether or not the information is ‘private’ in the sense that its disclosure would be significantly harmful. The law at that first stage of the Coco test does not, for example, in a trade secret case, raise what would be corresponding issues such as whether the trade secret in question is truly such as might be turned to great commercial advantage or with whether its disclosure would be thoroughly damaging to the claimant’s trade. It is not, as I see it, appropriate in a case of personal or individual confidence to look into any corresponding question at this first stage. Nor, on f
g

- a looking in more detail at the Australian case, does one find that the dictum was intended for any such use.

[190] The case did not concern personal or individual confidence or, indeed, in Gleeson CJ's view of the facts, the law of confidence at all (see Australian Broadcasting Corp v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 185 ALR 1 at 17 (para 55)). The case concerned the surreptitious filming for television of the respondent's brush-tailed possum processing operations, in particular the stunning and killing of such possums at its licensed abattoir. It was not suggested that the operations filmed were secret or that the requirements of confidentiality had been imposed upon those who might see the operations. The fact that the operations were and had to be licensed by a public authority suggested that information about the nature of the operations was not confidential (at 9 (para 25) per Gleeson CJ). It was, indeed, conceded (at 10 (para 30)) that information about the nature of the processing was not confidential and not imparted in confidence. The activities filmed were carried out on private property but were not private in any other sense (at 12 (para 35)). It was against that background that the respondent and the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, intervening, asserted not confidence but a very broad kind of unconscionability and privacy (at 10–11, 12 (paras 31 and 38)). But Gleeson CJ was cautious about 'declaring a new tort of the kind for which the respondent contends' (at 13 (para 41)).

[191] It was in the context of difficulties in constructing such a tort that the passage cited above appeared (at 13 (para 42)), the difficulties including a reflection by Gleeson CJ on whether notions of privacy deriving from the concept of human dignity could, under Australian law, in any event be invoked by a corporation. The last sentence of the citation was concerned with what might be regarded as private for a possible law of privacy or unconscionability; it did not purport to be a description of what may be confidential for the purposes of the law of confidence, still less was it addressing the first limb of the three-part test in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41. Moreover the dictum does not even purport to be an exclusive definition of what is private; that matters the disclosure of which would be highly offensive to a reasonable person of ordinary sensibilities may, on that account, be regarded as private does not, of itself, suggest that no other matters can be so regarded.

[192] On this basis I do not feel it necessary, whilst considering the law of confidence, to subject the unauthorised photographs to any test such as whether a reasonable person of ordinary sensibilities would, in the circumstances of the Douglasses, have regarded them or their publication by Hello! as highly offensive. However, had I been required to apply that test, I would not have held the photographs themselves to be highly offensive or offensive at all but that their taking and their publication, in all the surrounding circumstances, was likely to offend the Douglasses.

[193] It is not the case, where all three components of the Coco test are satisfied, that substantive relief necessarily follows. That would be to confuse the fundamental nature of the legal right with the question of whether equity affords a remedy in the particular case—see Stephens v Avery [1988] 2 All ER 477 at 481, [1988] Ch 449 at 454 per Browne-Wilkinson V-C. It is thus, for example, that no confidence 'in iniquity' will be protected, nor does equity extend itself to protect mere trivial tittle-tattle, however confidential it might be. It is also, as it seems to me, that it is at the remedy or relief stage that equity can and should take into account such features as whether, on conducting a balance between confidentiality and freedom of expression, substantive relief (eg an injunction or damages or equitable compensation beyond the nominal) should be granted—see Lord Griffiths in A-G v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [1988] 3 All ER 545 at 649–650, [1990] 1 AC 109 at 268–269 as to the court refusing, in appropriate cases, to uphold the right to confidence and as to judges being required to balance the public interest in upholding a right to confidence against some other public interest, an approach only the more appropriate now that the Human Rights Act 1998 and the recent authorities to which I have referred require conflicting issues such as confidentiality on the one hand and freedom of expression on the other to be weighed and a balance struck. It is at this stage that the degree of offensiveness of the activity complained of and its propensity to injure may be put in the scale.

A PROVISIONAL APPLICATION OF THE LAW TO THE FACTS

[194] Before I examine the Hello! defendants' arguments on the law of confidence I shall attempt to apply the law, as I have described it so far, to the facts, those I have already found and those I shall describe as I proceed.

[195] I shall first look to see whether it can be right to regard the Douglas wedding generally, and, in particular, the reception coupled with rights to the photography of the event, as a commercial entity attracting such aspects of the law of confidence as can be deployed to protect trade secrets. I have already noted the Council of Europe Resolution 1165 of 1998 and the recognition in A v B (a company) [2002] 2 All ER 545, [2003] QB 195 (see 186, above) that information about private lives has become a lucrative commodity for certain sections of the media. Here it is difficult to deny the title of commodity to that which the two rival magazines each bid a £1m or more to obtain. Moreover, to bride and groom, actor and actress, the public representation of their respective appearances was and is an important part of a successful career and business. Thus in evidence that was not disputed Miss Zeta-Jones said:

'Both Michael and I are in the business of "name and likeness". Any photographs of us that are published are important to us, not just personally but professionally as well. People go to see movies specifically because either Michael or I are in them and they have expectations, amongst other things, of the way we will look. Those expectations are created to a significant degree by the images they see of us in the media. Directors take into account the public's perception of actors and actresses when casting for films. The hard reality of the film industry is that preserving my image, particularly as a woman, is vital to my career. I had a lesson in Britain of the way in which poor publicity can stunt your career prospects. I have always been determined not to allow this to happen to me in the United States where I do virtually all my work. For this reason, there is a clause in every performance contract I sign giving me full photo approval. This means that no still photographs of the movie may be published or distributed without my prior consent. This is not a right that all actors manage to obtain and is only granted to those with sufficient "star" power. It is a right that I have had to work hard to obtain and I work hard to enforce and control it. I spend a great deal of time sifting through the hundreds of photographs that are taken of me during a film shoot and selecting those which I know will benefit my career.'

Mr Douglas says:

a 'On a professional level, because my name and likeness is a valuable asset to me, it has always been important for me, professionally, to protect my name and likeness and to prevent unauthorised use of either and I have taken steps to do so.'

b [196] Given that and given also the lengths to which Miss Zeta-Jones and Mr Douglas went to ensure the privacy of their wedding, I see it as appropriate to examine the applicability of the law of confidence on the basis that the claimants had here a valuable trade asset, a commodity the value of which depended, in part at least, upon its content at first being kept secret and then of its being made public in ways controlled by Miss Zeta-Jones and Mr Douglas for the benefit of them and of the third claimant. I quite see that such an approach may lead to a c distinction between the circumstances in which equity affords protection to those who seek to manage their publicity as part of their trade or profession and whose private life is a valuable commodity and those whose is not but I am untroubled by that; the law which protects individual confidences and a law of privacy may protect the latter class and provide no reason to diminish protection for the former. So far as concerns OK!, the right to exclusivity of photographic coverage d of the wedding was, in contrast with the nature of the confidence as to the first and second claimants, even more plainly a right in the nature of a trade secret.

[197] I thus regard photographic representation of the wedding reception as having had the quality of confidence about it. Of course, the general appearance of both Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones was no secret; what they looked like was
e well known to the public. But that does not deny the quality of commercial confidentiality to what they looked like on the exceptional occasion of their wedding. As I have said, the very facts that Hello! and OK! competed for exclusivity as they did and that each was ready to pay so much for it points to the commercial confidentiality of coverage of the event. The event was private in f character and the elaborate steps to exclude the uninvited, to include only the invited, to preclude unauthorised photography, to control the authorised photography and to have had the claimants' intentions in that regard made clear all conduce to that conclusion. Such images as were, so to speak, radiated by the event were imparted to those present, including Mr Thorpe and his camera, in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence. Everyone there knew that g was so. In the circumstances as I have held them to be, Mr Thorpe knew (or at the very least ought to have known) that the claimants reasonably expected the private character of the event and photographic representation of it to be protected.

[198] As for the Hello! defendants, their consciences were, in my view, h tainted; they were not acting in good faith nor by way of fair dealing. Whilst their position might have been worse had I held that the taking of unauthorised pictures for use by them had been truly commissioned in advance, even without that there is in my view enough to afflict their conscience. They knew that OK! had an exclusive contract; as persons long engaged in the relevant trade, they
j knew what sort of provisions any such contract would include and that it would include provisions intended to preclude intrusion and unauthorised photography. Particularly would that be so where, as they knew, a very considerable sum would have had to have been paid for the exclusive rights which had been obtained. As to their knowledge of steps taken to protect the secrecy of the event, their own written text in their issue 639 spoke of 'elaborate security procedures'. The surrounding facts were such that a duty of confidence should be inferred from them. The Hello! defendants had indicated to paparazzi in advance that they would pay well for photographs and they knew the reputation of the paparazzi for being able to intrude. The unauthorised pictures themselves plainly indicated they were taken surreptitiously. Yet these defendants firmly kept their eyes shut lest they might see what they undeniably knew would have become apparent to them. Breach of confidence apart, had the Hello! defendants opened their eyes they would have seen that the taking of the photographs which they bought had involved at least a trespass. The fact, as I have held it to be, that they did not in advance and in terms require or authorise on their behalf trespass and surreptitious photography by Thorpe or by any other paparazzo does not disprove the unconscionability, as I hold it to be, under English law, of their publication of the unauthorised photographs in England and Wales.

[199] It cannot be doubted but that the claimants suffered detriment from the publication by the Hello! defendants. Distress was caused to Mr and Mrs Douglas who also had to re-arrange their plans for approval of the authorised photographs. They incurred expenses that would otherwise have been unnecessary. They may also have suffered financial loss if it transpires that syndication receipts that would otherwise have become payable to them were lost upon syndication being either less extensive or less profitable than it would have been had not wedding photographs being published by Hello!.

[200] As for OK!, it not only had costs in the re-arranging of its schedule so as to get out some of the authorised images as soon as possible to mitigate loss but it lost also the kudos of being and being seen to be the only one of the two leading rivals to be able to offer authorised coverage of the 'showbiz wedding of the year'. They may well have sold fewer copies of their magazine and have received less in respect of syndication rights than would have been the case had Hello! not published the unauthorised pictures.

[201] A wedding is an exceptional event to any bride and groom and I do not hold Mr and Mrs Douglas' position as public figures or as persons who had, as to other events, no doubt been tolerant of or even welcoming to publicity, as lessening their right, as any might have, to complain of intrusion at their wedding or of the consequences of that intrusion. It was an intrusion against which elaborate steps had been taken. I have in mind, too, that the steps taken by the Douglasses were not taken solely for reward or as 'hype' but were taken in a genuine and reasonable belief that thereby an offensive media frenzy would be avoided.

[202] However, it does not follow from the mere presence of all the elements of a successful case in breach of confidence that substantive relief will follow. The Hello! defendants' right to freedom of expression and provisions of s 12 of the Human Rights Act 1998 here come into play, as I have indicated. Section 12(1) provides:

'This section applies if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression.'

[203] Section 12(5) makes it clear that 'relief' includes any remedy or order. The term thus includes an award of damages or of equitable compensation. Whilst any award of damages against the Hello! defendants and in favour of the claimants does not, in one sense, affect the Hello! defendants' right to freedom of expression as to the unauthorised photographs because they have already been published, any conclusion of mine that conduces to awards of a damages generally can be said to affect the exercise of the convention right to freedom of expression because a possible exposure to a substantial monetary award can deter or inhibit expression almost as completely as would an injunction. I thus proceed on the basis that s 12 applies to the case before me.

[204] Striking a balance between freedom of expression and confidentiality as directed by s 12 and the authorities to which I have referred, I have in mind that b no public interest is claimed for the unauthorised pictures, either within the understanding of the phrase in the general law or within the terms of 'the relevant privacy code', the PCC code to which I earlier referred. I have in mind that photographic representation of the wedding (though not by way of the unauthorised photographs) was, in November 2000, about to become available to the public by way of the intended editions of OK! and that the unauthorised c photographs, journalistic material but of poor quality, did become available to the public at the same time as the authorised pictures. I do not regard these features as sufficiently persuasive to exclude a grant of relief to the claimants. More significant, in my view, are the terms of the PCC code.

[205] Looking at that code, there was an intrusion into individuals' private d lives without consent; that intrusion was known or must be taken to have been known to the Hello! defendants, as was also that it amounted to a failure to respect the Douglasses' private and family lives. I have not understood any justification for the intrusion to have been advanced except Hello!'s wish to include as early as practicable some coverage of the event, an event which they were confident their readers would wish it to cover. I do not hold the intrusion e to have been justified. The very same principle in the PCC code that provides that the use of long lenses to take pictures of people in private places without their consent was unacceptable must, as I read it, inescapably also make the surreptitious use of short lenses to take pictures of people in private places without their consent at least equally unacceptable. Moreover, on the day and in f the surrounding circumstances, the parts of the Plaza Hotel in New York where the wedding ceremony and reception took place were private places in the sense, used by the PCC code, that they were places in respect of which there was a reasonable expectation of privacy. Given that Mr Thorpe, not an invitee, managed to effect an entry and took the trouble to wear a 'tuxedo' in order to hold himself out as if a guest at the wedding, I hold also that the unauthorised g photographs were obtained by misrepresentation or subterfuge. The PCC code was broken and the Hello! defendants either knew or, had they not closed their eyes to the truth, would have known and hence must be taken to have known, that that was the case.

[206] So far, then, and without yet having looked at the particular arguments h on the law which the Hello! defendants press upon me, I provisionally see the rights to freedom of expression of the Hello! defendants to have been subject to and, in the circumstances, to have been overborne by the rights of all the claimants respectively under the law of confidence.

j THE HELLO! DEFENDANTS' DEFENCES UNDER THE LAW OF CONFIDENCE

[207] In response to the claimants' claims under the law of confidence Mr Price and Mr Fernando raise a formidable battery of arguments. They say that the information as to which confidence is claimed is not sufficiently identified and that the protection of equity is to be denied because events of the wedding day could have been made public other than photography by, for example, a verbal description or by drawings. That argument is denied force by the observations in the Court of Appeal to which I have referred in 186, above and which I adopt. In any event, where the relevant principles are broad ones operating in conscience I doubt the wisdom of attempting to split hairs. a

[208] Next it is said that it was generally understood that the unauthorised pictures, once taken, could be fairly sold, bought and published. That is true in the sense only that there could have come about a situation in which someone whose conscience was wholly untainted by notice or knowledge of the circumstances that gave rise to the claim in confidence could have acquired the pictures, a person who would, on that account, have been able to publish them without risk of restraint from, or of having to provide compensation to, the claimants. The point, however, has nothing whatsoever to do with the factual position of the Hello! defendants. b

[209] Next it is said that as the unauthorised pictures and Hello!'s authorised ones, as it transpired, on the Court of Appeal's lifting of the injunction, both came out on the same day, any rights of the claimants were thereby lost; I cannot see that the giving or withholding of the protection of equity is to be denied by reason only of a defendant, otherwise liable, having been able to rush into print. It would be extraordinary if, by accelerating his otherwise unconscionable publication, a defendant could say that he had done no wrong. c

[210] Next the Hello! defendants say that any confidence that otherwise would or might have existed evaporated upon the contract being made by the Douglasses for sale of authorised pictures of the same event. No authority is given for the proposition save for s 12(4) of the Human Rights Act 1998 which, as I read it, does not support the proposition even as to a personal or individual confidence. But, of course, when the claim is regarded as one of commercial confidence, so far from its sale being destructive of confidence, it is a common form whereby the protected information should be turned to account, as, for example, might be the plot of an opera or of a proposed television series (see Gilbert v Star Newspaper Co Ltd (1894) 11 TLR 4 and Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER 8, [1969] 1 QB 349. d

[211] Next it is said that the Hello! defendants bought the information, the unauthorised photographs, rather than taking them themselves. That, of itself, is no defence where the successor in title, so to speak, to the original breaker of confidence has or is taken to have a conscience which is tainted. Were it otherwise, as Lord Griffiths pointed out (see [181], above) the protection of the law of confidence would be entirely worthless. Then these defendants say there was no wrong done by the law of the place, New York, but, firstly, I cannot see how Mr Thorpe can fail to be regarded as other than having been at least a trespasser by the law of New York and it has certainly not been demonstrated to me that he was not. Secondly, so long as the conscience of the publishers of Hello! is tainted, as I have held it to be, I fail to see how Thorpe's innocence of any breach of local law, even had that been proved to me, should assist them. e

[212] Then these defendants say, rightly in my view, that their rights under art 10 are engaged. But that is no trump card; a balance has to be struck and, as I have attempted to do by reference to the relevant code, the balance falls against the Hello! defendants' art 10's rights. These defendants also assert, again rightly, that the countervailing rights of confidence can only overcome an art 10(1) right to freedom of expression if they are 'prescribed by law'. In my judgment they are; I am not conscious of having extended but merely of having applied the law. f

[213] Next, as I have understood the argument, it is said that a right to confidence that would otherwise have existed is lost upon a claimant himself g a making the information public. I accept that that may in some cases be so but I do not see that the argument denies relief at trial to a claimant on the ground that he had intended to make the information public. If it were otherwise then whenever an injunction were to be declined and where, therefore, the defendant was free to and did publish ahead of or at the same time as the claimant, the refusal of the injunction would, in effect, be a denial of all relief. Damages could b never be an adequate remedy, yet here the Court of Appeal has held that they can be.

[214] Then these defendants say that the information contained in the unauthorised pictures was so generally available as that it could not be regarded as confidential. That, in my view, flies in the face of the facts as to the considerable lengths gone to in order to keep the appearance of the dress and the c cake and of the bride and groom on the day all secret, to keep the event to invitees to the exclusion of others and to ensure that only approved photographs were to be able to be both taken and published.

[215] Next it is said that what the claimants are truly claiming is a non-existent intellectual property right corresponding to copyright in the visual aspect of the d wedding. That the rights claimed by the claimants are in some respects capable of being likened to or to overlap with a claim in copyright does not, in my judgment, deny the claims validity. There are crucial differences, of which the fact that the claim in confidence operates by reference to the conscience of the defendant is perhaps the most significant. That there may be an overlap does not e disable a claimant from the ability to assert the separate right, not in copyright, which the claimants here assert.

[216] A recurring theme on the part of these defendants is that what the Douglasses, in particular, were seeking was not privacy or confidentiality but control. They wanted to be sure that the only visual representations of the wedding that were to be available to the media were such as had been approved f by them. In that way control over the media would be exercised. That, though, overlooks that control is not an improper objective of the law of confidence; that certain information should not be published or that copies of certain documents should be destroyed or returned or that abuse of a trade secret should be barred to a person are all both familiar aspects of the law of confidentiality and aspects of control. I do not see the fact that control was sought to be exercised as of itself
g denying the attempt the characteristics of an application of the law of confidence; it is, rather another factor in the overall balance between confidence and freedom of expression.

[217] Then it is said that by intending to make public some visual aspects of the wedding (namely photographs selected by them) the Douglasses lost the right to h claim in confidence as to any such representations (and therefore lost the right to complain of the unauthorised pictures). But I cannot see that that should follow, especially if one regards the confidence here as a commercial one. It is common, with respect to commercial confidences, that turning them to account involves making them public; the fact that there is an intention to make them public does j not deny that rights of confidence can exist with respect to them. Moreover, though these may not be complete analogies, it would be absurd if, for example, a playwright, intending his play later to be performed in public, upon his disclosing to a prospective supporter in confidence only that his play was about, say, a Prince of Denmark or if a television screen-writer, intending his series to be put on television, upon his disclosure only that his idea was for a series about three girls sharing a flat in Kensington, should in either case thereby lose rights to the confidentiality of the play or of the idea for a series. Mr Tugendhat, as an example showing that disclosure to the public of a chosen part can still leave rights in confidence in an unpublicised remainder, points to the Royal Family in the nineteenth century having permitted to be published engravings of an 1841 Landseer oil. The painting showed Her Majesty Queen Victoria, HRH Prince Albert, their eldest daughter, the Princess Royal, Victoria, their dogs and dead game and other birds in the green drawing room at Windsor. Mr Tugendhat asks rhetorically whether it could possibly be that by permitting that family scene to be made public the Royal Family thereby lost such rights as the law of confidence otherwise would have conferred on them to restrain publication of other representations of their private and family life. I see the force of the example. Indeed, if anything, the claimants here are in a better position because at the very point at which the Hello! defendants intended to publish, unless enjoined, the claimants had allowed the publication of nothing but one close-up of the bride and groom showing neither the bride's dress nor the wedding cake.

[218] Then Mr Price and Mr Fernando referred me to Pollard v Photographic Co (1888) 40 Ch D 345. Mrs Pollard had contracted with the defendant photographic company for photographs to be taken of herself for her own purposes. She found that the defendant was using the photograph for quite different purposes. The case was argued on the footing that, she having contracted for the photograph to be taken for one purpose, there was an implied term that it should not be used for any other. North J held that such an implied term did exist. There was no citation of authorities upon or any examination of, the law of confidence. Before me counsel argued that publication of a photograph of Mrs Pollard taken by a paparazzo outside the photographic company's premises would not have been a breach of confidence. That, as it seems to me, is very likely but it is nothing to do with this case. If the portrait photograph of Mrs Pollard had been taken for publication by her and was published then, say these defendants, there could, apart from copyright and contract, be no cause of action against the photographer were he separately to publish the photograph. That example supposes that the unauthorised publication took place after the authorised one. That is not the case before me.

[219] Then these defendants comment on Shelley Films Ltd v Rex Features Ltd [1994] EMLR 134 saying that it was important in that case to the producers' marketing and commercial strategy that the appearance of the latex Frankenstein creature mask in that case was kept secret pending the release of the film in which the mask was to be worn. I do not see that the comment assists these defendants; it was similarly important to the marketing and commercial strategy of all the claimants that the appearance of the bride, groom, wedding cake and other features of the wedding should be kept secret pending release of the approved photographs. In the Shelley Films case Mr M E Mann QC said (at 151):

'I do not ignore, of course, that there will come a time, possibly before the action comes on for trial, which I am told by Counsel I should assume it will, when Shelley's right to the protection it now seeks will be lost because Shelley will by then have released its confidential information to the public in a manner of its own choosing.'

[220] There is nothing about that passage which suggests that a claimant loses any of his remedies when his release to the public is not earlier than that, by the defendant, of which he complains.

a [221] Next these defendants are critical of the decision in Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444 but the extensive citation from it by Brooke LJ in the Court of Appeal hearing in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967 contains no criticism of the case and I do not accept that the case contains any relevant confusion between the scene itself which the observer saw and a photographic record of it. The law of confidence may there have been used to create an exclusive right to photography but I do not understand the Court of Appeal to have disapproved of that.

b [222] Then these defendants rely upon Sports & General Press Agency Ltd v Our Dogs Publishing Co Ltd [1917] KB 125. The plaintiff there had sold the press photographic rights to a dog show. An independent photographer took pictures and sold them to the defendant, who published them. The plaintiff sought to restrain further publication. An injunction was refused on the ground that the dog show organisers and the plaintiff could, by contract, have laid down, but had failed to lay down, conditions of entry or as to banning the use of unauthorised cameras. The authority does not assist in a case where (as before me) conditions of entry (albeit not by contract) were laid down and where there had been a well-understood ban on cameras. No questions as to confidentiality were argued.

c [223] These defendants then referred to Times Newspapers Ltd v MGN Ltd [1993] EMLR 443. Bingham MR complained that the court would have welcomed, but was denied, the opportunity of considering the plaintiffs' application for an injunction at greater length. Another difficulty in the case was that the plaintiffs (oddly, in my view) were not able satisfactorily to frame an injunction that did not go too far. However, Bingham MR did say that the unauthorised extracts from Lady Thatcher's memoirs, acquired by the defendant 'by means that are unknown' and parts of which the defendant had already published, were '[c]ertainly not information which is confidential in a sense that the public is not intended to learn of it, because this is material which is intended to be published, no doubt, as widely as an efficient publisher can procure'.

d [224] I respectfully doubt whether, even as to a wholly personal or individual confidence, an intention to publish should of itself invariably deny a claimant relief but it cannot sensibly deny relief in the case of a commercial secret. An inventor (to return to a point I have touched upon) might, for example, confide to a prospective manufacturer secret details of his invention which he hoped soon to make public by way of an application for a patent. So also in the case of the plot of a comic opera (see Gilbert v Star Newspaper Co Ltd (1894) 11 TLR 4), or the idea for a television series (see Fraser v Thames Television Ltd [1983] 2 All ER 101, [1984] QB 44). In such cases it would be absurd, as I have already mentioned, if an intention to make the subject matter of the confidence public should destroy confidentiality. It is to be noted, too, that in considering whether 'to take the extreme step of restraining publication of material which a newspaper wishes to publish', the Court of Appeal in 1993 did not then have the guidance of s 12(4) of the Human Rights Act 1998 and its reference to 'any relevant privacy code'. Had that been a relevant consideration in 1993 and had the circumstances of the defendants' acquisition of the material accordingly been investigated, questions might well, one would think, have arisen as to whether the material had been acquired through misrepresentation, subterfuge or worse. I do not regard the Times Newspapers case as authoritative in the post-Human Rights Act 1998 age.

e [225] Then these defendants argue that Woodward v Hutchins [1977] 2 All ER 751, [1977] 1 WLR 760 illustrates that a claimant who has deliberately sought publicity loses the right to insist upon confidentiality in respect of publicity. That, as it seems to me, goes too far and I do not see the case as establishing that proposition; what the case does illustrate is that where a claimant has fostered an image which is not a true one, there can be a public interest in correcting it (see also Campbell v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd [2003] 1 All ER 224, [2003] QB 633 (where the claimant could be described as a role model). The public, said Lord Denning MR, should not be misled ([1977] 2 All ER 751 at 754, [1977] 1 WLR 760 at 764). The defendant's case in Woodward's case was that the image which the plaintiffs had created was one of fallacies and half-truths ([1977] 2 All ER 751 at 756, [1977] 1 WLR 760 at 765 per Bridge LJ). No such allegation is made against Mr and Mrs Douglas, nor is it even said that the unauthorised photographs were intended to correct a false image which the authorised ones were about to create. To hold that those who have sought any publicity lose all protection would be to repeal art 8's application to very many of those who are likely most to need it. I would accept that a claimant who has himself publicised a certain area of his private life (for example his sexual proclivities and activity) might well lose the protection otherwise available to him in that area or, possibly, even more generally, but I have not seen how that argument could serve to diminish the protection to be afforded to the unique event, not 'hyped' by them, of the Douglas wedding.

[226] I hope I have now dealt with at least the principal submissions of the Hello! defendants on the English law as to confidence. For the reasons I have given their arguments do not deflect me from the view I expressed earlier.

CONCLUSIONS AS TO CONFIDENCE

[227] In my judgment, and first regarding the claimants' case as one of either commercial confidence or of a hybrid kind in which, by reason of it having become a commodity, elements that would otherwise have been merely private became commercial, I find the Hello! defendants to have acted unconscionably and that, by reason of breach of confidence, they are liable to all three claimants to the extent of the detriment which was thereby caused to the claimants respectively.

[228] Were I to be wrong in having regarded the first and second claimants' positions as akin to that of holders of a trade secret and had the confidence in question therefore to be regarded as wholly personal and individual, then, as I see it, the defence against them (but only them) that they intended by sale to release photographs of the event to the public, albeit ones selected by them, has greater force. Even so, I have difficulties. I do not understand Mr Price to say that there would have been no right under the law of confidence and in turn no right to injunctive or other relief if the bride and groom, having taken steps to keep the event private by way of security as they did, then made no agreement with any magazine and chose to allow no photographs at all to be published. If in such a case equity would have protected them, why should a sale of the photographic rights under which publication of photographs of the event were intended to be published itself deny that protection ahead of their actual publication? The Court of Appeal knew, of course, that the Douglasses had sold exclusive photographic coverage of the wedding to OK! with the knowledge that authorised photographs would thus be published but no member of the court held that the Douglasses thereby lost all rights and had destroyed their whole causes of action. Instead, at most, the court held that they had thereby confined their relief under their causes of action to damages. Even in a contest between, on the one hand, a claim to personal confidence weakened by sale and the intention to publish, and, on the a other, the Hello! defendants' rights to freedom of expression, I would still have been affected by the circumstances I have described, including Hello!'s breach of the PCC code. I would have come to the same decision as that given in [227], above. I fail to see why the fact that publication of authorised photographs was intended makes it any less unconscionable on the part of the Hello! defendants to seek, as they did, to anticipate that publication.

[229] It is notorious that, as our law was before the Human Rights Act 1998, there was no effective law of privacy; there was nothing to fill such gaps as might exist when neither the law of confidence nor any other law protected a claimant. That other jurisdictions, in general terms no less free or democratic than this one, have apparently workable laws of privacy which neither oppress nor stifle is at least arguable; Mr Tugendhat refers me to examples in Germany, Canada and France. Senor Enrich in his clear and impressive evidence as to Spanish law showed how such a law operates in Spain. That a strong case can be made, by way of the convention and the Human Rights Act 1998 coupled with decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, that in some respects we do now have a law of privacy is apparent from the judgment of Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967. I am invited to hold that there is an existing law of privacy under which the first and second claimants are entitled to relief. I decline that invitation for five reasons. (i) Whilst Sedley LJ's judgment provides a powerful case for the existence, already, of a law of privacy, that another view is tenable can be seen from the judgments in Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081, [2003] 3 All ER 943, [2002] QB 1334, judgments delivered on 20 December 2001, after Douglas' case. There the events complained of occurred before the Human Rights Act 1998 came into effect and were such that no case in confidence could be made. The hearing before the judge below and, of course, in the Court of Appeal, was after the Human Rights Act 1998 had come into force. The Court of Appeal held there had been no general law of privacy before the Human Rights Act 1998 and that the Act had had no retrospective effect. Thus even had the court held either that there had been or that there had not been a law of privacy created by the Human Rights Act 1998, it could only have been obiter. None the less there was reference made to the decision in Douglas' case. Lord Woolf CJ, beyond describing Sedley LJ's judgment as 'most instructive' ([2003] 3 All ER 943 at [20]) did nothing further to espouse it. Mummery LJ (at [60]), looking to the future, foresaw difficulties in the judicial development of a comprehensive or 'blockbuster' tort and Buxton LJ set out a strong case from [97] on as to the difficulties in the way of creating any such broad tort. (ii) Sedley LJ's case for a general tort depends, on my reading of his judgment, on our law otherwise being so inadequate in relation to the protection and enforcement of individual rights to private and family life as to fall short of compliance with the convention, the Human Rights Act 1998 and the requirements of decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. Even accepting the attractive argument so raised, it does not point to any need for the creation of new law in areas in which (for example, by way of reference to the law of confidence) protection and enforcement are already not only available in theory but in practice even in the particular case. As I have held Mr and Mrs Douglas to have been protected by the law of confidence, no relevant hole exists in English law such as, on the facts of the case before me, a due respect for the convention requires should be filled. (iii) So broad is the subject of privacy and such are the ramifications of any free-standing law in the area that the subject is better left to Parliament which can, of course, consult interests far more widely than can be taken into account in the course of ordinary inter partes litigation. A judge should therefore be chary of doing that which is better done by Parliament. That Parliament has failed so far to grasp the nettle does not prove that it will not have to be grasped in the future. The recent judgment in Peck v UK (2003) 13 BHRC 669 in the European Court of Human Rights, given on 28 January 2003, shows that in circumstances where the law of confidence did not operate our domestic law has already been held to be inadequate. That inadequacy will have to be made good and if Parliament does not step in then the courts will be obliged to. Further development by the courts may merely be awaiting the first post-Human Rights Act 1998 case where neither the law of confidence nor any other domestic law protects an individual who deserves protection. A glance at a crystal ball of, so to speak, only a low wattage suggests that if Parliament does not act soon the less satisfactory course, of the courts creating the law bit by bit at the expense of litigants and with inevitable delays and uncertainty, will be thrust upon the judiciary. But that will only happen when a case arises in which the existing law of confidence gives no or inadequate protection; this case now before me is not such a case and there is therefore no need for me to attempt to construct a law of privacy and, that being so, it would be wrong of me to attempt to do so. (iv) I have in mind also the judgment of the court delivered by Lord Woolf in A v B (a company) [2002] 2 All ER 545, [2003] QB 195 where, amongst the guidelines laid down, one finds (at 11):

‘It is most unlikely that any purpose will be served by a judge seeking to decide whether there exists a new cause of action in tort which protects privacy. In the great majority of situations, if not all situations, where the protection of privacy is justified, relating to events after the [Human Rights Act 1998] came into force, an action for breach of confidence now will, where this is appropriate, provide the necessary protection.’

(v) Finally, it has not been suggested that, even were there to be a law of privacy, the Douglasses would be able to make any recovery greater than that which is open to them under the law of confidence as I have held it to be. For those reasons I say nothing further as to any law of privacy.

THE DATA PROTECTION ACT 1998

[230] There is a full analysis of the relevant provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998 in Campbell v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd [2003] 1 All ER 224 at [72]–[138], which, fortunately, make an understanding of the Act easier than do the unvarnished provisions of the Act itself. At the risk of my construing the authority rather than the Act, I find, after reading Campbell’s case, that all three Hello! defendants can be taken to be a data controller, that the unauthorised pictures represent personal data and that publication of them in England is to be treated as part of the operations covered by the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1998. That is because when a data controller is responsible for the publication of hard copies that reproduce data that has previously been processed by means of equipment operated automatically, the publication forms part of the process and falls within the scope of the Act. The hard copies here were, of course, the copies of Hello! magazine (see Campbell’s case (at [75]–[76], [78], [107]) and the sections of the Data Protection Act 1998 there referred).

- a [231] That there had been such processing by equipment operating automatically appears because such processes were used in the transmission by ISDN line from California to London, in the calling up of the pictures on to a screen in London by Sue Neal, in her transmission of them to Madrid by ISDN line, in the taking out from unauthorised photographs of the defects that one or more of the earlier processes had introduced into them, in the transmission from
- b Hola's office in Madrid to the printers and in the processes used in the course of preparation for and in the course of printing. I am told there was also publication of the unauthorised photographs on a Hello! website. The exemption given in respect of the processing of personal data for journalistic purposes, the exemption which the Court of Appeal held to apply in Campbell's case, does not apply in the case before me because it depends, inter alia, on the data controller reasonably
- c believing that publication would be in the public interest. I have had no credible evidence as to such a belief nor, given the nature of the unauthorised photographs, the manner of their obtaining and that the Hello! defendants well knew that authorised photographs were shortly to be published by OK!, do I see any room for any conclusion that publication could reasonably be so regarded.
- d That the public would be interested is not to be confused with there being a public interest.

- [232] Lest the s 32 exemption should not be available to his clients, Mr Fernando, who alone addressed argument for the Hello! defendants under the Data Protection Act 1998, argued also that they could claim the exemption conferred by the transitional provisions in Sch 8 to the Act. The only relevant
- e kind of exemption is that of Sch 8, Pt II relating to the period between the commencement of the schedule and 24 October 2001—defined as 'the first transitional period'. During that period, which began on 24 October 1998, 'eligible automated data' were made exempt from certain provisions—Sch 8, para 13(1). But to be eligible automated data, the data has first to be 'eligible
- f data'—Sch 8, para 1(2). And, where the data is personal data (such as the unauthorised photographs) the data will only be eligible at any time 'if, and to the extent that, they are at that time subject to processing which was already under way immediately before 24th October 1998' (see Sch 8, para 1(1)).

- [233] That seems to require an examination of whether, when the proceedings began or now ('at that time') the unauthorised pictures were subject
- g to 'processing which was already under way immediately before 24th October 1998'. As the unauthorised photographs were not taken until November 2000, that appears to be impossible. Mr Fernando alternatively says that if any photographs of Mr Douglas and Miss Zeta-Jones were processed by the Hello! defendants before 24 October 1998 then, although that processing was of
- h different photographs, that suffices. But 'already under way' seems to suggest a continuous process from 24 October 1998 as would be the case where, for example, a running bank account was processed both before and after that date. I fail to see how it assists that other photographs than the unauthorised
- j photographs but relating to Mr Douglas or Miss Zeta-Jones were processed before that date; photographs even of the same subjects are quite separate items of personal data in a way that, say, operations on a running bank account, where the balance at any time is dependent upon the cumulative effect of earlier transactions, are not.

[234] Mr Fernando then says that it is enough that some processing of personal data in the form of photographs (even not of Mr Douglas or Miss Zeta-Jones at all) has continuously been a feature of the work of the Hello!

defendants since 24 October 1998. That seems to prove too much; had there been but one photograph by way of personal information of anyone in process before 24 October 1998, the transitional provision would, if this argument is right, exempt the, say, 5,000 photographs by way of personal data processed after that date to the extent of the exemption, an exemption which would be so wide as to be surprising and such as, had it been attended at all, would have been likely to have been spelled out in terms much clearer than one finds in the difficult terms of Sch 8, para 1(1). I do not find the Hello! defendants to be able to claim any of the exemptions by way of transitional relief offered by Sch 8 to the Act.

[235] That being so the Hello! defendants as data controllers were, without exemption, under a duty to comply with the data protection principles as to the unauthorised photographs (see s 4(4) and (1)). Their processing therefore had to be done 'fairly and lawfully' and in such a way that at least one of the conditions in Sch 2 was met (see Sch 1, Pt I, para 1(a)).

[236] As for the fairness of the processing, regard has to be had as to how the data were obtained (see Sch 1, Pt II, para 1(1)). Given the circumstances, as I have held them to be, in which the unauthorised photographs were obtained, that regard points to the processing (in particular the publication) as having not been fair. Nor are the other prerequisites of fair processing as set out in Sch 1, Pt II met.

[237] As for Sch 2, concerned with the processing of personal data, no consent to the processing (including publication) of the unauthorised photographs was given by 'the data subjects'—Mr and Mrs Douglas—Sch 2, para 1. The processing was not necessary for any of the purposes of Sch 2, paras 2–5 inclusive. As for para 6, it provides:

'(1) The processing is necessary for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by the data controller ... except where the processing is unwarranted in any particular case by reason of prejudice to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interests of the data subject.'

[238] The Hello! defendants did, in my view, have a relevant legitimate interest—the publication of their magazine to include coverage of the Douglas wedding—but para 6 denies legitimacy to the processing to that end if it is unwarranted by reason of prejudice to the rights and legitimate interests of the data subjects. The provision is not, it seems, one that requires some general balance between freedom of expression and rights to privacy or confidence; where there is a real public interest in relation to the material in issue then in the case of the press such a general approach will have been considered under s 32. Here (in the events which I have held occurred) the question is more simply whether the publication is unwarranted by reason of the prejudice to Mr and Mrs Douglas' legal rights. Paragraph 6 does not provide, as it so easily could have done, how serious has to be the prejudice before the processing becomes unwarranted and in point of language any prejudice beyond the trivial would seem to suffice. Here the prejudice to each of Mr and Mrs Douglas by reason of the publication was in my judgment above the trivial and indeed was substantial. I therefore do not see para 6 as assisting the Hello! defendants. Nor do I see that the fact that the Douglasses had by contract authorised processing by OK! as working some general waiver such that anyone else, including Hello!, might process by way of publication photographs of the wedding on the footing that the Douglasses' rights had evaporated.

- a [239] I thus see no defence to Mr and Mrs Douglas' claims, as individuals, to compensation under s 13(1) of the Act; had their consents to the publication of the unauthorised photographs been asked for, as the Act requires, it would, I am confident, have been refused. But can it be said that such damage or distress as was suffered was 'by reason of any contravention by a data controller' of any of the requirements of this Act. If the obligations under the Act had been performed
- b would it truly have made any difference? As it seems to me, it is only if deployment by Mr and Mrs Douglas of the data protection argument would have caused the Hello! defendants, on consent being refused to them, to elect not to publish the unauthorised pictures or if such an argument would have caused the Court of Appeal to leave Hunt J's injunction in place, that it could reasonably be said that the damage and distress occasioned to the Douglasses was by reason of a
- c contravention of the Act—s 13. The data processing argument was not in fact laid before the Court of Appeal but, in what is inevitably a speculative exercise, my reading of what the situation would have been is that the Hello! defendants would have elected to go ahead and publish and that the Court of Appeal would still have held that damages would be a sufficient remedy. Thus, although I hold
- d there to have been a breach of the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1998, I do not see it as adding a separate route to recovery for damage or distress beyond a nominal award, which I shall make.

INTERFERENCE WITH BUSINESS; BREACH OF CONFIDENCE AND OF THE DATA PROTECTION ACT 1998

- e [240] If I have been right in seeing OK! to be a person entitled to invoke the law of confidence against the Hello! defendants then this claim and many of the others I shall deal with add nothing. However, lest I am wrong, I will deal with further causes of action.

- f [241] It cannot be said that Mr and Mrs Douglas are in breach of their contract with OK!. The fact that Mr Thorpe eluded or deceived the security at the wedding does not suggest, still less prove, that the Douglasses had failed, within cl 16 of their contract (see [54], above) to take all reasonable means to provide such security as was necessary to ensure the exclusion of unauthorised media. The presence of the word 'reasonable' indicates the obligation was not absolute, as also does the obligation not to eliminate but to 'minimise' the risk of unauthorised
- g photography. Under cl 6 it was only 'best efforts' that were required to be used. Hence the Hello! defendants' purchase and publication of the unauthorised photographs did not bring about any breach by the Douglasses of their contract, nor did it even impede its performance. Indeed, as the security to be provided was in relation to a wedding on 18 November, as the purchase of the
- h unauthorised photographs was on 19 November and as their publication by Hello! was on 24 November, the timing alone suggests that that was so.

- i [242] In a passage in RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135, adopted by Hobhouse J in Rickless v United Artists Corp [1987] 1 All ER 679, [1988] QB 450 and [1986] FSR 502, Slade LJ said ([1982] 3 All ER 771 at 784, [1983] Ch 135 at 156):

'... as I understand the facts of all these cases where liability has been established under this particular head of tort, there has been an interference or attempt to interfere with the performance by a third party of his contractual obligations. There is nothing in this line of authority which I have been able to discover which suggests that A may be liable to B under this head of tort merely because A does an act (even an illegal act) which he knows is likely to render less valuable certain contractual rights of B as against C, without actually interfering with the performance by C of the contractual obligations owed by him to B.' a

In that case the defendant, Pollard, was a 'bootlegger' and, as such, he did not interfere with the performance of the artists' contracts with the plaintiff recording company even though he made the latter's rights under their exclusive contract less valuable; so also, as it seems to me, Hello! did not interfere with OK!'s contract with the Douglasses, although it may be argued that what Hello! did rendered OK!'s rights under the contract less valuable than otherwise they would have been. b

[243] That being so, OK! can succeed under this tort only if a further component is present, the one relevant for immediate consideration being whether there was an intent to injure by unlawful means. c

[244] Lord Wedderburn's chapter on economic torts in Clerk & Lindsell on Torts (18th edn, 2000) describes a tort 'which consists in one person using unlawful means with the object of and effect of causing damage to another'. The role of intent in the tort is not always described in the same terms in the authorities—compare Merkur Island Shipping Corp v Laughton [1983] 2 All ER 189 at 196–197, [1983] 2 AC 570 at 609—but it is appropriate for me to accept the Clerk & Lindsell formulation as it is by reference to that description that the claimants make their claim and that is the formulation which the defendants have been required to answer. d

[245] As for the relevant intent of the Hello! defendants, in practical terms it is either to be found in Senor Sanchez Junco or it does not exist. As to his intent, his written evidence said: e

'I want to state categorically that there was never an intention to cause damage to any of the claimants—to the first two claimants because we have always treated them in Hello! with deference and sympathy, in accordance with the magazine style. In our 60-year history we have never tried to damage anyone. Therefore, we would not want to do it to people whom we have always treated fairly and objectively in our reports portraying them in the best possible light. With respect to OK! we took it for granted that, without a doubt, they would have a great editorial success, as they had a great exclusive and consequently, the magazine would be sold under excellent conditions as was the case. Our main purpose was to inform our readers about an event which had been publicised all over the media for weeks before the wedding, which shows that this wedding was of interest for the United Kingdom. We did not wish to disappoint our readers. It was never our aim or intention to damage the third claimant, our prime motivation was only to give our readers information on the wedding of two celebrities, about whom, without doubt, our readers expected to read in Hello!. Other consideration was to defend the interests of our magazine and keep our place in the market. There was little or no monetary incentive in publishing these photographs because the increase in sales was not likely to compensate the costs incurred in purchasing the photographs, changing the edition and airlifting a proportion of the copies from Spain into the United Kingdom. However, this is something that every publisher must be prepared to do from time to time and it is a matter of professional pride and an investment in the goodwill of the publication's readership.' f g h j a [246] In his oral evidence Senor Sanchez Junco disavowed having acted in revenge against the Douglasses for his not getting the exclusive he so wished; rather he wanted, despite losing the exclusive, to publish an edition that would interest his readers, the event being one which had captured the imagination of the public. His act, he said, was not of revenge but of salvage. He denied having the intention of spoiling OK!'s sales adding: '... my motive was never to spoil the exclusive of OK!. I repeat, I wanted to defend as far as I could my publication ...'

b Mr Tugendhat put this to him:

'What I am suggesting to you is that in all of this you were driven by your anger and you were intending to do as much damages as you could both to the Douglasses and to the publishers of OK!'

c Senor Sanchez Junco:

d 'No. My priority was to save my publication after having, in the light of a very important big loss, and that is that of the exclusive, and I didn't think of the possible damage that I could inflict on OK! or the Douglasses because the photographs, I never thought that these photographs could be considered to damaging for the Douglasses and that is because photographs published in that way were unlikely to damage the authorised exclusive.'

e [247] Then, referring to an argument which I hold to be not unreasonable, namely that poor photographs in one of the rival magazines could in fact increase the sales of the other which covered the event in a better way, he added, of such a case:

f 'In some cases it encourages it. It has happened to me many times and I've never considered it to be that it was a damage which—certainly not a serious one. This supposed damage which I was supposed to have wanted to inflict on OK! wasn't even, in my opinion, clear damage. Maybe it could even help out its exclusive. In any event, I sold a few more, and I believe that OK! sold its exclusive very well.'

Ms Koumi, too, gave evidence that poor photographs of an event in one of the rival magazines could increase the sales of the rival that has better ones (though I am not to be taken to be holding that was in fact the case here).

g [248] Mr Luke, in close contact with Senor Sanchez Junco in Madrid was asked the question: 'How common, to your recollection, are spoilers by Hello! of OK! exclusives?' Mr Luke:

h 'It is a bit of a misnomer. I would not call it a spoiler because in the case of ... If we go back to the Zeta-Jones wedding, it was the event of the year. It is like one had to cover the outbreak of war because—or would not cover it because Churchill had given his exclusive interview to the Express. We had to cover it in some way. I think "spoiler" is a bit of a misnomer. It is something we have to cover, and if photographs become available you publish them. This is not an attack on your competition, this is because our readers want to know about these events so you go ahead and publish them. If those photographs are made available by an orang utan with a polaroid, well you publish them.'

[249] I have not found Senor Sanchez Junco or Mr Luke to be reliable as witnesses but I do accept the evidence they gave on this subject. Whilst I recognise that for a defendant to act out of self-interest does not, of itself, disprove that he had no intent to injure another, here I find on the evidence that there was no intent to injure by unlawful means because there was no intent to injure at all. Had I found such intent in the Hello! defendants I would have gone on to have found the intent to be to injure by the unlawful means of publishing in breach of obligation of confidence owed to all claimants and by way of contravention of the Data Protection Act 1998. a [250] As for the interest of the Marquesa and her company, Neneta Overseas Ltd, the latter had no intent other than through her. She was very loyal to Senor Sanchez Junco and was annoyed that, through no fault of hers, Hello! had failed to get an exclusive of the wedding as to which she had played only a limited role, namely in suggesting the possibility of paparazzi photographers to Senor Sanchez Junco and in identifying Mr Ramey to him. She had been careful not to compromise anyone in that it was not paparazzi photographs inside the wedding to which she had referred. As for the Marquesa's letter and its part in the lifting of the injunction, she did not regard the unauthorised photographs (such bad photographs, in her view) as being capable of spoiling OK!'s far better coverage. She was willing to accept that the publication of the unauthorised pictures by Hello! was a spoiling operation by Hello! aimed at OK! but that answer, without more, did not prove any such intent in her. The Marquesa's letter was in any case brought about by a combination of a wish to ingratiate herself with Senor Sanchez Junco, a wish to preserve her prospects of further employment by Hello! and a response to severe pressure, as she took it to be, from Senor Riera and, on his behalf, from Senora Elisa. I do not find the presence in her, either, of the necessary component, an intention to injure OK!. b

e

[251] The claimants' case under this heading therefore fails.

INTERFERENCE WITH BUSINESS; ABUSE OF PROCESS

[252] Here the unlawful means asserted consist of the deployment of a false case in the Court of Appeal in order to procure the lifting of the injunction. f

[253] I refer back to the Clerk & Lindsell formulation which requires there not only to be the object but the effect of causing damage to another if this tort is to be proven.

[254] That the injunction was lifted cannot be doubted but was its lifting the effect of the falsity of the case put forwarded by Hello! Ltd, then the only defendant? Despite such strength as was conferred upon the defendant's case in the Court of Appeal by Senor Sanchez Junco's statement, Miss Cartwright's second witness statement (in the form in which the court saw it) and the Marquesa's letter, the Court of Appeal held that some or all of the claimants had a sound case in breach of confidence or privacy (see [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 314 and 320, 324, [2001] QB 967 at 995 and 1001, 1005 (paras 96 and 125, 137) per Brooke and Sedley LJJ respectively), but the court went on to lift the injunction chiefly, as it seems to me, on the grounds that damages would be a sufficient remedy for OK! but an insufficient one for Hello! (see [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 314-315, 325, 331, [2001] QB 967 at 995-996, 1006, 1013 (paras 96, 97, 99, 142, 171) per Brooke, Sedley and Keene LJJ respectively). In the circumstances it is difficult to suppose that the Court of Appeal would have held other than they did as to the respective adequacy and inadequacy of damages as a remedy had the falsity of the defendant's case been seen for what it was. There is, in my view, no causal link between the falsity and the lifting of the injunction; the effect cannot be attributed to the alleged cause. On this ground this head of claim fails. g a [255] There are, as it would seem from the re-re-amended particulars of claim, a number of conspiracies alleged in this regard. One asserts the necessary combination as being of the Hello! defendants, the Marquesa, her company Neneŕa Overseas Ltd and Mr Ramey (para 32 of the re-re-amended particulars of claim). There is no alternative plea that some only of those six conspired together b and the target of this alleged conspiracy consists of all three claimants without any alternative plea that some only might have been the intended target. However the pleading is not entirely clear as in para 32 the conspiracy is of all defendants, with the unlawful acts '(as set out in paragraph 33 below)', whereas para 33 alleges a conspiracy only of the Hello! defendants. In another conspiracy c of this kind (para 32A) the combination alleged is of all defendants except Mr Ramey. Again there is no alternate plea as to a combination of only some of the five defendants and again the target is and is only all claimants. I have already set out some findings as to the intentions of the alleged conspirators.

CONSPIRACY OF ALL OR FIVE OF THE DEFENDANTS TO INJURE THE CLAIMANTS BY UNLAWFUL MEANS

d [256] As to the combination alleged to include Mr Ramey, he must have known of Thorpe's trespass and that the unauthorised photographs had been taken deliberately and surreptitiously and in breach of rules sought to be imposed upon guests and staff and that they had been taken despite stringent security arrangements intended to make unauthorised photographs impossible. I can assume that he knew that OK! had obtained an 'exclusive' for the wedding. However, there is nothing before me to suggest any relevant intent on his part e except, by inference, that he should gain as much financial reward as possible for the unauthorised photographs and, perhaps also, further to bolster his reputation as the paparazzo who could overcome any obstacles. Had he reflected on the matter (and I have no evidence to suggest that he did) he would have seen that his activity would be likely to distress the Douglasses and reduce the fruits gained f by OK! from its exclusive contract but his concern, as I see it, was to sell to the highest bidder. The fact that the unauthorised photographs had found their way to a Dutch agency suggests that it was not only to Hello! that the unauthorised photographs were offered. He could have expected Hello! to be the highest bidder but I am unable to hold him to have been part of any concert to injure the Douglasses or OK! or all three of the claimants.

g [257] As for a conspiracy said to involve all defendants except Mr Ramey, there are difficulties for the claimants in relation to the Marquesa's role. She was asked by Senor Sanchez Junco to help but was not directly asked by him to lie. However, Senor Riera, on Senor Sanchez Junco's instructions, did directly ask her to lie and lie she did. I must take it that she appreciated that one, at least, of the functions of the lie was to assist Hello! in having the injunction lifted. But, even h if I could find a combination between Hola SA, Hello!, Senor Sanchez Junco and the Marquesa and even were I to hold that a target of the conspirators was injury to OK! as opposed to promoting Hello!'s ability to give its readers that which they would wish to see, I still have a difficulty about attributing to the Marquesa, in j relation to her signature to the Marquesa's letter, any intent alone or in concert with others to harm the Douglasses. Her intent, as I have said, was to improve her relations with Hello! and in particular with Senor Sanchez Junco and thereby to preserve or enhance the likelihood of her gaining further work from Hello!. Good relations with celebrities and a reputation for good relations with celebrities was the very lifeblood of her trade. Moreover, whilst this, of itself, does not deny her entry into any combination, what was put to her in cross-examination by Mr Tugendhat was that she was 'set up' or 'used' as a screen between the paparazzi and Senor Sanchez Junco. A similar description of her role was put to Senor Sanchez Junco. I accept Miss Mulcahy's argument that such a description of her paints her more as a victim than a conspirator. a

[258] There was, in my judgment, no common plan or intent between the four or five said to be involved, to harm all claimants. I add that a further difficulty in treating the Marquesa as a separate conspirator is that, before Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, the claimants were at pains, and were successful, in arguing that, in relation to the creation of the Marquesa's letter, her actions were to be attributed to the Hello! defendants. b

[259] Accordingly, in my judgment both these claims in conspiracy fail.

CONSPIRACY BETWEEN THE HELLO! DEFENDANTS ONLY; UNLAWFUL MEANS c

[260] The alleged target of this conspiracy is all claimants (para 33 of the re-re-amended particulars of claim). This is not an area of the law where it can be assumed that a person intends the natural and probable consequences of his actions or omissions (see Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co Ltd v Veitch [1942] 1 All ER 142 at 149, [1942] AC 435 at 444 per Viscount Simon LC) so that for this conspiracy to succeed an intent to harm the Douglasses on the part of the Hello! defendants is required to be proved. However, like the Marquesa, Senor Sanchez Junco is not in the business of upsetting celebrities. He genuinely did not think the unauthorised photographs were unpleasant or offensive or such as to give offence to the Douglasses and he attributed the bringing of proceedings for an injunction to OK!'s commercial needs rather than any wish on the part of the Douglasses. I have already cited answers that he gave. No intent attributable to any of the Hello! defendants otherwise than the intent of Senor Sanchez Junco was proved and I do not hold him to have had any intent to injure the Douglasses. Accordingly, neither, therefore, had Hola or Hello! any such intent. This head of claim therefore fails. d
e

CONSPIRACY BETWEEN THE HELLO! DEFENDANTS WITH THE PREDOMINANT PURPOSE OF INJURING THE CLAIMANTS

[261] A key argument of the claimants in respect of this allegation in para 32(B) of the re-re-amended particulars of claim is that the Hello! defendants could never have expected that the extra sales likely to be generated by issue 639 in which the unauthorised photographs were incorporated would ever repay the extra expenses—printing and freight—which, in addition to the purchase price of the photographs themselves, were inescapable if the issue was to be on sale as early as they intended it to be. That being so, say the claimants, it follows that the Hello! defendants were motivated by a predominant purpose to injure OK!, their commercial rival. Leaving aside that that would not prove a predominant intent to injure the Douglasses, it is in any case based on a fallacy. I accept Senor Sanchez Junco's evidence that it was not unknown for Hello! to proceed with an issue on the basis that even expected extra sales would not avoid a loss on a particular issue. Average sales, it would be hoped, he said, would increase and the prestige of the magazine, too, would be an objective. It often happened, he said, that one would never recover extra costs. The impossibility of recovering extra costs therefore, in my judgment, does not, of itself, suggest the existence of predominant intent to injure. I do not here repeat what I have earlier said as to the intentions which motivated the Hello! defendants but I do not find the predominant purpose which is necessary for this tort to succeed. This claim therefore fails. g
h
j

THE HELLO! DEFENDANTS' IMPROPRIETY AS TO DISCLOSURE OF DOCUMENTS

a [262] There is an allegation that there were documents in the hands of one or more of the Hello! defendants that had come into existence in the period from 20 November–22 December 2000 but which were deliberately destroyed or disposed of with a view to avoiding their disclosure or were deliberately not disclosed.

b [263] I cannot see how any impropriety as to disclosure would have affected the result in the Court of Appeal as no one could have expected any completed disclosure by 23 November 2000, the last day of the proceedings before the three-man Court of Appeal and only two days after the issue of the claimants' claim form. Any complaint as to disclosure at that stage would have been met with the response that there were then no pleadings, that the issues between the parties had not by then sufficiently emerged and that everyone's time was fully engaged with the conduct of the appeal so that disclosure would have to await its due turn.

d [264] As to Hello!'s dealings with documents, I confess to some doubts, in particular as to whether any business efficiently conducted could countenance the destruction of invoices as early as Mrs Doughty's evidence suggested had been the case. The Hello! defendants did not produce the originals of the five invoices they received from Ramey, Griffin, Thorpe and Bauer. The originals may have had (but were not proved to have had) handwritten additions on them that could have been material. Mrs Doughty's evidence was that once she was e sure the invoice was not meant for Hello! there was no point in keeping it and, that (her evidence implied) it was then promptly destroyed. Building on that, her evidence was that once she had seen that the invoices relating to the unauthorised photographs were not for Hello! and once the Marquesa had faxed her on 15 December 2000 asking for copies of them to be sent to her there was, f in effect, no further need to keep the originals and that she was thus able to and did dispense with keeping them any further. The disposal of the invoices in that way was thus, as far as she was concerned, in ordinary course but, whilst it should not have occurred, it was not done with a view to avoid disclosure. I have preferred evidence other than Mrs Doughty's on a number of points but I do accept her evidence on that. Whilst the Hello! defendants' handling of documents g was far from satisfactory, having heard the evidence I am not satisfied that any material documents were deliberately not disclosed or were deliberately destroyed or disposed of after proceedings had begun with the view to avoiding their disclosure.

h [265] That finding, coupled with the facts that Sir Andrew Morritt V-C had held there had been no mishandling of documents before the proceedings had begun, that the outcome in the Court of Appeal was (in my view) unaffected by poor disclosure and that Sir Andrew Morritt V-C held that a fair trial was possible notwithstanding such shortcomings as he identified, together, as it seems to me, dispose of matters as to documents, given, too, that I have found in the claimants' j favour without resorting to inferences as to the content of any known or likely documents on the basis that they had been improperly undisclosed.

SETTING ASIDE THE JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF APPEAL

[266] So far as concerns the setting aside of the lifting of the injunction, the claim is pointless; publication of the unauthorised photographs has taken place. But can the Court of Appeal's order as to costs be varied?

[267] Whilst the usual means of seeking the setting aside of an order made in proceedings was previously to start a new action seeking that relief, Mr Tugendhat argues that under the new procedures there is no necessity for that where the impugned proceedings were interlocutory and are followed by a trial in the same proceedings. I see some force in that. To my suggestion that the obvious place for the variation of an order for costs made by the Court of Appeal was, surely, the Court of Appeal, Mr Tugendhat replies that it would be wrong to inflict upon his clients the need for a fresh hearing in that court when the question can be economically dealt with before me and that to require him to go direct to the Court of Appeal would deny him a tier of appeals that he would have if I were to decide the issue or if (albeit after disproportionate expense in time and costs) he was obliged to begin a second action to set aside a costs order made in the first.

[268] Further argument on this part of the re-re-amended particulars of claim was left over for consideration in the light of such facts as I should find but I should mention two subjects.

[269] Firstly, if, during the hearing of the case before the Court of Appeal, Senor Sanchez Junco's statement, Mrs Cartwright's second witness statement (in the form in which that court saw it) and the Marquesa's letter were all seen to be false, there would, of course, have been very powerful criticism of the way in which the defendants had acted, but would the outcome still have been a lifting of the injunction?

[270] The claimants allege that it is no part of their primary case to speculate on what might have been but I will wish to be addressed on whether some such speculation is inevitable. Unless the court in the second process is required to find that the matter complained of in the earlier process had probably had a real effect on the outcome of that first process, would not courts be inundated with applications to set aside decisions on the grounds of lies or combinations which had been unlikely to have had any effect on the outcome?

[271] Secondly, that there were arguments that could have been presented to the Court of Appeal to do otherwise than they did is plain. The law of confidence was only or primarily argued, it would seem, in relation to confidentiality of a private kind rather than such as can arise in a commercial context. Paragraph 6(a) of the re-re-amended particulars of claim did not raise the analogy with trade secrets until 3 May 2002. The fact that a confidence of the privacy kind had been sold by the Douglasses with a view to publication by OK! weighed heavily against the claimants, whereas had the claim been presented as one akin to a trade secret the sale may have been seen as the natural way of turning the commodity to account. Nor was it urged that by refusing an injunction because damages sufficed the Court of Appeal would, in effect, be allowing a compulsory purchase by Hello! of a right to breach the exclusiveness for which its trade rival had paid so much and to do so despite the court regarding the claimants as having sound claims in confidence—compare Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd [1984] 2 All ER 408 at 412–413, [1984] 1 WLR 892 at 897 per Sir John Donaldson MR. Nor, either, was it argued that it was wrong to apply an American Cyanamid approach (one designed, in any case where at least a serious question could be seen to require to be tried, to avoid any evaluation of the merits save as a very last resort) (see American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 504, [1975] AC 396) to a case in which, under s 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998, an evaluation of who would win was to some extent required by statute (see Cream Holdings Ltd v Banerjee [2003] EWCA Civ 103, [2003] 2 All ER 318). Subject to the answer as to the

- a propriety of speculation, I will wish to be addressed on whether, had the defendants been caught out in their misbehaviour, it would have been probable that the injunction would have remained in place.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES

- b [272] This vexed corner of the law has recently been visited by the House of Lords in Kuddus v Chief Constable of Leicestershire Constabulary [2001] UKHL 29, [2001] 3 All ER 193, [2002] 2 AC 122. The law was not as fully explored in the case as it might have been as the appeal was against a striking out rather than in a case which had been fully resolved on the merits. However, Kuddus' case, as I read it, points to three considerations in particular. The first is that the question whether or not to award exemplary damages should be determined more by reference to the nature of the behaviour complained of than by reference to the nature of cause of action to which that behaviour has given rise. The second is that a powerful case can be made that such damages should be considered where, and perhaps only where, the behaviour complained of gives rise to a sense of outrage: see Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead's speech (at [65]). The third is that a recognised category in which such damages may be awarded is where damages on an ordinary compensatory basis can be seen not to be sufficient to do justice. Lord Devlin in Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367 at 410, [1964] AC 1129 at 1226 spoke of a category in which the defendant's conduct had been calculated by him to make a profit for himself which might well exceed the compensation payable to the plaintiff.

- e [273] As to those three features, I am content to assume, without deciding, that exemplary damages (or equity's equivalent) are available in respect of breach of confidence. However, I do not find it possible to describe my judicial reaction to the conduct of the Hello! defendants as one of outrage, especially so far as it relates to the position as between Hello! and OK!. Both of them are participants in an industry—the press as part of the media—in which intrusion upon privacy and little regard for each other's business rights have, at any rate before the Human Rights Act 1998, been not unknown. Whilst I would not take either OK! or Hello! to have been as frequently intrusive or as disrespectful of other's rights as may have incurred in other sectors, neither of them is wholly without blemish. In that circumstance the word 'outrage' would be to overstate the matter.
- g Senor Sanchez Junco stooped to a kind of journalism he professed not to like and did thereby disregard the rights of each of the claimants but to describe his conduct as contemptuous would be to exaggerate. Moreover, I am not satisfied that none of the various ways in which damages or equitable compensation can be computed in response to the breach of the law of confidence which I have held
- h to have existed will yield a figure such that Hello!'s profit for itself would exceed the compensation due to the claimants, nor even that any Hello! defendant had ever calculated that that might be so.

[274] For these reasons I do not award exemplary damages.

j AGGRAVATED DAMAGES

[275] Mr and Mrs Douglas claim aggravated damages for distress, relying on three factors; the alleged flagrancy of the defendants' conduct, the fact that on the lifting of the injunction the defendants promptly went ahead and published the unauthorised photographs, knowing of the distress that that would cause and on the publications in the Sun and Daily Mail to which I have referred. As to that last factor, the Hello! defendants did act reasonably, although unsuccessfully, to stop publication by those newspapers. As for the puns which the newspapers published ('Catherine Eater Jones' and 'That takes the cake') they would not have appeared had the newspapers done as Hello! requested and, surely, conduce more to a groan than to offence. As to publishing once the injunction was lifted, it is difficult to regard that as high-handed or oppressive or otherwise such as to require aggravated damages; the Court of Appeal had just ruled, in effect, that a remedy in damages sufficed to meet the Douglasses' claims and there is no suggestion that the Hello! defendants will be unable to meet any likely award in damages. Given that there was, in any event, to be very extensive photographic coverage of the wedding, albeit as selected by the Douglasses, I do not see the behaviour of the Hello! defendants as so flagrant or offensive as to justify an award of aggravated damages.

LIABILITY OF THE MARQUESA TO ALL OR ANY CLAIMANTS

[276] The claims made against the Marquesa were for interference with business by unlawful means and conspiracy by unlawful means with the intent and purpose of causing damage to the claimants. No such claim succeeds against her and I do not find her liable in damages to any claimant. She is not in any position to re-publish the unauthorised pictures, nor has it been argued that she has or might acquire any intention to do so. She has nothing relevant to deliver up to the claimants on oath. But this is not to say that her writing of the Marquesa's letter has not left her vulnerable to an argument that her costs in this action should not follow the event, an argument and any counter to it which I can leave over until later. I accept, though, that her expressions of regret at ever having written her letter were not merely self-serving but are genuine and it is to be remembered that she had freely owned up to the falsity of the letter by her defence of 22 July 2002 and her witness statement of 22 November 2002.

NEW YORK AND SPANISH LAW

[277] As the evidence came out, no defendant or non-expert witness for a defendant credibly asserted a belief that what he, she, or it had done should not be complained of because it was not offensive under the local law. In that circumstance and on the basis of my other conclusions of fact and of law I do not see it as necessary to say anything as to the law of New York or as to Spanish law. In particular, as to the only claim in respect of which I have held any defendant as other than nominally liable, I do not see that publication of Hello! by the Hello! defendants in England would, in all the circumstances, have been any less unconscionable in the view of an English court had publication in New York been lawful.

AN INJUNCTION

[278] It does not follow from the fact that an item has passed into the public domain that it must be taken to have remained there in such a way that its confidentiality has been irretrievably lost. The fact that the unauthorised or authorised photographs were published in November 2000 does not, of itself, therefore deny the claimants a perpetual injunction. Whilst these proceedings have brought back into the public eye the fact that there were unauthorised photographs, I think it likely, given that the far better authorised pictures were also, of course, put into the public domain, that the look of the unauthorised photographs has passed out of the public mind. I thus see the claimants as in a position to ask for an injunction restraining the defendants such as is sought by the claimants in para 1 of the prayer to their re-re-amended particulars of claim.

- a I indicate immediately, though, that I shall be willing to accept an undertaking of the Hello! defendants in lieu. Such an injunction or undertaking will, in practical terms, make delivery-up unnecessary.

CONCLUSION

- b [279] For the reasons I have given, I hold the Hello! defendants to be liable to all three claimants under the law as to confidence. It will have been noted that an important step in my coming to that conclusion has been that, on balancing rights to confidence against freedom of expression for the purpose of granting or withholding relief, I have been required by statute to pay, and have paid, regard to the PCC code. The Hello! defendants broke their own industry's code.

- c [280] Save for the above liability in confidence, the undertaking or injunction I have described and a nominal award under the Data Protection Act 1998, I dismiss all other claims made by the claimants against the first to fifth defendants. Unless the parties agree, there will have to be a further hearing to establish the amount for which the Hello! defendants are liable to the claimants. Whilst there has been a little discussion as to the assessment of a notional licence fee as an appropriate approach to the quantification of compensation for OK!, at this stage
- d I say nothing as to that being apt or inapt but it is already clear that OK! has elected not to seek any account of the profits which Hello! may be said to have derived from the impugned publication. That aside, all issues as to quantum are left over, should it be necessary, for a later hearing.

- e Order accordingly.

Chappell v Somers & Blake (a firm)

[2003] EWHC 1644 (Ch)

NEUBERGER J

27 JUNE, 8 JULY 2003

Executor and administrator – Liability – Liability to estate or beneficiaries – Whether person appointed executor under will could be liable for losses suffered by estate or beneficiaries because of prolonged delay before will proved.

Solicitor – Will – Duty of care – Testatrix leaving properties to beneficiary – Solicitors allegedly failing to progress administration of estate for five years – Executrix suing to recover loss of income on properties during five-year period – Whether executrix having cause of action.

The testatrix died in December 1995. By her will, she appointed the claimant as executrix, and left her residuary estate to a single beneficiary. The residue included two properties, neither of which, according to the executrix, had been let at the time of the testatrix's death. In early January 1996 the executrix instructed the defendant solicitors to act on her behalf in the administration of the estate. Over the next five years, according to the executrix, the solicitors did nothing at all to progress the administration of the estate. The executrix therefore terminated the solicitors' retainer in April 2001 and went elsewhere for advice. As a result of that advice, she applied for, and was granted, probate, and in due course she distributed the estate in accordance with the terms of the will. The properties which formed part of the residuary estate remained unlet until after they were transferred to the beneficiary. The executrix, acting as such, brought proceedings against the solicitors, alleging breach of the contractual and tortious duties owed by them to her. She alleged, inter alia, that, if the solicitors had acted in accordance with their duty, the properties would have been assented to the beneficiary five years earlier than they were actually assented to; that income would have been earned from them during that period either by renting them out, or by selling them and enjoying interest on the proceeds of sale; and that the loss of income for that period was the liability of the solicitors owing to their failure to advise properly, promptly or at all. The solicitors applied to strike out that part of the claim, contending that any alleged loss had been suffered by the beneficiary, in its capacity as devisee of the properties, and not by the executrix in her capacity as such. Although the circuit judge apparently accepted that contention, he dismissed the application, holding that a claim by the executrix against the solicitors might succeed on the basis that she should be able to obtain an indemnity from them in respect of any liability she might have to the beneficiary if it brought proceedings against her for failing to administer the estate efficiently or properly. On the solicitors' appeal, the High Court considered whether that reasoning was sustainable and, if not, whether, on the assumption that her allegations were correct, the executrix was entitled, as executrix, to sue for the recovery of the loss of income on the properties, accounting to the beneficiary for any damages received.

- Held – A person appointed executor under a will could not be held liable for any losses which accrued to the estate, or to the beneficiaries under the will, as a result of prolonged delay before the will was proved. Although that result might appear surprising, it was explained by the fact that a person was not under a duty to accept an appointment as executor. Indeed, many persons appointed executors in wills were unaware of their appointment until after the testator had died. In those circumstances, some basis for the principle could be seen. Moreover, a beneficiary who thought that an executor was not moving swiftly enough to obtain a grant of probate could either apply to the Principal Probate Registry for the issue of a citation to accept or refuse a grant, or apply to the High Court to pass over the executor. It followed in the instant case that the circuit judge's decision could not stand on the basis of his reasoning. However, the action was properly constituted in that there was a cause of action vested in the executrix, in her capacity as such, in relation to the disputed claim. It was appropriate to treat the executrix as representing the interest of the owner of the property, and therefore the person entitled to recover damages. Due to the breach of duty owed by the solicitors to the claimant as executrix of the will and owner of the properties throughout the time that the duty had been breached, the person who was or should have been the owner of the properties had lost the income attributable to them. In those circumstances, it was hard to see why the executrix should be disentitled from recovering damages for such loss from the solicitors, and accounting for them to the beneficiary, to whom the properties had been devised as part of the very estate which she was responsible for administering. If to hold otherwise would involve the solicitors escaping any liability in damages, the result would be inconsistent with the policy consideration that solicitors should not be able to escape liability merely because they could identify a dichotomy between the person who could claim against them for a breach of duty, namely the executrix, and the person who could be said to have suffered the damage, namely the beneficiary. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [12]–[14], [16], [19]–[21], [33], [36], below).

Appeal

The defendant, Somers & Blake, a firm of solicitors, appealed with permission of Patten J granted on 10 April 2003 from the decision of Judge Cowell in the Central London County Court on 21 February 2003 dismissing their application to strike out part of an action for negligence brought against them by the claimant, Marceline Ann Chappell, suing in her capacity as executrix of the estate of Nellie Ivy Price (deceased). The facts are set out in the judgment.

Cur adv vult

8 July 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

NEUBERGER J.

[1] This is an appeal brought by the defendant, Somers & Blake, a firm of solicitors (the solicitors), against the refusal of Judge Cowell to strike out part of the claim brought against them by Mrs Marceline Chappell, in her capacity as the executrix of the will of Nellie Price (the deceased).

[2] The facts of the case are as follows. The deceased died on 24 December 1995. By cl 1 of her will (the will), dated 5 April 1995, the deceased appointed Mrs Chappell as her sole executrix. By cl 2 of the will, the deceased made specific bequests totalling just over £20,000, and cl 3 and 4 of her will involved other specific bequests. In cl 7 of the will, the deceased bequeathed and devised the residue of her estate to the Parochial Church Council of the Parish of St Mary's Church, St Mary's Road, South Ealing (the PCC).

[3] According to her pleaded case in these proceedings, it was in early January 1996 that Mrs Chappell instructed the solicitors 'to act on her behalf in the administration of the estate of the deceased'.

[4] Mrs Chappell's pleaded case goes on to allege that she spoke to the solicitors on a number of occasions between 1996 and 2001 about the administration of the estate (the estate). In her particulars of claim, Mrs Chappell alleges that between the time that they were first instructed, in January 1996, and early April 2001 the solicitors were in breach of their contractual and tortious duties to Mrs Chappell in that, to put it shortly, they did absolutely nothing. In particular, she alleges that they failed to give her any advice, to ascertain the assets and liabilities of the estate, to obtain a grant of probate, to make inquiries with regard to title deeds, to respond to her requests for information and advice regarding properties in the estate, to pay legacies within the executor's year or at all, and to progress the administration of the estate at all.

[5] In these circumstances, in early April 2001, Mrs Chappell terminated the solicitors' retainer and went elsewhere for advice. As a result of this advice, Mrs Chappell applied for, and was granted, probate, and in due course she distributed the estate in accordance with the terms of the will. The residue of the estate included two properties, namely 37 Netherbury Road, London W5 and the Top Floor, 7 Winchester Street, London W3 (the properties). At the date of the deceased's death, according to Mrs Chappell's pleaded case, these properties were unlet, and they remained unlet until after they were transferred to the PCC, pursuant to the provisions of cl 7 of the will.

a [6] In the schedule of losses appended to Mrs Chappell's particulars of claim, the loss alleged to have been suffered as a result of the solicitors' alleged breach of duty, so far as it relates to the properties, is expressed in these terms:

b 'The continuing delay [in applying for probate, and consequential administering and devolving of the deceased's estate] deprived the estate of income from part of its capital namely [the properties] ... The net loss claimed is put forward as a figure that enables a court to make a fair appraisal of the loss of income from the delay in a situation in which in the absence of any breach the estate would have been duly wound up and the properties assented to the residuary beneficiary by 1 January 1997 or in any event before 1 July 1997 or sold with the entire proceeds yielding investment income by 1 January 1997 or in any event before 1 July 1997.'

c [7] Mrs Chappell's claim for damages against the solicitors, in so far as it relates to the properties, is based on the following proposition. First, had the solicitors acted in accordance with their duty, the properties would have been assented to the PCC by 1 January (or at any rate by 1 July) 1997, which is approximately five years earlier than they were actually assented to the PCC. Secondly, income would then have been earned from the properties (either by renting them out, or by selling them and enjoying interest on the proceeds of sale) for that period of five years. Thirdly, the loss of income suffered for that period is properly the liability of the solicitors, owing to their failure to advise properly, promptly, or at all, over the period that they were instructed by Mrs Chappell.

d [8] As this is an application to strike out the claim (albeit only in so far as it relates to the damages relating to the properties), I proceed on the basis that the allegations made in the particulars of claim are correct. Further, as it is not suggested (nor, I think, could it be suggested) by the solicitors that the claim against them based on breach of contract and negligence is bound to fail, I must also assume that the factual allegations of breach of duty are justified.

e [9] Mrs Elspeth Talbot-Rice, who appears for the solicitors, contends that, both as a matter of principle, and in light of the way in which it is pleaded, Mrs Chappell's claim against the solicitors, in so far as it is based on loss of income from the properties, is bound to fail, and should accordingly be struck out. This contention is based on the proposition that any alleged loss must have been suffered by the PCC, in its capacity as the devisee of the properties, and not by Mrs Chappell, in her capacity as executrix of the deceased's estate. Such a contention is supported by the fact that, if the solicitors had not been in breach of duty as alleged, with the consequence of the deceased's estate being wound up five years earlier than it was, then the properties would have become vested in the PCC five years earlier than actually occurred. Thus, it is said that it is the PCC, and not Mrs Chappell, who would have received any income from those properties over the five years, either by renting them out, or by selling them and investing the proceeds.

h [10] Judge Cowell appears to have accepted this argument, but he none the less refused to strike out the relevant part of the pleading on the grounds that a claim somewhat along the lines pleaded might none the less succeed. He said that the PCC might seek to claim damages from Mrs Chappell, arising from her failure to administer the estate efficiently or properly, with the result that the properties were not vested in the PCC until 2002, and in those circumstances the PCC might seek to recover damages for its loss of income from the properties during the very period pleaded in the present particulars of claim. Judge Cowell considered that, on this basis, a claim by Mrs Chappell against the solicitors could succeed, because she should be able to obtain an indemnity from the solicitors in respect of any such liability as she might have to the PCC. a

[11] Mr Giles Harrap, who appears for Mrs Chappell, does not seek to support this reasoning. In my opinion, he is correct. First, as a matter of fact, there was and is no suggestion that the PCC is even contemplating bringing proceedings against Mrs Chappell. On the contrary. Since the decision of Judge Cowell, the only involvement of the PCC has been to indicate that it is prepared to be joined as a party in these proceedings, if that is necessary for Mrs Chappell's claim to be properly constituted. Quite apart from this, as Mrs Talbot-Rice points out, Mrs Chappell's claim as pleaded does not rely on any liability which she has, or might have, to the PCC; nor does it seek any indemnity in relation to such potential liability. Further, it is clear from the correspondence between the parties that it is common ground that no claim could be, or is being, brought by Mrs Chappell on this basis. b

[12] Over and above this, it appears to me that, as a matter of law, a person who is appointed executor under a will cannot be held liable for any losses which accrue to the estate or to the beneficiaries under the will, as a result of a prolonged delay before the will is proved. That this is the law appears to me to receive support from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Stevens, Cooke v Stevens [1898] 1 Ch 162. The point is most clearly made by Vaughan Williams LJ (at 177); I believe the same point is made, albeit not so clearly, and perhaps a little more tentatively, in the last paragraph of the judgment of Chitty LJ (at 174); in the last paragraph of his judgment (at 170), Lindley MR left the point open. It seems to me that Harman J took the same view in Cancer Research Campaign v Ernest Brown & Co (a firm) [1997] STC 1425. c

[13] Although this result may appear at first sight to be surprising, it is explained, as Mrs Talbot-Rice submits, by the fact that a person is not under a duty to accept an appointment as an executor, indeed, many persons appointed executors in wills are unaware of their appointment until after the testator has died. In those circumstances, one can see some basis for the principle. As Mrs Talbot-Rice also points out, a beneficiary, who thinks that an executor is not moving swiftly enough to obtain a grant of probate, can either apply to the Principal Probate Registry under r 47 of the Non-Contentious Probate Rules 1987, SI 1987/2024 for the issue of a citation to accept or refuse a grant, or apply to the High Court under r 52 of the 1987 rules to pass over the executor under s 116 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. d

[14] Accordingly, it seems to me that Judge Cowell's decision cannot stand on the basis of his reasoning. The question is whether it can be justified on the way in which Mr Harrap puts his case, namely that, even though the income from the properties, which would have been enjoyed if the solicitors had not been in breach of duty, would have been paid to the PCC, as devisee, it is none the less Mrs Chappell who is entitled to sue for the recovery of this loss of income, as executrix of the estate, albeit that she will have to account for any damages she receives to the PCC. e

[15] The issue raised by that argument is not entirely easy. Assuming, which appears to me to be correct and as is common ground in light of the authorities to which I have referred, that there can be no question of the solicitors having to indemnify Mrs Chappell in respect of any liability she may have to the PCC, it appears to me that there are, at least as a matter of logic, three possible answers f

- a to the present conundrum. The first, supported by Mr Harrap, is, as I have indicated, that the executrix is entitled to sue the solicitors, but has to account for any damages received to the beneficiary. The problem with that argument, as Mrs Talbot-Rice points out, is that the claimant, namely the executrix, is not the person who has suffered any loss as a result of the solicitors' breach of duty. The second possibility is that the beneficiary is entitled to sue the solicitors for any loss suffered. The problem with that argument is that the solicitors plainly owed no contractual duty to the beneficiary, and there must be considerable doubt as to whether it would be right, as a matter of principle, to impose any tortious duty to the beneficiary on the solicitors. The third possibility is that, as the solicitors' duty was owed to the executrix, and any loss resulting from the breach of duty was suffered by the beneficiary, there is what has been referred to in argument as a 'black hole', and the solicitors, in effect, escape from having to pay any damages.

- [16] Considering this issue by reference to general policy, as opposed to legal principle, I am of the view that there are two main points. The first is that it would be wrong if the solicitors escaped any liability for damages in a case such as this, merely because they could identify a dichotomy between the person who can claim against them for a breach of duty, namely the executrix, and the person who can be said to have suffered the damage, namely the beneficiary. I believe that this principle, which is there identified as 'the impulse to do practical justice', is supported by the speech of Lord Goff of Chieveley in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 702–703, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 259–260. In that case, the majority of the House of Lords held that a solicitor who had been negligent in drafting a will could be sued by the disappointed beneficiary, because otherwise the solicitor could escape liability, as the client, the deceased, had suffered no loss. The speech of Lord Goff contains the ratio of the decision of the House of Lords—see Carr-Glynn v Frearsons (a firm) [1998] 4 All ER 225 at 233, [1999] Ch 326 at 335 per Chadwick LJ (with whom Thorpe and Butler-Sloss LJ agreed). Indeed, the same policy point was articulated in Chadwick LJ's judgment ([1998] 4 All ER 225 at 231–232, [1999] Ch 326 at 334), citing Lord Browne-Wilkinson's observations in White's case [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 718, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 276, to the effect that it would be 'unacceptable' if a solicitor escaped liability in that case.
- e
- f

- [17] The second policy principle appears to me to be that, given that any damages would ultimately come to the beneficiary, irrespective of who has the right to sue, the question of whether it is the executrix or the beneficiary who can bring the proceedings is not of great significance. The essential point is to ensure that there cannot be double recovery (ie that the same damages cannot be recovered twice, once by the beneficiary and once by the executor). In that connection, I would refer to the decision of the House of Lords in Johnson v Gore Wood & Co (a firm) [2001] 1 All ER 481, [2002] 2 AC 1, especially per Lord Cooke of Thorndon ([2001] 1 All ER 481 at 514, [2002] 2 AC 1 at 47) and per Lord Millett ([2001] 1 All ER 481 at 528, [2002] 2 AC 1 at 62). Again, the judgment of Chadwick LJ in Carr-Glynn's case provides support for this point—see especially [1998] 4 All ER 225 at 231, 234, [1999] Ch 326 at 333–334, 336–337.
- g
- h

- j [18] However, considerations of policy cannot, at least on their own especially for a first instance judge, justify a decision which is contrary to established legal principle or binding authority. The minority speeches of Lord Keith of Kinkel and Lord Mustill in White's case demonstrate that legal principle may sometimes require a court to reach a conclusion which is hard, or even impossible, to reconcile with policy considerations such as those I have just articulated. In the same case, Lord Goff ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 710, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 268) was anxious to find a solution which was not an 'unacceptable circumvention of established principles'. The importance of a legally principled approach was also underlined in Johnson's case [2001] 1 All ER 481 at 503, 529, [2002] 2 AC 1 at 35–36, 62–63 per Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Millett respectively.

[19] However, I consider that, in this case, legal principle does justify a conclusion consistent with the first of the two policy considerations, and that the second of the two policy considerations does not really arise. In my judgment, the present action is properly constituted, in that there is a cause of action vested in Mrs Chappell, as the executrix of the estate, in relation to the instant disputed claim.

[20] It seems to me that Mr Harrap is right in his contention that it is appropriate to treat the executrix as representing the interest of the owner of the property, and therefore the person entitled to recover damages. As is explained in Williams, Mortimer and Sunnucks Executors, Administrators and Probate (18th edn, 2000) p 471 (para 42-10):

'The interests vesting in the personal representative do not vest in him beneficially. Although he is not necessarily a trustee he is said to hold "in auter droit" so that his interest is different from the absolute and ordinary interest which everyone has in his own property.'

In Marshall (Inspector of Taxes) v Kerr [1994] 3 All ER 106 at 112, [1995] 1 AC 148 at 157, Lord Templeman approved the following formulation:

'[T]he entire ownership of the property comprised in the estate of a deceased person which remains unadministered is in the deceased's legal personal representatives for the purposes of administration without any differentiation between legal and equitable interests ...'

In the same case Lord Browne-Wilkinson said ([1994] 3 All ER 106 at 119, [1995] 1 AC 148 at 165) that 'during the period of administration the legatee has no legal or equitable interest in the assets comprised in the estate'.

[21] Owing to the solicitors' breach of duty owed to Mrs Chappell, as the executrix of the will and the owner of the properties throughout the time that the duty was breached, the person who was or should have been the owner of the properties lost the income attributable to the properties. It is hard to see why, in those circumstances, Mrs Chappell should be disentitled from recovering damages for such loss from the solicitors, and accounting for them to the beneficiary, to whom the properties were devised as part of the very estate which she was responsible for administering. If to hold otherwise would involve the solicitors escaping any liability in damages, then it seems to me that the result would be inconsistent with the reasoning of the majority of the House of Lords in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207, and of the Court of Appeal in Carr-Glynn v Frearsons (a firm) [1998] 4 All ER 225, [1999] Ch 326. Furthermore, to hold that the executrix could recover in such circumstances does not seem to me even to fall foul of the reasoning or conclusions of Lord Keith or Lord Mustill, who dissented, in White's case.

[22] The only sensible alternative, as I have mentioned, would be that it is the beneficiary, in this case the PCC, who would be entitled to recover. There is no question of the beneficiary having been a client of the solicitors: the client was the executrix. In those circumstances, the notion of the beneficiary having a claim would be inconsistent with the speeches of Lord Keith and Lord Mustill in White's case, although it would not, at least on the face of it, be inconsistent with the a speeches of Lord Browne-Wilkinson or Lord Nolan. Lord Goff, whose speech represents the ratio of White's case, accepted that there were 'conceptual difficulties' in such a notion, and he identified those difficulties (see [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 698–701, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 255–258). In my judgment, the objections which impressed Lord Goff apply equally here. It is clear from the speech of Lord Goff that it was only with considerable difficulty that he was persuaded that a claim

b against a solicitor who had negligently drafted (or failed to draft) a will could be brought by a disappointed potential beneficiary thereunder. Unlike in the present case, there was, in White's case, no conceivable basis upon which the solicitors' client (or his executors) could possibly maintain a claim for substantial damages against the solicitor. Accordingly, the majority of the House of Lords held, to quote Chadwick LJ in Carr-Glynn's case [1998] 4 All ER 225 at 234, [1999] Ch 326
c at 336, that it was 'entitled—indeed, bound—to fashion a remedy to meet the need' to satisfy the requirements of justice, rather than to adopt a relatively conservative attitude, with the unjust result that the solicitor escaped liability for any substantial damages.

d [23] In the present case, given that there is a basis upon which it can fairly be said that the executrix can maintain a claim for the loss that has actually been suffered, it seems inappropriate to strain to find another lacuna and then to fill it by further extending the exceptional and somewhat controversial, if just, extension of the law established in White's case.

e [24] To hold that the executrix can recover in the present case does not seem to me to be inconsistent with the fact that no claim (other than for nominal damages for breach of contract) could have been maintained by the executor in White's case. First, unlike in White's case, the loss in the present case was suffered during the time that the properties were vested in the executrix. The damages would be calculated on the basis that the properties should have been available for letting or sale from about a year after the solicitors were instructed until they
f were assented to the beneficiary. During the whole of that period, the properties were vested in the executrix.

[25] It is true that the damages claim is calculated by reference to the loss of income over a later period owing to the time needed to find tenants (or to sell the properties) after the properties were, or would have been, vested in the beneficiary. However, for virtually the whole of that period, the properties were
g vested in the executrix. Furthermore, it is important to distinguish between the basis upon which the loss is identified, and the way in which damages are calculated. The basis upon which the loss in the present case is identified and assessed depends on the assertion that, while, from about one year after the death of the deceased, the properties were vested in the executrix, they were not let,
h and the executrix was under no obligation to let them, and it was only when they became vested in the beneficiary that there was any impetus and opportunity in practice to let them. Accordingly, the period in respect of which loss is claimed is, in effect, the period during which the properties wrongly remained in the hands of the executrix owing to the breach of duty by the solicitors.

j [26] The second important difference between the present case and White's case is that, had the executor in White's case been awarded substantial damages, there could have been no sensible basis upon which such an executor could be said to hold the damages for the ultimate benefit of the disappointed beneficiary in that case. That point is made by Chadwick LJ in Carr-Glynn's case [1998] 4 All ER 225 at 234, [1999] Ch 326 at 336. In the present case, it is quite rightly accepted by Mrs Talbot-Rice that if, contrary to her contention, the executrix is entitled to sue the solicitors in respect of the loss in question, she would be obliged to account to the beneficiary for any damages she received. a

[27] I believe that my conclusion is supported if one turns to consider a rather different factual situation. An example which was raised during argument was that of a bare trustee who seeks advice from a solicitor as to whether to distribute trust property, where the right advice is that the property should be distributed as soon as possible, because its income would attract a much lower rate of tax in the hands of the beneficiary than in the hands of the trustee, for some reason. If the solicitor delayed giving this advice for five years, it seems to me that it would be the trustee, and not the beneficiary, who would be entitled to sue the solicitor for the extra tax paid during that period. In such a case, it would be the trustee who was the client of the solicitor, and it would be the trustee who had had to pay the extra tax. b c

[28] The fact that it would be the beneficiary who, in practical terms, lost the tax which was paid, and it was the beneficiary who, but for the negligence of the solicitors, would have legally owned the trust property during the period when the loss was incurred, would not alter the fact that the appropriate claimant would be the trustee. I believe that it would be the trustee who should claim even in a case where the last instalment of extra tax was payable by the beneficiary after distribution, but it is not necessary to decide the point. As here, of course, the trustee would have to account to the beneficiary for any damages recovered from the solicitor. d

[29] At least in some respects, it could be said that Mrs Chappell's case is stronger than that of the trustee in the example I have given. In that example, the beneficiary had some interest (albeit not a legal interest) in the trust property at the relevant time, whereas, as the observations quoted above show, a beneficiary under a will, such as the PCC in this case, does not even have an equitable interest in a property devised to it in a will, during the period of administration. e

[30] Mrs Talbot-Rice suggested that, in the case of a will whose provisions were more complex than those in the present case, the conclusion that a claim such as the present would properly vest in the executrix could lead to difficulties. She postulated a case where a property was devised to A, and the residue of the estate was left to B, and where the executrix consulted a solicitor with the same consequences as those which are alleged to have arisen in the present case. Mrs Talbot-Rice said that if the executrix was entitled to recover damages to compensate for the loss of income during the relevant period of delay, the damages would be calculated on the basis of what had been suffered by A, the devisee of the particular property, but the executrix would have to pay them over to B, because they would form part of the residue of the estate. f g

[31] In the absence of having been referred to any principle or any authority which unequivocally justified that conclusion, I am of the view that the argument should be rejected. It seems to me that, in such a case, the executrix's claim would be in her capacity not only as the executrix client of the solicitor, but also as the owner of the property. In those circumstances, I consider that the executrix would hold any damages which she recovered as representing the loss of income on the property for the benefit of A, and not of B. I believe my view is consistent with the fact that the executrix would, in the normal way, be expected to account for any income from the property which accrued during the administration to A, not to B—see Theobald on Wills (16th edn, 2001) p 281. In any event, the person to whom the account had to be effected would be a matter between the executrix and the beneficiaries, and it is not a matter as between the executrix and the solicitor. h j

a [32] I have not so far discussed the applicability of the second policy issue, namely the need to avoid double recovery. In the light of my conclusion that it is Mrs Chappell, the executrix, and not the PCC, the beneficiary, who has the right of action, no question of double recovery arises. However, as I have mentioned, the PCC is prepared to be joined as a party to this action, and, at least as at present advised, it seems to me that, unless it would cause any delay or any significant b increase in costs, the PCC should be so joined. First, it would avoid any risk of double recovery (in case, at a later date, the PCC brings proceedings against the solicitors and successfully contends that it is not bound by this judgment, an event which I regard to be very unlikely indeed). Secondly, it would obviate the necessity or benefit of any appeal, unless there was a prospect of the solicitors
c successfully arguing that they could avoid liability against either party (which seems very improbable in light of the reasoning in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207 and Carr-Glynn v Frearsons (a firm) [1998] 4 All ER 225, [1999] Ch 326), or the court could be persuaded that an appeal could be justified in relation to the issue of the costs of the present application and appeal.

d [33] In my judgment, therefore, it is competent for Mrs Chappell, as executrix of the deceased's will, to bring proceedings against the solicitors for damages arising out of the income lost on the properties as a result of any breach of duty of care on the part of the solicitors as alleged in the particulars of claim.

e [34] As already mentioned, Mrs Talbot-Rice also contends that the claim was not properly pleaded, even if it could be justified in principle. I accept that, like almost any pleading, the way in which the particulars of claim in this case have been expressed could be improved. In particular, the passage I have quoted from the schedule of losses is in fairly broad terms, and it is not entirely clear, for instance, whether or not it is part of Mrs Chappell's case that the properties would have been let, and if so when, had the solicitors not been negligent as f alleged.

[35] Having said that, it seems to me that there are two points which, when taken together, provide a satisfactory answer to the point. The first is that it is tolerably clear to any fair-minded person what is being alleged in terms of damages, namely that the owner of the properties has been deprived of the opportunity to earn income on them during the period of the solicitors' inaction.
g The purpose of particulars of claim is to ensure that the defendant understands the nature of the claimant's case, and is not taken by surprise. However, and secondly, in so far as it can be said that there are any gaps or uncertainties in the particulars of claim, it is always open to a defendant to ask for further information, either formally or informally. Where it is arguable, for instance, that the claimant
h might be impliedly alleging something, or should be alleging something, or where it is not clear whether he is alleging something, the more sensible course for a defendant to take is to ask the claimant for clarification, rather than taking the aggressive and potentially time-consuming and expensive course of applying to strike out the claim.

i [36] In these circumstances, albeit for somewhat different reasons from Judge Cowell, I would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DIVISIONAL COURT)

AULD LJ AND GOLDRING J

16 JUNE 2003

Public order – Football – Designated football match – Indecent or racist chanting – Whether chanting including use of word 'Paki' of a racist nature – Football (Offences) Act 1991, s 3(2)(b).

A designated football match took place between Port Vale and Oldham Athletic at the Port Vale football ground. The defendant attended the match and was a member of a group of Port Vale supporters who were chanting, 'You're just a town full of Pakis', at the Oldham supporters. The defendant was arrested and charged with taking part at a designated football match in chanting of a racist nature contrary to s 3(1)^a of the Football (Offences) Act 1991. Section 3(2)(b) of that Act provided that 'of a racist nature' meant matter which was threatening, abusive or insulting to a person, by reason of his colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins. The district judge acquitted the defendant being of the opinion, inter alia, that the phrase was 'mere doggerel' and amounted to no more than aimlessly stating that 'our town is better than your town'; that it contained no swearing or offensive language per se; and that 'Paki' was no more insulting or racist than terms such as 'Brit', or 'Aussie'. The prosecution appealed by way of case stated.

Held – The use of the word 'Paki', certainly in the context of the 1991 Act, but more generally nowadays, was racist in the sense defined by the 1991 Act since the modern common understanding of the word 'Paki' was that it was a slang expression which was racially offensive. Indeed it was a word which was often used as a prelude to violence, whether provoking or offering it. There was no doubt that in most contexts the purpose of its use went beyond a convenient and/or affectionate abbreviation of a description of a nationality, such as an Aussie or a Brit. Furthermore, it was immaterial for the purposes of the offence whether persons of the racial group referred to in the offending words were present so as to hear them, or, if so present, were offended or affected in any way by them. The purpose of the 1991 Act was to discourage conduct of a racially insulting nature which could have that effect. Although, it was necessary to look at the use of the word on a case-by-case basis, on the facts found in the instant case, it was plain that the chanting in which the defendant was alleged to have taken part was 'of a racist nature' as defined by s 3(2)(b). Moreover, it was behaviour which fell squarely within the mischief at which the statutory

^a Section 3, so far as material provided: '(1) It is an offence to ... take part in chanting of ... a racist nature. (2) For this purpose ... "of a racist nature" means consisting of or including matter which is threatening, abusive or insulting to a person by reason of his colour, race, nationality (including citizenship) or ethnic or national origins.'

- a provision was aimed. It followed that the matter would be remitted to the district judge with a direction to convict (see [14], [15], [24]–[26], [28], below).

Case stated

- d The Director of Public Prosecutions appealed by way of case stated against the acquittal, by a district judge sitting at Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates' Court on 28 January 2003, of Sean Ratcliffe on a charge of taking part at a designated football match in chanting of a racist nature contrary to ss 3(1) and 5 of the Football (Offences) Act 1991. The question for the opinion of the High Court was: 'Whether the evidence which was properly adduced before the learned judge entitled him to find that the chanting in which the defendant was alleged to have taken part was not "of a racist nature" as defined by s 3(2)(b) of the Football (Offences) Act 1991.' The facts are set out in the judgment of Auld LJ.

Cur adv vult

g AULD LJ.

[1] This is an appeal by the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) by way of case stated against an acquittal by the district judge at Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates' Court on 28 January 2003 of Sean Ratcliffe on a charge of taking part at a designated football match in chanting of a racist nature, contrary to s 3 of the Football (Offences) Act 1991. The first respondent has indicated that he does not intend to take any part in the proceedings, and Sean Ratcliffe, the second respondent, who has been duly served with them, does not appear.

- [2] On 12 October 2002, a designated football match took place between Port Vale and Oldham Athletic at the Port Vale football ground, Stoke-on-Trent in Staffordshire. Sean Ratcliffe attended the match. At it, a number of persons were chanting: 'You're just a town full of Pakis.' The chant was directed at the Oldham Athletic supporters, who were in the adjacent section of the ground, known as Hamil Row. The evidence was that it was audible to those supporters.
- j

[3] On 26 October 2002, Ratcliffe was arrested for the offence. In interview, he admitted using the phrase at the football match on 12 October, along with many others. He was charged with the offence.

[4] His trial took place before the district judge on 28 January of this year, as I have said, at Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates' Court. Ratcliffe did not give evidence. On a submission that the words used were not of a racist nature, he was acquitted at the close of the prosecution case.

[5] The district judge, in his case stated of 4 April 2003, set out the following facts:

'(a) On 12 October 2002, at 4.10 pm Port Vale were playing a nationwide league game against Oldham Athletic at Vale Park, Burslem, Stoke-on-Trent. (b) The defendant was present at the game as a paying spectator situated in the front eastern end of the area known as the Railway Stand. (c) Certain of the spectators in that area, between 50–100 in number, began and continued to chant the words: "You're just a town full of Pakis." (d) Those words were audible to the supporters of Oldham Athletic who were situated in the adjacent Hamil Row end of Vale Park. (e) There were no Pakistani, Asian or black persons in the crowd or on the playing field.

5. The defendant elected not to give evidence, but, in his police interview on 26 October 2002, he had agreed that he had used the ... phrase.

6. The prosecution ... contended [that] the ... phrase that was uttered by the defendant was insulting and was therefore "of a racist nature" within the meaning of s 3 of the 1991 Act.

7. The defendant contended and submitted that the phrases were not insulting [in that sense].'

[6]–[11] The district judge gave five reasons for his acquittal of Ratcliffe, namely: 1. The phrase was 'mere doggerel' and amounted to no more than aimlessly stating that 'our town is better than your town'. 2. It contained no swearing or offensive language per se. 3. The word 'Paki' was no more insulting or racist than the use of the words 'Pom', 'Brit', 'Yank', 'Aussie' or 'Kiwi'. 4. The word 'Paki' is not insulting, whereas 'Frog' or 'Kraut' could be termed insulting. 5. The word 'Paki' is no more than a shortened form of 'Pakistani', which is an adjectival word meaning 'of the Pakistan nation'.

[12] The question that the district judge has posed for this court is in the following terms:

'Whether the evidence which was properly adduced before the learned judge entitled him to find that the chanting in which the defendant was alleged to have taken part was not "of a racist nature" as defined by s 3(2)(b) of the 1991 Act.'

[13] Chanting of a racist nature at a designated football match is an offence under s 3 of the 1991 Act. The words 'of a racist nature' mean, as provided by s 3(2)(b), that the chant consists of or includes matter which is threatening, abusive or insulting to a person, by reason of his colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins.

[14] I should note that it is immaterial for the purposes of the offence whether persons of the racial group referred to in the alleged offending words are present so as to hear them, or, if so present, are offended or affected in any way by them. The purpose of the 1991 Act is to discourage conduct of a racially insulting nature which could have that effect.

[15] Mr Edward Coke, in his helpful submissions on behalf of the DPP, has submitted that it is obvious that the use of the very word 'Paki', certainly in this a context, but more generally nowadays, is racist in the sense defined by the 1991 Act.

[16] As to the district judge's description of it as 'mere doggerel', Mr Coke submitted that, doggerel or no, the chant was intended to insult those coming from Oldham, whatever their origin, and that it was implicit in the chant that Oldham was inferior because of the nationality or ethnic or national origin of a number of its citizens. He said that the use of the word 'Paki' in that context demonstrated that it was those of Pakistani origin who were implicitly the cause of the inferiority. The effect, submitted Mr Coke, was that the chant was insulting within the meaning of the section.

b [17] He also challenged the district judge's finding that the chanting contained no offensive language, taking as the starting point of his submissions a reference to the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (5th edn, 2002), where the word 'Paki' is defined as 'slang which is racially offensive'.

c [18] As to the comparison drawn by the district judge between the word 'Paki' and the words 'Brit', 'Aussie' or 'Kiwi', Mr Coke submitted that, however it has come about historically, the normal usage of those words is not taken as being derogatory—often the contrary—and words like 'Pom' or 'Yank' may or may not be derogatory or complimentary, depending on the context.

d [19] 'Paki', Mr Coke suggested, is more to be bracketed with the words 'Frog' or 'Kraut', which were also referred to by the district judge in his case stated. It is wrong to suggest, he submitted, that the word 'Paki' is nowadays merely the shortened form of 'Pakistani'.

e [20] If legal support is needed for those submissions, Mr Coke provided it by reference to three cases. Under the general submission that the word 'Paki' has been recognised by the courts as something in the nature of racist abuse, the first case to which he referred the court is R v Reader [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 442. It involved offences of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, contrary to s 18 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, and actual bodily harm, contrary to s 47 of that Act, and criminal damage. The words used in the course of the violence, the subject of those charges, were: 'What are you doing standing up for a Paki?'

f [21] As Mr Coke observed, there was never any suggestion that the words were anything other than words of a racist nature; and the Court of Appeal treated them, as the sentencing judge had done, as an aggravating factor.

g [22] The second case to which Mr Coke referred the court was R v Webb [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 112. In that case, the words in question were: 'Paki bastard.' It was part of the prosecution case that the attack had been racially motivated when those words were used. Again, there was no suggestion before the court that the words were not of a racist nature. Indeed, the matter was dealt with as a racially aggravated assault for that reason.

h [23] Third is the case of R v Salihu [2001] EWCA Crim 483, [2001] All ER (D) 32 (Mar), another case of racially aggravated assault in which the words 'fucking Paki' and 'Paki wanker' were treated by the court as racially aggravated.

i [24] On the strength of those submissions and those authorities, Mr Coke maintained that the word 'Paki' is in itself a derogatory expression and a racist one now, and certainly was in the context in which it was used in this case.

[25] In my view, Mr Coke's submission is well founded. The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, in its definition in 2002 of the word 'Paki' as a slang expression which is racially offensive reflects the modern, common understanding of the word; it is also, unfortunately, all too familiar an expression to the courts, used, as it so often is, as a prelude to violence, whether provoking or offering it. a

[26] There is no doubt that in most contexts the purpose of its use goes beyond a convenient and/or affectionate abbreviation of a description of a nationality, such as an Aussie or a Brit. It is odd and a shame that that is so in this country, but the unpleasant context in which it is so often used has left it with a derogatory or an insulting racist connotation. b

[27] Of course, as Mr Coke submitted, the use of the word 'Paki' must, on a case-by-case basis, be looked at in its context. Here, there can be no doubt on the facts found by the district judge as set out in his case stated that Ratcliffe and his fellow Port Vale supporters, in using it as part of their chant against the opposing Oldham supporters, were using it in a racially derogatory or insulting sense. That is plain, if nothing else, from the presence of the word 'just' in the chant: 'You're just a town full of Pakis.' c

[28] In my view, Ratcliffe's admitted behaviour fell squarely within the definition in the 1991 Act of chanting of a racist nature at a designated football match and within the mischief at which the statutory provision was aimed. I would, therefore, answer 'No' to the question in the case stated, allow the DPP's appeal and remit the case to the district judge with a direction that he should on that evidence convict Ratcliffe of the offence. d

19 FEBRUARY 2003

Statement of claim – Leave to amend – Statements made in ‘without prejudice’ discussions inconsistent with statements made in affidavit – Whether within ‘unambiguous impropriety’ exception to ‘without prejudice’ rule.

The claimant company was in liquidation. At the time of its winding up the defendant was substantially indebted to it. The claimant commenced proceedings in order to recover the moneys due to it. Discussion between the parties resulted in their entering into a deed of settlement in relation to the indebtedness and a further supplemental deed. The defendant failed to fulfil a substantial part of his obligations under those deeds of settlement. He subsequently swore an affidavit of means in which he set out his material assets. The parties then entered into a third deed of settlement, expressed to be in full and final settlement of all claims, under which the defendant warranted that he had made full disclosure of his material assets in his affidavit. The claimant subsequently alleged that it had discovered that the defendant owned certain property which he had not disclosed. On the basis of that alleged non-disclosure and consequential misrepresentation in the defendant’s affidavit, the claimant commenced proceedings seeking, inter alia, rescission of the third deed of settlement. In an attempt to settle the proceedings, a ‘without prejudice’ meeting was arranged between the parties. The claimant alleged that at that meeting the defendant had admitted to ownership of shares in a company. The claimant later made further inquiries and discovered a director’s loan from the company to the defendant. Consequently, the claimant applied to reamend its statement of claim to add those non-disclosures to its particulars of claim on the grounds that the defendant’s inconsistencies as revealed by that meeting fell within the ‘unambiguous impropriety’ exception to the ‘without prejudice’ rule. The defendant submitted that the only circumstances in which the ‘without prejudice’ rule could be avoided within the ‘unambiguous impropriety’ exception was in a case where the admissions against interest, made at a without prejudice meeting or in without prejudice communications, were accompanied by a threat.

Held – There were a number of established exceptions to the ‘without prejudice’ rule designed to restrict the operation of the rule to what it was intended to protect and to prevent abuse. One party might be allowed to give evidence of what the other said or wrote in ‘without prejudice’ negotiations if the exclusion of the evidence would act as a cloak for perjury, blackmail or other unambiguous impropriety. Where the protection afforded by the rule had been unequivocally abused the veil imposed by public policy might have to be pulled aside, even so as to disclose admissions. No discernible difference could be seen, having regard to the policy of the privilege, between a case where there was an admission against interest accompanied by a threat and the instant case where a person unambiguously asserted the truth of a particular set of facts and in subsequent proceedings sought to deny it. Circumstances of that kind amounted to an abuse and the exclusion of such evidence by virtue of the rule would act as a cloak for perjury. Accordingly, the claimant's application to amend its statement of claim would be allowed (see [35]–[38], [40], [42], [52], below).

Application

The claimant, Savings and Investment Bank Ltd, applied for permission to reamend its statement of claim in proceedings against the defendant, Kenneth Fincken, seeking rescission of a compromise agreement reached in relation to the liabilities of the defendant to the claimant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

David Ashton (instructed by DJ Freeman) for the claimant.

Adrian Francis (instructed by RadcliffesLeBrasseur) for Mr Fincken.

PATTEN J.

[1] This is an application by the claimant in these proceedings, the Savings and Investment Bank Ltd (SIB), which is a company in liquidation, for permission to re-reamend the statement of claim. The principal relief sought in this action is the rescission of a compromise agreement reached in relation to the liabilities of the defendant, Mr Fincken, to the claimant company.

[2] At the time of the winding up of the claimant company it is alleged, and I think common ground, that the defendant was substantially indebted to SIB, either as principal debtor or in relation to various guarantees. In order to recover those moneys, and I take these facts from the re-reamended statement of claim, SIB issued proceedings on 23 February 1988 in action CH/1988/S/1540.

[3] There were then discussions which resulted first in a deed of settlement in relation to the indebtedness executed on 13 October 1988 by Mr Fincken and his wife. Under the terms of that agreement Mr Fincken acknowledged the existence of various debts and agreed to deliver by 30 November of that year a bill of exchange in the sum of some £19,266,000 odd.

[4] It was also agreed that no later than 13 October 1989 Mr Fincken would pay the sum of £250,000 to SIB, whereupon the company would return to him a the bill of exchange unrepresented and unnegotiated. That first deed of settlement was said to be in full and final settlement of all disputes between the parties. The bill of exchange was duly delivered on approximately 18 November 1988, but by 13 October 1989 Mr Fincken had paid only the sum of £50,000 and the obligation to return the bill did not therefore arise.

b [5] The parties then entered into a supplemental deed of settlement on 25 July 1990, which contained terms under which it was to be effective from 18 October 1989. It provided that in lieu of the terms of the prior agreement under which a single bill of exchange would be delivered, Mr Fincken agreed to deliver five bills of exchange, each in the sum of £19,216,276.02, payable respectively on 18 April 1990, 18 October 1990, 18 April 1991, 18 October 1991 and 18 April 1992.

c [6] The second deed also provided that Mr Fincken would make payments of £50,000 on each of those dates up to and including 18 October 1991 and a further £20,000 on 18 April 1992. On the payment of those moneys in accordance with that timetable the various bills of exchange would be returned to Mr Fincken unrepresented and unnegotiated, but in default of such payments the claimant d would be entitled to present and sue upon the appropriate bills of exchange.

e [7] It is alleged, and again I think common ground, that Mr Fincken failed to make the payments due on 18 April 1990 and on 18 October 1990 as a result of which the claimant presented the bill of exchange payable on 18 October 1990 which was subsequently dishonoured. There then followed the presentation in April 1991 of a bankruptcy petition against Mr Fincken in the Aylesbury County Court. The petition was dismissed and there was a subsequent appeal to the High Court.

f [8] On 9 December 1991, Mr Fincken swore an affidavit of means exhibiting a statement of personal assets, liabilities and business interests as at 9 December 1991. That statement which Mr Fincken deposed to as being true contained a number of statements, including a statement that he possessed or owned no land or buildings or other property save his residence at Field House in Chalfont St Giles and that he possessed or had no other investments or collections save two shotguns worth £2,500.

g [9] On 6 May 1992, the claimant and Mr Fincken entered into a third deed of settlement, under cl 2 of which Mr Fincken warranted that in the affidavit of means I have referred to he had made full disclosure of all material assets worldwide beneficially owned by him or in which he had an interest, whether alone or jointly with others. As a term of that agreement the claimant agreed to discontinue its appeal and it was agreed that the third deed would be in full and h final settlement of all claims.

j [10] It is now said prior to the amendment which this application is concerned with that the defendant, Mr Fincken, failed to disclose two material assets. The first was a beneficial interest in or ownership of a property called Field House Barn in Chalfont St Giles which is said to have a value of at least £25,000. Secondly, his beneficial interest in or ownership of a 20 bore shotgun worth at least £7,500.

[11] On the basis of those alleged non-disclosures and consequently the misrepresentations contained in the 1991 affidavit of means the claimant now seeks rescission of the third settlement agreement and, therefore, the right to enforce the provisions of the second deed of settlement or alternatively, to enforce and continue proceedings for the recovery of the original debt.

[12] The present application seeks to add to the particulars of misrepresentation and non-disclosure two further items. The first is alleged non-disclosure of beneficial interests in 47,500 fully paid ordinary shares of £1 each and 250,000 fully paid preference shares of £1 each in a company called Westminster Property Holdings plc, which for convenience I will refer to as Westminster. It is said that at the relevant time those shares were worth at least £228,785. The second item is an alleged indebtedness by way of director's loan to the defendant from Westminster in the sum of some £291,480.

[13] The first item, that is to say the shares, is said to have come to the attention of the claimant as a result of a meeting which took place on 13 December 2002 between Mr Fincken and Mr Michael Jordan, who is one of the claimant's joint liquidators. Paragraph 19.27 of the proposed amended pleading states that in the course of that meeting:

'Mr Fincken told Mr Jordan that all the Hallam shares were held by Hallam as his nominee and later in the meeting he again confirmed that he was the owner of all the Hallam shares.'

[14] The Hallam shares are the shares in Westminster that I have referred to. In relation to the director's loan, reliance is not placed on any alleged admissions made by Mr Fincken in the meeting with Mr Jordan. Rather, it is said by Mr Ashton that his clients, having been alerted to the position in relation to the shares, then caused further inquiries to be made and a further examination of the available material at Companies House and elsewhere as a result of which they were able to plead that there was this additional asset in the form of the indebtedness by way of director's loan.

[15] The application for permission to reamend is opposed by Mr Fincken on, essentially, three grounds. The first two are connected. Those grounds are that the meeting in December last year, which is pleaded in para 19.27, was a privileged occasion in the sense that it was a without prejudice meeting and the claimant is not therefore entitled to rely on and to adduce evidence as to what was said at that meeting in support of his claim to recover the shares, or rather to rely on the non-disclosure of the shares in support of his claim for rescission.

[16] Secondly, and this is the allied point, it is said that even if the plea in para 19.27 is removed and instead, as Mr Ashton has indicated, there is substituted a mere assertion that Mr Fincken was at all material times the beneficial owner of the Hallam shares, the position still remains that that claim can only be substantiated by the court receiving evidence of what took place at the without prejudice meeting and, therefore, I ought not to allow that claim into the pleadings if it is apparent from the outset that the evidence to support it will not be available.

[17] Thirdly, and more generally, Mr Francis, on behalf of Mr Fincken, says that these claims are far too late, that his client has had to endure these proceedings over a very considerable period of time and at considerable cost and expense to himself, both financial and in terms of the strain which litigation necessarily places upon an individual and that a line should now be drawn so that the action can proceed to trial on 17 March, when the trial is due to take place on the basis of the existing pleading.

[18] I will come back to those issues later in this judgment, but the position at the moment is that the action has been set down for trial in March as a result of an order in a case management conference made by Master Bragge as long ago as May 2002. It is common ground between the parties that if I allow these a proposed amendments into the pleadings a trial on that date will not be possible. There is an element of dispute, I think, between the parties as to whether a trial on that date is feasible even if the amendments are not allowed and the claim is restricted to the current allegations on the pleadings.

[19] I turn first of all to the principal ground of objection, which is the question of the admissibility of what took place at the meeting on 13 December. The privilege attaching to without prejudice communications between parties to litigation is designed to encourage settlement in litigation and to prevent admissions against interest being received in evidence in subsequent proceedings.

[20] The dangers of discouraging settlement that would flow from the general relaxation of the without prejudice rule are obvious, but it is equally clear on the authorities that the without prejudice rule and the privilege that attaches to such discussions is subject to a number of established exceptions designed on the one hand to restrict the operation of the rule to what it was intended to protect, and secondly, to prevent abuse.

[21] The purpose of the rule was described in some detail by Hoffmann LJ in Muller v Linsley & Mortimer (a firm) [1996] PNLR 74. Hoffmann LJ in his judgment in that case explained (at 77) that the rule has two justifications—

‘Firstly, the public policy of encouraging parties to negotiate and settle their disputes out of court and, secondly, an implied agreement arising out of what is commonly understood to be the consequences of offering or agreeing to negotiate without prejudice. In some cases both of these justifications are present; in others, only one or the other.’

[22] Hoffmann LJ then went on to analyse the way in which the rule operates and said (at 79):

‘If one analyses the relationship between the without prejudice rule and the other rules of evidence, it seems to me that the privilege operates as an exception to the general rule on admissions (which can itself be regarded as an exception to the rule against hearsay) that the statement or conduct of a party is always admissible against him to prove any fact which is thereby expressly or impliedly asserted or admitted. The public policy aspect of the rule is not in my judgment concerned with the admissibility of statements which are relevant otherwise than as admissions, i.e. independently of the truth of the facts alleged to have been admitted.’

[23] Hoffmann LJ went on to give examples of such exceptions. Without prejudice communications may be admitted in evidence when, for example, the issue is whether they resulted in an agreement or alternatively whether there was some misrepresentation actually practised in the course of those negotiations or whether, for example, a without prejudice letter containing a statement amounted to an act of bankruptcy. That is not an exhaustive list of the exceptions but is sufficient, I think, to establish and identify the principle.

[24] But, in the present case I am concerned not with exceptions of that kind but with a submission made by the claimant that to allow the defendant to take advantage of the privilege attaching to the December meeting would constitute an abuse because it would conceivably allow Mr Fincken to advance a case in subsequent proceedings to the effect that the shares do not belong to him when little over a month ago he was prepared to concede that they did.

[25] The relevant exception to the without prejudice rule relied on to support the admission of that evidence is what is referred to in the authorities as the unambiguous impropriety exception. That phrase was first coined by Hoffmann LJ in the unreported decision of Forster v Friedland [1992] CA Transcript 1052. That was a case where there was an allegation that the defendants had agreed to purchase shares in a company by 31 October 1989. The defendants denied the existence of any legally binding agreement, saying it was merely an agreement in principle. No completion took place in accordance with the alleged agreement and there followed a threat of proceedings.

[26] During the course of various meetings and telephone conversations between the parties, all of which the claimant secretly tape recorded, the first defendant was said to have made clear his position that if the matter went to a trial he would deny that there was any legally binding agreement but was, none the less, prepared to assure the claimant that he regarded himself as honour bound to go through with the deal. All that he really wanted was time to arrange matters so as to avoid the need to offer 73p in the pound to the other shareholders in accordance with the City Takeover Code.

[27] The claimant sought to adduce that evidence in the subsequent proceedings on the basis that the defendant should not be allowed to assert the claim that there was no legally binding agreement when, as he had conceded at the meeting, he was prepared to honour the agreement. The Court of Appeal held that the facts of that case did not fall within what is now referred to as the unambiguous impropriety exception.

[28] That result was hardly surprising, bearing in mind that the defendants never conceded even in the without prejudice negotiations that there was a legally binding agreement. For my own part, I am unable to see how the judge would have been assisted merely by knowing that the defendants were prepared to treat the agreement as binding in honour. But the case is important for the principle which it establishes. Hoffmann LJ who gave the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal, began by analysing two earlier cases in which the without prejudice privilege had been avoided in favour of allowing the evidence of the communications to be presented to the court.

[29] The first of those cases was the Canadian case of Greenwood v Fitts (1961) 29 DLR (2d) 260, in which the defendant told the plaintiffs in the course of without prejudice negotiations that unless they withdrew their claim for fraudulent misrepresentation he would give perjured evidence and bribe other witnesses to perjure themselves, and that even if they succeeded he would leave Canada rather than pay damages.

[30] The court held that the without prejudice rule was never intended to give protection to that sort of thing. In the English decision in Hawick Jersey International Ltd v Caplan (1988) Times, 11 March, Anthony May QC, then sitting as a deputy judge of the Queen's Bench Division, had to deal with a case where the plaintiff is said to have asserted during the course of without prejudice negotiations that he did not dispute and, indeed, accepted that a transaction was not a loan but one involving an exchange for some £10,000 in cash.

[31] During the course of those exchanges the defendant said to the plaintiff: 'You are not going to force my hand by blackmailing me.' To which the plaintiff replied: 'But I have got to, what would you do if you had been me?' Hoffmann LJ analysed these cases in the following way:

'These are clear cases of improper threats, but the value of the without prejudice rule would be seriously impaired if its protection could be removed from anything less than unambiguous impropriety. The rule is a designed to encourage parties to express themselves freely and without inhibition. I think it is quite wrong for the tape recorded words of a layman, who has used colourful or even exaggerated language, to be picked over in order to support an argument that he intends to raise defences which he does not really believe to be true.'

b [32] Although it is clear from that passage that Hoffmann LJ had identified the two earlier cases as ones in each of which there had been, to use his words, improper threats, his principal concern was to avoid an artificial and unrealistic dissection of the exchanges between the parties with a view to extracting unambiguous admissions that might form the basis of an application for their reception in evidence in the event that in subsequent proceedings the party making them intended to run a contrary case. That, I think, is clear from the concluding words of the quotation that I have just made.

c [33] Similarly, in the subsequent decision of the Court of Appeal in Fazil-Alizadeh v Nikbin [1993] CA Transcript 205, (1993) Times, 19 March, Simon Brown LJ rejected a submission that certain alleged admissions to the effect that an agreement had been altered at a later date than had been originally suggested should be admitted in evidence. He held that those statements were ambiguous and therefore did not represent an unambiguous impropriety within the meaning of that term. As Simon Brown LJ said in that case:

d 'There are ... powerful policy reasons for admitting in evidence as exceptions to the without prejudice rule only the very clearest of cases. Unless this highly beneficial rule is most scrupulously and jealously protected, it will all too readily become eroded.'

e [34] That, I think, is a reflection of part of the speech of Lord Griffiths in Rush & Tompkins Ltd v Greater London Council [1988] 3 All ER 737, [1989] AC 1280, in which the basis of the privilege was established and confirmed by the House of Lords. In his speech in that case Lord Griffiths said ([1988] 3 All ER 737 at 740, [1989] AC 1280 at 1300) that it was important not to allow the whittling down of the protection given to the parties—

f 'to speak freely about all issues in the litigation both factual and legal when seeking compromise and, for the purpose of establishing a basis of compromise, admitting certain facts.'

g [35] In Unilever plc v The Proctor & Gamble Co [2001] 1 All ER 783 at 796, [2000] 1 WLR 2436 at 2449 that point was picked up in his judgment by Robert Walker LJ who said that parties cannot speak freely at a without prejudice meeting if they must constantly monitor every sentence with lawyers or patent agents sitting at their shoulders as minders. But he recognised the exception to this rule. He said ([2001] 1 All ER 783 at 796, [2000] 1 WLR 2436 at 2449):

h 'Lord Griffiths in the Rush & Tompkins case noted, and more recent decisions illustrate, that even in situations to which the without prejudice rule undoubtedly applies, the veil imposed by public policy may have to be pulled aside, even so as to disclose admissions, in cases where the protection afforded by the rule has been unequivocally abused.'

i [36] This is a reference back to an earlier part of his judgment ([2001] 1 All ER 783 at 792, [2000] 1 WLR 2436 at 2444) where he referred to Forster v Friedland

[1992] CA Transcript 1052 and Hawick Jersey International Ltd v Caplan (1988) Times, 11 March as establishing the following principle:

‘Apart from any concluded contract or estoppel, one party may be allowed to give evidence of what the other said or wrote in without prejudice negotiations if the exclusion of the evidence would act as a cloak for perjury, blackmail or other “unambiguous impropriety” ...’

[37] It seems to me, therefore, that it is not right and I cannot accept Mr Francis’s primary submission that the only circumstances in which the without prejudice rule can be avoided is in a case where at the without prejudice meeting itself, or in the course of the without prejudice communications, the admission against interest is accompanied by some kind of threat.

[38] For my own part, I can see no discernible difference, having regard to the policy of the privilege, between the case where a threat of that kind is present and a case where somebody merely asserts in unambiguous and unequivocal terms the truth of a particular set of facts and then in subsequent proceedings seeks to deny it.

[39] The concerns of Lord Griffiths and Robert Walker LJ, and to that I add Hoffmann LJ, in the cases that I have referred to are largely concerned with ensuring that what may be complicated without prejudice negotiations should not subsequently be scrutinised with a view to constructing admissions which when made, and particularly in the context in which they were made, were never intended to be and were not in truth unequivocal and unambiguous admissions of liability.

[40] It seems to me that the exception identified by Robert Walker LJ can extend, in appropriate cases, not only to instances where the without prejudice occasion is abused by the making of threats but also cases where there is an unambiguous admission of facts which is intended to be followed by an equally unambiguous denial of those facts by the same party. Circumstances of that kind amount to an abuse and the exclusion of such evidence by virtue of the rule would act as a cloak for perjury.

[41] I am also satisfied, for what it is worth, that circumstances of that kind constitute unambiguous impropriety of the kind envisaged by Hoffmann LJ. That is not to say, as I hope I have indicated, that every admission, legal or factual, can be open to the court in subsequent proceedings regardless of the circumstances. The sort of cases that I have in mind are cases where in an uncomplicated situation and not for the purpose of establishing a negotiating position on a hypothetical basis the party has made a clear admission of relevant facts which he or she then subsequently chooses to deny.

[42] My decision on what I readily accept is not a straightforward point is, I believe, consistent with Anthony May’s decision in the Hawick Jersey International case, and also with a later decision of Judge Jack QC in Merrill Lynch, Pierce Fenner & Smith Inc v Raffa [2001] IL Pr 31. For those reasons I reject Mr Francis’s primary ground of objection to the proposed amendment.

[43] His second point is that even if the claimant is prepared to omit para 19.27 from the proposed amendment and to leave it to either a reply or the trial to seek to admit the evidence of the without prejudice meeting, that does not overcome the difficulty, and indeed creates the difficulty, that there is currently no evidence on which the allegation that Mr Fincken owns the shares can be based.

[44] Given the way I have decided the first issue, that point I think does not really arise. On the basis of the material before me and in particular the witness a statement of Mr Richard Colman made in support of this application, there is evidence before the court that at the meeting on 13 December 2002, Mr Fincken freely admitted to Mr Jordan that the shares in Westminster were his and that is sufficient to overcome the objection to the amendment that it cannot as currently formulated be substantiated at the trial.

b [45] That leaves, then, the more general objection to these amendments, namely that they are late and cause undue prejudice, particularly in relation to the possible vacation of the trial date. The court's power to permit amendments to statements of case is a general discretion which has to be exercised having regard to a number of well-established factors. In Cobbold v Greenwich London BC [1999] CA Transcript 1406, Peter Gibson LJ summed up the position in this way:

c 'The overriding objective [for the CPR] is that the court should deal with cases justly. That includes, so far as practical, ensuring that each case is dealt with not only expeditiously but also fairly. Amendments in general ought to be allowed so that the real dispute between the parties can be adjudicated upon provided that any prejudice to the other party or parties caused by the amendment can be compensated for in costs, and the public interest in the official administration of justice is not significantly harmed.'

[46] The present amendments, although made late, are explicable in terms of timing by virtue of the late admission relied on at the December meeting. Undoubtedly, the amendments, if permission is granted, will generate additional costs but some of those within the ordinary course of events will be costs for which the claimant will be responsible. Therefore, as I see it, there are two serious factors to be considered in terms of weighing up the general discretion in this particular case.

f [47] The first is the rather difficult to assess criterion of the general effect and additional worry that this may cause to Mr Fincken in terms of having to cope with these matters very late in the day. The second matter is the effect granting the amendment, and therefore having to put off the trial, will have on other court users. I will deal with the second first.

g [48] Although this application is made very late, the position in relation to the action as a whole is itself far from satisfactory. Although the master made directions back in May last year for disclosure and for the provision of experts' reports, none of those orders has been complied with, mainly, as I understand it, because the parties have very sensibly been engaged in discussions designed, although in the event unsuccessfully, to compromise these proceedings.

h [49] But the fact remains, perhaps through no fault of their own on either side, that as things stand this afternoon none of the case management conference directions about disclosure and the provision of witness statements, including experts statements, have been adhered to and, although I think the true position is that both parties have approached the court today on the footing that they could be ready by 17 March on the basis of the existing pleading, there must be a real doubt as to whether that is in fact achievable.

j [50] But, even if it is achievable, I am of the view that if I adjourn the trial now there will not be a significant impact on other court users. It will be possible for the judicial time that would have been engaged by the hearing of this case to be used in relation to some other case and I have no reason to suppose that the case will not be accommodated at some later time this year without any undue inconvenience to other parties. Therefore, I do not regard the effect of allowing the amendment on other court users as sufficient in itself to refuse permission to amend. a

[51] That leaves, then, the position of Mr Fincken. I know very little about his personal circumstances beyond what Mr Francis has told me and there is no evidence from him in relation to this application, but I suppose it must be the position that when somebody has had to deal with litigation for a period now of at least 14 years it must necessarily have been a strain. On the other hand, these are serious claims. Although they have been reduced in scale by a decision of the Court of Appeal, the basic claim that there is a case for rescission of the settlement agreements remains viable; there has been no attempt that I am aware of, certainly no successful attempt, to strike out the existing pleading. And, if it is right that there should be a trial in relation to that pleading, it is, in my judgment, right that there should be a trial in relation to that pleading which includes all relevant issues. b

[52] The position in relation to the shares and the loans on the proposed amended pleading is that they are clearly relevant to a consideration of whether or not there has been a material misrepresentation and, in my judgment, the need to do justice between the parties by allowing those issues properly to be litigated outweighs what I am aware of in terms of the effect that allowing the amendment with the further consequent delay will have on Mr Fincken. In those circumstances, with the proposed alteration and substitution of para 19.27, suggested by Mr Ashton, I will give permission to reamend. d

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, BROOKE AND LAWS LJJ

11, 27 FEBRUARY 2003

Occupier's liability – Trespasser – Duty of care – Whether test of existence of duty of care to be determined having regard to circumstances prevailing at time of accident – Occupiers' Liability Act 1984, s 1(3)(b).

The claimant decided to go for a night swim shortly after midnight on 27 December 1997. He dived from a slipway into Folkestone harbour, struck his head on a submerged pile, broke his neck and was rendered tetraplegic. At the head of each of the two staircases leading down to landing stages in the harbour, notices stated that jumping into the harbour and swimming were prohibited. There was no such notice at the top of the slipway. It was known that children and the occasional adult swam from the slipway in the summer, and security guards would try to stop children swimming in the harbour. The claimant brought proceedings against the defendant, the owner and occupier of the harbour, claiming that it was in breach of duty owed to him under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. Section 1(3)(b)^a of the 1984 Act provided that an occupier owed a duty to a person other than a visitor if, inter alia, he knew or had reasonable grounds to believe that the person was coming or might come into the vicinity of a danger of which the occupier was aware. The judge upheld the claim, although with a finding of 75% contributory negligence. The defendant appealed, contending that while it accepted that it owed a duty of care to those who, as it was well aware, swam and dived in the vicinity of the slipway in the summer, that duty did not extend to the claimant, of whose swimming expedition in mid-winter in the middle of the night it had neither known nor could reasonably have been expected to know.

Held – The test whether a duty of care existed under the 1984 Act had to be determined having regard to the circumstances prevailing at the time that it was alleged that the breach of duty had resulted in injury to the claimant. At the time that the claimant in the instant case sustained his grievous injuries, the defendant had had no reason to believe that he, or anyone else, would be swimming from the slipway. The criterion in s 1(3)(b) was not, therefore, satisfied. The defendant had owed no duty to the claimant and should not have been held to be under any liability for his accident. The appeal would accordingly be allowed (see [58], [77], [79], below).

Appeal

The defendant, Folkestone Properties Ltd, appealed with permission of Brooke LJ granted on 15 October 2002 from the decision of Judge Bowers, sitting as a judge of the High Court in Newcastle upon Tyne, on 2 September 2002 holding that Folkestone Properties was liable to the claimant, John Simon Donoghue, for damages for breach of its duty of care under s 1 of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR. h

Lawrence West (instructed by Eversheds, Cardiff) for Folkestone Properties. j

Bill Braithwaite QC and Alan Saggerson (instructed by Cunningham John, Thetford) for Mr Donoghue.

27 February 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal against the judgment given on 2 September 2002 by Judge Bowers, sitting as an additional judge of the High Court. It arises out of a tragic accident. On Saturday, 27 December 1997, shortly after midnight, the respondent, Mr Donoghue, decided to go for a swim in Folkestone Harbour. He dived into the sea from a slipway, struck his head on an underwater obstruction, broke his neck and was rendered tetraplegic.

[2] The appellants, Folkestone Properties Ltd (Folkestone Properties), own and occupy the harbour. Mr Donoghue claimed that they had been in breach of duty owed to him under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 and were responsible for his injuries. The judge upheld this claim, but found that Mr Donoghue had contributed to the accident by his own negligence to the extent that he could only recover 25% of his damages. He does not appeal against that finding. Folkestone Properties appeal. They contend that the judge erred in finding that they owed any duty of care to Mr Donoghue. They do not challenge his finding that they owed a duty of care to those who, as they were well aware, swam and dived in the vicinity of the slipway in the summer. They contend, however, that this duty did not extend to Mr Donoghue, of whose swimming expedition in mid-winter in the middle of the night they neither knew nor could reasonably have been expected to know.

THE HARBOUR

[3] The judge has given a careful and detailed description of Folkestone inner harbour where the accident occurred. Because the issue raised on this appeal is a narrow one, and essentially an issue of law, I can describe it much more briefly.

[4] The slipway, off which the accident occurred, lies in the north-west corner of the inner harbour. Initially it slopes down parallel and adjacent to the north wall of the inner harbour, but it then angles away from that wall, forming a dog's leg and continuing to slope down until it reaches the bed of the harbour.

[5] Protruding into the harbour at right angles to the lower limb of the dog's leg are seven substantial horizontal wooden beams, each set on a concrete base. These are grid piles forming a 'grid bed' upon which a boat can be placed as the tide ebbs away, so that access can be gained to her hull. The grid piles stand proud of the harbour bed to the extent of some 80 cm. As the tide rises the grid bed is progressively submerged until it is wholly under water for a period of between four and seven hours, depending upon whether the tides are spring or neap.

[6] The object of the slipway is to enable the launching or recovery of boats and jet-skis and members of the public were licensed by Folkestone Properties to use the slipway for this purpose. The judge found that they probably had an implied licence to walk down the slipway to the water's edge, and that they had a licence to walk up and down the path at the top of the harbour walls.

[7] Members of the public did not have a licence to use the inner harbour for the purpose of swimming or jumping or diving in the water. On the contrary, Folkestone Properties tried to prevent this. Eastward of the slipway, in two places, steps descended from the north harbour wall to a landing stage. In the summer these landing stages were popular places from which children, and the occasional adult, entered the water to swim. At the head of each staircase, but not the slipway, a notice was placed stating 'jumping in the harbour and swimming is prohibited'. a

[8] Children and the occasional adult also swam from the slipway in the summer, although in smaller numbers. They would sometimes jump or dive into the water from the slipway, and Folkestone Properties were aware of this. Security guards would try to stop the children from swimming in the harbour and, on occasion, the police were called, but to no marked effect. b

MR DONOGHUE

[9] Mr Donoghue was aged 31 at the time of his accident. He was about 6 ft 2 in tall, weighed 16 stone and was very fit. He was a professional scuba diver. He was trained in the Royal Navy and had served as a diver. His service records show the extent of his very considerable experience, which included on a number of occasions the recovery of bodies. After leaving the Navy, he continued to work as a diver. As a diving supervisor it had been his responsibility to ascertain water depths and freedom from obstructions before authorising a dive. As the judge found, years of professional training and experience reinforced in his case the common sense rule that you should not dive into water unless sure of sufficient depth and the absence of obstructions. c
d

[10] Mr Donoghue had lived in Folkestone since 1994. He had visited the harbour once every month or two and occasionally launched a rigid inflatable from the slipway. He had seen children and adults swimming in the harbour in the summer, but had never observed the grid piles or the notices at the top of the stairways, which prohibited swimming. The judge rejected his evidence that he thought the harbour was a recognised place to swim. He found that Mr Donoghue realised perfectly well that swimming was probably unauthorised but difficult to prevent. e

THE ACCIDENT f

[11] Mr Donoghue spent the latter part of the evening of Boxing Day drinking in Scruffy Murphy's public house with his partner Samia and with a number of friends. These included David Watkins, another professional diver who had been in the Navy with Mr Donoghue and who had taught him to dive. While in the public house Mr Donoghue consumed at least five pints of beer, so that he was 'merry drunk', but not incapable or unable to know what he was doing or saying. He had already had it in mind to go for a Boxing Day swim, and he discussed going for a night swim with the others in the public house. When they left, some of the party, including Samia, went home by taxi while Mr Donoghue, Mr Watkins and another man and woman walked to the slipway. g
h

[12] Mr Donoghue and Mr Watkins both intended to swim. Mr Donoghue undressed the faster and, having removed all his clothes, walked down the slipway until he reached the water. The state of the tide was such that there was about two feet or so of water over the grid bed. Mr Donoghue dived in and hit his head on a grid pile and broke his neck. He then floated face down on the water. Mr Watkins jumped in and rescued him. j

THE OCCUPIERS' LIABILITY ACT 1984

[13] Section 1 of the 1984 Act provides, so far as material, as follows:

'Duty of occupier to persons other than his visitors.—(1) The rules enacted by this section shall have effect, in place of the rules of the common law, to determine—(a) whether any duty is owed by a person as occupier of premises to persons other than his visitors in respect of any risk of their suffering injury on the premises by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them; and (b) if so, what that duty is.

(2) For the purposes of this section, the persons who are to be treated respectively as an occupier of any premises (which, for those purposes, include any fixed or movable structure) and as his visitors are—(a) any person who owes in relation to the premises the duty referred to in section 2 of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 (the common duty of care), and (b) those who are his visitors for the purposes of that duty.

(3) An occupier of premises owes a duty to another (not being his visitor) in respect of any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1) above if—(a) he is aware of the danger or has reasonable grounds to believe that it exists; (b) he knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other is in the vicinity of the danger concerned or that he may come into the vicinity of the danger (in either case, whether the other has lawful authority for being in that vicinity or not); and (c) the risk is one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, he may reasonably be expected to offer the other some protection.

(4) Where, by virtue of this section, an occupier of premises owes a duty to another in respect of such a risk, the duty is to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.

(5) Any duty owed by virtue of this section in respect of a risk may, in an appropriate case, be discharged by taking such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to give warning of the danger concerned or to discourage persons from incurring the risk.

(6) No duty is owed by virtue of this section to any person in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by that person (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another).'

[14] For the purposes of the 1984 Act, Folkestone Properties were the occupiers of the slipway. The judge found that Mr Donoghue did not go onto the slipway as a licensee. He was a trespasser and thus a person 'other than a visitor'. There is no appeal against that finding.

THE JUDGMENT

[15] The facts that I have set out above are based upon findings made by the judge which are not challenged. I now turn to the judge's application of the 1984 Act to these facts.

[16] The judge saw as his starting point the need to 'identify in precise terms the danger which creates a risk of personal injury due to the state of the premises'. He did so in these terms: 'the danger is from the presence of the grid piles immediately adjacent to the slipway which are submerged for substantial periods of each day.'

[17] The judge went on to consider the three criteria that give rise to a duty of care by reason of the provisions of s 1(3) of the 1984 Act. The critical issue in this appeal relates to his approach to this subsection. I shall explain the nature of that issue.

[18] Section 1(3) of the 1984 Act lays down the test of whether a duty of care is owed to an individual—‘the other’. It was and is the case advanced by Mr Lawrence West, on behalf of Folkestone Properties, that each of the criteria in s 1(3) must be considered having regard to the characteristics and attributes of the individual claimant and the circumstances prevailing when that individual suffered his injury. Thus the question raised by s 1(3) of whether the grid bed posed a danger had to be answered by considering whether it posed a danger to Mr Donoghue, a mature adult with great experience as a professional diver. The question raised by s 1(3)(b) of whether Folkestone Properties had reasonable grounds to believe that Mr Donoghue might be in, or come into, the vicinity of the danger had to be answered having regard to the time of year and the time of day when the accident occurred. The question raised by s 1(3)(c) of whether Folkestone Properties might reasonably be expected to offer some protection against the risk of suffering injury by reason of the presence of the grid bed had to be considered having regard to Mr Donoghue’s personal characteristics and attributes.

[19] On behalf of Mr Donoghue, Mr Braithwaite QC submitted to the judge, as he did to us, that the correct approach was that laid down by Ward LJ in Tomlinson v Congleton BC [2002] EWCA Civ 309, [2003] 3 All ER 1122, [2003] 2 WLR 1120. This demonstrated, so he submitted, that the approach when applying s 1(3) of the 1984 Act differed from the approach to be adopted when applying s 1(4). Section 1(3) imposed a duty on an occupier to offer some protection when he could reasonably believe that a class of persons, usually trespassers, might come into the vicinity of a danger that carried the risk of causing injury or death. Section 1(4) was concerned with the precise nature of the precautions that should be taken to protect the particular individual bringing the claim for breach of duty. If the appropriate precaution was, as in the present case, a warning sign, and failure to put up such a sign caused the individual to sustain injury, all the elements to establish liability would be present even though the accident occurred at a time other than that when the presence of the class of trespassers was reasonably to be anticipated.

[20] The judge accepted Mr Braithwaite’s submissions as to the way to determine if a duty exists—see the following passage of his judgment (at [32]):

‘... the claimant points, in particular, to the approach of Ward LJ in Tomlinson’s case who, when considering the issue of the existence of the duty (at [23]–[29]) did so in general terms rather than specifically to the individual claimant. Furthermore he points out that it is only when Ward LJ comes to look at the standard of care under s 1(4) that he states (at [30]): “By now the focus has to be on the duty owed to the individual claimant whereas at the earlier stages of the inquiry it was probably more accurate to think of the duty owed to the claimant as a member of a class of persons, young or old, nefariously on the premises or using them to the occupier’s knowledge, if not with his permission.” Comments drawing a similar distinction between on the one hand the duty being owed to the claimant personally but as a member of a class at risk and on the other hand the nature and extent of that duty (which are entirely personal to the claimant) are stated by Stuart-Smith LJ in Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670 at 683 (para 44). In looking at s 1(3) it is interesting to note that the expression used is “another (not being his visitor)” and thereafter “the other” is clearly a reference back to a notional person ie someone other than a visitor. In s 1(4) by contrast the a standard of care relates not to “the” (notional) “other” but to see that “he” does not suffer injury. Even therefore, if I did not feel bound by the authority of Tomlinson and the interpretation of Ward LJ (which I do) I would arrive at the same interpretation. I am quite satisfied that the existence of the duty is to be looked at in more general terms as a class of trespasser whereas the standard of care to be exercised is specifically set by reference to the individual trespasser.’

b [21] The judge, applying this approach to the facts, concluded (at 33) that Folkestone Properties had owed a duty to offer some protection by virtue of the provisions of s 1(3) of the 1984 Act:

c ‘Thus in my judgment the danger is from the presence of the grid piles immediately adjacent to the slipway which are submerged for substantial periods of each day. The defendants clearly knew of their existence, whether from the 1920s (their evidence) or the 1970s (Mr Gale). Equally clearly, the defendants knew or had reasonable grounds to believe that trespassers swam, jumped or dived in the harbour and some of them did so off the slipway in the vicinity of the grid piles. At certain times of the year (and of the day) the numbers could be substantial. There are self-evident risks in a tidal harbour regarding the depth of water and the possibility of submerged obstructions which might well be regarded as obvious to an adult and in respect of which no warning is required. However this is a permanent obstruction adjacent to the slipway from which an adult and/or child may attempt to jump or dive—indeed on the only side of the slipway from which one could jump or dive. The water is always murky according to the evidence and the grid piles are covered with water for significant periods in each day. Those periods when the grid piles are covered are the very times when swimming jumping or diving could take place and whilst at high tide the piles are well covered there are significant periods when the depth of water is relatively shallow. Thus in all the circumstances I consider that the occupier could reasonably be expected to offer some protection.’

d [22] The judge held (at [35]) that the precaution that Folkestone Properties should have taken was to display at the top of the slipway a notice stating words to the effect ‘Danger; No swimming, jumping or diving; Hidden objects; Shallow water’. He later held that, had such a notice been displayed, it would have dissuaded Mr Donoghue from diving off the slipway.

e [23] While the judge commented (at [33]) that the numbers of trespassers swimming, jumping and diving could be substantial at certain times of the year (and of the day), he made no express finding as to whether there were other times of the year (or day) when it would not be reasonable to expect any members of the class in question to be in the vicinity of the danger. It seems to me that he cannot have considered that this question was relevant. His approach to duty ‘in general terms’ involved the application of a test that was satisfied once it was shown that Folkestone Properties had reason to believe that on some occasions a class of persons would be swimming, jumping and diving in the vicinity of the grid bed.

f [24] The judge did, however, make the following finding in relation to the particular facts of this case:

g ‘It goes without saying that if I had accepted the defendants’ interpretation then clearly they could not possibly have known or had reasonable grounds to believe that the claimant would come onto the slipway in drink, after midnight, in mid-winter to dive naked into the harbour in the vicinity of the grid piles which were inadequately covered with water. Equally they would not reasonably be expected to offer him some protection from that risk.'

[25] Mr Braithwaite conceded that it was implicit from this finding that Folkestone Properties did not have reason to believe that anyone would be swimming, jumping or diving in the vicinity of the grid piles in mid-winter. He accepted that there was no basis upon which the judge could have found otherwise.

THE ISSUE

[26] Mr West has not abandoned his contention that the question of whether a danger existed and of whether a duty was owed under s 1(3) had to be decided by reference to a man with the attributes of Mr Donoghue. He has accepted, however, that, on the findings made by the judge, had Mr Donoghue been among those who to the knowledge of Folkestone Properties were accustomed to swim in the vicinity of the slipway in the summer, they would in the summer have owed a duty to protect him by posting a warning of the kind formulated by the judge. His appeal is founded solely upon the requirement of s 1(3)(b). He submits that the duty that is owed to offer some protection to a trespasser against a danger only extends to the time or times at which the occupier has reasonable grounds to believe that the trespasser may be in the vicinity of and at risk from the danger. As there were no reasonable grounds to believe that anyone would be swimming in the vicinity of the slipway in the middle of the night in mid-winter, no duty was owed to Mr Donoghue at the time that he had his accident.

[27] In reaching his conclusion in relation to duty, the judge was influenced by the approach that he understood to have been laid down by Ward LJ in Tomlinson's case. In so far as that case turned on any holding of legal principle we must follow it. I propose to make some general observations about the manner in which the 1984 Act appears to operate, and to refer to the sparse authority before Tomlinson's case that bears on this, before turning to consider the effect of that decision.

[28] The starting point is the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. The 1957 Act imposes on an occupier 'the common duty of care' to all his visitors—that is his invitees or licensees. Section 2(2) provides:

'The common duty of care is a duty to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there.'

[29] The 1957 Act did not impose any duty towards trespassers. In the decisions reflected in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1 and in British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877 the common law moved some way to fill the gap. In Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670 Stuart-Smith LJ, in a judgment with which the other two members of the court agreed, considered the effect of the 1984 Act on the principles laid down by the speech of Lord Diplock in Herrington's case. First he cited the following passage from Lord Diplock's speech ([1972] 1 All ER 749 at

b 'First, the duty does not arise until the occupier has actual knowledge
c either of the presence of the trespasser on his land or of facts which make it d likely that the trespasser will come on to his land; and has also actual e knowledge of facts as to the condition of his land or of activities carried out f on it which are likely to cause personal injury to a trespasser who is unaware of the danger. He is under no duty to the trespasser to make any enquiry or inspection to ascertain whether or not such facts do exist. His liability does not arise until he actually knows of them. Secondly, once the occupier has actual knowledge of such facts, his own failure to appreciate the likelihood of the trespasser's presence or the risk to him involved, does not absolve the occupier from his duty to the trespasser if a reasonable man possessed of the actual knowledge of the occupier would recognise that likelihood and that risk. Thirdly, the duty when it arises is limited to taking reasonable steps to enable the trespasser to avoid the danger. Where the likely trespasser is a child too young to understand or heed a written or a previous oral warning, this may involve providing reasonable physical obstacles to keep the child away from the danger. Fourthly, the relevant likelihood to be considered is of the trespasser's presence at the actual time and place of danger to him.
The degree of likelihood needed to give rise to the duty cannot, I think, be more closely defined than as being such as would impel a man of ordinary humane feelings to take some steps to mitigate the risk of injury to the trespasser to which the particular danger exposes him. It will thus depend on all the circumstances of the case: the permanent or intermittent character of the danger; the severity of the injuries which it is likely to cause; in the case of children, the attractiveness to them of that which constitutes the dangerous object or condition of the land; the expense involved in giving effective warning of it to the kind of trespasser likely to be injured, in relation to the occupier's resources in money or in labour.'

[30] Stuart-Smith LJ then commented ([1999] 1 WLR 670 at 680 (para 34)):

g 'Although the court must now obviously apply the words of the statute, it seems to me that the considerations enunciated by Lord Diplock in Herrington's case [1972] AC 877, 941, with the exception of the words emphasised in his fourth proposition, are still apposite. Those words which I have emphasised are no longer correct in the light of section 1(3)(c) and (5) of the 1984 Act.'

h I concur in this analysis.

[31] The duty of care identified by Lord Diplock and imposed under the 1984 Act is significantly less exacting than the common duty of care imposed under the 1957 Act, as a comparison of the two statutes readily demonstrates.

j [32] The 1984 Act imposes a duty on an occupier where: (1) the state of the premises poses a danger; (2) the danger is one that poses a risk of causing injury to a trespasser (it is convenient, though not always accurate, so to describe the 'non visitor') if he comes into the vicinity of the danger; (3) there are reasonable grounds for believing that the trespasser is or may come into the vicinity of the danger; and (4) in all the circumstances of the case it is reasonable to afford the trespasser some protection against the risk.

[33] The obvious situation where a duty under the 1984 Act is likely to arise is where the occupier knows that a trespasser may come upon a danger that is latent. In such a case the trespasser may be exposed to the risk of injury without realising that the danger exists. Where the state of the premises constitutes a danger that is perfectly obvious, and there is no reason for a trespasser observing it to go near it, a duty under the 1984 Act is unlikely to arise for at least two reasons. The first is that because the danger can readily be avoided, it is unlikely to pose a risk of injuring the trespasser whose presence on the premises is envisaged.

[34] There are, however, circumstances in which it may be foreseeable that a trespasser will appreciate that a dangerous feature of premises poses a risk of injury, but will nevertheless deliberately court the danger and risk the injury. It seems to me that, at least where the individual is an adult, it will be rare that those circumstances will be such that the occupier can reasonably be expected to offer some protection to the trespasser against the risk.

[35] There are some features of land that are not inherently dangerous but which may tempt a person on the land to indulge in an activity which carries a risk of injury. Such activities include cliff climbing, mountaineering, skiing, and hang-gliding by way of example. It does not seem to me that a person carrying on such an activity can ascribe to the 'state of the premises' an injury sustained as a result of a mishap in the course of carrying on the activity—provided of course that the mishap is not caused by an unusual or latent feature of the landscape. I do not consider that the 1984 Act imposes any duty on an occupier to protect a trespasser from making use of a particular feature of the premises in order to carry on an activity simply because that activity carries with it an inherent risk of injury.

[36] This brings me to swimming and diving. An expanse of water, be it a lake, pond, river or the sea, does not normally pose any danger to a person on land. If a trespasser deliberately enters the water to swim, then the trespasser chooses to indulge in an activity which carries a degree of inherent risk. If the trespasser gets cramp or becomes exhausted and drowns, it cannot properly be said that this tragedy is attributable to the 'state of the premises'. Where a trespasser suffers injury as a result of diving onto the bottom, or onto an obstruction that stands proud of the bottom, the position is less simple.

[37] If a trespasser jumps down a bank and injures himself by contact with the ground, his injury cannot properly be said to be attributable to the 'state of the premises'. If the bank is on the edge of a lake, and the ground is beneath the water, I still have difficulty in seeing how his injury can be said to be attributable to the 'state of the premises'. If, however, there is a concealed obstruction beneath what appears to be deep water, it then becomes arguable that an injury suffered by a trespasser who dives upon it is attributable, in part, to the 'state of the premises'. It will not, of course, necessarily follow that the occupier will be liable under the 1984 Act. This will depend upon the application of the other criteria laid down by the Act.

[38] I now return to Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670. In that case a student had gained access to a swimming pool by climbing over a locked gate at night and dived into the shallow end, sustaining severe injuries. He claimed that the defendants were liable under the 1984 Act in that they should have taken greater precautions to prevent such an accident. The Court of Appeal held that no duty was owed to him under the 1984 Act because he was aware of the risk involved and willingly accepted it.

a [39] In holding that the majority of Lord Diplock's principles were applicable under the statutory regime, it is particularly significant in the context of the present case that Stuart-Smith LJ indorsed the proposition that the existence of the duty had to be determined by reference to the likelihood of the trespasser's presence in the vicinity of the danger at the actual time and place of danger to him.

b [40] I turn to Stuart-Smith LJ's judgment (at 683 (para 44)), which the judge considered supported the approach of identifying whether a duty arises under s 1(3) of the 1984 Act by reference to a 'class at risk'. What Stuart-Smith LJ said was this:

c 'The duty, if any, is owed to the individual trespasser, though he may be a member of a class that the occupier knows or has reasonable grounds to believe is in the vicinity of the danger. But the nature and extent of what it is reasonable to expect of the occupier varies greatly depending on whether the trespasser is very young or very old and so may not appreciate the nature of the danger which is or ought to be apparent to an adult.'

d [41] These observations do not support the proposition that, when applying s 1(3), it is appropriate to ask the question of whether a duty is owed to a class. Consideration of a class of trespasser may be helpful when approaching the question raised by s 1(3)(b) of whether the occupier has reasonable grounds to believe that the trespasser may come into the vicinity of the danger. Plainly this does not restrict those who are the subject of the duty to individuals of whom the occupier has personal knowledge. It will be enough if the trespasser can show
e that he was one of a class of persons whom the occupier had reason to believe might be in the vicinity of the danger. Once, however, s 1(3)(b) is satisfied, it then becomes necessary to consider whether any duty was owed to the particular member of that class who suffered the injury. That was the very point made by Stuart-Smith LJ when he observed that what it is reasonable to expect of the f occupier varies greatly depending upon the age of the trespasser. A duty to offer some protection to children known to be present in the vicinity of the danger may well exist in circumstances where the occupier cannot reasonably be required to offer any protection to an adult.

g [42] There is an earlier decision of the Court of Appeal, which affords some further guidance to the approach to s 1 of the 1984 Act. White v St Albans City and District Council (1990) Times, 12 March involved a claim by a trespasser who had suffered injury by falling into a gap when taking a short cut to a car park. In the leading judgment, after setting out sub-ss (3), (4) and (5) of s 1, Neill LJ commented:

h 'We can see, therefore, the scheme of those last three subsections. Subsection (3) contains the provisions which are relevant for the purpose of determining whether the occupier of the premises owes any duty at all to the person who is described as "another (not being his visitor)". Subsection (4) sets out the nature and extent of the duty once it has been established that j the person on the premises is a person to whom a duty is owed. Subsection (5) contains provisions which may, in certain circumstances, apply whereby the occupier may be able to discharge his duty by taking such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances, either to give warning of the danger or, alternatively, to discourage persons from incurring the risk.'

These comments draw no distinction between the subsections in respect of the approach to be adopted when considering whether a duty is owed to a trespasser.

[43] A subsequent passage in Neill LJ's judgment is particularly relevant to the present case. Mr West, in that case appearing for the claimant, argued that the fact that the defendants had placed a chain link fence to inhibit access to the gap demonstrated that the likelihood of trespassers approaching the gap had been appreciated by them. He contended that, when considering whether a duty of care existed, it was necessary to consider the position before any precautions had been taken. Neill LJ rejected this submission. He held:

'It seems to me that the question to be considered under sub-s (3)(b) must be answered by looking at the actual state of affairs on the ground at the time when the injury is suffered. The question is: had the occupier of the premises reasonable grounds to believe that somebody such as Mr White might come into the vicinity of the danger ... To my mind, the judge was wholly justified in coming to the conclusion that the council had no reasonable grounds for believing that Mr White on that occasion might come into the vicinity of this gap or channel into which, unhappily, he fell.'

TOMLINSON

[44] Having considered the prior authorities which are relevant I now turn to Tomlinson v Congleton BC [2003] 3 All ER 1122, [2003] 2 WLR 1120. Mr Tomlinson, the claimant, suffered injuries which rendered him a paraplegic as a consequence of hitting his head on the bottom when he dived into a lake that was situated on land owned and occupied by the defendant council. He had dived from a position standing in the water and hit his head on the bed of the lake, not on any obstruction. The council permitted the public to have access to the lake and the land around it for various leisure activities, but these did not include swimming. The prohibition on swimming was made clear by notices at the shore of the lake reading 'DANGEROUS WATER; NO SWIMMING'.

[45] The trial judge ruled that, by ignoring this notice, Mr Tomlinson became a trespasser so that the applicable statute was the 1984 Act. That proposition was not challenged, though in his dissenting judgment Longmore LJ expressed reservations about it. I share those reservations. What was at issue in the case was whether the council should have taken steps which would have prevented Mr Tomlinson from entering the lake, that is, whether a duty of care was owed to him before he did the unauthorised act. In those circumstances it seems to me that it was arguable that the relevant statute was the 1957 Act. However for present purposes what is relevant is what the Court of Appeal had to say about the operation of the 1984 Act.

[46] The trial judge held that the council was under no liability to Mr Tomlinson. He held that the danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow were obvious. Applying previous decisions under the 1957 Act, he held that an occupier was not under a duty to warn against a risk which was obvious. In any event, he held that the signs prohibiting swimming were reasonable and sufficient steps to give warning of the danger. The council were aware that these signs were widely disregarded, but the judge rejected the argument that in these circumstances the council owed a duty to fence off the beaches and to plant vegetation that would discourage the public from entering the water. He held that the decision to enter the water was one that members of the public were free to make; they could choose to accept the risk.

[47] The Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge. Ward LJ gave the leading judgment. He was impressed by documentary evidence showing hundreds of

- a people swam in the lake on warm summer days, that there had been a history of accidents in the lake, including near drownings, and that the council had been advised that it was only a question of time before somebody drowned. In these circumstances he held (at [38]) that the council had been under a duty to prevent members of the public from suffering injury 'by reason of the dangers which awaited those who entered the water for a swim'. Those dangers he had earlier identified as follows (at [21]):

- b 'In this case there was a risk of injury being suffered by anyone entering the water because of the dangers due to the state of the premises, the premises being constituted by the configuration and contents of this pond created as it was from a disused sand-extraction pit. There was a risk of injury through drowning because of the dangers, among others, of the effect of cold water, being caught in weed, being stuck in the mud or plunging unexpectedly into deep water. There was the risk of injury through diving because of the dangers of diving too steeply in shallow water or into an obstruction. There may have been risks of other injury from other dangers, eg Weil's disease. These risks of injury arose as soon as one entered the water because one did not know what danger lurked, or where it lay hidden. The exact nature of the hazard may not much matter in the particular circumstances of this case.'

- [48] Ward LJ held that the 1984 Act had to be used as a 'template' for judgment and that it was necessary to look to the Act for the relevant principles. It was a staged process. The first stage was to identify the risk and the danger. This he did in the manner set out in the paragraph above. The second stage was to determine whether or not a duty was owed by the occupier. This depended solely on whether the criteria in s 1(3) were satisfied. In applying this test the judge drew no distinction between Mr Tomlinson and the many other trespassers who were known to enter the lake. He held that s 1(3)(b) was satisfied because it was known to the council that many entered the water and were in the vicinity of the dangers concerned.

- [49] When addressing s 1(3)(c) Ward LJ held that a different approach was required from that which was applicable when considering s 1(4). He said (at [26]):

- g 'The third, and in this case crucial, requirement laid down by s 1(3)(c) is whether the risk was one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, the occupiers might reasonably be expected to offer the trespasser some protection. Analysing that, the protection is against any such risk as is referred to in sub-s (1), the risk, that is, of the trespasser suffering injury by reason of the dangers lurking in the mere. The protection we are looking for is "some protection". The question is whether some protection might reasonably be expected to be offered. The question is not whether reasonable protection is to be expected. To frame the question that way is to fail to distinguish between the establishing of the duty under s 1(3) and the standard of care necessary to satisfy the duty which is provided by s 1(4). These are distinct and separate requirements and I am concerned that the judge may have failed to keep them separate and distinct when he said (at [28]–[29]): "In the circumstances of this case at least, consideration of the third requirement under s 1(3) and the consideration of the duty under s 1(4) cover much the same ground ... In my view the danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow were obvious ... an occupier is not under a duty to warn against a risk which is obvious.”

[50] Ward LJ went on to review the evidence of the history of accidents and near drownings over the years and concluded that the occupiers were reasonably to be expected to offer some protection against the risks of entering the water and that it followed that the council was under a duty to Mr Tomlinson. He then turned to s 1(4) and said (at [30]):

‘The standard of care is defined by s 1(4). It is—“to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.” By now the focus has to be on the duty owed to the individual claimant whereas at the earlier stages of the inquiry it was probably more accurate to think of the duty owed to the claimant as a member of a class of persons, young or old, nefariously on the premises or using them to the occupier’s knowledge, if not with his permission.’

This is the passage that led Judge Bowers to approach the question of whether Folkestone Properties owed a duty of care ‘in general terms’ without reference to the particular experience that Mr Donoghue had as a diver or to the time of year and of day when he had his accident.

[51] Ward LJ went on to consider the nature of the steps that the council should have taken to protect Mr Tomlinson and concluded that the council should have carried out landscaping and planting that would have transformed the lakeside beach into a barrier.

[52] Sedley LJ agreed that the appeal should be allowed. He added some brief reasoning of his own, the essence of which was as follows (at [43]–[45]):

‘It is, I agree, an apparent oddity that a person who is injured by diving into shallow water—a pretty obvious hazard—should be able to claim the benefit of precautions which in reality were needed in order to stop people losing their footing where the lake bed shelved steeply or becoming entangled in thick weeds. But there are two separate answers, one relating to the obviousness of the hazard, the other to its nature ... As to the nature of the hazard, it was rightly not argued by the respondents that this could make the difference between liability and no liability in the present case. It is well settled by authority that if there is a duty to protect people against foreseeable injury, it does not matter if the accident which happens was not itself foreseeable, so long as it is not in an entirely different league: see Hughes v Lord Advocate [1963] 1 All ER 705, [1963] AC 837 and Smith v Leech Brain & Co Ltd [1961] 3 All ER 1159, [1962] 2 QB 405 ... If primary liability is established, the obviousness of the hazard goes to contributory negligence; for it is only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability.’

Longmore LJ gave a short but powerful dissenting judgment.

[53] There are aspects of each of the majority judgments in Tomlinson’s case with which I have difficulty. I have been unable to identify in either judgment the ‘state of the premises’ which posed a danger which carried with it the risk of the injury suffered by Mr Tomlinson. It seems to me that Mr Tomlinson suffered his injury because he chose to indulge in an activity which had inherent dangers, not because the premises were in a dangerous state. Nor can I readily reconcile a Sedley LJ's statement (at [45]) that 'it is only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability' with the terms under which the 1984 Act, and particularly s 1(5), imposes a limited duty of care in respect of trespassers.

[54] Turning to the distinction that Ward LJ made between the approach to s 1(3) and the approach to s 1(4), this does not form part of the majority ratio, nor indeed was it critical to the result reached by Ward LJ himself. I am not bound to follow it and shall not attempt to do so, for I do not consider that the distinction is a valid one. On the natural meaning of s 1(3) and s 1(4) it seems to me that 'the other' in s 1(3) is the same person as 'another' in s 1(4), namely the very individual who has sustained the injury and in respect of whom the issue under consideration has arisen. Quite apart from the natural meaning of the words, I cannot see how one can logically reach the question of what action it is reasonable for an occupier to take to protect an individual trespasser against a risk pursuant to s 1(4) unless one has first decided that the risk is such that it is reasonable for the occupier to offer that person some protection pursuant to s 1(3).

d [55] If I am correct, the basis underlying the judge's decision on duty is unsound. Even if I am not correct, it does not seem to me that Ward LJ's approach should have led the judge to the conclusion that, when considering whether a duty of care existed pursuant to s 1(3), it was unnecessary to apply the statutory criteria to the circumstances prevailing at the time that the accident occurred. In Tomlinson's case it was common ground that the council had reasonable grounds to believe that members of the public such as Mr Tomlinson were likely to be in the vicinity of the lake when the accident occurred. No issue under s 1(3)(b) arose. Ward LJ's approach did not involve the conclusion that if a duty of care exists in the summer, an identical duty will exist in the winter. The circumstances which are material to the existence of the duty may change with the seasons or the time of day. That was the position in the present case.

f [56] In the course of argument we invited Mr Braithwaite to consider what the position would have been if Folkestone Properties had decided to adopt a more effective way of preventing members of the public from swimming from the slipway than merely posting a notice. What if they had posted a security guard on the slipway to prevent people from swimming? If they withdrew the guard during hours of darkness in circumstances where there were no reasonable grounds to believe that anyone would wish to swim from the slipway, could they possibly be held to be in breach of duty under the 1984 Act? Mr Braithwaite was hard pressed to argue that they could, but contended that the facts of this case were different in that the reasonable steps that the judge held should have been adopted involved putting up a notice, which would have remained day and night, summer and winter.

j [57] I did not find this response convincing. It does not seem to me that the period during which a duty of care extends can depend upon the means that may be used to discharge the duty. Furthermore, we asked Mr Braithwaite whether Folkestone Properties would have been in breach of duty had they posted a notice in the summer, but taken away all notices prohibiting swimming shortly before Christmas to repaint them, in the reasonable belief that no one would attempt to go swimming in the harbour in mid-winter. Mr Braithwaite conceded that he would have been unable to establish a breach of duty in such circumstances.

[58] The observations of members of this court, which I have cited, in Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670 and White v St Albans City and District Council (1990)

Times, 12 March suggest that the test of whether a duty of care exists under the 1984 Act must be determined having regard to the circumstances prevailing at the time that it is alleged that the breach of duty resulted in injury to the claimant. That is my own reading of the relevant provisions of the 1984 Act. At the time that Mr Donoghue sustained his grievous injuries, Folkestone Properties had no reason to believe that he, or anyone else, would be swimming from the slipway. The criterion of s 1(3)(b) of the 1984 Act was not satisfied. Folkestone Properties owed no duty to Mr Donoghue and should not have been held under any liability for his accident. It is never a pleasant task to snatch from a grievously injured claimant compensation that might provide a measure of mitigation of his ill-fortune but for the reasons that I have given I would allow this appeal.

BROOKE LJ.

[59] This case is all about the duty an occupier of premises owes to a trespasser. In Fairchild v Glenhaven Funeral Services Ltd [2001] 1 EWCA Civ 1881 at [118]–[121], [2002] IRLR 129 at [118]–[121], [2002] 1 WLR 1052 at [118]–[121] I explained in section 8(iii) of the judgment of the court certain features of the common law relating to occupiers' liability prior to the enactment of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. In particular I quoted (at [116]) the well-known dictum of Willes J in Indermaur v Dames (1866) LR 1 CP 274 at 288, [1861–73] All ER Rep 15 at 21 in which he set out what I described as an occupier's occupancy duty towards his invitees:

‘And, with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law, that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as matter of fact.’

[60] The 1957 Act abolished the old Byzantine distinctions between an invitee and a licensee. It clarified by statute the nature of the common duty of care which an occupier owes to all his visitors in consequence of the invitation or permission he gave to them to enter or use his premises. But it left untouched the question whether an occupier owed a duty, and if so what duty, to trespassers (being people whom he did not invite or permit to enter or use his premises for the purposes for which they chose to enter them, and who used them without any such invitation or permission).

[61] In general the old common law judges had little sympathy with trespassers. In his speech in British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749 at 763–764, [1972] AC 877 at 905–906, however, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest referred to a trilogy of early nineteenth-century cases in which plaintiffs had claimed damages after being shot by spring guns which landowners placed on their land to deter trespassers. Two strands of thought flowed from the decisions in these cases. The first was that the law should not sanction conduct towards trespassers that was inconsistent with common humanity. The second was that the law should not sanction conduct whereby an occupier of land intentionally set out to cause physical harm to trespassers. In the fullness of time an occupier who conducted himself with a reckless disregard for the safety of trespassers also a came within this rubric. This was the state of the law when Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1 was decided.

[62] Mr Dumbreck's four-year-old son, like many others of all ages, trespassed in a field which was being used as a dump for the deposit of ashes from the pithead of a colliery. The boy was killed while sitting on the cover of an unprotected iron wheel. He was caught and drawn into the operating machinery. Lord Hailsham LC b said ([1929] AC 358 at 367, [1929] All ER Rep 1 at 6) that English law had been accurately summarised by Scrutton LJ in an earlier case in these terms:

c 'If the children were trespassers, the landowner was not entitled intentionally to injure them, or to put dangerous traps for them intending to injure them, but was under no liability if in trespassing they injured themselves on objects legitimately on his land in the course of his business. Against those he was under no obligation to guard trespassers.' (See Hardy v Central London Rly Co [1920] 3 KB 459 at 473–474.)

[63] In his speech in the same case Viscount Dunedin widened the scope of potential liability to a trespasser to include reckless conduct ([1929] AC 358 at d 376–377, [1929] All ER Rep 1 at 10):

e '... if the person is a trespasser, then the only duty the proprietor has towards him is not maliciously to injure him: he may not shoot him; he may not set a spring gun, for that is just to arrange to shoot him without personally firing the shot. Other illustrations of what he may not do might be found, but they all come under the same head – injury either directly malicious or an acting so reckless as to be tantamount to malicious acting.'

f [65] In the years after Addie's case the development of the modern law of negligence proceeded apace following the breakthrough decision in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1, but the law governing an occupier's duty to trespassers stood still, at least so far as the House of Lords was concerned. As I have indicated it was omitted from the law reform project that led up to the enactment of the 1957 Act, and on this side of the border there was nothing g resembling the statutory scheme introduced into the law of Scotland by the Occupiers' Liability (Scotland) Act 1960 which Lord Reid mentions in his speech in British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749 at 757, [1972] AC 877 at 898.

h [66] It is unnecessary for the purposes of this judgment to discuss such cases as Videan v British Transport Commission [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650 or Comr for Railways v Quinlan [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054 in which efforts were made to confer on trespassers greater rights, and to impose on occupiers greater obligations, than were consistent with the decision in Addie's case. They are fully discussed in Herrington's case and in the Law Commission's publications j which followed Herrington. I can go straight to Herrington's case in which the five members of the House of Lords unanimously dismissed an appeal by the British Railways Board against an order directing them to pay compensation to a child trespasser who had strayed across a dilapidated fence onto their electrified railway line.

[67] The trouble with Herrington's case, from the point of view of the smooth administration of justice, was that the five members of the House of Lords expressed themselves in different terms. The contents of their speeches, and the nature of the difficulties they created, are well-summarised by the Law Commission in their working paper on Liability for Damage or Injury to Trespassers and Related Questions of Occupiers' Liability (1973) (Consultation Paper no 52 (paras 15–22)). The five Law Lords spoke with different voices when they tried to identify the occasions on which an occupier's duty to a trespasser might arise. They also spoke with different voices when they sought to identify the content of that duty. a

[68] This, then, is the background against which the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 falls to be interpreted. The House of Lords had rejected the harshness of Addie's case. They considered that humanity required a softer approach to the law relating to trespassers (and particularly child trespassers), but they could not agree what that approach should be. The situation was tailor-made for the statutory reference the Lord Chancellor made to the Law Commission in April 1972 (two months after Herrington's case was decided) in these terms: c

‘To consider, in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in British Railways Board v Herrington ([1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877) the law relating to liability for damage or injury suffered by trespassers.’ d

[69] This reference led in due course to the publication of the Law Commission's report on Liability for Damage or Injury to Trespassers and Related Questions of Occupiers' Liability (Law Com no 75) (1976) and the enactment eight years later of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. That Act by s 1(1) expressly replaced the common law rules relating to the existence and nature of the duty owed by an occupier of premises to persons other than his visitors with a new statutory code. e

[70] The mischief which this legislation was enacted to remedy is clear from paras 4–11 of the Law Commission's report. It said that the decision of the House of Lords in Herrington's case represented a considerable development of the principles laid down by the House in Addie's case. It was difficult, however, to conclude that the question as to when special facts gave rise to a duty to the trespasser had received an entirely consistent answer in that case, nor to give a simple answer as to the content of the occupier's duty once it could be said, on the facts, to have arisen. f

[71] The language of the Law Commission's suggested legislative solution differed to a considerable extent from the language eventually adopted by Parliament, although there are certain similarities. For instance the new statutory duty will only arise if the danger/risk was ‘one against which in all the circumstances of the case, the [occupier/he] can reasonably be expected to offer [him/the other] some protection’. Once the duty arises, it is described in each case as— g

‘a duty to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstance of the case to see that [the entrant/he] does not suffer [personal injury or death/injury] by reason of the danger [concerned].’ j

[72] In an important passage of its report, after explaining the duty in this way, the Law Commission said:

‘28. It will be evident that the duty towards the trespasser under our recommendations is of a quite different character from the “common duty of care” under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. Under the latter that duty a is, in short, owed to all visitors and the occupier has to take reasonable care to see that they are reasonably safe. Under the former, while the duty is one which is owed potentially to all trespassers, the question of the extent of the duty does not arise at all unless, in the first place, the court decides as a question of fact that the danger is one against which, in all the circumstances, b it is reasonable for the occupier to offer some protection. In consequence, given identical circumstances, the fulfilment of the common duty of care towards a visitor may be expected in many instances to produce results entirely dissimilar from the fulfilment of our recommended duty of care towards the trespasser. To take a few very obvious examples: if one of the steps upon the stairs in his house is temporarily missing while it is being c repaired, an occupier may be expected to warn his visitor making use of the stairs of this fact in order to render him reasonably safe. But it would, in our view, be entirely unreasonable in the circumstances to expect the occupier to offer a burglar at night any protection at all in respect of this danger; and under our recommendations, therefore, no duty would be owed if the burglar were injured in consequence of this danger. Again, a farmer selling d livestock might be expected to keep a path reasonably safe for a customer who visits him to view the stock and to give him warning of, or protection in respect of, any dangers he might meet with in the course of his inspection.

But he could not reasonably be expected to take the same precautions in respect of a thief engaged in stealing the stock. Such a person may enter at night by places other than the usual entrance and might injure himself on e farm implements left lying off the path or on rusty nails on gates which he is unable to see; or he may even encounter dangers of an entirely natural character, such as a stream in which he falls and is injured or even drowned.
In those circumstances it might very well be unreasonable to expect the farmer to offer any protection; and if so, again no duty at all would arise.
f Finally, it may well be that in some circumstances it will be reasonable to offer some protection to the trespasser who is a child. This does not, however, mean that all child trespassers will be owed a duty: each case will depend upon its facts as to whether it would be reasonable in the circumstances to expect some protection to be given. Examples could, of course, be multiplied; but we give here sufficient only to indicate that the g duty we are recommending is far less onerous than the common duty of care owed to the visitor, in that a positive answer must be given to the first element of the proposed duty before any consideration at all is given to the extent of the duty owed.

h 29. When a court has decided as a question of fact that an occupier did in the particular circumstances of a case owe some protection to a trespasser, the question then to be decided, in accordance with our recommendations, is whether the occupier has discharged the duty on him by taking such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that the trespasser did not suffer personal injury or death by reason of the danger upon the j premises. In the range of circumstances to which the courts will have regard in deciding whether the occupier has acted reasonably, the application of the duty towards trespassers may again be expected to differ markedly from the common duty of care.'

[73] On the facts of the present case, the question we have to answer is whether, in the language of s 1(1) of the 1984 Act, Folkestone Properties Ltd, as the occupiers of this working port, owed any duty to Mr Donoghue (being a person other than a visitor for these purposes: see s 1(2)) in respect of his having suffered a broken neck by reason of the danger posed by the presence of the grid piles below the waterline. That question is to be answered by applying the tests set out in s 1(3). It is only if the answer is 'Yes, Folkestone Properties did owe him a duty in respect of the risk posed by the submerged grid piles' that one must then move on to s 1(4) to ascertain, in the language of s 1(1), what that duty is.

[74] Like Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR, I have not been able to detect with any clarity any common ratio in the judgments of the majority of this court in Tomlinson v Congleton BC [2002] EWCA Civ 309, [2003] 3 All ER 1122, [2003] 2 WLR 1120. If Sedley LJ had said that he agreed with the analysis contained in Ward LJ's judgment, we would have been bound by that analysis, however much we might disagree with it. But I do not know the route by which Sedley LJ concluded that the defendants owed Mr Tomlinson a duty in the circumstances of that case, or why he considered that they were in breach of that duty. His short judgment was concerned with other matters.

[75] The law protects people from foreseeable harm in at least two distinct ways. For instance it may, by regulation, require the occupier of dangerous premises or the owner of dangerous machinery to provide fencing or guardrails or warning notices or other safety devices to protect people from risk of injury. Or it may, according to the genius of the common law, ask whether a particular defendant owed a particular injured person a legal duty in the circumstances in which he met with his injury. If he did, it will ask what that duty was, and whether it was breached before going on to consider questions of causation and foreseeability and the amount of any recoverable damages.

[76] Usually judges and lawyers do not have to pause very long in the early stages of this analysis. The driver of a motor car, for example, owes a duty of care to those who may be foreseeably injured by his driving of the car, and if he drives his car carelessly and someone gets injured as a result, then there are the makings of a legal claim. But in more unusual contexts, where these questions are to be answered by reference to common law tests, the inquiry will always be fact specific. In Haley v London Electricity Board [1964] 3 All ER 185, [1965] AC 778 the House of Lords held that electricity undertakers owed a duty of care to blind persons as a class when they excavated a trench along a pavement in a London suburb because blind people foreseeably walk along pavements. The content of the duty was also fact specific, founded on the principle that such undertakers were entitled to assume that blind people would take reasonable care to protect themselves, for example by using a stick to ascertain if there was anything in the way. Unlike the maker of a statutory regulation, who legislates to provide protection against a number of different risks, the common law examines the factual situation in the particular case before undertaking the necessary inquiry as to liability.

[77] In the present case Mr Donoghue dived into the inner harbour in the early hours of Saturday, 27 December 1997. Section 1(3) of the 1984 Act compels us to focus on that factual situation, which has nothing to do with the circumstances in which children swam or dived in the harbour at high tide on a sunny August bank holiday weekend. Although the defendants were aware of the danger posed by the presence of the grid piles under the waterline, the judge made the unchallenged findings, adverse to Mr Donoghue, which Lord Phillips MR has recited (at [24], above). On these facts, therefore, the claim fails a at the hurdle imposed by s 1(3)(b) of the 1984 Act and I, too, would allow the appeal.

[78] In the circumstances it is not necessary to say much about s 1(3)(c). In the modern law of negligence, which postdates the enactment of the 1984 Act, we are accustomed to ask ourselves whether it is fair, just and reasonable for the law to impose the duty contended for. In the context of this statutory scheme

b Parliament has in essence declared that it is fair and just to impose a duty if the requirements of s 1(3)(a) and (b) are satisfied. When courts decide, on the facts of a particular case, whether the risk is one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, an occupier might reasonably be expected to offer a trespasser some protection, they would do well to refer to the passage in the 1976 Law Commission report which I have quoted at [72], above. I can see no evidence that

c in 1984 Parliament intended to alter the general philosophy of the law relating to trespassers which the House of Lords articulated in differing terms in Herrington's case. The mischief the 1984 Act was enacted to remedy was the one identified by the Law Commission at the start of its report (see [70], above), and nothing more.

d LAWS LJ.

[79] I agree with both judgments.

Appeal allowed.

Occupier's liability – Common duty of care – Nature of duty – Reasonable care – Lake open to the public – Occupier posting notices prohibiting swimming – Occupier aware of further steps which could minimise likelihood of swimming – Claimant running into lake, diving, and suffering injury – Whether occupier having taken such care as in all the circumstances was reasonable to see that claimant would be reasonably safe – Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, s 2. d

The defendants owned, occupied and managed a public park. In the park was a lake formed from a disused sand extraction pit. The lake had sandy beaches and was a popular recreational venue where yachting, sub-aqua diving and other regulated activities were permitted, but swimming was not. Notices reading 'Dangerous water: no swimming' were posted but they had little or no effect. The unauthorised use of the lake and the increasing possibility of an accident was of concern to the defendants. A plan to landscape the shores and plant over the beaches from which people swam had been approved, but work had begun only shortly before 6 May 1995. On that date the claimant went to the lake. He ran into the water and dived, striking his head on the sandy bottom with sufficient force to cause him an injury which resulted in paralysis from the neck downward. He brought proceedings for damages claiming that the defendants, as occupiers, owed him the common duty of care set out in s 2(2)^a of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, which was a duty to take such care as in all the circumstances was reasonable to see that a visitor would be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he was permitted to be there. At trial it was conceded that he had seen and ignored the warning signs so that when he entered the water he had ceased to be at the park for purposes for which he had been invited and permitted by the defendants to be there, and had accordingly ceased to be a visitor and had become a trespasser. As such he was owed a lesser duty of care under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. The judge found against the claimant, holding inter alia that the danger and risk of injury were obvious, and that an occupier was not under a duty to warn against such a risk. The claimant appealed. The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed his appeal, holding that the gravity of the risk of injury, the frequency with which park users came to be exposed to the risk, the failure of warning signs to curtail the extent to which the risk was being run and the attractiveness of the location led to the conclusion that e
g
h
j

^a Section 2, so far as material, is set out at [6], below

- a the occupiers were reasonably to be expected to offer some protection against the risks of entering the water. The posting of notices, shown to be ineffective, had therefore not been enough to discharge the duty. The authorities should have carried out the landscaping and planting which had been recommended to them. The defendants appealed.
- b Held – The majority of the Court of Appeal appeared to have proceeded on the oversimplified basis that if there had been a foreseeable risk of serious injury the defendants had been under a duty to do what was necessary to prevent it. Even assuming that the circumstances of the instant case were such that a duty had been owed to a lawful visitor under s 2(2) of the 1957 Act, and that there had been a risk attributable to the state of the premises rather than to the acts of the claimant, the question of what amounted to ‘such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable’ depended not only on the likelihood that someone might be injured and the seriousness of the injury which might occur, but also on the social value of the activity which gave rise to the risk and the cost of preventative measures. Those factors had to be balanced against each other. It would be extremely rare for an occupier of land to be under a duty to prevent people from taking risks which were inherent in the activities they freely chose to undertake upon the land. He would be entitled to impose conditions prohibiting risky activities, as the defendants had done in the instant case by prohibiting swimming. But the law did not require him to do so. There was an important question of freedom at stake. It would be unjust if the harmless recreation of responsible people upon the beaches were prohibited in order to comply with what was thought to be a legal duty to safeguard irresponsible visitors against dangers which were perfectly obvious. That such people took no notice of warnings could not create a duty to take other steps to protect them. Local authorities and other occupiers of land were ordinarily under no duty to incur such social and financial costs as had been incurred in the instant case to protect a minority, or even a majority, against obvious dangers. Accordingly, in the instant case, even if swimming had not been prohibited, and the defendants had owed a duty under s 2(2) of the 1957 Act, that duty would not have required them to have taken any steps to prevent the claimant from diving or warning him against dangers that were perfectly obvious. It followed that there could have been no duty owed under the 1984 Act. The appeal would therefore be allowed (see [1], [34], [40]–[42], [45], [46], [48], [50]–[52], [65], [83], [84], [94], below (House of Lords judgment)).

Appeal

The claimant, John Peter Tomlinson, appealed from the decision of Jack J on 21 March 2001 in the Manchester District Registry holding (i) that the defendants, Congleton Borough Council and Cheshire County Council, were not liable for

- a damages for breach of their duty of care under s 1 of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 to the claimant who had suffered accidental injury as a trespasser in a park which the defendants together owned, occupied and managed; and (ii) that the claimant's contributory negligence amounted to a proportion of two-thirds. The facts are set out in the judgment of Ward LJ.

- c
- 14 March 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

WARD LJ.

- d [1] This appeal concerns an accident with very severe consequences which happened on 6 May 1995 to the claimant, John Tomlinson. He was 18 years old at the time and he was one of many hundreds of people who regularly went to Brereton Heath Park near Congleton in Cheshire. The park was owned and occupied by the borough council (the first defendant) and managed for them by the county council (the second defendant). They have resolved their initial
- e differences and now defend jointly as occupiers.

- [2] The centrepiece of the park is a lake. It is not a natural mere but a disused quarry, about 40 feet deep at its deepest point towards which the shore shelves at varying degrees. It was an extremely popular venue where yachting, sub-aqua diving and other regulated activities were permitted, but swimming and diving
- f were not. The prohibition was made clear by notices reading 'DANGEROUS WATER: NO SWIMMING', which had little or no effect. A succession of disclosed internal documents, to which I shall have to refer in detail later, shows the local authorities to have been fully alive to this and the need to do what they could about it. A scheme was in fact developed to plant the shores from which people swam with vegetation which would make them inaccessible, but by the
- g date of the accident the budgetary bids for the relatively modest cost of doing this work had been repeatedly turned down. Since the accident, planting has been carried out and has proved effective.

- [3] May 6 1995 was the Saturday of a bank holiday weekend and a hot day. The claimant went there after work with some friends in the early afternoon. He
- h went in and out of the water, like others, to cool off, diving or plunging within his depth. At one point of the afternoon Mr Tomlinson dived from a standing position in water which came no higher than his mid-thigh. Somehow—it has never become clear how, but the judge saw no reason to attribute it to a submerged object—Mr Tomlinson struck his head with sufficient force to drive
- j his fifth cervical vertebra into the spinal canal. The injury paralysed him from the neck down, and in the time since he has made only a limited recovery of the use of his hands and arms.

[4] His case against the local authorities is that as occupiers it was their breach of their duty of care towards him which was the cause of his accident. Their case is that the risk of danger was, as he knew, an obvious one and he willingly accepted it.

[5] Jack J, who tried the issue of liability in Manchester on 21 March 2001, set out the history in careful detail. At the end of it he said:

'I conclude this section by noting that there was nothing about the mere at Brereton Heath which made it any more dangerous than any other ordinary stretch of open water in England. Swimming and diving carry their own risks. So, if the mere at Brereton was to be described as a danger, it was only because it attracted swimming and diving, which activities carry a risk.'

[6] As to the occurrence of the accident, the judge found:

'Mr Tomlinson waded into the water until it was a little above his knees, probably at or no deeper than mid-thigh level. He could not see the bottom. He then threw himself forward in a dive or plunge. He intended it to be a shallow dive. But it went wrong. He went deeper than he intended. His head struck the sandy bottom ... I am satisfied that he did not dive towards the shore, and I am satisfied that he did not jump into the air and then jack-knife to do a vertical dive ... Mr Tomlinson said that he was a strong swimmer. It appeared from his evidence that he did not have much experience of diving. Somehow on this occasion he just got it wrong, with tragic results. He might have been saved by his arms, had they been outstretched in front of him, but somehow he was not.'

[7] The judge's findings, which have not been challenged on this appeal, that the claimant had seen and ignored the signs meant that when he entered the water, he ceased to be at the park for the purposes for which he was invited and permitted by the defendants to be there. He accordingly ceased to be a visitor and became a trespasser. As such, he was owed not the common duty of care under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 but the duty contained in s 1 of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. That Act, replacing the accretion of common law rules, provides by s 1:

'Duty of occupier to persons other than his visitors.—(1) The rules enacted by this section shall have effect, in place of the rules of the common law, to determine—(a) whether any duty is owed by a person as occupier of premises to persons other than his visitors in respect of any risk of their suffering injury on the premises by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them; and (b) if so, what that duty is.

(2) For the purposes of this section, the persons who are to be treated respectively as an occupier of any premises (which, for those purposes, include any fixed or movable structure) and as his visitors are—(a) any person who owes in relation to the premises the duty referred to in section 2 of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 (the common duty of care), and (b) those who are his visitors for the purposes of that duty.

(3) An occupier of premises owes a duty to another (not being his visitor) in respect of any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1) above if—(a) he is aware of the danger or has reasonable grounds to believe that it exists; (b) he knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other is in the vicinity of the danger concerned or that he may come into the vicinity of the danger (in either case, whether the other has lawful authority for being in that vicinity or not); and (c) the risk is one against which, in all the

a circumstances of the case, he may reasonably be expected to offer the other some protection.

(4) Where, by virtue of this section, an occupier of premises owes a duty to another in respect of such a risk, the duty is to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.

b (5) Any duty owed by virtue of this section in respect of a risk may, in an appropriate case, be discharged by taking such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to give warning of the danger concerned or to discourage persons from incurring the risk.

c (6) No duty is owed by virtue of this section to any person in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by that person (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another) ...

[8] Jack J found against the claimant. His essential conclusions were these:

d '[27] In his cross-examination Mr Tomlinson accepted that he knew that he should not dive in shallow water where he might hit the bottom. He accepted that he could not see the lake bed, that he assumed that it was sufficiently deep to dive without hitting the bed, and that he should have checked. These were important answers but in reality they were a necessary acceptance of the obvious. In short, Mr Tomlinson took a risk.

e [28] A duty arises by reason of s 1(3) of the 1984 Act if three matters are satisfied. First, there must be a risk of which the occupier was aware (or had reasonable grounds to believe existed). The risk here was not the risk of drowning through, for example, exhaustion or cramp, but the risk of injury through diving—which might include drowning consequent on a direct injury. The defendants were aware of this danger: I refer in particular to the two head injuries in 1992. The second is satisfied if the occupier knows that the claimant may come into the vicinity of the danger. That was the case here. The third is that, in all the circumstances of the case, the risk was one against which the occupier may reasonably be expected to offer the claimant some protection. It was submitted on behalf of the defendants that this was not satisfied. Where there is a duty, s 1(4) provides that it is to take such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances to give warning of the danger concerned or to discourage persons from incurring that risk. In the circumstances of this case at least, consideration of the third requirement under s 1(3) and consideration of the duty under s 1(4) cover much the same ground.

h [29] In my view the danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow were obvious. That is my conclusion on the evidence in the case. It concurs with the conclusions reached in the cases which I have cited. On the basis of Darby v National Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 189, [2001] PIQR P372 that is really the end of the matter. For the essence of that case—a 1957 Act case—and others is, in my view, that an occupier is not under a duty to warn against a risk which is obvious. But, if I take a step further and say that the history showed some protection was required because of the attractions of the lake, then I would hold that the signs were reasonable and sufficient steps to give warning of the danger and to discourage persons from incurring the risk. It can be said that despite the signs people continued to go into the water. That was a decision which they were free to make: they could choose to accept the risk. I do not think that the defendants' legal duty to the claimant in the circumstances required them to take the extreme measures which were completed after the accident involving the fencing off of the areas where people went into the water and the planting of the beaches with trees. I should add that I reject the submission that by putting the warning signs on the beaches the defendants were inviting swimming elsewhere. That is lacking in realism. If the water was dangerous off the beaches, it was plainly at least as dangerous elsewhere.

[30] I also consider that an alternative route to the answer in this case is under s 1(6). For, by diving as he did, Mr Tomlinson willingly accepted the risk involved ...

[34] Finally, if I am wrong and the defendants were in breach of duty to the claimant, the question of contributory negligence would arise. In my view, on the facts and circumstances which I have set out it would be appropriate to apportion the responsibility for the injury as to one-third to the defendants and two-thirds to the claimant. I do so on the basis that Mr Tomlinson dived in very shallow water, knowing of the notices warning of the danger.'

[9] Mr Braithwaite QC, having taken this court through the authorities which Jack J had considered in detail, and having drawn attention to the way the dangers had been considered by the authorities, submitted that if Jack J's decision was right, an occupier's liability is discharged simply by the display of notices even where the locus is a public resort, where it is perceptible that the notices do not have the required effect, and where alternative measures which will be effective are manifest but are not undertaken. The duty, he submits, was to do what was practicable to prevent the occurrence of accidents, not merely to warn people that they might occur. As to contributory negligence, he submits that no more than one third of the blame can properly rest upon the claimant.

[10] Mr Machell QC submits that in the circumstances found by the judge the defendants owed the claimant no duty; or that if they did, it was discharged by the display of warning notices. He relies in particular upon the judge's finding that there was nothing about this lake which made it more dangerous than any other stretch of open water, and that the risk of injury from diving where the lake was shallow was obvious. This was not a case where an unpredictable declivity in the lake bed had caused a child to lose its footing and drown (which, Mr Machell accepted, would have attracted liability): this was a case of an adult choosing to dive into shallow water.

[11] Mr Braithwaite meets this argument initially by submitting that the judge has adopted two erroneous premises in reaching his conclusion. He has expressly treated the lake as no more dangerous than any other ordinary open stretch of water, when the chief reason for keeping swimmers out was precisely that it was treacherous underfoot. And he has taken the risk to be not the generalised risk that anybody entering the water might, albeit in a possibly unpredictable way, have a nasty accident, but as the specific risk of injury through diving. If so, he argues, the conclusion must be arrived at afresh by this court on a correct factual and legal basis.

[12] Like the judge, we have reviewed various authorities. I must deal with them, albeit shortly. The first is Staples v West Dorset DC (1995) 93 LGR 536. There the plaintiff was crouching on a plainly visible dark layer of the algae-covered slope of the harbour wall to which the public had access as a promenade. He a slipped and suffered serious injury. His claim was brought under the Occupier's Liability Act 1957 and he contended that the council ought to have erected a sign warning that the cobb was slippery particularly when wet. Kennedy LJ with whom the other members of the court agreed held (at 541):

b 'It is, in my judgment, of significance that the duty is a duty owed by the occupier to the individual visitor, so that it can only be said that there was a duty to warn if without a warning the visitor in question would have been unaware of the nature and extent of the risk. As the statute makes clear, there may be circumstances in which even an explicit warning will not absolve the occupier from liability (see section 4(a) above); but if the danger is obvious, the visitor is able to appreciate it, he is not under any kind of pressure and he is free to do what is necessary for his own safety, then no warning is required.'

One should, however, not pass from the judgment without noting Kennedy LJ's further comment (at 544):

d 'Of course, after the accident the position was different. The district council then knew that a visitor had slipped off the edge into the sea, and, as responsible occupiers, they had to do what they could to prevent a recurrence, so they posted warning notices. The fact that they took that action after the accident does not enable me to draw the inference that, in order to discharge the common duty of care to the plaintiff, they should have done so before the accident occurred.'

[13] Whyte v Redland Aggregates Ltd [1997] CA Transcript 2034 is an unreported decision of this court handed down on 27 November 1997. The plaintiff hit his head when diving into the water in a disused gravel pit owned by the defendants. Again it was a case on the common duty of care under the 1957 Act. The plaintiff's complaints were that the occupiers had failed to find out about the uneven state of the bottom of the pit and had failed to give proper warnings as to the danger. There had been no previous accidents. Hirst LJ dismissed the appeal after an analysis of the facts. Henry LJ agreed but added this:

g 'In my judgment, the occupier of land containing or bordered by the river, the seashore, the pond or the gravel pit, does not have to warn of uneven surfaces below the water. Such surfaces are by their nature quite likely to be uneven. Diving where you cannot see the bottom clearly enough to know that it is safe to dive is dangerous unless you have made sure, by reconnaissance or otherwise that diving is safe ie that there is adequate depth at the place where you choose to dive. In those circumstances, the dangers of there being an uneven surface in an area where you cannot plainly see the bottom are too plain to require a specific warning and, accordingly, there is no such duty to warn ...'

j Harman J added pungently:

'There is far too much open water in this island where riparian owners are private citizens for a duty of such a wide general nature to be easily imposed by the law.'

[14] Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670 concerned an inebriated student ignoring all clear warnings, climbing over a locked gate and diving more steeply into the shallow end of the pool than he intended. Giving a judgment with which the other members of the court agreed Stuart-Smith LJ said (at 681 (para 37)): a

‘Even if the defendants knew or had reasonable grounds to believe that students might defy the prohibition on use of the pool and climb over the not insignificant barrier of the wall or gate, it does not seem to me that they were under any duty to warn the plaintiff against diving into too shallow water, a risk of which any adult would be aware and which the plaintiff, as one would expect, admitted that he was aware. Had there been some hidden obstruction in the form of an extraneous object in the pool or a dangerous spike, of which the defendants were aware, the position might have been different.’ b

Stuart-Smith LJ added two other pertinent comments. First he said (at 680 (para 35)): ‘... it is important to identify the risk or danger concerned since the occupier had to have knowledge of it, or reasonable grounds to believe it exists: section 1(3)(a).’ He later said (at 683 (para 44)): c

‘The duty, if any, is owed to the individual trespasser, though he may be a member of a class that the occupier knows or has reasonable grounds to believe is in the vicinity of the danger. But the danger of and extent of what it is reasonable to expect of the occupier varies greatly depending on whether the trespasser is very young or very old and so may not appreciate the nature of the danger which is or ought to be apparent to an adult.’ d

[15] Bartrum v Hepworth Minerals and Chemicals Ltd (29 October 1999, unreported) is a decision of Turner J. The claimant dived from a ledge on a cliff and struck his head on the bottom of an old quarry. There was a history of swimming accidents and signs warning against swimming were being ignored. Turner J held that the danger of not diving far enough out from the cliff to enter the deep water was so obvious to any adult that it was not reasonably to be expected of the defendants that they would offer any protection. Even if there was a duty, a sign warning ‘NO SWIMMING’ was— e

‘authoritative for the proposition that people were not expected to swim in that lake, whether they entered it by walking or wading, or by jumping or diving; the greater must, it seems to me, include the less.’ f

[16] The latest swimming case is Darby v National Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 189, [2001] PIQR P372. The claim was brought under the 1957 Act. There were no warning signs. A little unusually leading counsel and junior counsel for the claimant put forward different propositions. Leading counsel accepting the difficulty that the risk of death by drowning was foreseeable submitted that the warning should have included a warning against the possibility of contracting Weil’s disease. Junior counsel submitted there was no proper correlation between the risk of swimming in the sea and of swimming in that particular pond. The Court of Appeal did not agree with him. May LJ said (at [27]): g

‘It cannot be the duty of the owner of every stretch of coastline to have notices warning of the dangers of swimming in the sea. If it were so, the coast would have to be littered with notices in places other than those where there are known to be special dangers which are not obvious. The same would apply to all inland lakes and reservoirs. In my judgment there was no duty on the National Trust on the facts of this case to warn against h a swimming in this pond where the dangers of drowning were no other or greater than those which were quite obvious to any adult such as the unfortunate deceased.'

[17] When giving permission to appeal Henry LJ drew attention to some obiter comments of Simon Brown LJ in Scott v Associated British Ports, Swainger v Associated British Ports [2000] All ER (D) 1937 at [20], a decision of the Court of Appeal, to the effect that:

b '... let us postulate (contrary to the facts) that the defendants here had known full well that dozens of youngsters in the 13 to 15 age group routinely surfed on their rails in the manner of these appellants, and that a simple fence would have been wholly effective in eliminating this practice. Could it really then be said that they were under no duty to erect such a fence; or, indeed, that a youth who came to be injured whilst surfing had accepted the risk and therefore was owed no duty of care? I hardly think so. For my part, indeed, I would recognise that on certain facts a comparable duty would be owed by occupiers to trespassers who they know are consciously imperilling themselves on their land to that owed by police or prison officers to those known to be of suicidal tendency in their care: see Reeves v Metropolitan Police Comr [1999] 3 All ER 897, [2000] 1 AC 360. All that, however, is for another day and another case.'

e [18] Mr Braithwaite did rely also on Jebson v Ministry of Defence [2000] 1 WLR 2055 but I do not find the authority helpful as it concerns a duty of care as carriers to passengers being carried in an army lorry. The case is, however, convenient for its citation of a passage in the speech of Lord Steyn in Jolley v Sutton London BC [2000] 3 All ER 409 at 416, [2000] 1 WLR 1082 at 1089:

f 'Two general observations are, however, appropriate. First, in this corner of the law the results of decided cases are inevitably very fact sensitive. Both counsel nevertheless at times invited your Lordships to compare the facts of the present case with the facts of other decided cases. That is a sterile exercise. Precedent is a valuable stabilising influence in our legal system. But, comparing the facts of an outcomes of cases in this branch of the law is a misuse of the only proper use of precedent, namely to identify the relevant rule to apply to the facts as found.'

I respectfully agree.

h [19] In that search for principle, I have found it useful to trace the development of the law. The extreme position was taken by Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358 at 365, [1929] All ER Rep 1 at 4 which established the rule that an occupier was only liable to a trespasser if he did 'some act ... with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the trespasser, or at least some act done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser'. The harshness of that rule was ameliorated by British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877 which discarded the Addie test and substituted a test, variously expressed, but usually summed up as the test of 'common humanity'. That prompted the Law Commission's inquiries and their report on Liability for Damage or Injury to Trespassers and Related Questions of Occupiers' Liability (Law Com no 75) (Cmnd 6428) was presented in March 1976. The Law Commission proposed steering a path between extending the common duty of care to trespassers and treating trespassing as an activity to be undertaken at the trespasser's risk with there being no duty on the occupier to make his land safe for persons whom the occupier did not desire to be present on his land at all. The result was the 1984 Act, the terms of which I have already recited.

[20] Since the 1984 Act defines when an occupier of premises owes a duty to another, and if so what the standard of care is, it is in my view essential to use the Act as a template for judgment in each and every case. I do not wish to suggest that the decisions in the cases I have recited are wrong but I have found it useful to warn myself that a finding that a risk was obvious is a statement of a conclusion, not the application of a principle. For the principle one must look to the 1984 Act. It is a staged process.

[21] The first stage under s 1(1) is to identify the risk and the danger. The risk is expressed to be to persons other than visitors suffering injury on the premises by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises (or to things done or omitted to be done on them). In this case there was a risk of injury being suffered by anyone entering the water because of the dangers due to the state of the premises, the premises being constituted by the configuration and contents of this pond created as it was from a disused sand-extraction pit. There was a risk of injury through drowning because of the dangers, among others, of the effect of cold water, being caught in weed, being stuck in the mud or plunging unexpectedly into deep water. There was the risk of injury through diving because of the dangers of diving too steeply in shallow water or into an obstruction. There may have been risks of other injury from other dangers, eg Weil's disease. These risks of injury arose as soon as one entered the water because one did not know what danger lurked, or where it lay hidden. The exact nature of the hazard may not much matter in the particular circumstances of this case.

[22] The next stage is to determine whether or not a duty was owed by the occupier. That question depends solely upon whether the three criteria of s 1(3) are satisfied.

[23] The first is whether the occupier was aware of the danger. Here that is beyond question. But a few of the records will suffice to indicate the extent of the defendants' knowledge. The Brereton Heath Management Advisory Group was established in January 1983. At the end of its first year the minutes of 21 November 1983 record that: 'The risk of a fatality to swimmers was stressed and agreed by all.' A water safety site visit of 11 May 1990 recorded:

'Many instances of swimming during hot spells. During such times up to 2,000 people are present with as many as 100 in the water ... Extensive "beach" areas are popular with families ... Not unnaturally many will venture into the water for a swim.

Hazards.

(iii) Long history of swimming activity here (a "known" spot for swimming).'

An accident was recorded on 19 May 1992 when a man dived into the lake and 'hit head on something'. The following week a person was pulled unconscious from the lake and had to be resuscitated. The management committee reported on 9 June 1992:

'The lake acts as a magnet to the public and has become heavily used for swimming in spite of a no swimming policy due to safety considerations. As a a result of the general flaunting [sic] of the policy [to ban swimming] there have been a number of near fatalities in the lake with three incidents requiring hospital treatment in the week around Whitsun. Whilst the rangers are doing all they can to protect the public it is likely to be only a matter of time before someone drowns.'

b [24] On 23 July 1992 the leisure services department wrote:

c 'To provide a facility that is open to the public and which contains beach and water areas is, in my view, an open invitation and temptation to swim and engage in other waters-edge activities despite the cautionary note that is struck by deterrent notices etc., and in that type of situation accidents become inevitable.'

d The Cheshire Water Safety Committee meeting on 5 October 1993 noted that: 'The site has a history of near drownings.' In a resolution put to the borough council on 21 November 1999 it was noted that: 'We have on average three or four near drownings every year and it is only a matter of time before someone dies.' The claimant suffered his injuries six months later.

e [25] The second criterion to establish whether a duty is owed is provided by s 1(3)(b), namely that the occupier knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other person is in the vicinity of the danger concerned. Again this has not been in dispute. The minutes I have cited establish that and there is more to like effect. It is quite clear that the park was a very popular venue and despite all efforts to impose the ban on swimming, it was known to the defendants that many entered the water and were in the vicinity of the dangers concerned.

f [26] The third, and in this case crucial, requirement laid down by s 1(3)(c) is whether the risk was one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, the occupiers might reasonably be expected to offer the trespasser some protection.

g Analysing that, the protection is against any such risk as is referred to in sub-s (1), the risk, that is, of the trespasser suffering injury by reason of the dangers lurking in the mere. The protection we are looking for is 'some protection'. The question is whether some protection might reasonably be expected to be offered. The question is not whether reasonable protection is to be expected. To frame the question that way is to fail to distinguish between the establishing of the duty under s 1(3) and the standard of care necessary to satisfy the duty which is provided by s 1(4). These are distinct and separate requirements and I am concerned that the judge may have failed to keep them separate and distinct when he said:

h '[28] ... In the circumstances of this case at least, consideration of the third requirement under s 1(3) and the consideration of the duty under s 1(4) cover much the same ground ...

i [29] In my view the danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow were obvious ... an occupier is not under a duty to warn against a risk which is obvious.'

[27] There is a further important phrase in s 1(3)(c): the question is whether some protection might reasonably be expected to be offered 'in all the circumstances of the case'. This serves to emphasise Lord Steyn's observation that cases are 'inevitably very fact sensitive' (see [18], above).

[28] The circumstances of this case are that Brereton Heath Park has for years been a well-known and well-used leisure attraction. The minutes show that in 1992 160,000 people used the park during the year. During a hot spell 2,000 people were present with as many as 100 in the water. The lake was a magnet to the public and the sandy beaches an invitation to swim. Of major concern to the occupiers was the unauthorised use of the lake and the increasing possibility of an accident. As minutes of the advisory group held as long ago as 17 March 1988 record:

‘On busy days the overwhelming numbers make it impossible to control this use (swimming and the use of rubber boats) of the lake, and it is difficult to see how the situation can change unless the whole concept of managing the park and the lake is revised.’

[29] In discharge of the common duty of care owed to the visitors under the Occupiers’ Liability Act 1957, the authorities placed prominently signs which forbade swimming and warned of the ‘dangerous water’. In entering the water against that prohibition, the claimant made himself a trespasser to whom a different duty was now owed. If the words on the noticeboard ‘NO SWIMMING’ qualified the use he was permitted to make of the facility, do the other words above or below that, ‘DANGEROUS WATER’ constitute some protection against the risk of injury if the person decides to take a swim? I think that maybe too narrow a view of a warning notice which serves a composite purpose of turning a visitor into a trespasser and also warning him of a danger. But this case does not rest there. The misuse of the facility, the extent of the unauthorised swimming, the history of accidents and the perceived risk of fatality was noted and acted upon by the occupiers over many years. They did not, as may have been the fact in some of the other decided cases, treat the notice as sufficient to discharge any duty that might be owed. Here the authorities employed rangers whose duty it was to give oral warnings against swimming albeit that this met with mixed success and sometimes attracted abuse for their troubles. In addition to the oral warnings, the rangers would hand out safety leaflets which warned of the variable depth in the pond, the cold, the weeds, the absence of rescue services, waterborne diseases and the risk of accidents occurring. It seems to me that the rangers’ patrols and advice and the handing out of these leaflets reinforced the ineffective message on the sign and constituted ‘some protection’ in fact given and reasonably expected to be offered in the circumstances of this case. Congleton Beach, as the place was also known, was as alluring to ‘macho’ young men as other dangerous places were to young children. In my judgment the gravity of the risk of injury, the frequency with which those using the park came to be exposed to the risk, the failure of warning signs to curtail the extent to which the risk was being run, indeed the very fact that the attractiveness of the beach and the lake acted as a magnet to draw so many into the cooling waters, all that leads me to the conclusion that the occupiers were reasonably to be expected to offer some protection against the risks of entering the water. It follows that in my judgment the defendants were under a duty to the claimant.

[30] The standard of care is defined by s 1(4). It is—

‘to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.’

By now the focus has to be on the duty owed to the individual claimant whereas at the earlier stages of the inquiry it was probably more accurate to think of the duty owed to the claimant as a member of a class of persons, young or old,

- a nefariously on the premises or using them to the occupier's knowledge, if not with his permission. The Law Commission rejected the invitation to give guidelines for determining what may reasonably be expected of an occupier. I should do likewise. Whilst, therefore, this does not pretend to be a checklist, it is obvious that among the facts and circumstances which inevitably will have to be taken into account—and this is not an exhaustive list by any means—the court
- b will have regard to the age and character of the claimant, the nature and purpose of the trespassory entry on the premises, the extent to which any protective steps which were taken had proved to have been inadequate, the difficulty or ease with which steps could be taken to reduce or eliminate the danger and the question of the cost of taking those precautions balanced against the gravity of the risks of injury. Once again the key words are 'reasonable in all the circumstances of the case'.
- c

- [31] Before looking at the matter generally, the question under s 1(5) arises first. Is this an appropriate case where the duty can be said to have been discharged by the warnings given of the danger concerned and the discouragement to persons from incurring the risk of injury from that danger? Subsection (5)
- d expressly recognises that the giving of a warning 'may, in an appropriate case' discharge the duty. It follows that a warning does not necessarily or inevitably discharge the duty. In the time-honoured phrase, it must all be a matter of fact and degree. That, in my judgment, is the weakness of the judgment under appeal. The judge found that the risk was obvious, which means no more than that the claimant acknowledged the inevitable, namely that diving into water
- e where one cannot see the bottom creates the risk that one will dive too steeply and so suffer injury. That may be a sufficient answer in many cases, perhaps even most cases. But here the history both of the danger and of the exposure to it drove the authorities inevitably, and rightly, to the conclusion that warnings were not working. The authorities were inviting public use of this amenity
- f knowing that the water was a siren call strong enough to turn stout men's minds. In my judgment the posting of notices, shown to be ineffective, was not enough to discharge the duty.

- [32] The next question is whether the claimant willingly accepted as his the risk of his suffering injury from the dangers concerned. There are, in my judgment, two answers to this. The first is that the claimant did not freely and voluntarily accept the risk. For the defence to succeed it must be shown that he had full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran and impliedly agreed to incur it. I accept the submission made on the claimant's behalf that he made an assumption which was erroneous that it was safe to dive. He did not know that the water where he dived was so shallow and the dive he made so
- g steep that he would be injured. There were risks in general but he thought that what he did was safe. He did not freely and voluntarily wish the injury on himself. The second point is that if the duty on the defendants was to take reasonable steps to prevent the claimant from diving into the mere, then the defendants concede that they could not seek to argue that in diving into the mere
- h the claimant voluntarily assumed the risk of injury attendant upon such act. I have identified the risk of injury to be the risk of entering the water but, in agreement with Turner J (at [15], above), the greater includes the less and consequently upon entering the water there is a risk of diving into it.
- j

[33] The crucial question is, therefore, whether there was a breach by the defendants of the duty owed to the claimant. What care was it reasonable in all the circumstances of this case for the authorities to take to see that the claimant did not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned? The defendants' own documents provide the answer. The recommendation after a water safety site visit on 11 May 1990 was: a

'The creation of beach areas is a great encouragement for people to indulge in beach-type activities and this includes swimming. Suggest cutting down on beach area by increasing reed zones.'

[34] Dealing with water safety in Cheshire, a meeting on 25 May 1990 noted that precautions against the hazards of swimming included introducing reed beds in littoral zones and planting shrubs on the littoral zone. It was said that precautions which could easily be implemented should be undertaken with immediate effect. b

[35] On 7 December 1992 the minutes of the Congleton countryside progress meeting reveal that the estates department was being asked for a plan and costings for covering the beach areas. c

[36] When the rangers met on 19 January 1994 the borough council's area service manager stated that a decision had been taken by the council to remove the beaches; that £10,000 had been allocated for that purpose but that the proposal had not been activated because of financial restraint. At the same time Mr Tyler-Jones, the chairman of the Cheshire Water Safety Committee was reporting that his major recommendation to remove the beaches had not been carried out. Later in March he recommended a reputable landscape architect to advise on suitable plant species to reclaim the water margins. The Brereton Heath Park Management Advisory Group were told in July 1994 that the 1994/95 bid for landscaping the beaches had been rejected but there was the possibility of money being left at the end of the year to do one beach at a time. The following month, on 10 August, 'all agreed on the urgency to take action to landscape the beaches to deter swimming'. In putting forward a recommendation to cover the beach with soil and planting the margin of the water with reeds and other aquatic plants at a capital cost of £15,000 it was stated that: d

'We have on average three or four near drownings every year and it is only a matter of time before someone dies. The recommendation from the National Water Safety Committee, endorsed by County Councils is that something must now be done to reduce the "beach areas" both in size and attractiveness. If nothing is done about this and someone dies the borough council is likely to be held liable and would have to accept responsibility.'

At a meeting of the community services committee of the borough council on 21 November the general capital programme for 1995/1996 allocated £5,000 for safety improvements to the Brereton Heath Country Park. The work of covering the beach with topsoil and planting the beaches began shortly before this accident. e

[37] In my judgment the defendants, prudent and responsible as they showed themselves to be, came under a duty to the claimant to carry out the landscaping and planting that was recommended in the minutes I have recited. The carrying out of the work presented no practical problems and if carried out was likely to prove to be and in fact did turn out to be an effective deterrent to swimming in the mere. The expense, be it £5,000 or £15,000, was not excessive, especially having regard to the serious risk of injury from the accident that was waiting to happen. f a [38] It follows that in my judgment the defendants were in breach of a duty they owed the claimant to take reasonable care to see that he did not suffer injury at the country park by reason of the dangers which awaited those who entered the water for a swim.

b [39] The final question is the extent to which the court thinks it just and equitable that the damages recoverable be reduced having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage. The judge would have assessed his contribution at two-thirds, an apportionment Mr Machell supports whereas Mr Braithwaite submits the proportions be reversed: one-third to the claimant, two-thirds to the defendants. The claimant knew he should not enter the water and he took some risk. The defendants knew that someone was bound to do just that sooner or later and that comparatively simple remedial steps c would absolve them from responsibility. If the matter had been left to my judgment, I would have held that the relative share of blameworthiness and the relative importance of the acts and omissions in causing this damage fell equally on claimant and defendants. However, this court is always loath to interfere with an assessment of contributory negligence even where the judge expressed his d conclusions from the difficult position that he had already found against the claimant. Since Sedley and Longmore LJ, whose judgments I have been able to read in draft, would not interfere with the judge's apportionment, I recognise that my views should not be imposed.

e [40] I do not pretend to have found this case easy. My views have swung one way and the other. That admitted, I am satisfied now that the appeal must be allowed and the matter must be remitted to the High Court for the assessment of damages to be reduced by two-thirds for the claimant's contributory negligence.

SEDLEY LJ.

f [41] I agree with Ward LJ that this appeal should be allowed. But because I have read Longmore LJ's judgment in favour of dismissing the appeal, I add some brief reasoning of my own.

g [42] I do not consider that it is appropriate to reason out a claim like the present one from its consequences. If the logic of our decision is that other public lakes and ponds require similar precautions to those which were lacking at Brereton Heath, so be it. But negligence is fact-specific, and we are able neither to determine what the occupiers' duties are in other places nor to predicate our decision on what its effect on those occupiers might be. We are creating no duty and no standard of care which is not already laid down by Parliament. Our task, like that of the trial judge, is simply to apply a general law to specific facts.

h [43] The other matter to which Longmore LJ draws attention is the particularity of the hazard to which the claimant fell prey. It is, I agree, an apparent oddity that a person who is injured by diving into shallow water—a pretty obvious hazard—should be able to claim the benefit of precautions which in reality were needed in order to stop people losing their footing where the lake bed shelved steeply or becoming entangled in thick weeds. But there are two j separate answers, one relating to the obviousness of the hazard, the other to its nature.

[44] As to the nature of the hazard, it was rightly not argued by the defendants that this could make the difference between liability and no liability in the present case. It is well settled by authority that if there is a duty to protect people against foreseeable injury, it does not matter if the accident which happens was not itself foreseeable, so long as it is not in an entirely different league: see Hughes v Lord

Advocate [1963] 1 All ER 705, [1963] AC 837 and Smith v Leech Brain & Co Ltd [1961] 3 All ER 1159, [1962] 2 QB 405. a

[45] If primary liability is established, the obviousness of the hazard goes to contributory negligence; for it is only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability. Even so, in a gross case contributory negligence can approach one hundred per cent. This is not such a case, but it is a case in which the claimant did something which he was old enough to realise was stupid—not so much by entering the mere (everyone was doing that, and the defendants had failed to take reasonable measures to stop it) but by diving steeply from a standing position in a couple of feet of water. I see no reason to differ from Jack J's contingent assessment of the claimant's share of responsibility for his consequent misfortune as two-thirds. b

[46] The nub of the defendants' case was that the mere did not present any unusual or special risks at all. As to this, the logic of Ward LJ's judgment seems to me compelling, and I do not need to add to it. I would accordingly allow the appeal and direct entry of judgment for one-third of the damages to be assessed. c

[47] One of the dangers of going for a swim in any stretch of water other than a dedicated swimming pool is that the swimmer may slip and injure himself. He may also quickly find himself out of his depth and be unable to cope; he may get cramp or be assailed by the coldness of the water and be unable to recover. All these are obvious dangers to anyone except a small and unaccompanied child. Another danger is that a swimmer may decide to dive into the water and hit his head on the bottom, if the water is too shallow; in my judgment that is an equally obvious danger and cannot provide a reason for saying that the owner or occupier of the water should be under any duty to take reasonable steps to prevent people swimming or diving in the relevant stretch of water. e

[48] The position would, of course, be different if the occupier knew of some concealed danger or some danger that was not obvious to people using the water. But in this case Jack J has held in terms that there was nothing about the mere at Brereton Heath which made it any more dangerous than any other ordinary stretch of open water in England. The judge thought (and I agree) that if there was a duty to take reasonable steps to prevent public access for the purpose of swimming at Brereton Heath, similar steps would have to be taken in relation to other stretches of open water in the country. f

[49] Mr John Tomlinson has suffered appalling injuries as a result of his unfortunate dive while enjoying the water on a warm May bank holiday weekend in 1995. Mr Braithwaite QC on his behalf has submitted that the mere at Brereton Heath was a special case different from other stretches of water because: (1) the heath was a managed site where the defendants encouraged the public to go to spend their leisure time; (2) the defendants knew that accidents were liable to happen (and, indeed, had happened on three previous occasions); and (3) the defendants were in the process of taking steps to eliminate injuries from swimming accidents in that they: (a) put up signs prohibiting swimming; and (b) when it became clear that the signs were being ignored, they were advised that the beaches on the mere should be fenced off and covered in vegetation but had not got round to doing this by the time of Mr Tomlinson's accident. g

[50] I do not consider that these factors either singly or together make the mere at Brereton Heath different from other stretches of open water. The fact that the defendants arranged and even promoted the site for leisure activity does h a not mean that they should have taken reasonable steps to prevent swimming unless they knew of any particular hazard. Even then it would probably be sufficient to give a warning in relation to that hazard. There was here no allegation or evidence of any particular hazard, beyond the ordinary hazards of swimming in open water.

b [51] The fact that during the defendants' management of the site three accidents had occurred to people swimming in the mere cannot of itself impose a duty of care since swimming in open stretches of water is often an inherently dangerous activity. It would only be if the number of accidents was significantly above the norm that any duty could arise and that would then be because it would be possible to conclude that there was a particular hazard in relation to the stretch of water (even if the hazard might not at first be easily identifiable).
c Likewise, the fact that a local authority may responsibly seek to deter or prevent swimming does not to my mind give rise to any duty to an individual member of the public or the public at large to take steps to prevent people swimming, unless there is a particular hazard (over and above the ordinary risks of swimming) about which the public should know.

d [52] I should add that, for myself, I would have reached the same conclusion even if the claimant had not conceded that he was a trespasser. I find it odd that if there is a general licence to the public to come to a park for leisure activities but there are notices which prohibit swimming, someone who enters the water intending to swim becomes a trespasser. At what point does he become a trespasser? When he starts to paddle, intending thereafter to swim? There was
e no evidence that Mr Tomlinson in fact swam at all. He dived from a position in which swimming was difficult, if not impossible. I would be troubled if the defendants' duty of care differed depending on the precise moment when a swim could be said to have begun.

f [53] For these reasons which are much the same as those given by this court in Darby v National Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 189, [2001] PIQR P372 it seems to me that this appeal should fail. It is noteworthy that the Supreme Court of Canada seems to have come to a similar conclusion in relation to a similar stretch of water in British Columbia (see Vancouver-Fraser Park District v Olmstead (1974) 51 DLR (3d) 416).

g [54] On contributory negligence, I would not interfere with the judge's apportionment.

Appeal allowed in part.

Appeal

The defendants appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 23 July 2002. The claimant cross-appealed, with permission of j the Appeal Committee given on 9 October 2002, as to quantum of contributory negligence.

Raymond Machell QC and Peter Burns (instructed by James Chapman & Co, Manchester) for the councils.

Bill Braithwaite QC and Gerard Martin QC (instructed by Paul Ross & Co, Manchester) for the claimant.

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons he gives, with which I agree, I would allow this appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

THE ACCIDENT

[2] My Lords, in rural south-east Cheshire the early May Bank Holiday weekend in 1995 was unseasonably hot. John Tomlinson, aged 18, had to work until midday on Saturday 6 May but then met some of his friends and drove them to Brereton Heath Country Park, between Holmes Chapel and Congleton. The park covers about 80 acres. In about 1980 Congleton Borough Council acquired the land, surrounding what was then a derelict sand quarry, and laid it out as a country park. Paths now run through woods of silver birch and in summer bright yellow brimstone butterflies flutter in grassy meadows. But the attraction of the park for John Tomlinson and his young friends was a 14-acre lake which had been created by flooding the old sand quarry. The sandy banks provided some attractive beaches and in hot weather many people, including families with children, went there to play in the sand, sunbathe and paddle in the water. A beach at the far end of the lake from the car park was where in fine weather groups of teenagers like John Tomlinson would regularly hang out. He had been going there since he was a child.

[3] After sitting in the hot sun for a couple of hours, John Tomlinson decided that he wanted to cool off. So he ran out into the water and dived. He had done the same thing many times before. But this time the dive was badly executed because he struck his head hard on the sandy bottom. So hard that he broke his neck at the fifth vertebra. He is now a tetraplegic and unable to walk.

[4] It is a terrible tragedy to suffer such dreadful injury in consequence of a relatively minor act of carelessness. It came nowhere near the stupidity of Luke Ratcliff, a student who climbed a fence at 2.30 am on a December morning to take a running dive into the shallow end of a swimming pool (Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670) or John Donoghue, who dived into Folkestone Harbour from a slipway at midnight on 27 December after an evening in the pub (Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 231, [2003] 3 All ER 1101, [2003] 2 WLR 1138). John Tomlinson's mind must often recur to that hot day which irretrievably changed his life. He may feel, not unreasonably, that fate has dealt with him unfairly. And so in these proceedings he seeks financial compensation: for the loss of his earning capacity, for the expense of the care he will need, for the loss of the ability to lead an ordinary life. But the law does not provide such compensation simply on the basis that the injury was disproportionately severe in relation to one's own fault or even not one's own fault at all. Perhaps it should, but society might not be able to afford to compensate everyone on that principle, certainly at the level at which such compensation is now paid. The law provides compensation only when the injury was someone else's fault. In order to succeed in his claim, that is what Mr Tomlinson has to prove.

OCCUPIERS' LIABILITY

- a [5] In these proceedings Mr Tomlinson sues the Congleton Borough Council and the Cheshire County Council, claiming that as occupiers of the park they were in breach of their duties under the Occupiers' Liability Acts 1957 and 1984. If one had to decide which of the two councils was the occupier, it might not be easy. Although the park belongs to the borough council, it is managed on their behalf by the countryside management service of the county council. The borough council provides the funds to enable the countryside management service to maintain the park. It is the county which employs the rangers who look after it. But the two councils very sensibly agreed that one or other or both was the occupier. Unless it is necessary to distinguish between the county council and the borough council for the purpose of telling the story, I shall call them both the council.

VISITOR OR TRESPASSER?

- d [6] The 1957 Act was passed to amend and codify the common law duties of occupiers to certain persons who came upon their land. The common law had distinguished between invitees, in whose visit the occupier had some material interest, and licensees, who came simply by express or implied permission. Different duties were owed to each class. The Act, on the recommendation of the Law Reform Committee (Third Report: Occupiers' Liability to Invitees, Licensees and Trespassers (1954) Cmd 9305), amalgamated (without redefining) the two common law categories, designated the combined class 'visitors' (s 1(2)) and provided that (subject to contrary agreement) all visitors should be owed a 'common duty of care'. That duty is set out in s 2(2), as refined by sub-ss (3)–(5):

- f '(2) The common duty of care is a duty to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there.

- g (3) The circumstances relevant for the present purpose include the degree of care, and of want of care, which would ordinarily be looked for in such a visitor, so that (for example) in proper cases—(a) an occupier must be prepared for children to be less careful than adults; and (b) an occupier may expect that a person, in the exercise of his calling, will appreciate and guard against any special risks ordinarily incident to it, so far as the occupier leaves him free to do so.

- h (4) In determining whether the occupier of premises has discharged the common duty of care to a visitor, regard is to be had to all the circumstances, so that (for example)—(a) where damage is caused to a visitor by a danger of which he had been warned by the occupier, the warning is not to be treated without more as absolving the occupier from liability, unless in all the circumstances it was enough to enable the visitor to be reasonably safe; and (b) where damage is caused to a visitor by a danger due to the faulty execution of any work of construction, maintenance or repair by an independent contractor employed by the occupier, the occupier is not to be treated without more as answerable for the danger if in all the circumstances he had acted reasonably in entrusting the work to an independent contractor and had taken such steps (if any) as he reasonably ought in order to satisfy himself that the contractor was competent and that the work had been properly done.

(5) The common duty of care does not impose on an occupier any obligation to a visitor in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by the visitor (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another).’

[7] At first Mr Tomlinson claimed that the council was in breach of its common duty of care under s 2(2). His complaint was that the premises were not reasonably safe because diving into the water was dangerous and the council had not given adequate warning of this fact or taken sufficient steps to prevent or discourage him from doing it. But then a difficulty emerged. The county council, as manager of the park, had for many years pursued a policy of prohibiting swimming or the use of inflatable dinghies or mattresses. Canoeing and windsurfing were allowed in one area of the lake and angling in another. But not swimming; except, I suppose, by capsized canoeists or windsurfers. Notices had been erected at the entrance and elsewhere saying ‘DANGEROUS WATER. NO SWIMMING’. The policy had not been altogether effective because many people, particularly rowdy teenagers, ignored the notices. They were sometimes rude to the rangers who tried to get them out of the water. Nevertheless, it was hard to say that swimming or diving was, in the language of s 2(2), one of the purposes ‘for which [Mr Tomlinson was] invited or permitted by the occupier to be there’. The council went further and said that once he entered the lake to swim, he was no longer a ‘visitor’ at all. He became a trespasser, to whom no duty under the 1957 Act is owed. The council cited a famous bon mot of Scrutton LJ in The Calgarth, The Otarama [1927] P 93 at 110: ‘When you invite a person into your house to use the staircase, you do not invite him to slide down the banisters ...’ This quip was used by Lord Atkin in Hillen v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1936] AC 65 at 69, [1935] All ER Rep 555 at 558 to explain why stevedores who were lawfully on a barge for the purpose of discharging it nevertheless became trespassers when they went onto an inadequately supported hatch cover in order to unload some of the cargo. They knew, said Lord Atkin ([1936] AC 65 at 69–70, [1935] All ER Rep 555 at 558) that they ought not to use the covered hatch for this purpose ‘for them for such a purpose it was out of bounds; they were trespassers’. So the stevedores could not complain that the barge owners should have warned them that the hatch cover was not adequately supported. Similarly, says the council, Mr Tomlinson became a trespasser and took himself outside the 1957 Act when he entered the water to swim.

[8] Mr Tomlinson’s advisers, having reflected on the matter, decided to concede that he was indeed a trespasser when he went into the water. Although that took him outside the 1957 Act, it did not necessarily mean that the council owed him no duty. At common law the only duty to trespassers was not to cause them deliberate or reckless injury, but after an inconclusive attempt by the House of Lords to modify this rule in British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877, the Law Commission recommended the creation of a statutory duty to trespassers (see its Report on Liability for Damage or Injury to Trespassers and Related Questions of Occupiers’ Liability (1976) (Law Com no 75) (Cmnd 6428)). The recommendation was given effect by the Occupiers’ Liability Act 1984. Section 1(1) describes the purpose of that Act:

‘(1) The rules enacted by this section shall have effect, in place of the rules of the common law, to determine—(a) whether any duty is owed by a person as occupier of premises to persons other than his visitors in respect of any risk

a of their suffering injury on the premises by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them; and (b) if so, what that duty is.'

[9] The circumstances in which a duty may arise are then defined in sub-s (3) and the content of the duty is described in sub-ss (4)–(6):

b '(3) An occupier of premises owes a duty to another (not being his visitor) in respect of any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1) above if—

c (b) he knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other is in the vicinity of the danger concerned or that he may come into the vicinity of the danger (in either case, whether he has lawful authority for being in that vicinity or not); and

d (4) Where, by virtue of this section, an occupier of premises owes a duty to another in respect of such a risk, the duty is to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.

e (5) Any duty owed by virtue of this section in respect of a risk may, in an appropriate case, be discharged by taking such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to give warning of the danger concerned or to discourage persons from incurring the risk.

f (6) No duty is owed by virtue of this section to any person in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by that person (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another).'

[10] Mr Tomlinson says that the conditions set out in sub-s (3) were satisfied. The council was therefore under a duty under sub-s (4) to take reasonable care to see that he did not suffer injury by reason of the danger from diving. Subsection (5) shows that although in appropriate circumstances it may be sufficient to warn or discourage, the notices in the present case had been patently ineffectual and therefore it was necessary to take more drastic measures to prevent people like himself from going into the water. Such measures, as I shall later recount in detail, had already been considered by the council.

g [11] The case has therefore proceeded upon a concession that the relevant duty, if any, is that to a trespasser under s 1(4) of the 1984 Act and not to a lawful visitor under s 2(2) of the 1957 Act. On one analysis, this is a rather odd hypothesis. Mr Tomlinson's complaint is that he should have been prevented or discouraged from going into the water, that is to say, from turning himself into a trespasser. Logically, it can be said, that duty must have been owed to him (if at all) while he was still a lawful visitor. Once he had become a trespasser, it could not have meaningful effect. In the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 309, [2003] 3 All ER 1122, [2003] 2 WLR 1120), Longmore LJ was puzzled by this paradox:

h [52] ... At what point does he become a trespasser? When he starts to paddle, intending thereafter to swim? There was no evidence that Mr Tomlinson in fact swam at all. He dived from a position in which swimming was difficult, if not impossible. I would be troubled if the defendants' duty of care differed depending on the precise moment when a swim could be said to have begun.' a [12] In the later case of Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 231 at [45], [2003] 3 All ER 1101 at [45], [2003] 2 WLR 1138 Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR said that he shared these reservations about the concession:

'What was at issue in the case was whether the council should have taken steps which would have prevented Mr Tomlinson from entering the lake, that is, whether a duty of care was owed to him before he did the unauthorised act.' b

[13] As a matter of logic, I see the force of these observations. But I have nevertheless come to the conclusion that the concession was rightly made. The duty under the 1984 Act was intended to be a lesser duty, as to both incidence and scope, than the duty to a lawful visitor under the 1957 Act. That was because Parliament recognised that it would often be unduly burdensome to require landowners to take steps to protect the safety of people who came upon their land without invitation or permission. They should not ordinarily be able to force duties upon unwilling hosts. In the application of that principle, I can see no difference between a person who comes upon land without permission and one who, having come with permission, does something which he has not been given permission to do. In both cases, the entrant would be imposing upon the landowner a duty of care which he has not expressly or impliedly accepted. The 1984 Act provides that even in such cases a duty may exist, based simply upon occupation of land and knowledge or foresight that unauthorised persons may come upon the land or authorised persons may use it for unauthorised purposes. But that duty is rarer and different in quality from the duty which arises from express or implied invitation or permission to come upon the land and use it. c

[14] In addition, I think that the concession is supported by the high authority of Lord Atkin in Hillen's case. There too, it could be said that the stevedores' complaint was that they should have been warned not to go upon the hatch cover and that logically this duty was owed to them, if at all, when they were lawfully on the barge. g

[15] I would certainly agree with Longmore LJ that the incidence and content of the duty should not depend on the precise moment at which Mr Tomlinson crossed the line between the status of lawful visitor and that of trespasser. But there is no dispute that the act in respect of which Mr Tomlinson says that he was owed a duty, namely, diving into the water, was to his knowledge prohibited by the terms upon which he had been admitted to the park. It is, I think, for this reason that the council owed him no duty under the 1957 Act and that the incidence and content of any duty they may have owed was governed by the 1984 Act. But I shall later return to the question of whether it would have made any difference if swimming had not been prohibited and the 1957 Act had applied. h

[16] It is therefore necessary to consider the conditions which s 1(3) of the 1984 Act requires to be satisfied in order that any duty under s 1(4) should exist. But before looking at the statutory requirements, I must say something more about the history of the lake, upon which Mr Braithwaite QC, who appeared for Mr Tomlinson, placed great reliance in support of his submission that the council owed him a duty with which it failed to comply.

THE HISTORY OF THE LAKE

a [17] The working of the sand quarry ceased in about 1975 and for some years thereafter the land lay derelict. People went there for barbecues, camp fires, open-air parties and swimming. The borough council bought the land in 1980 and most of the work of landscaping and planting was finished by 1983. The land was reclaimed for municipal recreation. But the traditions established in the b previous anarchic state of nature were hard to eradicate. From the beginning, the county council's management plan treated swimming as an 'unacceptable water activity'. The minutes of the county council's advisory group of interested organisations (anglers, windsurfers and so forth) record that on 21 November 1983 the managers proposed to put up more signs to dissuade swimmers: 'The risk of a fatality to swimmers was stressed and agreed by all.' The windsurfers
c particular were concerned about swimmers getting in their way; perhaps being injured by a fast-moving board. The chairman summed up by saying that although the lake with its sandy beaches was a great attraction to visitors, it was also a management problem because of misuse and dangerous activities on the water.

d [18] In the following year, 1984, the management reported that larger notice boards had prevented the swimming problem from getting any worse: 'Every reasonable precaution had now been taken, but it was recognised that some foolhardy persons would continue to put their lives at risk.'

[19] The management report for 1988 stated that a major concern was—

e 'the unauthorised use of the lake and the increasing possibility of an accident; this is swimming and the use of rubber boats. Warnings are ignored by large numbers who see Brereton as easy, free access to open water. On busy days the overwhelming numbers make it impossible to control this use of the lake, and it is difficult to see how the situation can change unless the whole concept of managing the park and the lake is f revised.'

[20] In 1990 there was an inspection by Mr Victor Tyler-Jones, the county council's water safety officer. He reported that the swimming problem continued, due to the ease of access, the grassy lakeside picnic areas and the beaches and the long history of swimming in the lake. His recommendation was
g to reduce the beach areas by planting them with reeds. His guidelines for the entire county said that swimming in lakes, rivers and ponds should be discouraged:

h 'We do not recommend swimming as a suitable activity for any of our managed sites. Potential swimmers could be dissuaded by noticeboard reference to less pleasant features e.g. soft muddy bottom, danger of contracting Weil's Disease, presence of blue-green algae.'

If this did not have the desired effect, ballast should be dumped on beaches and banks to make them muddy and unattractive and reeds and shrubs should be j planted.

[21] The money to implement these recommendations had to be provided by the borough council, which was under some financial pressure. But impetus was provided in the summer of 1992 by a number of incidents. Over Whitsuntide there were three cases of 'near drowning resulting in hospital visits'. The only such incident of which more details are available concerned a man who 'was swimming in lake, after drinking, and got into difficulty'. He was rescued by a relative, resuscitated by an off-duty paramedic and taken to hospital. Two men cut their heads by hitting them on something when diving into the lake; there is no information about where they dived. Mr Kitching, the county council's countryside manager, prepared a paper for the borough council at the end of the first week in June. He said that the park had become very popular:

'... the total number of visitors now exceeds 160,000 per annum ... The lake acts as a magnet to the public and has become heavily used for swimming in spite of a no swimming policy due to safety considerations ... Advice has been sought from the County Council's water safety officer as to how the problem should be addressed and this has been carefully followed. Notices are posted warning of the dangers and leaflets are handed to visitors to emphasise the situation. Life belts and throwing lines are provided for use in emergencies. In spite of these actions the public continue to ignore the advice and the requests of the rangers not to swim. The attitude is that they will do what they want to do and that rangers should not interfere with their enjoyment. There have been several occasions when small children have been out in the middle of the lake and their parents have been extremely rude to staff when approached about this. As a result of the general flaunting of the policy there have been a number of near fatalities in the lake with three incidents requiring hospital treatment in the week around Whitsun. Whilst the rangers are doing all they can to protect the public it is likely to be only a matter of time before someone drowns.'

[22] In July 1992 the borough council's leisure officer visited the park and concluded that the notices and leaflets were not having the desired effect. On 23 July 1992 he proposed to other officers the preparation of a report to the borough council recommending the adoption of Mr Tyler-Jones' scheme for making the beaches less hospitable to visitors:

'... I want the water's edge to be far less accessible, desirable and inviting than it currently is for children's beach/water's edge type of play activities. I personally find this course of action a regrettable one but I have to remind myself that Council policy was to establish a Country Park and not specifically to provide a swimming facility, no matter how popular this may have become in consequence. To provide a facility that is open to the public and which contains beach and water areas is, in my view, an open invitation and temptation to swim and engage in other water's edge activities despite the cautionary note that is struck by deterrent notices etc., and in that type of situation accidents become inevitable. We must therefore do everything that is reasonably possible to deter, discourage and prevent people from swimming or paddling in the lake or diving into the lake ... Work should be prepared for the report with a view to implementation of a scheme at the earliest opportunity, bearing in mind that we shall require a supplementary estimate for the exercise ...'

[23] As a result of this proposal, the borough leisure officer was asked to prepare a feasibility report with costings. £5,000 was provided in the draft estimates for the borough's amenities and leisure services committee, but it was one of many items deleted at the committee's meeting on 1 March 1993 to achieve a total saving of £200,000. In 1994, the officers tried again. It was listed as a 'desirable' growth bid in the budget (below 'essential' and 'highly desirable').

a But the bid failed. When it came to the 1995 budget round, the officers presented a strongly-worded proposal:

b 'Cheshire Countryside Management Service has now taken all reasonable steps with regard to providing information and attempting to educate the public about the dangers of bathing in the lake. This has had a limited effect on the numbers entering the water for short periods but there are still numbers of people, including young children, swimming, paddling and using inflatable rafts and dinghies whenever the weather is warm and sunny. We have on average three or four near drownings every year and it is only a matter of time before someone dies. The recommendation from the National Safety Water Committee, endorsed by County Councils is that something must now be done to reduce the "beach areas" both in size and attractiveness. If nothing is done about this and someone dies the Borough Council is likely to be held liable and would have to accept responsibility.'

d [24] The borough council found this persuasive and in 1995 £5,000 was allocated to the scheme. But the work had not yet begun when Mr Tomlinson had his accident. At that time, the beach to which he and his friends had been accustomed to go since childhood was still there. The diggers, graders and planters arrived to destroy it a few months later.

e THE SCOPE OF THE DUTY UNDER THE 1984 ACT

f [25] The conditions in s 1(3) of the 1984 Act determine whether or not a duty is owed to 'another' in respect of 'any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1)'. Two conclusions follow from this language. First, the risks in respect of which the Act imposes a duty are limited to those mentioned in sub-s (1)(a)—risks of injury 'by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them'. The Act is not concerned with risks due to anything else. Secondly, the conditions have to be satisfied in respect of the claimant as 'another'; that is to say, in respect of a class of persons which includes him and a description of risk which includes that which caused his injury.

g A DANGER 'DUE TO THE STATE OF THE PREMISES'

h [26] The first question, therefore, is whether there was a risk within the scope of the statute; a danger 'due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them'. The judge found that there was 'nothing about the mere at Brereton Heath which made it any more dangerous than any other ordinary stretch of open water in England'. There was nothing special about its configuration; there were no hidden dangers. It was shallow in some places and deep in others, but that is the nature of lakes. Nor was the council doing or permitting anything to be done which created a danger to persons who came to the lake. No power boats or jet skis threatened the safety of either lawful windsurfers or unlawful swimmers. So the council submits that there was no danger attributable to the state of premises or things done or omitted on them. In Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 1101 at [53] Lord Phillips MR expressed the same opinion. He said that he had been unable to identify the 'state of the premises' which carried with it the risk of the injury suffered by Mr Tomlinson:

'It seems to me that Mr Tomlinson suffered his injury because he chose to indulge in an activity which had inherent dangers, not because the premises were in a dangerous state.'

[27] In making this comment, Lord Phillips MR was identifying a point which is in my opinion central to this appeal. It is relevant at a number of points in the analysis of the duties under the 1957 and 1984 Acts. Mr Tomlinson was a person of full capacity who voluntarily and without any pressure or inducement engaged in an activity which had inherent risk. The risk was that he might not execute his dive properly and so sustain injury. Likewise, a person who goes mountaineering incurs the risk that he might stumble or misjudge where to put his weight. In neither case can the risk be attributed to the state of the premises. Otherwise any premises can be said to be dangerous to someone who chooses to use them for some dangerous activity. In the present case, Mr Tomlinson knew the lake well and even if he had not, the judge's finding was that it contained no dangers which one would not have expected. So the only risk arose out of what he chose to do and not out of the state of the premises.

[28] Mr Braithwaite was inclined to accept the difficulty of establishing that the risk was due to the state of the premises. He therefore contended that it was due to 'things done or omitted to be done' on the premises. When asked what these might be, he said that they consisted in the attraction of the lake and the council's inadequate attempts to keep people out of the water. The council, he said, were 'luring people into a deathtrap'. Ward LJ ([2003] All ER 1122 at [31]) said that the water was 'a siren call strong enough to turn stout men's minds'. In my opinion this is gross hyperbole. The trouble with the island of the sirens was not the state of the premises. It was that the sirens held mariners spellbound until they died of hunger. The beach, give or take a fringe of human bones, was an ordinary mediterranean beach. If Odysseus had gone ashore and accidentally drowned himself having a swim, Penelope would have had no action against the sirens for luring him there with their songs. Likewise in this case, the water was perfectly safe for all normal activities. In my opinion 'things done or omitted to be done' means activities or the lack of precautions which cause risk, like allowing speedboats among the swimmers. It is a mere circularity to say that a failure to stop people getting into the water was an omission which gave rise to a duty to take steps to stop people from getting into the water.

[29] It follows that in my opinion, there was no risk to Mr Tomlinson due to the state of the premises or anything done or omitted upon the premises. That means that there was no risk of a kind which gave rise to a duty under the 1957 or 1984 Acts. I shall nevertheless go on to consider the matter on the assumption that there was.

THE CONDITIONS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF A DUTY

(i) Knowledge or foresight of the danger

[30] Section 1(3) of the 1984 Act has three conditions which must be satisfied. First, under para (a), the occupier must be aware of the danger or have reasonable grounds to believe that it exists. For this purpose, it is necessary to say what the relevant danger was. The judge thought it was the risk of suffering an injury through diving and said that the council was aware of this danger because two men had suffered minor head injuries from diving in May 1992. In the Court of Appeal, Ward LJ described the relevant risk much more broadly. He regarded all the swimming incidents as indicative of the council's knowledge that a danger

a existed. I am inclined to think that this is too wide a description. The risk of injury from diving off the beach was in my opinion different from the risk of drowning in the deep water. For example, the council might have fenced off the deep water or marked it with buoys and left people to paddle in the shallows. That would have reduced the risk of drowning but would not have prevented the injury to Mr Tomlinson. We know very little about the circumstances in which
b two men suffered minor cuts to their heads in 1992 and I am not sure that they really provide much support for an inference that there was knowledge, or reasonable grounds to believe, that the beach posed a risk of serious diving injury. Dr Penny, a consultant occupational health and safety physician with long experience of advising organisations involved in aquatic sports (and himself a diver) said that the Code of Safety for Beaches, published in 1993 by the Royal Life
c Saving Society and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, made no mention of diving risks, no doubt assuming that, because there was little possibility of high diving from a beach, the risk of serious diving injuries was very small compared with the risk of drowning. I accept that the council must have known that there was a possibility that some boisterous teenager would injure d himself by horseplay in the shallows and I would not disturb the concurrent findings that this was sufficient to satisfy para (a). But the chances of such an accident were small. I shall return later, in connection with para (c), to the relevance of where the risk comes on the scale of probability.

(ii) Knowledge or foresight of the presence of the trespasser

e [31] Once it is found that the risk of a swimmer injuring himself by diving was something of which the council knew or which they had reasonable grounds to believe to exist, para (b) presents no difficulty. The council plainly knew that swimmers came to the lake and Mr Tomlinson fell within that class.

f (iii) Reasonable to expect protection

[32] That leaves para (c). Was the risk one against which the council might reasonably be expected to offer Mr Tomlinson some protection? The judge found that 'the danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow were obvious'. In such a case the judge held, both as a matter of common sense and following consistent authority (Staples v West Dorset DC (1995) 93 LGR 536, Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670, Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR P372), that there was no duty to warn against the danger. A warning would not tell a swimmer anything he did not already know. Nor was it necessary to do anything else. 'I do not think', said the judge, 'that the defendants' legal duty to the claimant in the circumstances required them to take the extreme measures
h which were completed after the accident'. Even if Mr Tomlinson had been owed a duty under the 1957 Act as a lawful visitor, the council would not have been obliged to do more than they did.

[33] The Court of Appeal disagreed. Ward LJ said that the council was obliged to do something more. The gravity of the risk, the number of people who
j regularly incurred it and the attractiveness of the beach created a duty. The prohibition on swimming was obviously ineffectual and therefore it was necessary to take additional steps to prevent or discourage people from getting into the water. Sedley LJ said ([2003] 3 All ER 1122 at [45]): '... it is only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability.' Longmore LJ dissented. The majority reduced the damages by two-thirds to reflect Mr Tomlinson's contributory negligence, although Ward LJ said that he would have been inclined to reduce them only by half. The council appeals against the finding of liability and Mr Tomlinson appeals against the apportionment, which he says should have been in accordance with the view of Ward LJ. a

THE BALANCE OF RISK, GRAVITY OF INJURY, COST AND SOCIAL VALUE.

[34] My Lords, the majority of the Court of Appeal appear to have proceeded on the basis that if there was a foreseeable risk of serious injury, the council was under a duty to do what was necessary to prevent it. But this in my opinion is an oversimplification. Even in the case of the duty owed to a lawful visitor under s 2(2) of the 1957 Act and even if the risk had been attributable to the state of the premises rather than the acts of Mr Tomlinson, the question of what amounts to 'such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable' depends upon assessing, as in the case of common law negligence, not only the likelihood that someone may be injured and the seriousness of the injury which may occur, but also the social value of the activity which gives rise to the risk and the cost of preventative measures. These factors have to be balanced against each other. b

[35] For example, in Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v Miller Steamship Co Pty, The Wagon Mound (No 2) [1966] 2 All ER 709, [1967] 1 AC 617, there was no social value or cost saving in the defendant's activity. Lord Reid said: c

'In the present case there was no justification whatever for discharging the oil into Sydney Harbour. Not only was it an offence to do so, but also it involved considerable loss financially. If the ship's engineer had thought about the matter there could have been no question of balancing the advantages and disadvantages. From every point of view it was both his duty and his interest to stop the discharge immediately.' (See [1966] 2 All ER 709 at 718, [1967] 1 AC 617 at 643.) d

[36] So the defendants were held liable for damage which was only a very remote possibility. Similarly in Jolley v Sutton London BC [2000] 3 All ER 409, [2000] 1 WLR 1082 there was no social value or cost saving to the council in creating a risk by leaving a derelict boat lying about. It was something which they ought to have removed whether it created a risk of injury or not. So they were held liable for an injury which, though foreseeable, was not particularly likely. On the other hand, in The Wagon Mound (No 2) [1966] 2 All ER 709 at 718, [1967] 1 AC 617 at 642 Lord Reid drew a contrast with Bolton v Stone [1951] 1 All ER 1078, [1951] AC 850 in which the House of Lords held that it was not negligent for a cricket club to do nothing about the risk of someone being injured by a cricket ball hit out of the ground. The difference was that the cricket club were carrying on a lawful and socially useful activity and would have had to stop playing cricket at that ground. e

[37] This is the kind of balance which has to be struck even in a situation in which it is clearly fair, just and reasonable that there should in principle be a duty of care or in which Parliament, as in the 1957 Act, has decreed that there should be. And it may lead to the conclusion that even though injury is foreseeable, as it was in Bolton v Stone, it is still in all the circumstances reasonable to do nothing about it. f

[38] In the case of the 1984 Act, there is the additional consideration that unless in all the circumstances it is reasonable to expect the occupier to do g

- a something, that is to say, to 'offer the other some protection', there is no duty at all. One may ask what difference there is between the case in which the claimant is a lawful visitor and there is in principle a duty under the 1957 Act but on the particular facts no duty to do anything, and the case in which he is a trespasser and there is on the particular facts no duty under the 1984 Act. Of course in such a case the result is the same. But Parliament has made it clear that in the case of
- b a lawful visitor, one starts from the assumption that there is a duty whereas in the case of a trespasser one starts from the assumption that there is none.

THE BALANCE UNDER THE 1957 ACT

- [39] My Lords, it will in the circumstances be convenient to consider first the question of what the position would have been if Mr Tomlinson had been a
- c lawful visitor owed a duty under s 2(2) of the 1957 Act. Assume, therefore, that there had been no prohibition on swimming. What was the risk of serious injury? To some extent this depends upon what one regards as the relevant risk. As I have mentioned, the judge thought it was the risk of injury through diving while the Court of Appeal thought it was any kind of injury which could happen to
- d people in the water. Although, as I have said, I am inclined to agree with the judge, I do not want to put the basis of my decision too narrowly. So I accept that we are concerned with the steps, if any, which should have been taken to prevent any kind of water accident. According to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, about 450 people drown while swimming in the United Kingdom every year (see Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR P372 at 374). About 25–35
- e break their necks diving and no doubt others sustain less serious injuries. So there is obviously some degree of risk in swimming and diving, as there is in climbing, cycling, fell walking and many other such activities.

- [40] I turn then to the cost of taking preventative measures. Ward LJ described it (£5,000) as 'not excessive'. Perhaps it was not, although the outlay
- f has to be seen in the context of the other items (rated 'essential' and 'highly desirable') in the borough council budget which had taken precedence over the destruction of the beaches for the previous two years.

- [41] I do not however regard the financial cost as a significant item in the balancing exercise which the court has to undertake. There are two other related considerations which are far more important. The first is the social value of the
- g activities which would have to be prohibited in order to reduce or eliminate the risk from swimming. And the second is the question of whether the council should be entitled to allow people of full capacity to decide for themselves whether to take the risk.

- [42] The Court of Appeal made no reference at all to the social value of the
- h activities which were to be prohibited. The majority of people who went to the beaches to sunbathe, paddle and play with their children were enjoying themselves in a way which gave them pleasure and caused no risk to themselves or anyone else. This must be something to be taken into account in deciding whether it was reasonable to expect the council to destroy the beaches.

- j [43] I have the impression that the Court of Appeal felt able to brush these matters aside because the council had already decided to do the work. But they were held liable for having failed to do so before Mr Tomlinson's accident and the question is therefore whether they were under a legal duty to do so. Ward LJ placed much emphasis upon the fact that the council had decided to destroy the beaches and that its officers thought that this was necessary to avoid being held liable for an accident to a swimmer. But the fact that the council's safety officers thought that the work was necessary does not show that there was a legal duty to do it. In Darby's case the claimant's husband was tragically drowned while swimming in a pond on the National Trust estate at Hardwick Hall. Miss Rebecca Kirkwood, the water and leisure safety consultant to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, gave uncontradicted evidence, which the judge accepted, that the pond was unsuitable for swimming because it was deep in the middle and the edges were uneven. The National Trust should have made it clear that swimming in the pond was not allowed and taken steps to enforce the prohibition. But May LJ said robustly that it was for the court, not Miss Kirkwood, to decide whether the Trust was under a legal duty to take such steps. There was no duty because the risks from swimming in the pond were perfectly obvious.

FREE WILL

[44] The second consideration, namely the question of whether people should accept responsibility for the risks they choose to run, is the point made by Lord Phillips MR in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 1101 at [53] and which I said was central to this appeal. Mr Tomlinson was freely and voluntarily undertaking an activity which inherently involved some risk. By contrast, Miss Bessie Stone, to whom the House of Lords held that no duty was owed, was innocently standing on the pavement outside her garden gate at 10 Beckenham Road, Cheetham when she was struck by a ball hit for six out of the Cheetham Cricket Club ground. She was certainly not engaging in any activity which involved an inherent risk of such injury. So compared with Bolton v Stone, this is an a fortiori case.

[45] I think it will be extremely rare for an occupier of land to be under a duty to prevent people from taking risks which are inherent in the activities they freely choose to undertake upon the land. If people want to climb mountains, go hang gliding or swim or dive in ponds or lakes, that is their affair. Of course the landowner may for his own reasons wish to prohibit such activities. He may be think that they are a danger or inconvenience to himself or others. Or he may take a paternalist view and prefer people not to undertake risky activities on his land. He is entitled to impose such conditions, as the council did by prohibiting swimming. But the law does not require him to do so.

[46] My Lords, as will be clear from what I have just said, I think that there is an important question of freedom at stake. It is unjust that the harmless recreation of responsible parents and children with buckets and spades on the beaches should be prohibited in order to comply with what is thought to be a legal duty to safeguard irresponsible visitors against dangers which are perfectly obvious. The fact that such people take no notice of warnings cannot create a duty to take other steps to protect them. I find it difficult to express with appropriate moderation my disagreement with the proposition of Sedley LJ ([2003] 3 All ER 1122 at [45]) that it is 'only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability'. A duty to protect against obvious risks or self-inflicted harm exists only in cases in which there is no genuine and informed choice, or in the case of employees, or some lack of capacity, such as the inability of children to recognise danger (see British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877) or the despair of prisoners which may lead them to inflict injury on themselves (see Reeves v Metropolitan Police Comr [1999] 3 All ER 897, [2000] 1 AC 360).

a [47] It is of course understandable that organisations like the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents should favour policies which require people to be prevented from taking risks. Their function is to prevent accidents and that is one way of doing so. But they do not have to consider the cost, not only in money but also in deprivation of liberty, which such restrictions entail. The courts will naturally respect the technical expertise of such organisations in drawing
b attention to what can be done to prevent accidents. But the balance between risk on the one hand and individual autonomy on the other is not a matter of expert opinion. It is a judgment which the courts must make and which in England reflects the individualist values of the common law.

[48] As for the council officers, they were obviously motivated by the view that it was necessary to take defensive measures to prevent the council from c being held liable to pay compensation. The borough leisure officer said that he regretted the need to destroy the beaches but saw no alternative if the council was not to be held liable for an accident to a swimmer. So this appeal gives your Lordships the opportunity to say clearly that local authorities and other occupiers of land are ordinarily under no duty to incur such social and financial costs to d protect a minority (or even a majority) against obvious dangers. On the other hand, if the decision of the Court of Appeal were left standing, every such occupier would feel obliged to take similar defensive measures. Sedley LJ was able to say that if the logic of the Court of Appeal's decision was that other public lakes and ponds required similar precautions, 'so be it'. But I cannot view this prospect with the same equanimity. In my opinion it would damage the quality e of many people's lives.

[49] In the particular case of diving injuries, there is little evidence that such defensive measures have had much effect. Dr Penny, the council's expert, said that over the past decade there had been little change in the rate of serious diving accidents. Each year, as I have mentioned, there are about 25–35 fracture-dislocations of the neck. Almost all those affected are males and their average age
f is consistently around 25 years. In spite of greatly increased safety measures, particularly in swimming pools, the numbers (when Dr Penny gave evidence) had remained the same for a decade:

g "This is probably because of the sudden, unpredictable nature of these dangerous dives, undertaken mostly by boisterous young men ... hence the common description the "Macho Male Diving Syndrome".

[50] My Lords, for these reasons I consider that even if swimming had not been prohibited and the council had owed a duty under s 2(2) of the 1957 Act, that duty would not have required them to take any steps to prevent Mr Tomlinson
h from diving or warning him against dangers which were perfectly obvious. If that is the case, then plainly there can have been no duty under the 1984 Act. The risk was not one against which he was entitled under s 1(3)(c) to protection. I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the decision of Jack J. It follows that the cross-appeal against the apportionment of damages must be dismissed.

LORD HUTTON.

[51] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann and I gratefully adopt his account of the background facts to the tragic injury which Mr Tomlinson suffered in the lake in Brereton Heath Country Park in Cheshire. I agree with your Lordships that the appeal brought by Congleton Borough Council and Cheshire County Council

(together the council) should be allowed, but as I was attracted for a considerable time during the hearing of the appeal by Mr Tomlinson's argument supporting the reasoning of Ward LJ in the Court of Appeal (with which Sedley LJ agreed) ([2002] EWCA Civ 309, [2003] 3 All ER 1122, [2003] 2 WLR 1120) that Mr Tomlinson was entitled to recover damages, I wish to add some observations of my own.

[52] I approach the case on the basis that Mr Tomlinson was, in strict law, a trespasser at the time he dived and struck his head on the bottom of the lake. It is clear that he was invited by the council to come to the country park but it is also clear that swimming in the lake was expressly prohibited by the council and, as the trial judge found, Mr Tomlinson was fully aware of this prohibition. Therefore when he began to dive he became a trespasser because, as Lord Atkin stated in Hillen v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1936] AC 65 at 69, [1935] All ER Rep 555 at 558:

'So far as he sets foot on so much of the premises as lie outside the invitation or uses them for purposes which are alien to the invitation he is not an invitee but a trespasser, and his rights must be determined accordingly.'

However I agree with Lord Hoffmann that even if Mr Tomlinson had not been a trespasser at the time of his dive but had been a visitor within the meaning of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, he would still not have been entitled to recover damages.

[53] In relation to s 1(1)(a) of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 I recognise that there is force in the argument that the injury was not due to the state of the premises but was due to Mr Tomlinson's own lack of care in diving into shallow water. But the trial judge found that Mr Tomlinson could not see the bottom of the lake and, on balance, I incline to the view that dark and murky water which prevents a person seeing the bottom of the lake where he is diving can be viewed as 'the state of the premises' and that if he sustains injury through striking his head on the bottom which he cannot see this can be viewed as a danger 'due to the state of the premises'. If water were allowed to become dark and murky in an indoor swimming pool provided by a local authority and a diver struck his head on the bottom I consider that the danger could be regarded as 'due to the state of the premises', and whilst there is an obvious difference between such water and water in a lake which in its natural state is dark and murky, I think that the term 'the state of the premises' can be applied both to the swimming pool and to the lake.

[54] Section 1(3) and (4) of the 1984 Act provide:

'(3) An occupier of premises owes a duty to another (not being his visitor) in respect of any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1) above if—

(b) he knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other is in the vicinity of the danger concerned or that he may come into the vicinity of the danger (in either case, whether the other has lawful authority for being in that vicinity or not); and

(c) the risk is one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, he may reasonably be expected to offer the other some protection.

(4) Where, by virtue of this section, an occupier of premises owes a duty to another in respect of such a risk, the duty is to take such care as is a reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.'

[55] There is no doubt from the reports and proposals of the council's officials to the borough's amenities and leisure services committee and to the borough council which Lord Hoffmann has described that paras (a), (b) of s 1(3) are satisfied. If s 1(3) were satisfied and the risk was one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, the council might reasonably be expected to offer Mr Tomlinson some protection, I consider that there would be an argument of some force that they were in breach of the duty specified in s 1(4), because the minutes of the meetings showed that they knew that there were dangers to persons swimming or diving in the lake (there had been two cases of swimmers sustaining head injuries) and they knew that the dangers might lead to death or serious injury, but they had decided not to take the recommended steps such as planting reeds on the beach, which would probably have stopped swimming, because of financial constraints, although the cost of these precautionary measures would have been only in the region of £15,000.

d [56] Therefore I think the crucial question is whether Mr Tomlinson has established that the risk was one to which s 1(3)(c) applies. On this point the reasoning of Ward LJ was contained in [2003] 3 All ER 1122 at [29]:

e 'Here the authorities employed rangers whose duty it was to give oral warnings against swimming albeit that this met with mixed success and sometimes attracted abuse for their troubles. In addition to the oral warnings, the rangers would hand out safety leaflets which warned of the variable depth in the pond, the cold, the weeds, the absence of rescue services, waterborne diseases and the risk of accidents occurring. It seems to me that the rangers' patrols and advice and the handing out of these leaflets reinforced the ineffective message on the sign and constituted "some protection" in fact given and reasonably expected to be offered in the circumstances of this case.'

[57] I thought for a time that this reasoning was persuasive, but I have concluded that it should not be accepted because I consider that it is contrary to a principle stated in the older authorities which is still good law. In Stevenson v Corp of Glasgow 1908 SC 1034 at 1039 Lord M'Laren stated:

h '... in a town, as well as in the country, there are physical features which may be productive of injury to careless persons or to young children against which it is impossible to guard by protective measures. The situation of a town on the banks of a river is a familiar feature; and whether the stream be sluggish like the Clyde at Glasgow, or swift and variable like the Ness at Inverness, or the Tay at Perth, there is always danger to the individual who may be so unfortunate as to fall into the stream. But in none of these places has it been found necessary to fence the river to prevent children or careless persons from falling into the water. Now, as the common law is just the formal statement of the results and conclusions of the common sense of mankind, I come without difficulty to the conclusion that precautions which have been rejected by common sense as unnecessary and inconvenient are not required by the law.'

j [58] In Corp of the City of Glasgow v Taylor [1922] 1 AC 44 at 61 Lord Shaw of Dunfermline stated:

'Grounds thrown open by a municipality to the public may contain objects of natural beauty, say precipitous cliffs or the banks of streams, the dangers of the resort to which are plain.'

Lord Shaw then cited with approval the words of Lord M'Laren in Stevenson's case that 'in a town, as well as in the country, there are physical features which may be productive of injury to careless persons or to young children against which it is impossible to guard by protective measures'. I think that when Lord M'Laren referred to physical features against which 'it is impossible to guard by protective measures' he was not referring to protective measures which it is physically impossible to put in place; rather he had in mind measures which the common sense of mankind indicates as being unnecessary to take. This statement echoed the observation of the Lord President (Lord Dunedin) in Hastie v Magistrates of Edinburgh 1907 SC 1102 at 1106 that there are certain risks against which the law, in accordance with the dictates of common sense, does not give protection—such risks are 'just one of the results of the world as we find it'.

[59] Stevenson's and Hastie's cases (which were not concerned with trespassers) were decided almost a century ago and the judgments are couched in old-fashioned language, but I consider that they express a principle which is still valid today, namely, that it is contrary to common sense, and therefore not sound law, to expect an occupier to provide protection against an obvious danger on his land arising from a natural feature such as a lake or a cliff and to impose a duty on him to do so. In my opinion this principle, although not always explicitly stated, underlies the cases relied on by the council where it has been held that the occupier is not liable where a person has injured himself or drowned in an inland lake or pool or in the sea or on some natural feature.

[60] In Cotton v Derbyshire Dales DC [1994] CA Transcript 753 the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the trial judge dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for serious injuries sustained from falling off a cliff. Applying the judgment of Lord Shaw in Taylor's case the Court of Appeal held that the occupiers were under no duty to provide protection against dangers which are themselves obvious.

[61] In Whyte v Redland Aggregates Ltd [1997] CA Transcript 2034 the appellant dived into a disused gravel pit and alleged that he had struck his head on an obstruction on the floor of the pit. The Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal against the judgment of the trial judge who held that he was not entitled to damages. Henry LJ stated:

'In my judgment, the occupier of land containing or bordered by the river, the seashore, the pond or the gravel pit, does not have to warn of uneven surfaces below the water. Such surfaces are by their nature quite likely to be uneven. Diving where you cannot see the bottom clearly enough to know that it is safe to dive is dangerous unless you have made sure, by reconnaissance or otherwise, that the diving is safe ie that there is adequate depth at the place where you choose to dive. In those circumstances, the dangers of there being an uneven surface in an area where you cannot plainly see the bottom are too plain to require a specific warning and, accordingly, there is no such duty to warn (see Lord Shaw in Corp of the City of Glasgow v Taylor [1922] 1 AC 44 at 60). There was no trap here on the judge's finding. There was just an uneven surface, as one would expect to find in a disused gravel pit.'

a [62] In Bartrum v Hepworth Minerals and Chemicals Ltd (29 October 1999, unreported), the claimant dived from a ledge on a cliff. In order to avoid shallow water he knew that he had to dive out into the pool but he failed to do so and fractured his neck. Turner J dismissed his claim for damages and stated:

b 'So far as the Act is concerned, by s 1(3) of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 the defendants were under a duty to those whom they had reasonable grounds to believe would be in the vicinity of the danger, that is on the cliff for the purpose of diving, and the risk was one which, in all the circumstances, [they] may be reasonably expected to offer some protection. In my judgment the danger here was so obvious to any adult that it was not reasonably to be expected of the defendants that they would offer any protection.'

c [63] In Darby v National Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 189, [2001] PIQR P372 the claimant's husband was drowned whilst swimming in a pond on National Trust property. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the National Trust against the trial judge's finding of liability and May LJ stated (at [27]):

d 'It cannot be the duty of the owner of every stretch of coastline to have notices warning of the dangers of swimming in the sea. If it were so, the coast would have to be littered with notices in places other than those where there are known to be special dangers which are not obvious. The same would apply to all inland lakes and reservoirs. In my judgment there was no duty on the National Trust on the facts of this case to warn against swimming in this pond where the dangers of drowning were no other or greater than those which were quite obvious to any adult such as the unfortunate deceased. That, in my view, applies as much to the risk that a swimmer might get into difficulties from the temperature of the water as to the risk that he might get into difficulties from mud or sludge on the bottom of the pond.'

e [64] I also think that the principle stated by Lord M'Laren in Stevenson's case is implicit in the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 231 at [34], [2003] 3 All ER 1101 at [34], [2003] 2 WLR 1138. In that case the claimant dived from a slipway into Folkestone harbour after midnight in mid-winter. He struck his head on a grid pile under the water adjacent to the harbour wall and broke his neck. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the defendant against the trial judge's finding of liability. Lord Phillips MR stated:

h '[33] The obvious situation where a duty under the 1984 Act is likely to arise is where the occupier knows that a trespasser may come upon a danger that is latent. In such a case the trespasser may be exposed to the risk of injury without realising that the danger exists. Where the state of the premises constitutes a danger that is perfectly obvious, and there is no reason for a trespasser observing it to go near it, a duty under the 1984 Act is unlikely to arise for at least two reasons. The first is that because the danger can readily be avoided, it is unlikely to pose a risk of injuring the trespasser whose presence on the premises is envisaged.'

j [34] There are, however, circumstances in which it may be foreseeable that a trespasser will appreciate that a dangerous feature of premises poses a risk of injury, but will nevertheless deliberately court the danger and risk the injury. It seems to me that, at least where the individual is an adult, it will be rare that those circumstances will be such that the occupier can reasonably be expected to offer some protection to the trespasser against the risk.' a

Lord Phillips MR then went on to state that where a person was tempted by some natural feature of the occupier's land to engage in some activity such as mountaineering which carried a risk of injury, he could not ascribe to 'the state of the premises' an injury sustained in carrying on that activity. However in the present case, as I have stated, I incline to the view that the dark and murky water can be viewed as 'the state of the premises'. b

[65] Therefore I consider that the risk of Mr Tomlinson striking his head on the bottom of the lake was not one against which the council might reasonably have been expected to offer him some protection, and accordingly they are not liable to him because they owed him no duty. I would add that there might be exceptional cases where the principle stated in Stevenson's and Taylor's case should not apply and where a claimant might be able to establish that the risk arising from some natural feature on the land was such that the occupier might reasonably be expected to offer him some protection against it, for example, where there was a very narrow and slippery path with a camber beside the edge of a cliff from which a number of persons had fallen. But the present is not such a case and, for the reasons which I have given, I consider that the appeal should be allowed. c

[66] My Lords, in this case the trial judge after having heard all the evidence made findings of fact which are now accepted by Mr Tomlinson:

'There was nothing about the mere which made it any more dangerous than any other stretch of open water in England. Swimming and diving held their own risks. So if the mere was to be described as a danger, it was only because it attracted swimming and diving, which activities carry a risk. Despite having seen signs stating "DANGEROUS WATER: NO SWIMMING", the claimant ignored them. The danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow was obvious. At the time of the accident, the claimant was 18 years of age and had regularly been going to the park since he was a small child. He knew it well. The accident occurred when he waded into the water until the water was a little above his knees and threw himself forward in a dive or plunge. He knew that he shouldn't. He could not see the bottom. In fact it was a smooth sandy surface without any obstruction or hazard. He dived deeper than he had intended and his head hit the sandy bottom causing his injury. Besides the notices already referred to, visitors were handed leaflets warning them of the dangers of swimming in the mere. Wardens patrolled the park and told people further that they should not swim in the mere. However it was the fact that visitors often took no notice and very many people did bathe in the mere in summer.' f

[67] Mr Tomlinson has made his claim for personal injuries under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 on the basis that at the time that he suffered his injury he was a trespasser in that he was swimming in the mere and swimming was, as he was aware, forbidden. This seems to me to be a somewhat artificial approach to the case; since paddling was apparently allowed but not swimming and Mr Tomlinson was at the material time in water which only came a little j a above his knees. However, under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 (and at common law) when an invitee or licensee breaches the conditions upon which he has entered the premises, he ceases to be a visitor and becomes a trespasser (s 2(2)). Mr Tomlinson was permitted to enter the park on the condition that (inter alia) he did not swim in the mere. If he should swim in the mere, he broke this condition and as a result ceased to be a visitor. However, like all of your

b Lordships, I consider that whether he makes his claim under the 1984 Act or the 1957 Act, he does not succeed.

[68] The two Acts apply the same general policy and the 1984 Act is a supplement to the 1957 Act. The earlier Act was the result of a re-examination of the common law relating to occupiers' liability. Its primary purpose was to c simplify the law. It had previously been based upon placing those coming on another's land into various different categories and then stipulating different standards of care from the occupier in respect of each category. This was the historical approach of the common law to the question of negligence and found its inspiration in Roman law concepts (as was the case in the law of bailment (see Coggs v Bernard (1703) 2 Ld Raym 909, [1558–1774] All ER Rep 1)). By 1957, the d dominant approach had become the 'good neighbour' principle enunciated in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1. But special rules still applied to relationships which were not merely neighbourly. One such was occupiers' liability. The relevant, indeed, principal simplification introduced in the 1957 Act was to introduce the 'common duty of care' as a single standard
e covering both invitees and licensees (see s 2(2)). The 1957 Act applied only to visitors, ie persons coming onto the land with the occupier's express or implied consent. It did not apply to persons who were not visitors including trespassers. The 1984 Act made provision for when a duty of care should be owed to persons who were not visitors (I will for the sake of convenience call such persons 'trespassers') and what the duty should then be, that is, a duty of care in the terms
f of s 1(3), more narrow than that imposed by the 1957 Act. Thus the duty owed to visitors and the lesser duty which may be owed to trespassers was defined in appropriate terms. But, in each Act, there are further provisions which define the content of the duty and, depending upon the particular circumstances, its scope and extent.

g [69] The first and fundamental definition is to be found in both Acts. The duty is owed 'in respect of dangers due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them'. In the 1957 Act it is s 1(1). In the 1984 Act it is in s 1(1)(a) which forms the starting point for determining whether any duty is owed to the trespasser (see also s 1(3)) and provides the subject matter of any duty h which may be owed. It is this phrase which provides the basic definition of 'danger' as used elsewhere in the Acts. There are two alternatives. The first is that it must be due to the state of the premises. The state of the premises is the physical features of the premises as they exist at the relevant time. It can include footpaths covered in ice and open mine shafts. It will not normally include parts j of the landscape, say, steep slopes or difficult terrain in mountainous areas or cliffs close to cliff paths. There will certainly be dangers requiring care and experience from the visitor but it normally would be a misuse of language to describe such features as 'the state of the premises'. The same could be said about trees and, at any rate, natural lakes and rivers. The second alternative is dangers due to things done or omitted to be done on the premises. Thus if shooting is taking place on the premises, a danger to visitors may arise from that fact. If speed boats are allowed to go into an area where swimmers are, the safety of the swimmers may be endangered. a [70] In the present case, the mere was used for a number of activities—angling, board-sailing, sub-aqua, canoeing and sailing model yachts—but none of these was suggested to have given rise to any danger to Mr Tomlinson or others. Therefore Mr Tomlinson has to found his case upon a danger due to the ‘state of the premises’. His difficulty is that the judge has found that there was none and he has accepted that finding. Therefore his case fails in limine. If there was no such danger the remainder of the provisions of the Acts all of which depend upon the existence of such a danger cannot assist him. Mr Tomlinson clearly appreciated this when he brought his claim since his statement of claim specifically pleaded that there had been ‘an obstruction under the surface of the water’ on which he struck his head. The judge found that there was no such obstruction. b

[71] Section 2 of the 1957 Act deals with the content of the duty (if any). Thus s 2(2) defines the common duty of care as one—

‘to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there.’ d

If swimming is not one of those purposes, the duty of care does not extend to him while he is swimming. Section 2(3) deals with what circumstances are relevant to assessing any duty owed. They include ‘the degree of care, and of want of care, which would ordinarily be looked for in such a visitor’. Examples are given: ‘(a) an occupier must be prepared for children to be less careful than adults ...’ A skilled visitor can be expected to appreciate and guard against risks ordinarily incident to his skilled activities (see s 2(2)(b)). An obvious instance of the second example is a steeple jack brought in to repair a spire or an electrician to deal with faulty wiring. Here, Mr Tomlinson was an 18-year-old youth who ought to be well able to appreciate and cope with the character of an ordinary lake. He can take care of himself; he does not need to be looked after in the same way as a child. e

[72] Turning to the 1984 Act, one can observe the same features. The basic requirement of a ‘danger due to the state of the premises’ is there. Section 1(2) contains a cross-reference to s 2(2) of the earlier Act. Section 1(3) depends upon the existence, and knowledge, of a danger coming within s 1(1). The risk of personal injury arising from that danger must further be one against which, in all the circumstances, it is reasonable to expect the occupier ‘to offer the [trespasser] some protection’. The equivalent phrase ‘reasonable in all the circumstances’ is used in sub-ss (4), (5). Subsection (5) specifically permits the use of warnings and discouragements against incurring the relevant risk. g

[73] It is an irony of the present case that Mr Tomlinson has found it easier to put his case under the 1984 Act than under the 1957 Act and argue, in effect, that the occupier owed a higher duty to a trespasser than to a visitor. This is because the inclusion of the words in s 2(4), duty ‘to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned’. Mr Tomlinson did suffer injury whilst on the premises; the councils failed to see that he did not. Whilst this argument in any event fails on account of the fundamental point that the state of the premises did not give rise to any danger, it would be perverse to construe these two Acts of Parliament so as to give the 1984 Act the effect which Mr Tomlinson contends for. (See also the quotation from the Law Commission j a report by Brooke LJ in his judgment in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 231 at [72], [2003] 3 All ER 1101 at [72], [2003] 2 WLR 1138.) The key is in the circumstances and what it is reasonable to expect of the occupier. The reference to warnings and discouragements in sub-s (5) and the use of the words 'some protection' in sub-s (3)(c) both demonstrate that the duty is not as onerous as Mr Tomlinson argues. Warnings can be disregarded (as was the case here); discouragements can be evaded; the trespasser may still be injured (or injure himself) while on the premises. There is no guarantee of safety any more than there is under the 1957 Act. The question remains what it is reasonable to expect the occupier to do for unauthorised trespassers on his land. The trespasser by avoiding getting the consent of the occupier, avoids having conditions or restrictions imposed upon his entry or behaviour once on the premises. By definition, the occupier cannot control the trespasser in the same way as he can control a visitor. The Acts both lay stress upon what is reasonable in all the circumstances. Such circumstances must be relevant to the relative duties owed under the two Acts.

[74] Returning to the facts of this case, what more was it reasonable to expect of the councils beyond putting up the notices and issuing warnings and prohibitions? It will not have escaped your Lordships that the putting up of the notices prohibiting swimming is the peg which Mr Tomlinson uses to acquire the status of trespasser and the benefit of the suggested more favourable duty of care under the 1984 Act. But this is a case where, as held by the judge, all the relevant characteristics of this mere were already obvious to Mr Tomlinson. In these circumstances, no purpose was in fact served by the warning. It told Mr Tomlinson nothing he did not already know. (See Staples v West Dorset DC (1995) 93 LGR 536, Whyte v Redland Aggregates Ltd [1997] CA Transcript 2034, Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670, Darby v National Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 189, [2001] PIQR P372.) The location was not one from which one could dive into water from a height. There was a shallow gradually sloping sandy beach. The bather had to wade in and Mr Tomlinson knew exactly how deep the water was where he was standing with the water coming up to a little above his knees. Mr Tomlinson's case is so far from giving a cause of action under the statute that it is hard to discuss coherently the hypotheses upon which it depends. There was no danger; any danger did not arise from the state of the premises; any risk of striking the bottom from diving in such shallow water was obvious; Mr Tomlinson did not need to be warned against running that risk; it was not reasonable to expect the occupier to offer the claimant (or any other trespasser) any protection against that obvious risk.

[75] Faced with these insuperable difficulties and with the fact that they had failed to prove the pleaded case, counsel for Mr Tomlinson put the argument in a different way. They pointed to the internal reports and minutes disclosed by the defendant councils. Passing over a minute of 22 November 1984 which under the heading 'Swimming' accurately stated:

'Probably as a result of the larger notice boards the problems of swimming were no worse than in previous years and perhaps marginally better. Every reasonable precaution had now been taken, but it was recognised that some foolhardy persons would continue to put their lives at risk.'

They referred to an undated report of some time in 1992 concerning swimming in the mere. It reported many instances of swimming during hot spells with up to 2,000 people present and as many as 100 in the water. It referred to the popularity of the extensive beach areas with families where children paddled and made sandcastles and groups picnicked, adding 'not unnaturally many [people] will venture into the water for a swim'. The 'hazards' pointing to the likelihood of future problems were stated to include 'lakeside grassy picnic area'. The recommendations were directed at the beach areas: 'Suggest cutting down on beach area by increasing reed zones'. 'Signs should indicate the nature of the hazard eg "Danger—Water 5m deep".' It is clear that accidents such as that suffered by Mr Tomlinson were not in the writer's mind. Other similar reports are referred to in the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann and it is otiose to quote from them again. a

[76] In July of the same year a departmental memorandum referred to the council's policy to stop all swimming. It therefore called upon the council to engage on a scheme of landscaping to make 'the water's edge to be far less accessible, desirable and inviting than it currently is for children's beach/water's edge type of play activities'. The solution called for was to remove or cover over the beaches and replace them by muddy reed beds. Part of the reasoning was that with attractive beaches 'accidents become inevitable' and 'we must therefore do everything that is reasonably possible to deter, discourage and prevent people from swimming or paddling in the lake or diving into the lake'. An estimate of cost was asked for. c
d

[77] Funds were short but in 1994 a request for finance was presented. It was based upon the public's disregard of the embargo on bathing in the lake despite having 'taken all reasonable steps' to educate the public. The request states that 'we have on average three or four near drownings every year and it is only a matter of time before someone dies'. 'If nothing is done about [the landscaping] and someone dies the Borough Council is to be held liable and would have to accept responsibility.' This was the nub of Mr Tomlinson's case. The situation was dangerous. The councils realised that they should do something about it—remove the beaches and make the water's edge unattractive and not so easily accessible. They recognised that they would be liable if they did not do so. This reasoning needs to be examined. e

[78] The first point to be made is that the councils were always at liberty, subject to the Local Government Acts, to have and enforce a no swimming policy. Indeed this had all along been one of the factors which had driven their management of this park. Likewise, subject to the same important qualification, they were at liberty to take moral responsibility for and pay compensation for any accident that might occur in the park. It is to be doubted that this was ever, so stated, their view. But neither of these factors create any legal liability which is what is in question in the present case. If they mistakenly misunderstood what the law required of them or what their legal liabilities were, that does not make them legally liable. g

[79] The second point is the mistreatment of the concept of risk. To suffer a broken neck and paralysis for life could hardly be a more serious injury; any loss of life is a consequence of the greatest seriousness. There was undoubtedly a risk of drowning for inexperienced, incompetent or drunken swimmers in the deeper parts of the mere or in patches of weed when they were out of their depth although no lives had actually been lost. But there was no evidence of any incident where anyone before Mr Tomlinson had broken his neck by plunging from a standing position and striking his head on the smooth sandy bottom on which he was standing. Indeed, at the trial it was not his case that this was what had happened; he had alleged that there must have been some obstruction. j a There had been some evidence of two other incidents where someone suffered a minor injury (a cut or a graze) to their head whilst diving but there was no evidence that these two incidents were in any way comparable with that involving Mr Tomlinson. It is then necessary to put these few incidents in context. The park had been open to the public since about 1982. Some 160,000 people used to visit the park in a year. Up to 200 would be bathing in the mere on a fine summer's day. Yet the number of incidents involving the mere were so few. It is a fallacy to say that because drowning is a serious matter that there is therefore a serious risk of drowning. In truth the risk of a drowning was very low indeed and there had never actually been one and the accident suffered by Mr Tomlinson was unique. Whilst broken necks can result from incautious or reckless diving, the probability of one being suffered in the circumstances of Mr Tomlinson were so remote that the risk was minimal. The internal reports before his accident make the common but elementary error of confusing the seriousness of the outcome with the degree of risk that it will occur.

d [80] The third point is that this confusion leads to the erroneous conclusion that there was a significant risk of injury presented to Mr Tomlinson when he went into the shallow water on the day in question. One cannot say that there was no risk of injury because we know now what happened. But, in my view, it was objectively so small a risk as not to trigger s 1(1) of the 1984 Act, otherwise every injury would suffice because it must imply the existence of some risk. However, and probably more importantly, the degree of risk is central to the assessment of what reasonably should be expected of the occupier and what would be a reasonable response to the existence of that degree of risk. The response should be appropriate and proportionate to both the degree of risk and the seriousness of the outcome at risk. If the risk of serious injury is so slight and remote that it is highly unlikely ever to materialise, it may well be that it is not reasonable to expect the occupier to take any steps to protect anyone against it. The law does not require disproportionate or unreasonable responses.

g [81] The fourth point, one to which I know that your Lordships attach importance, is the fact that it is not, and should never be, the policy of the law to require the protection of the foolhardy or reckless few to deprive, or interfere with, the enjoyment by the remainder of society of the liberties and amenities to which they are rightly entitled. Does the law require that all trees be cut down because some youths may climb them and fall? Does the law require the coastline and other beauty spots to be lined with warning notices? Does the law require that attractive water-side picnic spots be destroyed because of a few foolhardy individuals who choose to ignore warning notices and indulge in activities dangerous only to themselves? The answer to all these questions is, of course, No. But this is the road down which your Lordships, like other courts before, have been invited to travel and which the councils in the present case found so inviting. In truth, the arguments for Mr Tomlinson have involved an attack upon the liberties of the citizen which should not be countenanced. They attack the liberty of the individual to engage in dangerous, but otherwise harmless, pastimes at his own risk and the liberty of citizens as a whole fully to enjoy the variety and quality of the landscape of this country. The pursuit of an unrestrained culture of blame and compensation has many evil consequences and one is certainly the interference with the liberty of the citizen. The discussion of social utility in the Illinois Supreme Court is to the same effect (see Bucheleres v Chicago Park District (1996) 171 Ill 2d 435 at 457–458).

[82] I cannot leave this case without expressing my complete agreement with the reasoning of the judgment of Lord Phillips MR in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 1101. a

[83] For these reasons and those given by my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann, and in agreement with the judgment of Longmore LJ, I too would allow this appeal. b

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE. b

[84] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. Subject to one reservation I am in complete agreement with the reasons he gives for allowing this appeal. But I find myself in such fundamental disagreement with the approach to this case by the majority in the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 309, [2003] 3 All ER 1122, [2003] 2 WLR 1120) that I want to add, also, a few comments of my own. c

[85] My reservation is that the Act which must be applied to the facts of this case in order to decide whether the council is under any liability to Mr Tomlinson is, in my opinion, the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, not the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. d

[86] The 1957 Act regulates the duty of care which an occupier of premises owes to visitors to the premises (see s 1(1)). 'Visitors' are persons who would, at common law, be invitees or licensees (see s 1(2)). The 1984 Act, on the other hand, applies to persons on the premises who are not visitors but are trespassers. It lays down the criteria for deciding whether the occupier of the premises owes any duty of care at all to the trespasser in question in relation to the type of injury he has suffered (see s 1(3)). If a duty of care is owed, the Act describes the duty (see s 1(4)). e

[87] Mr Tomlinson's case against the council is based on an alleged breach of the duty of care they owed him. There is no doubt at all that he was a visitor at the park. The park was open to the public and he was entitled to be there. Wearing the shoes of a visitor, he was owed the duty of care prescribed by the 1957 Act. f

[88] The notices prominently displayed at various places in the park forbade swimming in the lake. But entry into the water was not forbidden. Visitors to the park were entitled to paddle and splash in the shallows of the lake. Many did so, particularly children. They were entitled to run into the water and splash one another. They were entitled to lie in the shallows and let the cool water lap over them. In doing these things they were visitors and were owed the 1957 Act duty of care. All they were forbidden to do was to swim. If they had started swimming, using the lake for a purpose which was forbidden, they would have lost their status as visitors and become trespassers. The 1984 Act would then have applied. g

[89] Mr Tomlinson did not suffer his tragic accident while swimming in the lake. He ran into the water and, when the depth of the water was at mid thigh level, executed the disastrous 'dive' and suffered the accident. At no stage did he swim. It may be that his 'dive' was preparatory to swimming. But swimming in water not much above knee level, say 2 feet 6 inches deep, is difficult. There might be some element of flotation but I do not think the activity would normally justify the use of the verb 'swim'. In any event, Mr Tomlinson's injury was not caused while he was swimming and cannot be attributed in any way to the dangers of swimming. His complaint against the council is that the council did not take reasonable care to discourage him while in the shallows of the lake from h a executing a 'dive'. If the 'dive' was, which I regard as doubtful for the reasons given, a preliminary to an attempt to swim, the complaint may be regarded as a complaint that the council failed to prevent him from becoming a trespasser. But this must necessarily, in my view, have been a duty owed to him while he was a visitor.

[90] An analogous situation might arise in relation to the trees in the park. b Suppose there were notices forbidding the climbing of trees. None the less a visitor to the park climbs a tree, falls from it, injures himself and sues the council. He would have been a trespasser vis-à-vis the tree. But a claim under the 1984 Act would be hopeless. The proposition that the council owed him a duty to make the tree easier or safer to climb would be ridiculous. But the injured climber might contend that the presence of the tree posed an enticing, exciting c and irresistible challenge to those visitors to the park who, like himself, were addicted to the adrenalin surge caused by climbing high trees and that, consequently, the council owed a duty to make it impossible for him, and others like him, to succumb to the temptation, to prevent him from becoming a trespasser vis-à-vis the tree. This duty, if it were owed at all, would be a duty d owed to him, a visitor, under the 1957 Act. The contention would, of course, be rejected. The council's 1957 Act duty of care to its visitors would not require the trees to be cut down or the trunks and lower branches to be festooned with barbed wire in order to prevent visitors to the park from disobeying the notices and turning themselves into trespassers by climbing the trees. For present purposes, however, the point I want to make is that the climber's contention e would engage the 1957 Act, not the 1984 Act.

[91] In the present case it seems to me unreal to regard Mr Tomlinson's injury as having been caused while he was a trespasser. His complaint, rejected by the trial judge but accepted by the majority in the Court of Appeal, was that the council ought to have taken effective steps to discourage entry by visitors into the f waters of the lake. The notices were held to be inadequate discouragement. But, if there was this duty, it was a duty owed to visitors. The people who read the notices, or who could have read them but failed to do so, would have been visitors. These were the people to be discouraged. The alleged duty was a 1957 Act duty.

[92] The council's duty under the 1957 Act to its visitors was a duty 'to take g such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted ... to be there' (see s 2(2)). The purpose for which visitors were invited or permitted to be in the park was general recreation. This included paddling and playing about in the water. The proposition that in order to h discharge their 1957 Act duty to visitors the council had to discourage them from any entry into the water and, in effect, to prevent the paddling and playing about that so many had for so long enjoyed is, in my opinion, for the reasons so cogently expressed by Lord Hoffmann, wholly unacceptable. There was no breach by the council of its 1957 Act duty. The question whether it owed any 1984 Act duty did j not, in my opinion, arise. If, wrongly in my opinion, the 1984 Act were to be regarded as applicable, the case would be a fortiori.

[93] There are two respects, in my opinion, in which the approach of the courts below to the facts of this case have been somewhat unreal. First, the action of Mr Tomlinson that brought about his tragic injury has been described as a 'dive'. I think it is misdescribed. A dive into water, as normally understood, involves a hands-arms-head-first movement from a standpoint above the water down into the water. A dive is dangerous if the depth of the water is unknown for the obvious reason that if the depth is inadequate the head may strike the bottom of the pool or the lake before the diver is able to check his downwards trajectory and curve out of the dive. There had, apparently, been two previous occasions over the past five years or so on which a person diving into the lake had suffered head injuries. The evidence did not disclose the details but it seems reasonable to assume that these occasions had involved dives properly so-called. Mr Tomlinson did not execute a dive in the ordinary sense. He ran into the lake and, when he thought he was far enough in to do so, he threw himself forward. His forward plunge may, for want of a better word, be called a 'dive' but it should not be confused with the normal and usual dive. Mr Tomlinson was not diving from a standpoint above the lake down into water of uncertain depth. His feet were on the bottom of the lake immediately before he executed his forward plunge. He knew how deep the water was when he began the plunge. He must have expected the downward shelving of the bottom of the lake to continue and there is no evidence that it did not. The accident happened because the trajectory of his forward plunge was not sufficiently shallow. This was not a diving accident in the ordinary sense and there was no evidence that an accident caused in the manner in which Mr Tomlinson's was caused had ever previously occurred at the lake.

[94] Second, much was made of the trial judge's finding that the dangers of diving or swimming in the lake were obvious, at least to adults. No one has contested that finding of fact. But I think its importance has been overstated. Mr Tomlinson was not diving in the normal sense, nor was he swimming. He simply ran into the water and when he could not run any further, because the water was above his knees and the galloping action that we all adopt when running into water on a shelving beach had become too difficult, he plunged forward. This is something that happens on every beach in every country in the world, temperature and conditions permitting. Mr Tomlinson would not have stopped to think about the dangers of swimming or diving in the lake. He was not taking a pre-meditated risk. It would not have occurred to him, if he had thought about it, that he was taking a risk at all. He was a high-spirited young man enjoying himself with his friends in a pleasant park with a pleasant water facility. If he had set out to swim across the lake, it might have been relevant to speak of his taking an obvious risk. If he had climbed a tree with branches overhanging the lake and had dived from a branch into the water he would have been courting an obvious danger. But he was not doing any such thing. He was simply sporting about in the water with his friends, giving free rein to his exuberance. And why not? And why should the council be discouraged by the law of tort from providing facilities for young men and young women to enjoy themselves in this way? Of course there is some risk of accidents arising out of the joie de vivre of the young. But that is no reason for imposing a grey and dull safety regime on everyone. This appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Cross-appeal dismissed.

AD v East Kent Community NHS Trust

[2002] EWCA Civ 1872

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

JUDGE, LONGMORE LJ AND SULLIVAN J

3, 17 DECEMBER 2002

Damages – Unwanted pregnancy – Negligence – Assessment of damages – Patient detained under Mental Health Act 1983 – Patient becoming pregnant while in care of NHS Trust and giving birth to healthy child – Patient unable to care for child – Whether damages recoverable by patient for costs incurred by grandmother in rearing child.

The claimant was a patient detained under the Mental Health Act 1983 in the care of the defendant NHS trust. She suffered from mental instability as a result of brain damage caused by a childhood illness. She was transferred to a mixed psychiatric ward where she became pregnant as a result of having sexual intercourse with an unknown patient. She gave birth to a healthy daughter although she was unable to care for her. The child's grandmother applied for and was granted a residence order and took on all responsibility for looking after the child. The claimant issued proceedings against the defendant alleging that the pregnancy and resultant birth were caused by the defendant's negligence while it was responsible for her psychiatric care, and seeking damages for, inter alia, the costs of the child's upbringing, maintenance and education. At a preliminary hearing the judge decided that the claimant was not entitled to claim loss and damage in respect of those costs. The claimant appealed contending, inter alia, that there was no basis for distinguishing between a severely incapacitated mother, whose disability added expense, which was claimable, to the costs of rearing a healthy child born as a result of medical negligence, and herself, who was totally disabled from caring for her child.

Held – Even if the birth of a child resulted from medical negligence, damages were not recoverable to compensate for the cost of rearing a healthy child. In the instant case, the costs of rearing the child were not 'additional' or 'extra' in the sense that they arose from the child's or the mother's disability. They were costs, being borne by someone other than the mother, which would have been borne by the child's mother if she had been fit. As a head of damages, those costs were not recoverable as part of the mother's claim. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [14], [17], [19], [20], below).

Appeal

The claimant, A, a patient detained under s 3 of the Mental Health Act 1983 and in the care of the defendant, the East Kent Community NHS Trust, brought proceedings against the defendant, alleging that her pregnancy and the resultant birth of her child were caused by the defendant's negligence while it was responsible for her psychiatric care. The claimant appealed, with permission granted by Cooke J, against his decision on 24 May 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2256 (QB), [2002] 3 FCR 658) on the trial of a preliminary issue, that the claimant was not entitled to claim damage and loss in respect of the child's upbringing, maintenance and education. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. d

Cur adv vult f

17 December 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

JUDGE LJ.

[1] This litigation arises from the birth of a child, C, on 27 July 1998. Her father is unknown. Her mother, the claimant, A, was born on 16 March 1971. Her maternal grandmother, Mrs A, was born on 3 October 1950. g

[2] C is a healthy little girl. Her grandmother, now aged 52 years, is also fit and well. Unfortunately, the claimant suffers from mental instability, the result of brain damage caused by encephalopathic illness when she was five years old. h

[3] A has been intellectually impaired ever since, and her behaviour is 'characterised by manic mood swings, aggression, temper tantrums, promiscuity and disinhibition'. She is 'sectioned' under s 3 of the Mental Health Act 1983, and in March 1997, after a series of placements, she was transferred to a mixed psychiatric ward at St Martin's Hospital, Canterbury, which was run by the defendant NHS Trust. j

[4] According to the pleaded case, towards the end of October 1997, the claimant became pregnant 'as a result of having sexual intercourse with an unknown patient'. Although the word rape was mentioned in argument, nothing is known of the circumstances. When the claimant discovered her pregnancy, a 'scan' was carried out on 19 January 1998 [which] showed her to a be eleven weeks and five days pregnant. The claimant decided not to have a termination, and her daughter was born on July 27 1998'.

b [5] Shortly before the child's birth, after a case conference convened by social services, she was designated as a 'child in need'. Rather than arrangements for fostering or adoption, immediately after her birth, her grandmother applied to Canterbury County Court for a residence order. This was made on 31 July. Since then the child has been brought up by her grandmother, who has accepted responsibility for looking after her for the 'foreseeable future'.

c [6] It is not contended that A's inability to care for C was caused by the defendants. Her long-term problem preceded her admission to the hospital for which they were responsible. What is alleged is that the pregnancy and resultant birth of the child were caused by the defendants' negligence, while they were responsible for her psychiatric care. The factual matters alleged are in dispute, but for present purposes must be assumed to be correct:

d 'The defendants: (a) Placed the claimant in a mixed psychiatric ward, when it was obviously unsuitable for her; (b) Failed to place the claimant in a single-sex ward; (c) Failed to arrange for the claimant to be sterilised or given some form of contraception to prevent her from becoming pregnant; (d) Failed to solicit and obtain the claimant's consent to be sterilised or given some form of contraception to prevent her from becoming pregnant and / or, if it was refused, to seek the assistance of the court authorising her sterilisation or the provision of a suitable method of contraception; (e) Failed to heed and act upon Mrs A's express concerns about the claimant's vulnerability, including the risk of her becoming pregnant; (f) Failed to provide an adequate level of supervision of the claimant and in the ward generally, and (g) Failed to prevent the claimant from becoming pregnant.'

f [7] For completeness, we must add that the defendants have denied negligence. They contend that the claimant 'was capable of deciding whether or not to engage in sexual intercourse and ... whether or not to consent to contraceptive treatment', and that she was fully aware of the risks of pregnancy and the benefits of contraceptive measures, which she had elected not to use. g The defendants also draw attention to the absence from the claimant's case of any assertion that she had no desire to become pregnant, or that the child was unwanted, or that she was unaware of the risk of pregnancy if contraception was not used. These are all matters which will be decided in due course at a full hearing. At the risk of repetition, we must proceed on the basis that the claimant's allegations are factually correct.

h [8] The loss consequent on the alleged negligence has two distinct ingredients. First, by para 9, the claimant 'suffered injury, namely the physical and psychological effects of the pregnancy, and the psychiatric trauma caused by her separation from and inability to bring up the child'. Second, by para 10, she 'sustained loss and damage, namely the costs of the child's upbringing, maintenance and education', on the basis that effectively the mother is carrying out all these necessary functions for and on behalf of her daughter. j

[9] This is an appeal from a decision by Cooke J dated 24 May 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2256 (QB), [2002] 3 FCR 658) at the trial of the preliminary issue which was confined to the second ingredient of the alleged loss: 'Whether the claimant is entitled to claim in respect of the child's upbringing, maintenance and education.' Cooke J decided that the claimant was not so entitled, and gave her permission to appeal. a [10] In reaching his decision, Cooke J was bound by the decisions and principles set out in three authorities. They are equally binding on us. These were: McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59, Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266 and Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [2002] EWCA Civ 88, [2002] 2 All ER 177, [2003] 1 QB 20. We understand that permission to appeal this third decision has been granted by the House of Lords. b

[11] The starting point is McFarlane's case. By a majority, the House of Lords held that, in view of the negligence which had attended a vasectomy operation carried out on the father, the mother, who gave birth to a healthy, normal child, was entitled to general damages for pain and suffering, and the inconvenience of pregnancy and childbirth, together with associated special damages. The House also held, unanimously, that the cost of caring for and bringing up the baby were not recoverable. c

[12] The skeleton arguments before us carefully analysed the reasoning process by which each member of the House of Lords came to a conclusion. We do not think it necessary to examine the different judgments: the principle is clear. If A were capable of bringing up her child, based on McFarlane's case, the claim pleaded in para 10 would be unsustainable. d

[13] Since McFarlane's case, however, these issues have been reconsidered in this court. First, we must note Greenfield v Flather [2001] EWCA Civ 113, (2001) 59 BMLR 43, [2001] WLR 1279. Following the birth of a healthy child, the mother made a claim for the loss of earnings sustained when she gave up work to care for and bring up her child. Although for the purposes of argument, the Court of Appeal was prepared to accept that the House in McFarlane's case was not consciously directing its attention to such a claim, the claim for these losses was held to fall within the McFarlane principle, and hence was unsustainable. For example, May LJ ((2001) 59 BMLR 43 at [44]) could discern no 'material distinction between the costs of caring for and bringing up a child held to be irrecoverable in McFarlane's case, and the mother's claim for loss of earnings'. Laws LJ thought it sufficient for the decision to reflect that the existence of a healthy child could not be categorised as a detriment sounding in damages. The argument before us makes it unnecessary to deal with the further distinction sought to be drawn with McFarlane's case, that the claim there was decided on the basis of economic loss resulting from negligent advice, rather than physical injury caused by negligent omission, as in Greenfield v Flather. e
g
h

[14] As we are here concerned with the birth of a healthy child, we need not consider the problems which might have arisen if C had been disabled at birth. In Parkinson's case and Groom v Selby [2001] EWCA Civ 1522, (2002) 64 BMLR 47, and a number of cases at first instance, a distinction was drawn between McFarlane's case, where a healthy child was born, and such cases. That said, Parkinson's case lends emphasis to the principle that the ordinary costs of rearing a child cannot be recovered: the admissible claim was directed to the 'additional' costs arising from the child's disability. j

[15] In the present case, of course, unlike McFarlane's case and indeed Parkinson's case, the mother herself was disabled: so we must consider a further a distinction with McFarlane's case. Inevitably, and rightly, therefore, our particular attention was focused on Rees's case, where the mother's vision was substantially impaired. Mr Nicolas Yell pointed out to us that, notwithstanding the residence order, in this case the mother herself was not divested of her statutory parental responsibility for her child under the Children Act 1989, and the Child Support Act 1991. This responsibility may indeed have survived the residence order, but no one has suggested that in practical terms this responsibility is, or may become more than technical or theoretical, and, in any event, it extends to the normal obligation of maintenance and support of the child. Moreover, it is expressly pleaded that C will be brought up by her grandmother, who will be 'looking after her for the foreseeable future', and the claimant herself claims damages for the psychiatric trauma 'caused by her separation from and inability to bring up' her daughter. It is not alleged that the mother's disability will involve additional expense, beyond the cost inevitably involved in rearing a healthy child. Given that the House of Lords will be examining Rees's case, we shall not complicate the debate by adding any observations of our own. It is sufficient to record that, although the disability d in this case arose from the mother's mental, rather than any physical infirmity, if she had been going to bring up her own child, and if further, her disability would have required her to incur additional cost while doing so, we should have been required to apply Rees's case.

[16] To overcome the difficulty presented by the principle in McFarlane's case, Mr Yell submitted that there was no logical basis for distinguishing e between the severely incapacitated mother and the claimant, who is totally disabled from caring for her child. It was not 'fair, just and reasonable', within the ambit of the Caparo principle (see Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605), to hold that the prohibition created by McFarlane's f case extended as far as this case, in which the grandmother had assumed the burden of care and support. He submitted that the birth of the child to this mother provided no benefit whatever to her: to the contrary, she was seeking an award of damages to compensate her for psychiatric illness caused by deprivation of the joys of motherhood. In this context, Hale LJ's metaphor of 'deemed equilibrium' (see Parkinson's case [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [90] and Rees's g case [2002] 2 All ER 177 at [10]) was apposite, because the birth of her child produced no benefits for the mother. Accordingly, and in summary, taking this mother as they found her (that is, unable through mental infirmity to care for her child), the costs of bringing the child up were 'additional' or 'extra' costs for the grandmother arising from the mother's total disability. During the course h of his reply, Mr Yell suggested that the claim should be seen as the valuation of substituted care provided by another carer. However, he did not seek to amend para 10(v), and suggested that this new approach to the claim was subsumed in the original pleading.

i [17] Despite Mr Yell's persuasive submissions, in reality, this mother is claiming as damages the entire cost of bringing up and supporting her healthy child on the basis that, although she could not recover such damages herself if she were fit and healthy (see McFarlane's case), and could recover only the 'extra' costs occasioned by her disability if she were partly disabled (see Rees's case), she should now recover all these costs because her mother has fully accepted the responsibilities which would otherwise have fallen on her. In effect, her mother has replaced her in the life of her child, carrying both the emotional and financial burdens. a

[18] This is not a claim for damages either by the child herself, nor indeed by her grandmother. The principles which govern cases where a relative gratuitously provides care for an injured claimant are well understood. Damages are recoverable from the tortfeasor to the injured claimant for the reasonable value of such services, and are then held in trust for the benefit of the person providing the voluntary care (see Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 All ER 385, [1994] 2 AC 350). Notwithstanding some of the difficulties about the concept of a trust created in these circumstances, for present purposes it is enough, but crucial, to notice that Lord Bridge of Harwich ([1994] 2 All ER 385 at 389, [1994] 2 AC 350 at 358), giving the judgment with which the other members of the House agreed, made clear that the person providing the voluntary services has no cause of action of her own. b c

[19] As a matter of principle, therefore, we are required to focus on the sustainability of a claim by the mother for the cost of rearing her healthy child. It is illuminating to contrast the position of the mother, who has lost earnings as a result of giving up work to care for her injured child (the situation in Donnelly v Joyce [1973] 3 All ER 475, [1974] QB 454) with that of the mother, similarly losing earnings, in order to be at home to care for the healthy child born to her as a result of the defendant's negligence (as in Greenfield v Flather (2001) 59 BMLR 43, [2001] WLR 1279). Although some of Megaw LJ's observations in Donnelly's case about the basis of the mother's claim are no longer authoritative, no one doubts that the tortious defendant would be liable to pay damages to the injured child if his mother were to suffer loss of earnings in order to be at home to care for him. Nevertheless, as we have already seen, in Greenfield v Flather, losses sustained on the same basis (loss of earnings to be at home to care for a healthy child) were not recoverable by the mother who had been the victim of negligence by a hospital authority. The difference is not accidental: it reflects the principle that even if the birth of the child resulted from medical negligence, damages are not recoverable to compensate for the cost of rearing a healthy child, notwithstanding that identifiable expense can be established. d e f g

[20] The cost of rearing C is not 'additional' or 'extra' in the sense envisaged in Parkinson's case and Rees' case. For all practical purposes, they are the same costs, now being borne by someone other than the mother, Mrs A, gratuitously providing for her granddaughter in the same way as the child's mother would have done, if she had been fit. As a head of damages, on the authorities, these costs are not recoverable as part of the mother's claim. h

[21] We must add that we do not accept that this child cannot and never will provide any possible benefit to her mother. It is not inconceivable that in years to come C will discover within herself a well-spring of affection for the mother who bore her, who, even in her continuing mental infirmity, will derive unanticipated comfort and strength from it. And if the claim could be advanced by Mrs A herself (which, for the reasons we have given, it has not and cannot) it would be invidious to attempt to put a money value on the benefit that she will derive from the joy of having her healthy granddaughter living with her and growing up in her home. j a [22] We naturally have great sympathy for Mrs A as well as considerable admiration for the way in which she has come to C's rescue and provided her with the love and care that she needs. We must, however, dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, KAY AND DYSON LJ

25, 26 NOVEMBER, 16 DECEMBER 2002

Immigration – Deportation – Refugee – Asylum – Right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion – Asylum seekers without well-founded fear of persecution – Deportation of asylum seekers not leading to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment – Whether deportation of asylum seekers leading to breach of right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion lawful – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, arts 3, 9.

In the first of two conjoined appeals, the claimant, an active member of the Ahmadhiya faith who carried out preaching and teaching, entered the United Kingdom from Pakistan and applied for asylum on the basis of persecution he had suffered as a result of practising his religion, and for permission to remain by virtue of the rights contained in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the convention). The Secretary of State did not accept that the claimant had shown that he had a well-founded fear of persecution under the Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees 1951 (the refugee convention) and dismissed his claim for asylum. He also concluded that the claimant had not shown that he qualified for permission to remain under any of the articles of the convention. The special adjudicator dismissed the claimant's appeal, holding that he did not fall within the refugee convention and that while art 9^a of the convention, guaranteeing the freedom of religion, was engaged, the Secretary of State had acted lawfully and proportionately in pursuance of the legitimate aim of immigration control. The claimant's application for judicial review was refused and permission to appeal granted only in relation to the claimant's reliance on art 9.

In the second appeal, the claimant, a Vietnamese Roman Catholic who had been teaching the Catholic religion to children in Vietnam, made similar claims under the refugee convention and arts 3^b and 9 of the convention. Article 3 provided that no one should be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The immigration appeal tribunal upheld the refusal of the immigration adjudicator to grant her asylum and her claims under arts 3 and 9. The evidence showed that there was local variation in Vietnam in the restrictive treatment of persons practising religion. The claimant appealed. At the hearing of the conjoined appeals the court identified the following issues:

a Article 9, so far as material, is set out at [2], below.

b Article 3 provides: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

a (i) whether the 1998 Act, together with art 9 of the convention, required the United Kingdom to give refuge to immigrants who were prevented from freely practising, and in particular from preaching or teaching, their religion in their own countries; and (ii) the extent to which the 1998 Act inhibited the United Kingdom from expelling asylum seekers who fell short of demonstrating a well-founded fear of persecution.

b Held – (1) The underlying rationale for the application of the convention to the act of expulsion was that it was an affront to fundamental humanitarian principles to remove an individual to a country where there was a real risk of serious ill-treatment, even though such ill-treatment might not satisfy the criteria of persecution under the refugee convention. Article 3 of the convention provided the test. The European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) had not yet taken the step of extending the scope of the convention to articles other than art 3 where the apprehended treatment of a deportee in the receiving state would fall short of that covered by art 3. Sections 3 and 6 of the 1998 Act did not require United Kingdom courts to take that further step. There was no domestic authority requiring the court to hold that where an alien was removed to a country where his right to practice his religion was inhibited, art 9 would, or could, be engaged. Accordingly, a decision to remove an asylum seeker to a country that did not respect his rights under art 9 of the convention would not infringe the 1998 Act where the nature of the interference with the right to practice religion that was anticipated in the receiving state fell short of ill-treatment within the terms of art 3. The refugee convention and art 3 of the convention already catered for the more severe categories of ill-treatment on the ground of religion. It was not for the courts, but for the executive, or for Parliament, to decide whether to offer refuge to persons who were not in a position to claim refuge under the refugee convention, or the convention as currently applied by the ECHR (see [39], [47], [58], [60]–[63], below).

(2) Where the treatment to which an alien, refused the right to enter or remain, was likely to be subjected to by the receiving state fell outside art 3, there might be cases which justified the grant of exceptional leave to remain on humanitarian grounds. The decision of the Secretary of State in such cases would be subject to the ordinary principles of judicial review, but not to the constraints of the convention (see [64], below).

(3) In the instant appeals it was unnecessary to consider further the facts of the claimant in the first appeal's case, since it had already been determined that they did not engage art 3. In the claimant in the second appeal's case, the inhibition that might be placed on her right to practice her religion by the possibility that she might have to move from her home to a different part of the country fell far short of persecution under the refugee convention or ill-treatment that violated art 3 of the convention. Nor was art 9 of the convention engaged by her proposed removal. The appeals, would, accordingly be dismissed (see [3], [65], [67], [68], [70], below).

Appeals

R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator

The claimant, Ahsan Ullah, appealed with permission granted by Harrison J on 16 July 2002 from his judgment on that date ([2002] All ER (D) 235 (Jul)) refusing the claimant's application to quash the decision of the defendant special adjudicator, promulgated on 17 September 2001, dismissing his appeal against the refusal of the Secretary of State for the Home Department of his claim for asylum and rejection of his claim that it would be contrary to the Human Rights Act 1998 to remove him to his home country, Pakistan. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Do v Secretary of State for the Home Department

The claimant, Thi Lien Do, appealed, with permission granted by Tuckey LJ on 22 May 2002, from the determination of the immigration appeal tribunal (Judge Holden, M Padfield and SS Ramsumair) on 7 January 2002 upholding the decision of a special adjudicator (HS Coleman), promulgated on 5 September 2001, a upholding the refusal of the defendant Secretary of State to grant the claimant asylum and rejecting her claim that it would be contrary to the Human Rights Act to remove her to her home country, Vietnam. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

16 December 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

d INTRODUCTION

[1] There are before the court two conjoined appeals. Common to each is the following question. Does the Human Rights Act 1998, together with art 9 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) (the human rights convention), require this country to give a refuge to immigrants who are prevented from freely practising, and in particular from preaching or teaching, their religion in their own countries? This question reflects a wider issue. To what extent does the 1998 Act inhibit the United Kingdom from expelling asylum seekers who fall short of demonstrating a well-founded fear of persecution?

f [2] Article 9 of the human rights convention provides:

'Freedom of thought, conscience and religion

g 1. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

h 2. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

THE FACTS

Mr Ullah's appeal

j [3] This is an appeal from a judgment of Harrison J dated 16 July 2002 in which he refused Mr Ullah's application to quash the decision of an immigration adjudicator, promulgated on 17 September 2001. The adjudicator dismissed Mr Ullah's appeal against the Secretary of State's refusal to grant him asylum and rejected a claim that it would be contrary to the 1998 Act to remove him to his home country, Pakistan. Permission to seek judicial review was granted by Mr Jack Beatson QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court on 12 April 2002. Permission was, however, restricted to a single point—Mr Ullah's reliance on art 9 of the human rights convention. Harrison J, in his turn, gave permission to appeal 'on the basis of the importance of some of the points involved in the case'. a

[4] Mr Ullah is a citizen of Pakistan. He is an active member of the Ahmadiyya faith. In particular, on 28 December 1998 he was appointed 'secretary of teaching' in order to spread the beliefs of the Ahmadiyya faith and thereafter carried on what he has described as 'preaching duties' and 'preaching activities' in Pakistan. b

[5] On 15 January 2001 Mr Ullah arrived at Heathrow on a plane from Karachi. He entered the country on false documents that he had purchased in Karachi. He applied for asylum two days later. He claimed to have a well-founded fear of persecution as a result of persecution that he had suffered as a result of practising his faith. In particular, he alleged that he had been harassed, intimidated and, on two occasions, attacked by members of a religious terrorist group called Khatme Nabuwait, in whose activities the local police were complicit. On one occasion he said that he had been beaten and left for dead. On the other occasion he said that his house was burnt down. Faced with further death threats he fled to England. c

[6] The Secretary of State found some aspects of Mr Ullah's account to be implausible. He did not accept that Mr Ullah had demonstrated that he had a well-founded fear of persecution under the terms of the Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951; TS 39 (1954); Cmd 9171) (as amended by the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees (New York, 31 January 1967; TS 15 (1969); Cmd 3906)) (the refugee convention). He dismissed the claim for asylum. He further concluded that Mr Ullah had not demonstrated that he qualified for permission to remain in this country by reason of any of the articles of the human rights convention. d

[7] Mr Ullah appealed against the Home Secretary's decision. With the assistance of Thompson & Co, solicitors, he filed detailed grounds of appeal. Most of these were in terms that applied to the position of all Ahmadis in Pakistan. They alleged that Ahmadis were subject to persistent and organised persecution and that the government of Pakistan failed to provide protection to Ahmadis against religious extremists. e

[8] We set out in Annex A to our judgment the relevant findings of the adjudicator, Mrs Nichols, in relation to Mr Ullah's asylum application. We set out in Annex B her findings in relation to Mr Ullah's claim under the 1998 Act. In summary, the adjudicator did not find credible much of Mr Ullah's evidence and concluded that he did not have a well-founded fear of persecution. So far as his claim under the human rights convention is concerned, the adjudicator found that arts 9, 10 and 11 of the convention were engaged. She found that Ahmadis were a religious minority and that if Mr Ullah returned to Pakistan he would not enjoy the same rights as the majority. He would none the less be able to practise his religion. The articles invoked gave qualified rights. In refusing to permit Mr Ullah to remain in this country the Secretary of State was acting lawfully in pursuance of the legitimate aim of immigration control. The act of removing Mr Ullah to Pakistan was proportionate to any difficulties he might face on his return. f

[9] On the application to Harrison J for judicial review, counsel for Mr Ullah submitted that the adjudicator had been wrong to find that, by reason of art 9(2) of the human rights convention, immigration control was a legitimate aim which could justify interference with the art 9 rights. Counsel for the Secretary of State challenged this assertion, but argued that the adjudicator had erred in finding that g a art 9 was engaged at all. She submitted that, where art 9 was invoked as a bar to removal from the jurisdiction, it could only be engaged if the alleged violation was 'flagrant'. This it was not.

[10] Harrison J accepted the submissions made on behalf of the Secretary of State. He ruled that the alleged violation of art 9 was not flagrant. He further ruled that immigration control fell within the legitimate aims that were b recognised by art 9(2).

Miss Do's appeal

[11] This is an appeal from the final determination of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal dated 7 January 2002. The tribunal had upheld the decision of an immigration adjudicator, promulgated on 5 September 2001. The adjudicator c had upheld the refusal of the Secretary of State to grant Miss Do asylum. She also rejected a claim that it would be contrary to arts 3 and 5 of the human rights convention to remove Miss Do to her home country, Vietnam. The tribunal considered also whether Miss Do had a case under art 9, and concluded that she did not. Permission to appeal to this court was granted by Tuckey LJ, who
d remarked 'the art 9 point may be of some importance'.

[12] Miss Do is a citizen of Vietnam, where she was born in 1979. On 20 November 2000 she arrived in the United Kingdom clandestinely and without travel documents. On 13 December 2000 she claimed asylum. The basis of her claim was that she had a well-founded fear of persecution in Vietnam as a result e of her religious beliefs as a Catholic. The Secretary of State rejected her claim to asylum. He remarked that when questioned she had showed ignorance of the basic beliefs of the Catholic Church. She had never been arrested, detained or charged by the police in Vietnam. The Secretary of State considered whether Miss Do qualified for protection under any of the articles of the human rights convention and decided that she did not.

f [13] Miss Do supported her appeal to the adjudicator with an appeal statement, prepared with the assistance of Sheikh & Co, solicitors. This included the following statements:

g 'It is correct that recently the Vietnamese government has eased its control over church activities. There might be a certain freedom of religion in Vietnam in comparison with the past, but this is only the case for big cities. In the villages and in the countryside, Catholic Christians are still harassed by the Vietnamese authorities. For example in my village the church never got permission from the local authorities to be refurbished. The local authorities
h also confiscated the building where we were teaching catechism. When I was teaching Catholicism I was harassed by the authorities and suffered discrimination. The police came to my house many times and took me to the police station. In June 2001 I was taken twice to the police station. The police told me to stop teaching Catholicism or I would be arrested. I carried on teaching as my faith was stronger and because I thought that they could j not find out what I was doing. I did not feel safe anywhere in Vietnam and that is why I decided to leave the country. The Communist government wants children to be raised and taught according to Communist beliefs. Teaching Catholicism is believed to be acting against the government. If I were to be returned to Vietnam I could not practice my religion freely and I could not teach Catholicism, as it is my wish. The Vietnamese authorities would eventually arrest me and put me in prison. This happened to a lot of Christians in Vietnam and is still happening ... I suffered discrimination and threat to my life in my country of origin. If I was to be returned to Vietnam I could not practice my religion freely and I will not be allowed to teach Catholicism to the children, as it is my wish. Furthermore the Vietnamese authorities are suspicious towards people coming from abroad. I would be watched by the police even more closely. I fear for my safety and my freedom as I could be put into prison if I am required to return to Vietnam. I therefore request that I should be allowed to remain in the United Kingdom as a refugee recognised under the convention.'

[14] We set out in Annex C the relevant findings of the adjudicator. In summary, the adjudicator accepted Miss Do's evidence that she had practised the Catholic religion in Vietnam. That evidence included the statement that Miss Do taught the Catholic religion to children. The adjudicator found that, as a practising Catholic, Miss Do had suffered from discrimination and harassment, but that this fell short of persecution or violation of the human rights invoked by Miss Do. Miss Do could still practise her religion 'albeit under reduced circumstances'.

[15] Before the tribunal Miss Do was represented by counsel. The tribunal recorded her counsel's submission that, because Miss Do's ability to teach children about the Catholic faith was curtailed, there was a substantial interference with her right to practise a religion of her choice. In short, but adequate, reasons the tribunal expressed the view that the adjudicator had reached the correct decision for the reasons that she had given. In relation to art 9 the tribunal commented that the 'reduced circumstances' identified by the adjudicator appeared to relate to Miss Do's suggested difficulties in teaching young children. The tribunal was not satisfied that these were sufficient to amount to a violation of Miss Do's art 9 rights.

ISSUES AND SUBMISSIONS

[16] Mr Gill QC, who appeared for Miss Do, argued briefly that the treatment that she had received in Vietnam was sufficient to cause her a well-founded fear of persecution. For reasons that will become apparent in due course, we are in no doubt that the adjudicator and the tribunal were right to dismiss Miss Do's claim to asylum under the refugee convention. The important issue raised by her appeal relates to the application of art 9 of the human rights convention. On this issue, Mr Gill's submissions were in harmony with those of Mr Blake QC, who appeared for Mr Ullah.

'TERRITORIALITY'

[17] Article 1 of the human rights convention requires the contracting states to secure to everyone 'within their jurisdiction' (my emphasis) the convention rights and freedoms. Section 6 of the 1998 Act provides that it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right. The courts of this country have proceeded on the basis that the obligation imposed by s 6 is subject to the same limitation as that which results from the words that we have emphasised in art 1 of the human rights convention. It applies only in relation to persons within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom. So far as we are aware, this interpretation of s 6 has never been challenged, and certainly neither Mr Blake nor Mr Gill has challenged it in the present case. The issue that has been explored on this appeal is the manner in which the words a 'within their jurisdiction' limit the obligations of the contracting parties to the convention and of public authorities under the 1998 Act.

[18] Both Mr Ullah and Miss Do are within this jurisdiction. The act of removing either will, if it takes place, be an act of a public authority done to a person within the jurisdiction. If the consequence of this act will be that the person will be removed to a country where his or her art 9 rights will not be respected, will this infringe the human rights convention and the 1998 Act? To this question Mr Blake suggested a qualified answer. Yes, provided that the restriction on religious freedom is severe. Mr Gill was not prepared to accept such a qualification. His primary submission was that all that Miss Do had to demonstrate was that there was 'real risk' that, if she were removed to Vietnam, her art 9(1) rights would be infringed.

c [19] For the Secretary of State Miss Carss-Frisk QC's primary submission was that removal of a person from this country pursuant to our immigration laws was not capable of engaging art 9 of the human rights convention. Alternatively, she submitted that art 9 would only be engaged if removal would be likely to lead to a 'flagrant' breach of the individual's art 9 rights.

d [20] The debate in relation to these contentions focused both on Strasbourg and domestic jurisprudence. Each counsel submitted that, if the test were apprehension of 'flagrant' violation of art 9, his client could readily satisfy that test. We propose first to consider the law before turning to the facts of the individual cases.

e STRASBOURG JURISPRUDENCE

[21] The human rights convention was opened for signature in November 1950. Most signatories to that convention also subscribed to the refugee convention. It is notable that art 33(2) of the latter convention permitted a state to remove someone convicted of a particularly serious crime, or constituting a danger to the community, notwithstanding that removal would be to a country where that person's life would be threatened. We do not believe that the signatories to the human rights convention conceived that it would impact on their rights under international law to refuse entry to or to remove aliens from their territory.

g [22] Our belief receives support from the terms of the human rights convention itself. The right of immigration control is recognised by art 5(1)(f) which qualifies the right to liberty by permitting arrest or detention of a person 'to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition'. Nowhere else in the qualifications to those convention rights which are not absolute is there any reference to the right of a state to control immigration. We do not believe that this was because this right would, or would arguably, be covered by express limitations, such as 'the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country', which justify derogation from art 8 rights. We believe that it was because the contracting states had no intention of restricting their rights of immigration control. The human rights convention was not designed to impact on the rights of states to refuse entry to aliens or to remove them. The convention was designed to govern the treatment of those living within the territorial jurisdiction of the contracting states.

[23] The human rights convention is, however, a living instrument. If, initially, it was not designed to impact on the right to control immigration it has, to a degree, been interpreted by the Strasbourg court in a manner which does have that effect. The task of identifying the principles which govern the application of the convention in this context is not an easy one. a [24] In cases involving expulsion or refusal of entry the Strasbourg court has repeatedly emphasised the following principle (see, for instance, Bensaid v UK (2001) 33 EHRR 205 at 216 (para 32)):

‘Contracting States have the right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations including the convention, to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens.’ b

As we consider the authorities, it will become apparent that the court does not consider that the human rights convention will be engaged simply because the effect of the exercise of immigration control will be to remove an individual to a country where the convention rights are not fully respected. Equally, where the court finds that removal or refusal of entry engages the human rights convention, the court will often treat the right to control immigration as one that outweighs, or trumps, the convention right. c

[25] The first case to which we turn is, perhaps, the most significant, and we propose to analyse it at some length. In Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 the applicant was a German national, detained in the United Kingdom pending extradition to the United States of America to face charges of murder in the Commonwealth of Virginia. If extradited and convicted he would face the death penalty and the stresses and rigours associated with prolonged detention on ‘death row’. He alleged that this prospect was so severe that extradition would violate his art 3 right not to be subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. He further contended that he would not be entitled to legal representation in Virginia and that this meant that extradition would violate his art 6 rights to a fair trial. d

[26] The United Kingdom contended that the human rights convention was not engaged. An extraditing state could not be held responsible for acts which occurred outside its territorial jurisdiction. To surrender a fugitive criminal was not to ‘subject’ him to any treatment that he might thereafter receive in the receiving state. e

[27] The court made the following statement of general principle (at 466 (para 86)):

‘Article 1 of the Convention, which provides that “the High Contracting Parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section I,” sets a limit, notably territorial, on the reach of the Convention. In particular, the engagement undertaken by a Contracting State is confined to “securing” (“reconnaître” in the French text) the listed rights and freedoms to persons within its own “jurisdiction”. Further, the Convention does not govern the actions of States not Parties to it, nor does it purport to be a means of requiring the Contracting States to impose Convention standards on other States. Article 1 cannot be read as justifying a general principle to the effect that, notwithstanding its extradition obligations, a Contracting State may not surrender an individual unless satisfied that the conditions awaiting him in the country of destination are in full accord with each of the safeguards of the Convention.’ f

[28] Despite this general principle, the court held that, where extradition exposes an individual to a real risk of being subjected to inhuman or degrading g a treatment or punishment proscribed by art 3, that article will be violated. The reasoning of the court appears in the following passages (at 467–469):

b '88. Article 3 makes no provision for exceptions and no derogation from it is permissible under Article 15 in time of war or other national emergency. This absolute prohibition on torture and on inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment under the terms of the Convention shows that Article 3 enshrines one of the fundamental values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe. It is also to be found in similar terms in other international instruments such as the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the 1969 American Convention on Human Rights and is generally recognised as an internationally accepted standard. The question remains whether the extradition of a fugitive to another State where he would be subjected or be likely to be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment would itself engage the responsibility of a Contracting State under Article 3 ... It would hardly be compatible with the underlying values of the Convention, that "common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law" to which the Preamble refers, were a Contracting State knowingly to surrender a fugitive to another State where there were substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture, however heinous the crime allegedly committed. Extradition in such circumstances, while not explicitly referred to in the brief and general wording of Article 3, would plainly be contrary to the spirit and intendment of the Article, and in the Court's view this inherent obligation not to extradite also extends to cases in which the fugitive would be faced in the receiving State by a real risk of exposure to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment proscribed by that Article ...

f 91. In sum, the decision by a Contracting State to extradite a fugitive may give rise to an issue under Article 3, and hence engage the responsibility of that State under the Convention, where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faces a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the requesting country. The establishment of such responsibility inevitably involves an assessment of conditions in the requesting country against the standards of Article 3 of the Convention. Nonetheless, there is no question of adjudicating on or establishing the responsibility of the receiving country, whether under general international law, under the Convention or otherwise. In so far as any liability under the Convention is or may be incurred, it is liability incurred by the extraditing Contracting State by reason of its having taken action which has as a direct consequence the exposure of an individual to proscribed ill-treatment.'

j [29] It is often said that the effect of the passages that we have quoted is to give to art 3 'extra-territorial effect'. This phrase is not wholly apposite. The act which infringes art 3 is the act of extradition which takes place within the jurisdiction in relation to an individual who is within the jurisdiction. But the act of removal does not itself constitute inhuman treatment. It is the foreseeable consequences of the act which the court held engaged art 3. It seems to us that this reasoning involved a significant extension of the ambit of the human rights convention. Had Mr Soering been extradited, tried and acquitted by the Virginia court we do not find it easy to see how art 3 would have been infringed. The principle applied by the Strasbourg court appears to have been that it is a breach of the human rights convention to take action in relation to someone within the jurisdiction which carries with it the real risk that it will expose that person to infringement of his art 3 rights outside the jurisdiction.

[30] Such a principle is readily intelligible. What is less easy to see is why it should not be applied to any convention right. Yet we think that Miss Carss-Frisk was plainly right to submit that the approach of the court in Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 was exceptional. What is the basis of the exception and what are its parameters? In considering the application in 15 Foreign Students v UK (1977) 9 DR 185 the European Commission of Human Rights declined to extend the approach in Soering's case to a complaint that removal would deprive the applicants of the right to education under art 2 of the First Protocol to the convention. The Commission held (at 187 (para 6)) that the applicants' complaints could not be compared with complaints under art 3 which 'concerns alleged violations of human rights of a particularly serious nature'.

[31] Some passages in Soering's case itself lend support to the thesis that the basis of the exception is the severity of the foreseeable consequences of extradition. Apart from the passages which we have already cited, we would draw attention to the manner in which the court dealt with the application under art 6 (at 479 (para 113)):

'The right to a fair trial in criminal proceedings, as embodied in Article 6, holds a prominent place in a democratic society. The Court does not exclude that an issue might exceptionally be raised under Article 6 by an extradition decision in circumstances where the fugitive has suffered or risks suffering a flagrant denial of a fair trial in the requesting country. However, the facts of the present case do not disclose such a risk. Accordingly, no issue arises under Article 6(3)(c) in this respect.'

[32] The possibility that expulsion to Iran might infringe art 6 if this involved a flagrant risk of deprivation of a fair trial was recognised by the Commission in Dehwari v Netherlands (2001) 29 EHRR CD 74 at 78 (para 86), citing Soering's case. The 'flagrancy' test in Soering's case was also cited 'mutatis mutandis' by the court in Drozd v France (1992) 14 EHRR 745 at 793 (para 110). It held that art 5 might be engaged by imprisoning an individual within the jurisdiction pursuant to conviction in a trial outside the jurisdiction 'if it emerges that the conviction is the result of a flagrant denial of justice'.

[33] These decisions are, as we understand it, the basis of Miss Carss-Frisk's submission that, if art 9 is engaged, this can only be on the basis that removal will involve a risk of a flagrant breach of art 9 in the receiving state. Her primary submission is, however, that expulsion can only engage a convention right where, as in the case of art 3, the right is absolute.

[34] Before leaving Soering's case we should draw attention to two passages in which the court suggested that the importance of extradition fell to be weighed in the balance when deciding whether the treatment to be anticipated in the receiving state was sufficiently severe to engage art 3. The court endorsed (at 466 (para 86)) the submission of the United Kingdom that the beneficial purpose of extradition in preventing fugitive offenders from evading justice cannot be ignored in determining the scope of application of the human rights convention and of art 3 in particular.

a 'What amounts to "inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" depends on all the circumstances of the case. Furthermore, inherent in the whole of the Convention is a search for a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. As movement about the world becomes easier and crime takes on a larger international dimension, it is increasingly in the interest of all nations that suspected offenders who flee abroad should be brought to justice. Conversely, the establishment of safe havens for fugitives would not only result in danger for the State obliged to harbour the protected person but also tend to undermine the foundations of extradition. These considerations must also be included among the factors to be taken into account in the interpretation and application of the notions of inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment in extradition cases.'

[36] In Chahal v UK (1996) 1 BHRC 405 the court considered whether deportation of a Sikh separatist leader to India would violate art 3. The United Kingdom argued that if he remained in this country he would be a threat to national security, so that the human rights convention posed no bar to his deportation, even if he would be at risk of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment in India. The threat to national security fell to be balanced against the risk of ill-treatment. The court rejected this argument, holding that the national interests of the state could not be invoked to override the interests of the individual where substantial grounds had been shown for believing that he would be subjected to ill-treatment if expelled.

f '79. Article 3 enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic society ... The Court is well aware of the immense difficulties faced by states in modern times in protecting their communities from terrorist violence. However, even in these circumstances, the convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. Unlike most of the substantive clauses of the convention and of Protocols Nos 1 and 4, art 3 makes no provision for exceptions and no derogation from it is permissible under art 15 even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation ...

g 80. The prohibition provided by art 3 against ill-treatment is equally absolute in expulsion cases. Thus, whenever substantial grounds have been shown for believing that an individual would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to art 3 if removed to another state, the responsibility of the contracting state to safeguard him or her against such treatment is engaged in the event of expulsion ... In these circumstances, the activities of the individual in question, however undesirable or dangerous, cannot be a material consideration. The protection afforded by art 3 is thus wider than that provided by arts 32 and 33 of the 1951 convention ...

j 81. The Court's judgment in Soering v UK 11 EHRR 439 at 467-468 (para 88), which concerned extradition to the United States of America, clearly and forcefully expresses the above view. It should not be inferred from the Court's remarks (para 89) concerning the risk of undermining the foundations of extradition that there is any room for balancing the risk of ill-treatment against the reasons for expulsion in determining whether a state's responsibility under art 3 is engaged.'

[38] We find it hard to reconcile this passage with the court's judgment in Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 at 468 (para 89). It seems to us that the court was resiling from that paragraph. Clayton and Tomlinson The Law of Human Rights (2000) p 387 (para 8.15) observed that art 3 provides protection 'only against the most serious ill-treatment'. If the risk of such treatment is to prevail absolutely over the right of a state to extradite a criminal pursuant to a treaty, or to deport an alien who is a threat to national security, then it seems to us that the ill-treatment in question must necessarily be serious. In Tyrer v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 1 the court held that three strokes with a birch constituted degrading punishment for a 15-year-old boy which violated art 3, having regard to the particular circumstances in which it was administered. We find it hard to accept that the risk of such treatment could suffice to override the right of a state to deport an alien guilty of a serious crime. It seems to us that the court had reason in Soering's case for concluding that the interest in an effective system of extradition was a relevant factor when considering the severity of ill-treatment in the receiving state that would preclude the extradition of a suspected criminal.

[39] As we read Soering's case and Chahal's case, the underlying rationale for the application of the convention to the act of expulsion is that it is an affront to fundamental humanitarian principles to remove an individual to a country where there is a real risk of serious ill-treatment, even though such ill-treatment may not satisfy the criteria of persecution under the refugee convention. Article 3 provides the test of such treatment. The issue then arises of whether this rationale extends to preventing removal of aliens where there is a real risk that the receiving country will treat them in a way that infringes other articles, and in particular art 9.

[40] While in Soering's case the court recognised that expulsion might engage art 6, we know of no case where the court has held that it has done so.

[41] There is a line of Strasbourg authority that suggests that where an individual is removed, or, having landed, is denied entry, with the specific motive of preventing the enjoyment of a convention right such as, for instance, a right protected by arts 9 or 10, the right in question will be engaged—see the cases cited in R (on the application of Farrakhan) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 606, [2002] 4 All ER 289, [2002] QB 1391 and the discussion of these at [52]–[56]. That situation has, however, no relevance in the present context.

[42] Article 8 has been quite often invoked in support of a submission that an immigration restriction infringes the human rights convention. We believe, however, that it has only successfully been invoked where removal or refusal of entry has impacted on the enjoyment of family life of those already established within the jurisdiction. The Strasbourg cases in this field were reviewed by Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 840 at 858–861 (paras 43–56).

[43] In the leading case of Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471 applicants living within this jurisdiction complained that their art 8 rights were infringed because their husbands were not permitted entry in order to join them. The United Kingdom argued that neither art 8, nor any other article of the human rights convention applied to immigration control. In rejecting this argument the court remarked that the applicants were not the husbands but the wives and that they were not complaining of being refused leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, but as persons lawfully settled in the country of being deprived or threatened with deprivation of the company of their spouses.

a [44] In Abdulaziz's case, as in all similar art 8 cases, the court has been astute to recognise the right under international law of a state to control immigration into its territory. This right has been weighed against the degree of interference with the enjoyment of family life caused by the immigration restriction often, as we see it, not because this served a legitimate aim under art 8(2) but because it acted as a free-standing restriction on the art 8 right.

b [45] A recent case in which art 8 was invoked as a bar to expulsion was Bensaid v UK (2001) 33 EHRR 205. The applicant was a schizophrenic, faced, as an illegal immigrant, with removal to Algeria. He claimed that the proposed move would deprive him of essential medical treatment and sever ties that he had developed in England that were essential to his well-being. He claimed that his art 3 and art 8 rights would be infringed and his complaint focused, in part, on the treatment that he would receive, or fail to receive, in Algeria. The court held that his case under art 3 was not made out. It went on (at 219–220) to deal with his art 8 claim:

d '46. Not every act or measure which adversely affects moral or physical integrity will interfere with the right to respect to private life guaranteed by Article 8. However, the Court's case-law does not exclude that treatment which does not reach the severity of Article 3 treatment may nonetheless breach Article 8 in its private life aspect where there are sufficiently adverse effects on physical and moral integrity.

e 47. Private life is a broad term not susceptible to exhaustive definition. The Court has already held that elements such as gender identification, name and sexual orientation and sexual life are important elements of the personal sphere protected by Article 8. Mental health must also be regarded as a crucial part of private life associated with the aspect of moral integrity. Article 8 protects a right to identity and personal development, and the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings and the outside world. The preservation of mental stability is in that context an indispensable precondition to effective enjoyment of the right to respect for private life.

g 48. Turning to the present case, the Court recalls that it has found above that the risk of damage to the applicant's health from return to his country of origin was based on largely hypothetical factors and that it was not substantiated that he would suffer inhuman and degrading treatment. Nor in the circumstances has it been established that his moral integrity would be substantially affected to a degree falling within the scope of Article 8 of the Convention. Even assuming that the dislocation caused to the applicant by removal from the United Kingdom where he has lived for the last eleven years was to be considered by itself as affecting his private life, in the context of the relationships and support framework which he enjoyed there, the Court considers that such interference may be regarded as complying with the requirements of the second paragraph of Article 8, namely as a measure "in accordance with the law", pursuing the aims of the protection of the economic well-being of the country and the prevention of disorder and crime, as well as being "necessary in a democratic society" for those aims.'

j [46] Part of the reasoning of the court suggests that the treatment that a deportee is at risk of experiencing in the receiving state might so severely interfere with his art 8 rights as to render his deportation contrary to the convention. The more significant art 8 factor was, however, the disruption of private life within this country. There is a difference in principle between the situation where art 8 rights are engaged in whole or in part because of the effect of removal in disrupting an individual's established enjoyment of those rights within this jurisdiction and the situation where art 8 rights are alleged to be engaged solely on the ground of the treatment that the individual is likely to be subjected to in the receiving state. In Bensaid's case the court considered that the right to control immigration constituted a valid ground under art 8(2) for derogating from the art 8 rights of the applicant in that case. a

[47] We shall now set out our conclusions in relation to the Strasbourg jurisprudence that deals with the apprehended treatment of a deportee in the receiving state. The application of art 3 in expulsion cases is an extension of the scope of the convention and one that is at odds with the principle of territoriality expressed in art 1. That extension has occurred because the human rights convention is a living instrument. The extension no doubt reflects the fact that it would affront the humanitarian principles that underlie the human rights convention and the refugee convention for a state to remove an individual to a country where he or she is foreseeably at real risk of being seriously ill-treated. To date, with the possible exception of Bensaid's case, the application of this extension has been restricted to art 3 cases. To apply the principle to other articles where the apprehended treatment would fall short of that covered by art 3 would be likely to constitute a further extension. While the Strasbourg court has contemplated the possibility of such a step, it has not yet taken it. The obligations in ss 3 and 6 of the 1998 Act do not require this court to take that further step. We turn now to consider the approach that has been taken by the English courts. c

THE DOMESTIC JURISPRUDENCE

[48] The possibility that an immigration decision may engage the human rights convention is recognised by ss 65 and 77(3) of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. The latter subsection provides: f

'In considering—(a) any ground mentioned in section 69, or (b) any question relating to the appellant's rights under Article 3 of the Human Rights Convention, the appellate authority may take into account any evidence which it considers to be relevant to the appeal (including evidence about matters arising after the date on which the decision appealed against was taken).'

This demonstrates that Parliament has accepted that immigration decisions can engage art 3 of the human rights convention. It also demonstrates that Parliament has not accepted that immigration decisions can engage other articles of the convention. We do not consider that it demonstrates that Parliament has accepted that immigration decisions cannot engage other articles of the convention—see the discussion in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v S and K (3 December 2002, unreported) considered at [57], below. h

[49] Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Z [2001] EWCA Civ 952, [2002] Imm AR 560 was an appeal from a decision of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal which had ruled unlawful the removal of the respondent to Zimbabwe. It was common ground that the decision of the tribunal in the case of Z could not stand. The appeal in Z's case was heard with two others that raised similar issues. Each involved an application by a man who claimed to be a homosexual. Apart from claims to asylum under the refugee convention, each claimed that removal to j

a Zimbabwe would violate both arts 3 and 8 of the human rights convention. This was because in Zimbabwe 'living the sort of sexual life which he would wish to live has been subjected to various social and statutory inhibitions' (see [2002] Imm AR 560 at 564 (para 8) per Schiemann LJ). Schiemann LJ, with whose judgment the other two members of the court agreed, did not have to do more than consider whether it was arguable that art 3 or art 8 was engaged. So far as art 3 was concerned, he held (at 566 (para 16)):

b 'Circumstances can undoubtedly exist in which the treatment which awaits a claimant in a destination state is of a severity which would cause a state to be in breach of a claimant's art 3 rights if it expelled him to that destination State. I would not rule out the possibility that amongst those c circumstances might be treatment which was aimed at a particular sexual group. However, I do not consider that the mere existence of a law in the destination state prohibiting particular types of sexual conduct in private amongst adults has the automatic result that an expelling state which wishes to expel a person who wishes to indulge in that type of sexual conduct is breaching his rights under article 3.'

d [50] So far as art 8 is concerned, Schiemann LJ concluded that the question was fact-specific and should not be decided in the abstract. In the case of both Z and A the matter was remitted to the tribunal. Schiemann LJ clearly considered that it was possible that art 8 was engaged by the decision to remove each of them, but we do not consider that his judgment is conclusive of this question.

e [51] In R (on the application of Holub) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 1359 the Court of Appeal had to consider a claim that the removal of a schoolgirl to Poland would interfere with her right to education under art 2 of the First Protocol. In giving the judgment of the court, Tuckey LJ made this observation (at 1366 (para 21)):

f 'We are not bound to follow the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights but simply to take them into account. Nevertheless the jurisprudence of the court does point clearly to the fact that rights which are not absolute, such as the right to education, are not engaged where a state is exercising legitimate immigration control. Accordingly we think g Mr Pleming's submissions on this issue are right. A child's right to education whilst it is in the United Kingdom does not carry with it the right to stay here. The Secretary of State has obviously to take account of any educational difficulties which it is alleged the child will suffer if returned to the country of origin as part of the compassionate grounds for granting exceptional leave to remain, but is not obliged to take a view as to whether the child's article 2 h right will be infringed there. However, in the spirit of restraint to which we have referred, we do not think it is necessary to decide this point authoritatively in this case, in view of our decision on the other issues to which we now turn.'

j He went on to consider whether art 2 was infringed and held that it was not.

[52] In R (on the application of Ahmadi) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWHC 1897 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 52 (Sep), [2003] ACD 14 Scott Baker J had to consider the issue of whether removal to Germany of a family of refugees from Afghanistan was contrary to the human rights convention. Germany was the country responsible for entertaining their application for asylum under the Convention determining the State responsible for examining Applications for Asylum lodged in one of the Member States of the European Communities (Dublin; TS 72 (1997); Cm 3806). They claimed, however, that removal to Germany would infringe arts 3, 8 and 14 of the human rights convention. The evidence relied upon in the case of Mrs Ahmadi sought to demonstrate that the contrast between the family's living conditions in this country and in Germany would damage her fragile mental health and, thus, infringe her art 8 rights. Reliance was placed on, among other matters, evidence that, in the words of her consultant psychiatrist (at [44]–[45]):

'She has been allowed to develop a social network that has helped to support her ... she has now been in the UK long enough to develop a positive and supportive social network ... I do believe that if returned she will deteriorate markedly if only because of the loss of her social network.'

[53] No issue was raised as to whether, in principle, art 8 could be engaged. The issue was simply as to whether, on the facts, the claim under the convention was 'manifestly unfounded'. Scott Baker J decided that in the case of Mrs Ahmadi it was not—there was a case to go before the adjudicator.

[54] So far as the children were concerned, greater emphasis appears to have been placed on the effect on them of the conditions in Germany, and Scott Baker J expressly held that this was material. He held that, in considering the art 8 claim, it was necessary to 'look at this family as a whole' and ruled that the children also had an arguable case under art 8.

[55] It remains to consider three starred appeals to the tribunal. The first, Kacaj v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] Imm AR 213, was reversed by the Court of Appeal on the facts ([2002] EWCA Civ 314, [2002] All ER (D) 203 (Mar)), but without comment on the tribunal's analysis of the law. The applicant claimed asylum under the refugee convention and the right to remain on the ground that return to her native country of Albania would infringe arts 3, 4 and 8 of the human rights convention. The Secretary of State contended that only art 3 was capable of being engaged by an immigration decision, relying in part on the observation of this court in R (on the application of Holub) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 1359 that we have quoted at [51], above. In the judgment of the tribunal, Collins J ([2002] Imm AR 213 at 228) analysed the position as follows:

'25. With great respect to the Court of Appeal, we are not persuaded that the rights are not engaged in immigration cases. That in our view is contrary to [Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439]. The true analysis is that, although the rights may be engaged, legitimate immigration control will almost certainly mean that derogation from the rights will be proper and will not be disproportionate. There may be exceptions, as the reference in Soering to flagrant breaches of article 6 indicate. This is because the court has recognised that a country is entitled, "as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations including the Convention, to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens". (See Hilal v United Kingdom ((2001) 11 BHRC 354) at paragraph 59). In Salazar v Sweden (App No 28987/95 (7 March 1996, unreported)) the Commission observed: "In the field of immigration Contracting States enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in determining the steps to be taken to ensure compliance with the Convention, with due regard to the needs and resources of the community and of individuals." Among other cases, it cites a Abdulaziz v United Kingdom (1985) 7 EHRR 471, which concerned an alleged breach of article 8 in the refusal to permit the applicant to join his family in the United Kingdom. The Court decided that article 8 could apply where immigration control was being enforced but that in the circumstances of that case there was no breach.

b 26. We therefore see no reason to exclude the possible application of any relevant article (save, perhaps article 2 if the reasoning in [Dehwari v Netherlands (2001) 29 EHRR CD 74] is to be followed) in deportation cases, but it will be virtually impossible for an applicant to establish that control on immigration was disproportionate to any breach. In particular, if article 3 is not established, it is difficult to see how article 8 could be if, as in this instant case, the alleged breach will occur in the receiving state when the applicant is removed. In the context of this case, the adjudicator was in error in concluding that article 4 could not be relied on because it did not, as he put it, have extra-territorial effect. That definition is misleading since there is no question of extra-territorial effect in the true sense of that word since the breach, if any, will have occurred within the jurisdiction by the decision to remove which will have the effect of exposing the individual to whatever violation of his human rights is in issue. We have used the word as a convenient label for the argument, but, for the reasons given, we reject the argument.'

e [56] Shortly after this decision, the appeal in Devaseelan v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (13 March 2002, unreported) was heard by a tribunal presided over by Mr Mark Ockelton. The appellant, a Tamil, contended that removal to Sri Lanka would infringe his rights under arts 3, 5, 6 and 8 of the human rights convention. The tribunal ruled out any danger of infringement of arts 3 and 8 on the facts. So far as the alleged engagement of arts 5 and 6 were concerned, the tribunal said this:

f '110. ... It is clear that the Court does not attempt to impose the duties of the Convention on States that are not party to it. It is also clear that the fact that a person may be treated in a manner that would, in a signatory State, be a breach of the Convention does not of itself render his expulsion to another country unlawful, unless either the breach will be of Article 3, or the consequences of return will be so extreme a breach of another Article that the returning State, as one of its obligations under the Convention, is obliged to have regard to them. Following the jurisprudence on Articles 5 and 6, this consequence will only arise if the situation in the receiving country is that there will be a flagrant denial or gross violation of the rights secured by the Convention. For this reason we have not needed to consider in this determination the precise implications of Articles 5 and 6 within signatory States.

g 111. The reason why flagrant denial or gross violation is to be taken into account is that it is only in such a case—where the right will be completely denied or nullified in the destination country—that it can be said that removal will breach the treaty obligations of the signatory State however those obligations might be interpreted or whatever might be said by or on behalf of the destination State.'

j [57] In Secretary of State for the Home Dept v S and K (3 December 2002, unreported), the tribunal presided over by Collins J considered, among other issues, the effect of the 1998 Act on the proposed removal to Croatia of a number of ethnic Serbs. The tribunal made the following comments in relation to s 77 of the 1999 Act:

‘21. Section 6 of the 1998 Act requires the appellate authority as a public authority (see s 6(3)(a)) to act in a way which is compatible with a convention right. This obligation does not apply if “as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation, the authority could not have acted differently” (see s 6(2)(a)). Section 3 of the 1998 Act requires us to read and give effect to legislation so far as possible in a way which is compatible with the convention rights. To make a determination which upholds a decision to return in breach of human rights could, subject to the impact of primary legislation, breach s 6. It is important to note the language of and relationship between s 77(3) and (4). In s 77(3) a distinction is drawn between a “ground mentioned in s 69” and a question relating to rights under art 3. Section 77(4) refers to consideration of “any other ground” not to consideration of other questions arising. The differences in wording must be taken to have been deliberate. We are well aware that the Home Office view was (and the argument has been raised by Mr Wilken in his skeleton but not developed because of our decision in [Kacaj v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] Imm AR 213]) that only art 3 could be relied on in removal cases. It is therefore not surprising that Parliament should have wanted to leave the matter open, particularly in the light of indications in Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 that art 6 certainly might be relied on in such cases. Parliament no doubt recognised the absurdities and contradictions of its “one-stop” policy which would arise otherwise and it is incidentally to be noted that the matter is put beyond doubt in the [Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002] which has just been passed.

22. In our judgment s 77(4) does not in appeals concerned with potential removals from the United Kingdom prevent consideration of any question relating to an appellant’s rights under any article of the human rights convention as at the date of hearing.’

[58] The two decisions of the Court of Appeal that we have cited are inconclusive on the question of whether an expulsion decision can engage articles other than art 3 on the ground of the treatment to be anticipated in the receiving state. In R (on the application of Ahmadi) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] All ER (D) 52 (Sep), [2003] ACD 14 no issue was raised as to whether on the facts, which bore similarities to those in Bensaid v UK (2001) 33 EHRR 205, art 8 was capable of being engaged. The decisions of the tribunal accept that other articles can be engaged in principle, although, in Devaseelan v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (13 March 2002, unreported), only where a flagrant violation is anticipated. In Kacaj v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] Imm AR 213, Collins J considered that the right to control immigration would almost inevitably outweigh any interference with a convention right other than one arising under art 3. These decisions are not binding on this court. There is no domestic authority which requires us to hold that where an alien is removed to a country where his right to practise his religion is inhibited, art 9 will, or can, be engaged.

[59] Both Mr Blake and Mr Gill urged the importance of art 9 rights. They submitted that they were ‘fundamental’ or ‘core’ rights under the human rights

a convention. In support of this submission they referred us to the following statement of principle by the court in Kokkinakis v Greece (1994) 17 EHRR 397 at 418 (para 31):

b 'As enshrined in Article 9, freedom of thought, conscience and religion is one of the foundations of a "democratic society" within the meaning of the Convention. It is, in its religious dimension, one of the most vital elements
c that go to make up the identity of believers and of their conception of life, but it is also a precious asset for atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. The pluralism indissociable from a democratic society, which has been dearly won over the centuries, depends on it. While religious freedom is primarily a matter of individual conscience, it also implies, inter alia, freedom to "manifest [one's] religion." Bearing witness in words and deeds is bound up with the existence of religious convictions. According to Article 9, freedom to manifest one's religion is not only exercisable in community with others, "in public" and within the circle of those whose faith one shares, but can also be asserted "alone" and "in private"; furthermore, it includes in principle the right to try to convince one's d neighbour, for example through "teaching", failing which, moreover, "freedom to change [one's] religion or belief," enshrined in Article 9, would be likely to remain a dead letter.'

e [60] Counsel emphasised that art 9 rights are, to a degree, absolute. It is only the freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs that can, in pursuance of the prescribed aims, be limited. They referred us to Professor Hathaway's The Law of Refugee Status (1991) p 109. There the author identifies 'basic and inalienable rights' and comments: 'the failure to ensure these rights in any circumstances is ... appropriately considered to be tantamount to persecution'. The rights identified include 'freedom of thought, conscience and religion'.

f [61] We recognise that ill-treatment of a member of a religious minority is capable of amounting to persecution under the refugee convention or to infringement of art 3 rights—see, for instance, Ahmed v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2000] INLR 1. Mr Ullah's contention that his case fell into this category did not succeed and is not the subject of this appeal. We have yet to explain why Miss Do's claim under the refugee convention is not made out.
g What we are currently considering is, in effect, a submission that the 1998 Act and the convention require this country to grant asylum to anyone who can demonstrate that his freedom to practise his religion is not respected in his home country, though Mr Blake adds the proviso that the interference with that freedom must be 'severe'.

h [62] Mr Blake accepted that the Strasbourg court has not gone this far. He submitted, however, that this court should take the lead in recognising that removal in the interests of immigration control can engage art 9. In our judgment there are compelling reasons why this court should not do so. The refugee convention and art 3 of the human rights convention already cater for the j more severe categories of ill-treatment on the ground of religion. The extension of grounds for asylum that Mr Blake and Mr Gill seek to establish would open the door to claims to enter this country by a potentially very large new category of asylum seeker. It is not for the court to take such a step. It is for the executive, or for Parliament, to decide whether to offer refuge in this country to persons who are not in a position to claim this under the refugee convention, or the human rights convention as currently applied by the Strasbourg court. There may be strong humanitarian grounds for offering refuge in this country to individuals whose human rights are not respected in their own country, and it is open to the Secretary of State to grant exceptional leave to remain where he concludes that the facts justify this course. There are, however, practical and political considerations which weigh against any general extension of the grounds upon which refuge may be sought in this country. It is not for the courts to make that extension.

[63] For these reasons we hold that a removal decision to a country that does not respect art 9 rights will not infringe the 1998 Act where the nature of the interference with the right to practise religion that is anticipated in the receiving state falls short of art 3 ill-treatment. It may be that this does not differ greatly, in effect, from holding that interference with the right to practise religion in such circumstances will not result in the engagement of the human rights convention unless the interference is ‘flagrant’.

OTHER ARTICLES

[64] This appeal is concerned with art 9. Our reasoning has, however, wider implications. Where the human rights convention is invoked on the sole ground of the treatment to which an alien, refused the right to enter or remain, is likely to be subjected by the receiving state, and that treatment is not sufficiently severe to engage art 3, the English court is not required to recognise that any other article of the human rights convention is, or may be, engaged. Where such treatment falls outside art 3, there may be cases which justify the grant of exceptional leave to remain on humanitarian grounds. The decision of the Secretary of State in such cases will be subject to the ordinary principles of judicial review but not to the constraints of the human rights convention.

[65] Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider further the facts of Mr Ullah’s case, for it has already been determined that these do not engage art 3. We would simply observe that most of the matters urged by Mr Blake in relation to the facts applied to all Ahmadis in Pakistan. Mr Ullah’s special position as a preacher added little to his case in the light of the adjudicator’s finding that his preaching ‘did not result in any serious problems for him’. In Miss Do’s case, her claim under the refugee convention as well as her claim under art 3 remain to be considered, in addition to her claim under art 9. We turn to the facts of her case.

MISS DO’S APPEAL

[66] Miss Do’s more extreme allegations of harassment and arrest by the police were not accepted. Before the tribunal it was submitted on her behalf that the adjudicator’s finding that Miss Do could only practise her religion ‘under reduced circumstances’ was enough to make good her case. This was because this constituted an infringement of a ‘basic’ or ‘first category’ right from which there could be no derogation. The grounds of appeal to this court focused largely on the allegation that Miss Do would have to curtail that part of her religious activities which consisted of teaching her faith to children if she returned to Vietnam. It was submitted that this was an inhibition on her core right to practise her religion, which infringed art 9(1) and could not be justified under art 9(2). If apprehension of a ‘flagrant’ violation of her right was the correct test, then that test was satisfied.

[67] The evidence does not indicate that there is a total embargo on teaching the Catholic faith in Vietnam. It does establish that, if Miss Do wishes to continue to do this, she may have to move from her home to a different part of the country.

a Such inhibition as this might place on her right to practise her religion falls far short of persecution under the refugee convention or ill-treatment that violates art 3 of the human rights convention. There is evidence of other restrictions on the practice of Catholicism as a minority religion in Vietnam, but these are applicable to all of that minority, which has the sizeable total of some eight million. Mr Gill was wise not to press these points. That part of Miss Do's b case was not, and could not be, made out.

[68] Miss Do's case based on art 9 fails in consequence of our finding that art 9 is not engaged by her proposed removal. We wish, however, to draw attention to a paradox in her case which struck us from the outset. In so far as she was prevented from teaching Christianity to children in Vietnam, she did nothing to improve her position by coming to this country. Had she been an English

c missionary and had the Vietnamese authorities deported her to this country, she would have had a stronger case of interference with her right to teach Catholicism than that which she advances. We put this paradox to Mr Gill at the start of the hearing. It was not one which appeared to have occurred to those instructing him. They at once set about inquiring whether there was an answer

d to it. If it transpired that Miss Do had a burning desire to proselytise the Catholic faith no matter where she found herself the paradox would be shown to be illusory. This proved not to be the case. Miss Do has been in this country about two years. She attends mass at a church in Tottenham every Sunday. She asked the assistant priest whether she could help in any way with the parish's teaching of young children. He declined on the basis that her English was not good e enough for her to be of any real use to him. She did not persist in attempting to teach, although she provided the assistant priest with some general assistance in the parish. This picture is at odds with the suggestion that Miss Do came to England in order to be able to continue to teach her faith. The paradox remains.

[69] We do not see that the 'reduced circumstances' under which Miss Do was

f practising her faith in Vietnam differ significantly from those encountered by the other eight million Catholics in that country. This merely underlines the implications that would follow were it correct that the decision to remove her to Vietnam engaged art 9 of the human rights convention.

[70] As it is, for the reasons that we have given, the appeals of both Mr Ullah and Miss Do must be dismissed.

j 35. In summary therefore I find that although the appellant's family may well have been subjected to general harassment and verbal abuse in recent years, perhaps because it has become known in the community the appellant preaches, there is no credible evidence that he has in fact suffered from serious incidents of violence which the police have been unwilling to investigate. The appellant and his family remained living in Karachi during the whole of this period. The appellant's family are still living in Karachi and do not appear to be experiencing any serious problems, although I accept that his children may continue to be abused at school. His father lives in Karachi as does his wife's family and there is no evidence that they suffer any particular problems. The appellant has never been subjected to any state investigation as a result of his preaching; he has never been arrested nor detained for any reason at all. He claims to have been a successful businessman, even to the extent of being able to restart a business in Karachi with no apparent difficulty and yet he produces no evidence about his business activities. He had no problems at all until the age of 42 and has been able to carry on his faith all of his life without serious hindrance. This evidence must be viewed against the background evidence of serious discrimination against some followers of the Ahmadi faith in their work and daily lives and serious interference in their ability to follow and practise their faith. There is no credible evidence that this has been the position in relation to this appellant. Having regard to the evidence in totality, I have come to the conclusion that the appellant has come to the United Kingdom for reasons other than the need to seek international protection.

36. The appellant has therefore not established that he has in fact been persecuted in the past on account of his faith and neither has he established that he would face a serious risk of persecution, in his particular circumstances, if he returns to Pakistan now. I see no reason why the appellant cannot return to Karachi to his wife and children where on his own account it is open to him to continue his business activities and, importantly, in his case, the evidence strongly supports the finding that he will be able to carry on his faith as before, as his family appear to do so currently. Even accepting that he began to preach in 1998, for the reasons I have already given, I do not find that in his case that did result in any serious problems for him. He is an ordinary member of the Ahmadiyya faith; he has not come to the attention of the authorities on account of his faith; has no credible evidence that he has been targeted by religious extremists for that reason and no evidence on which to properly conclude that he would face such problems in the future.

ANNEX B

Relevant findings of the immigration adjudicator, Mrs Nichols, in relation to Mr Ullah's claim under the Human Rights Act 1998

In relation to arts 9, 10 and 11 (freedom of thought, conscience and religion and expression and freedom of assembly and association) it is clear from the background evidence that the ability of Ahmadis to exercise their free rights under these articles are constrained by the law and by societal attitudes towards them and that state action is generally ineffective. In relation to the appellant however, these rights do have to be regarded in the context of the evidence before me, which as I have said, has led to my finding that he has not personally experienced to any serious degree some of the problems which are faced by many Ahmadis in Pakistan. I have referred to the background evidence included in the appellant's bundle and to two further fairly recent reports in late 2000 from Amnesty International concerning the stepping up of campaigns against minorities in the country. The background evidence also supports the conclusion that the government continues to express its opposition to discrimination against religious minorities although, I accept, that this may just be words as opposed to action. I have concluded that in the context of these articles, that is that they enshrine an individual's right to express his beliefs in public or private and to a manifest his beliefs in worship, teaching practice and observance and to share ideas and information concerning his or her opinions and also to have the freedom of peaceful assembly, that returning the appellant to Pakistan where those rights are curtailed, does engage those articles under the convention in the appellant's case. These articles are qualified articles and I must therefore consider whether or not the United Kingdom government's action in returning the

b appellant would be in breach of those articles by a reference to a three-stage test, that is: whether or not the respondent's action is in accordance with the law; whether it pursues a legitimate aim; and whether or not it is proportionate in relation to the prospective breach. It is my finding that the respondent's action is in accordance with the law in that he has made his decisions in accordance with immigration legislation and the decisions he has made comply with statutory

c requirements. I also find that the respondent is pursuing a legitimate aim, that is immigration control which is a state's right. The appellant will be returned to a society where he is regarded as a religious minority and he is not afforded the same rights as the majority. Nevertheless, for the reasons I have already given in his particular circumstances, that has not prevented him from carrying on his

d faith nor has it prevented his family. He has been preaching since 1998 and the authorities have taken no action against him. He has been a life-long Ahmadi, he was born into an Ahmadi family and neither he nor his family appear to have suffered any direct discrimination from the state. He has been successful in business; his children have been educated and apart from incidents of verbal abuse in the streets and minor violence there is no credible evidence of any

e serious problems. His family remain in Karachi and there is no evidence that they are experiencing any real difficulties. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the United Kingdom government's action in seeking to remove the appellant to Pakistan in pursuance of the need for proper immigration control, and in the light of my findings in this case, will not breach the appellant's right under these

f articles as that action is proportionate to any difficulties the appellant may face as a result of his faith on return to Pakistan.

ANNEX C

Relevant findings of the immigration adjudicator, Mrs Coleman, in relation to g Miss Do's asylum application

14. The respondent refused the claim saying that he did not believe that the appellant was a Roman Catholic. This was based on the fact that the appellant appeared to have little knowledge of Roman Catholicism and her replies to technical questions were inadequate. That evidence has now been rebutted in

h three ways. The first way is the fact that a lot of the evidence was simply based on mistranslation. I can say from my own experience at the hearing that this is a problem. Clearly the Vietnamese interpreters available in this country are all Buddhist with little or no knowledge of Christian terminology. They were unable to translate what she was saying either in interview or at the hearing. For j this reason I put little weight on some of the answers. Further the appellant has now produced two important pieces of evidence that strongly support her claim. The first is the photographic evidence. And clear evidence that the appellant was given first Holy Communion in the Catholic Church and confirmed into that Church. I find that unassailable evidence of her membership of the Catholic Church. Finally her evidence is supported by the Vietnamese priest being the Reverend Simon Thag Duc Nguyen who submitted a witness statement. That witness statement indicates that the appellant is a strong supporter of the Catholic faith and her lack of knowledge of Catholic tenets would be expected from someone brought up in Vietnam under the repressive regime which did not allow good religious instruction. On that basis I accept that the appellant has proved to the necessary standard that she was a member of the Catholic Church and that she practised the Catholic religion in Vietnam. a

15. The appellant has also claimed that she found it difficult to practice her religion because of the attitude of the authorities in Vietnam. I have described above the ways in which she said she was disadvantaged. I have considered that evidence in the light of the objective evidence. The objective evidence does show that there are problems with certain religions. Up until recently religions were banned but that has been changed and the constitution now provides for freedom of worship. However the United States Department of State report says: 'Government regulations control religious hierarchies and organised religious activities in part because the Community Party fears that organised religion may weaken its authority and influence.' The report also says: b

'Many of these restrictive powers lie principally with provincial city people's committees and local treatment of religious persons varied widely ... In other areas such as the north-west provinces local officials allowed believers little discretion in practising their faith. In general religious groups face difficulties in obtaining teaching materials, expanding training facilities, publishing religious materials, and expanding the clergy in training in response to the increased demand from the congregation.' c

In those circumstances the appellant's evidence of difficulties in following her faith and discrimination are supported by the evidence and I accept the same. d

16. The appellant has also belatedly claimed that the police had questioned her and taken her to the station on a number of occasions. Although I have generally accepted the appellant's evidence I do not accept this evidence. This evidence is in direct contradiction to her original interview and statement. Her statement never mentioned any question of a problem with the police. The statement was detailed and such an omission seems to me surprising, to say the least, if it were true. Further in interview she very specifically said that she had never been arrested although she did say that there were difficulties with the police over the religion. However, that reference was only to discriminatory steps being taken. I therefore find it highly suspicious that suddenly just before the hearing, and after the criticism of her claim in the refusal letter relating to lack of arrests, she adds a claim that she has been harassed by the police and taken to the police station. Further I cannot understand the distinction she is trying to make between being arrested and being invited to go to the police station and being taken there. The evidence itself was contradictory as to whether she ever went to a police station or not. I simply believe that this is an embellishment to the claim and I do not accept the appellant's evidence in that regard at all ... e

18. I have considered the objective evidence in the light of the arguments before me. I do not find that the objective evidence supports the appellant's claim. The Home Office Country Information and Policy Unit report, the United States Department of State International Religious Freedom report and the United States Department of State report all indicate that Roman Catholicism is a recognised religion by the government of Vietnam. Although there certainly is some discrimination against religious practices and efforts to minimise their effect, there is absolutely no evidence that persons are actually persecuted. f

- a* Certainly there is no evidence of widespread arrests. There is evidence of arrests of certain political and religious dissidents but the objective evidence makes it clear that those religious dissidents are not Roman Catholic. There are some Buddhists, Protestants and something called a Hoa Hoa Sect which have been targeted. However, there is no evidence at all that Roman Catholics are at risk of persecution. The sort of behaviour the appellant specified in her statement is
- b* discrimination. It does not affect her basic rights. She can still practice her religion albeit under reduced circumstances and her rights to earning a living, physical safety and her right to shelter are not compromised. In those circumstances such disadvantages as she does suffer because of her faith do not cross the line from discrimination to persecution. For all these reasons therefore I find that the appellant has not proved to the necessary standard that she is likely
- c* to be persecuted or arrested if she were returned to Vietnam because of her religion. I therefore dismiss the asylum appeal.

[2003] EWCA Civ 63

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

WARD, LAWS AND JONATHAN PARKER LJJ

16 JANUARY, 5 FEBRUARY 2003

Practice – Order – Consent order – Claimant obtaining freezing order against defendant – Debt owed to defendant by third party being paid into account held by parties' solicitors – Court discharging freezing order by consent on undertaking by defendant not to withdraw or dispose of money in account – Whether terms of consent order giving claimant charge over money in account.

On commencing an action to recover £4,200,000, the claimant obtained a freezing order restraining the defendant company from dealing with its assets up to the value of the sum claimed. The company sought the discharge of that order, but the hearing was adjourned, and the freezing order continued, on agreed terms that were embodied in a consent order. Those terms included a provision that, pending the adjourned hearing, a debtor of the company was to be at liberty to pay a sum of £4,200,000 out of the moneys owed by it to the company into an account in the joint names of the parties' solicitors, and that no sums were to be withdrawn from that account pending further order of the court or the written consent of the parties' solicitors. After the £4,200,000 had been paid into the account, the parties compromised the interlocutory dispute on terms which were incorporated in another consent order (the discharge order) discharging the freezing order. Those terms included an undertaking by the company not to withdraw, dispose of, deal with or encumber its interest in the moneys in the account up to a limit of £3,325,000 pending further order of the court or the written consent of the parties' solicitors. Subsequently, provisional liquidators of the company were appointed. That appointment precluded the claimant from continuing its action without the leave of the court. The claimant duly sought leave. The success of that application depended on the claimant having, as against the liquidators, a valid charge over the moneys in the account. The judge allowed the application, holding that the claimant had such a charge to secure any judgment which it might obtain in the action up to a maximum of £3,325,000. On the liquidators' appeal, the Court of Appeal considered whether the discharge order had in fact created such a charge or whether it had simply provided continuing interim protection in the nature of a freezing order—a form of relief which created no proprietary rights in the assets that were subject to it.

Held – A consent order, embodying a term agreed between the parties that the debtor would not withdraw or dispose of or deal with its interest in moneys in an account, did not give rise to a security right in relation to that fund unless it contained an obligation in favour of the creditor to pay the debt out of the fund. A freezing order created no such right over the assets from time to time subject to it precisely because such an order, without more, did not impose an obligation on the part of a respondent to satisfy any judgment debt out of those assets. In the instant case, it was impossible to spell out of the terms of the discharge order a provision to the effect that the company had to satisfy any judgment obtained by the claimant (up to the specified maximum of £3,325,000). There was nothing

- a on the face of the discharge order to indicate anything other than an intention to provide continuing interim protection of a 'freezing' nature. Accordingly, the discharge order did not confer any security right on the claimant, and the appeal would therefore be allowed (see [43], [47]–[49], [53], below).

5 February 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

JONATHAN PARKER LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is the judgment of the court.

[2] This is an appeal by Mr Nicholas Edwards and Mr James Smith (the appellants), as provisional liquidators of Swissair Schweizerische Luftverkehr-Aktiengesellschaft (the company), against an order made by Neuberger J in the Chancery Division, Companies Court, on 2 August 2002 granting leave to Flightline Ltd (Flightline) pursuant to s 130(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986 to continue an action which it had commenced against the company in the Queen's Bench Division on 16 January 2002. In the action, Flightline claims some £4.2m as money owed to it by the company, alternatively it claims damages. The judge granted permission to appeal.

[3] The judge's judgment ([2002] EWHC 1648 (Ch)) is reported at [2003] 1 BCLC 427, [2002] 1 WLR 2535, and for the purposes of this judgment we shall take it as read.

[4] The substantive issue before the judge, as before us, is whether (as Flightline contends) Flightline has, as against the appellants, a valid charge over moneys standing to the credit of an account at the Bishopsgate branch of the National Westminster Bank plc in the joint names of Allen & Overy and Field Fisher Waterhouse, respectively the former solicitors for the company and the solicitors for Flightline, limited to £3.325m of those moneys. If Flightline has such a charge, with the consequence that it is a secured creditor in respect of any judgment which it may obtain in the action up to a maximum of £3.325m, then it is accepted by the appellants that leave to continue the action should be granted. Conversely, if it has not, then Flightline accepts that such leave should be refused.

[5] The judge concluded that Flightline has a charge over the moneys in the joint account to secure any judgment which it may obtain in the action up to a maximum of £3.325m, and he accordingly granted Flightline leave pursuant to s 130(2) of the 1986 Act to continue the action.

[6] Before the judge, argument was directed solely to the question whether the effect of what took place in relation to the setting up of the joint account was to create the charge for which Flightline contends. On this appeal, however, the appellants seek to raise a further argument, viz that even if a charge was created, such charge is nevertheless void as against the appellants for non-registration pursuant to ss 395 and 396 of the Companies Act 1985.

[7] After hearing full argument on the primary issue as to whether a charge was created, we concluded that that issue should be decided in favour of the appellants and that the appeal should accordingly be allowed. We therefore indicated to Mr Martin Pascoe QC (for the appellants) and Mr Gabriel Moss QC (for Flightline) that we did not need to hear argument on the secondary issue as to non-registration, and that we would give our reasons for allowing the appeal on the primary issue in writing and hand down our judgments in due course. This judgment is accordingly concerned only with the primary issue as to whether a charge was created.

THE FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[8] The company was incorporated in Switzerland. It formed part of the Swissair Group (the group), which provided commercial air services in a Switzerland and elsewhere. Flightline operated certain routes on behalf of the company.

[9] In October 2001 the group collapsed, and the company repudiated its arrangements with Flightline. Flightline then commenced two actions against the company. The first action related to the period prior to October 2001, and has since been compromised. The second action, which relates to the period after

b October 2001, is the action with which these proceedings are concerned. As already noted, this action was commenced on 16 January 2002, and seeks recovery of a sum of £4.2m. The claim is primarily in debt, but with an alternative claim for damages.

[10] In the meantime, in October 2001 insolvency proceedings were taken against the group in Switzerland. On 5 October 2001 the Swiss court appointed a provisional administrator of the group, and in December 2001 it granted a debt restructuring moratorium, the effect of which (under Swiss law) was to restrict the bringing or continuing of actions against companies in the group. We are told that that moratorium is still in place, and that unless some kind of debt restructuring scheme is put in place, the eventual liquidation of the group is

[11] On the commencement of the action on 16 January 2002, Flightline applied without notice for, and was granted, a freezing order until 6 February 2002 restraining the company from dealing with its assets in England and Wales, up to the value of £4.2m. The order was expressed to extend to the company's interest in any account held by the International Air Transport Association

e (IATA), which at that time owed substantial sums of money to the company. Notwithstanding that the standard form of freezing order as set out in the annex to CPR PD 25 (see now the White Book (Civil Procedure (Autumn 2002) vol 1, p 552) provides expressly (para 11(4)) that the freezing order shall cease to have effect if the respondent provides security in a sum to be specified in the order, f either by means of a payment into court or by some other agreed method, the freezing order as granted (and as subsequently continued) contained no such express provision.

[12] The company indicated that on the return date (6 February 2002) it intended not only to oppose any continuation of the freezing order but also to apply to discharge the order. The application to discharge, if successful, would of course have exposed Flightline to liability under its cross-undertakings in the freezing order.

[13] On 6 February 2002 the matter was adjourned to 14 February 2002 with an estimated length of hearing of half a day.

[14] On 14 February 2002 the matter came before McCombe J, but there was h not time to complete the argument on that day. Accordingly, by his order dated 14 February 2002 (the February order) McCombe J, by consent, adjourned the matter to a date to be fixed and continued the freezing order in the meantime, on agreed terms.

[15] As at 14 February 2002 the company was expecting to receive from the j IATA, within the next few days, a payment in excess of £4.2m. The company was concerned that the entirety of the IATA moneys should not be frozen, pending the adjourned hearing. In the event it was agreed that, pending the adjourned hearing, the IATA should be at liberty to pay a sum of £4.2m out of moneys owed by it to the company into an account in the joint names of the parties' solicitors, and having done so to release to the company the balance of any moneys owed to the company, and that thereupon the freezing order should immediately cease to have effect. These terms were duly incorporated in paras 3 and 4 of the February order. Paragraph 5 of the February order was in the following terms: a

‘If the sum of [£4.2m] is paid into such joint bank account as referred to in para 3 of this order, it shall be retained in such account and no sums shall be withdrawn therefrom pending further order of the court or the written consent of both [firms of solicitors].’ b

[16] Shortly after the making of the February order the two firms of solicitors opened the joint account, which was designated by the bank as a ‘Solicitors’ Reserve Account’. It was entitled ‘Allen & Overy and Field Fisher Waterhouse Joint Escrow General Client Account’. On 18 February 2002 £4.2m was paid by the IATA to Allen & Overy and held by Allen & Overy in its client account. On 20 February 2002 Allen & Overy paid that sum into the joint account. c

[17] The date fixed for the adjourned hearing of the matter was 13 March 2002. In the meantime, however, the parties had reached agreement on terms of compromise of the interlocutory dispute. These terms were incorporated in a further consent order made by McCombe J on 13 March 2002 (the March order).

[18] The March order was expressed to be made on undertakings by the parties. Flightline undertook not to apply for a further freezing order over the company’s assets without giving two clear days’ written notice of the application. The company’s undertaking was in the following terms (set out in the second schedule to the March order): d

‘Not to withdraw or in any way dispose of or deal with or encumber its interest in the moneys in the [joint account] up to a limit of £3,325,000 pending further order of the court or the written consent of [the two firms of solicitors].’ e

[19] The body of the March order (which was expressed to be made by consent) provided merely that the freezing order be discharged; that the company’s application to discharge it be dismissed; and that there be no order as to costs. It also contained general liberty to apply. f

[20] On 4 April 2002 the appellants were appointed provisional liquidators of the company. On 16 October 2002 the company was compulsorily wound up and the appellants were appointed liquidators of the company by the Secretary of State. It is common ground that at all material times the company was in serious financial difficulties, and that such difficulties were known to Flightline. g

[21] On 28 May 2002 Flightline issued its application pursuant to s 130(2) of the 1986 Act for leave to continue its action against the company.

SECTION 130(2) OF THE 1986 ACT h

[22] Section 130(2) of the 1986 Act provides as follows:

‘When a winding-up order has been made or a provisional liquidator has been appointed, no action or proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company or its property, except by leave of the court and subject to such terms as the court may impose.’ j

THE JUDGE’S JUDGMENT

[23] After setting out the factual and procedural background, the judge referred to the two distinct lines of authority which had been cited to him. One such line of authority (exemplified by Re Ford, ex p the trustee [1900] 2 QB 211,

- a* WA Sherratt Ltd v John Bromley (Church Stretton) Ltd [1985] 1 All ER 216, [1985] QB 1038, Halvanon Insurance Co Ltd v Central Reinsurance Corp [1988] 3 All ER 857, [1988] 1 WLR 1122 and Re Mordant, Mordant v Halls [1997] 2 FCR 378) establishes that where money is paid into court by a defendant as a condition of the grant of permission to defend the action or as an offer of compromise under the relevant procedural rules, or where it is paid into an account out of court but with the
- b* intention that the same consequences shall follow as if it had been paid into court, the claimant has a charge on the money so paid to secure any judgment obtained by him in the action. The other line of authority (exemplified by Cretanor Maritime Co Ltd v Irish Marine Management Ltd [1978] 3 All ER 164, [1978] 1 WLR 966 and Re Multi Guarantee Co Ltd [1987] BCLC 257) establishes that a freezing order is relief in personam and creates no proprietary rights in the assets from
- c* time to time subject to it.

- d* [26] The present case is something of a hybrid. On the one hand, as in all the cases where the money (whether in court or in a bank account) has been held to be security for the claim, it is, subject to the parties agreeing otherwise, under the control of the court, which must mean the court which is seised of the action in relation to which the payment has been made. In all those cases the money has been treated as security. On the other hand, unlike those cases, in this case the money has been paid to discharge, or in
- e* substitution for, an order which is non-proprietary. That can therefore be said to support the contention that, in accordance with part of the reasoning in [the Multi Guarantee case], the money should not be treated as security for the claimant.

- f* [27] It would therefore be idle to suggest that the argument raised by Mr Pascoe on behalf of the [provisional liquidators], to the effect that [Flightline] cannot claim that the money in the joint account is to be treated as security for its claim, has no force. On the contrary: it is an attractive argument, which was attractively advanced. None the less, I have reached the conclusion that [Flightline's] case is correct, and that the money held in the joint account pursuant to the March order is indeed security for any
- g* judgment which the applicant may obtain, whether by consent or otherwise, in the claim.'

[25] The judge went on to express his reasons for reaching this conclusion.

- h* [26] In the first place, the judge noted that the effect of the March order was that the money was to be held in the account subject only to what the court might order (the judge took the view that the reference to the parties' consent added nothing in this respect, since it is always open to the parties to agree how to deal with money paid in connection with an action). The judge went on (at [28]):

- j* 'The effect of the March order is, therefore, that the £3.325m is sterilised and is beyond the reach of the company, unless and until the court orders otherwise. On the face of it, therefore, as with a payment into court (or into a joint bank account) in circumstances such as those in [Re Ford, ex p the trustee [1900] 2 QB 211, WA Sherratt Ltd v John Bromley (Church Stretton) Ltd [1985] 1 All ER 216, [1985] QB 1038] or [Re Mordant, Mordant v Halls [1997] 2 FCR 378], the money will remain in the joint account until the claim is disposed of. One would therefore expect it to be available to satisfy any judgment in the applicant's favour ...'

[27] The judge said:

'[29] The retention of the £3.325m in the joint account pursuant to the company's undertaking in the March order was agreed in order to discharge the freezing order. The purpose of the freezing order was to protect [Flightline] from the risk of being unable to obtain satisfaction of any judgment it obtained on the claim, owing to dissipation of the company's assets. It seems to me that, on a sensible, commercial view, what the parties intended by agreeing the March order was that the freezing order was no longer necessary because [Flightline] had security for its claim, in the form of the money in court. The perceived danger of the company dissipating its assets remained, but, following the March order (and indeed following the February order) [Flightline] had no ground for maintaining the freezing order because it was protected by the payment of the money into the joint account.'

[30] It is true that there is nothing in the company's undertaking in the March order which indicates how the court is to exercise its power to control the money in the joint account. There is therefore obviously substantial room for argument that the fact that the money is to be effectively controlled by the court means that the court should regard it in the same way as it would regard assets frozen by the freezing order, particularly as the money was paid into the joint account effectively in substitution for, or to discharge, the freezing order. However, if that is what the parties had intended, then, particularly in light of the authorities which I have referred to dealing with payments into court or into accounts which were in some way to be controlled by the court, in the context of cases which are already underway, one would have expected them to spell it out. Thus, it does not seem likely that, after the March order, [Flightline] or the company would have intended the court to be able to permit the company to use the moneys in court to discharge its legal costs and expenses in connection with the claim: if that had been their intention, it would have been only too easy to say so.'

[28] The judge's second reason for concluding that the money in the joint account stands as security for Flightline's claim was the existence in the standard form of freezing order of a provision that the freezing order shall cease to have effect if the respondent provides 'security' by paying money into court or by some other agreed method. The judge accepted, however, that this point was weakened by the fact that the freezing order in question did not contain such a provision. The judge went on (at [31]):

'As the freezing injunction will, ex hypothesi, have been discharged as a result of the payment of such "security", it appears to me that the natural inference is that such payment would be security for the claimant's claim. Accordingly, I consider that the notion that a payment into court or into a joint account in the name of both parties' solicitors to discharge or buy off a freezing injunction should then be treated as security for any judgment which the claimant subsequently obtains, is not by any means inherently inconsistent with the notion of a freezing order.'

a [29] The judge's third reason for his conclusion was that he considered that, on analysis, the decision of this court in Re Multi Guarantee Co Ltd [1987] BCLC 257 provided no significant support for the appellants' argument, since in the Multi Guarantee case at the time when the money was paid into a joint account proceedings had not yet been commenced, albeit they had been threatened. The judge considered (at [32]) that there was 'a very substantial difference' between a payment into a joint account when there were no legal proceedings pending, and one which is made in the context of litigation which is already under way. Further, in so far as Nourse LJ (who gave the leading judgment in the Multi Guarantee case) relied on the fact that the payment was made in the context of a possible application for a freezing order, the judge noted that the Court of Appeal did not appear to have considered the provision in the standard form of freezing order to which reference has already been made, and that the fact that the background in that case included the possibility of a freezing order was merely one of the factors which weighed with the Court of Appeal. The judge suggested that equal, if not more, weight appeared to have been placed by the Court of Appeal on the negotiations between the parties, and the absence of any express agreement as to the basis upon which the money in the joint account in that case was to be held.

d [30] Fourthly, the judge considered that the fact that a payment of money into court or into a joint bank account in order to discharge a freezing order converts the claimant pro tanto into a secured creditor in respect of his claim was not such a surprising result as might at first appear. The judge went on to point to what he regarded as similarities between the position of a claimant in such a case and that of a claimant who has obtained the benefit of a payment into court. The judge took the view that there was no intrinsic reason why a claimant who has obtained a freezing order, and in the process has incurred risk and expense, should not be in a better position than other creditors, either by being paid or by having the benefit of security. However, the judge went on (at [35]) to acknowledge—

e 'that it is arguable that a creditor who applies for summary judgment and, as it were, only fails by a short head, as a result of which there is a payment into court, has by his action, justified his secured creditor status rather more obviously than a creditor who achieves that status through a payment into court to discharge a freezing injunction.'

g [31] Finally, the judge referred to three other matters relied on by Flightline which, in the judge's view, provided some further support for the conclusion which he had reached: first, the fact that the joint account was described as an 'escrow' account; secondly, the 20% or so reduction in the amount to be paid into the joint account; and thirdly the fact that at the material time the company was in serious financial difficulties. In connection with this last matter, the judge commented that it must have been reasonably foreseeable that the company would go into some form of liquidation in the near future. He considered that in those circumstances it was rather more likely that the parties would have agreed the provision of security rather than merely a mechanism for the replacement of the freezing order.

j [32] Mr Pascoe submits that having concluded (at [30]) that the terms embodied in the March order—including the company's undertaking—were

'effectively in substitution for, or to discharge, the freezing order', the judge ought to have gone on to conclude that just as the freezing order created no security rights neither did the March order. a [33] Whilst accepting, as he must (see Investors Compensation Scheme v West Bromwich Building Society, Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v Hopkin & Sons (a firm), Alford v West Bromwich Building Society, Armitage v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 All ER 98 at 114, [1998] 1 WLR 896 at 913 per Lord Hoffmann), that in determining the effect of the March order regard may not be had to 'the previous negotiations of the parties and their declarations of subjective intent', Mr Pascoe submits that it is not only legitimate but essential for the court to consider the effect of the March order against the background of the February order. He submits that the terms and effect of the February order afford strong support for the conclusion that the effect of the March order was merely to provide an alternative form of freezing relief pending trial. Thus he submits firstly that there is nothing on the face of the February order to suggest that the parties intended to do more than provide an alternative mechanism of a 'freezing' nature. Secondly, he points out that the February order was to continue only until the adjourned hearing of the interlocutory proceedings—proceedings in which the company was not only opposing any continuation of the freezing order but was also intending to seek the discharge of the freezing order ab initio, with consequential exposure of Flightline to liability under its cross-undertakings. Viewing the February order in that context, it is (he submits) inherently extremely improbable that the parties would have intended to create security rights in favour of Flightline. b

[34] Turning to the March order, Mr Pascoe submits that (as in the case of the February order) there is nothing on the face of the March order to indicate that in compromising the interlocutory proceedings the parties intended to do more than substitute an alternative mechanism of a 'freezing' nature, albeit (in contrast to the February order) a mechanism which was intended to continue until trial or further order. He submits that the words 'pending further order of the court' in the company's undertaking in the March order are entirely consistent with an arrangement for the freezing of the moneys in the joint account (up to the specified limit), as is the grant in the body of the March order of liberty to apply. Secondly, he submits that that conclusion is reinforced when the March order is viewed against the background of the February order, which (as he submits, see above) plainly created no security rights. f
g

[35] Mr Pascoe submits that it is nothing to the point that the freezing order as granted on 16 January 2002 and as subsequently extended did not include the provision as to security which appears in the standard form of freezing order.

[36] In the course of argument we invited Mr Pascoe to comment on the well-known passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in Palmer v Carey [1926] AC 703 at 706–707, [1926] All ER Rep 650 at 651–652, to which we drew his attention (and to which further reference will be made at [43], below), to the effect that in order for an equitable charge to be created over a specific fund it is necessary to find not merely a restriction on disposal of the fund by the debtor but also an obligation on the debtor to pay the debt out of the fund. In response to that invitation, Mr Pascoe submitted that in the instant case there was nothing in the March order to support the existence of such an obligation. h

[37] Mr Moss submits that the resolution of the issue whether the March order created security rights involves the two-stage process identified by Lord Millett in Agnew v Comr of Inland Revenue [2001] UKPC 28 at [32], [2001] 2 BCLC 189 at [32], a [2001] 2 AC 710 at [32]. The first stage is to ascertain from the language which the parties have used the nature of the rights and obligations which they intended to create: the second stage is to consider whether, as a matter of law, those rights and obligations give rise to a charge. So, he submits, the question to be addressed in the instant case is not 'Did the parties intend that the March order should create a security?', but rather 'As a matter of law, does the March order have the effect of

c [38] As to the first stage in the two-stage process, Mr Moss submits that as a matter of construction of the March order it was intended that the moneys in the joint account be available to Flightline to satisfy any judgment which it might obtain in the action, up to the specified limit of £3.325m. He relies in this connection (more strongly here than below, it would appear) on the fact that the title to the joint account includes the word 'escrow'. He referred us to one of the dictionary meanings of the word as 'a deposit held in trust or as security'. He also referred us to a passage in 13 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 36 where the technical conveyancing meaning of the word is explained. Thus a deed which is delivered 'in escrow' will not become binding on the party delivering it unless

d and until some specified event happens or some specified condition is fulfilled. Mr Moss submits that notwithstanding that the word 'escrow' in the title to the joint account is plainly not used in its strict technical sense, nevertheless the flavour of word points towards the existence of some kind of security rights and the fact that the parties have seen fit to include that word in the title to the joint account is an indicator that they regarded the March order as having created a e security.

[39] Mr Moss submits that it is of central importance that under the March order (as under the February order) the moneys in the joint account were placed under the control of the court. He accepts that that is not in itself sufficient to take the instant case out of the category of freezing order cases and to place it in f the same category as cases where money is paid into court, since the control of the court is present in each category of case; but he submits that what is crucial in the instant case is that under the terms of the March order the court may direct that the moneys in the joint account (up to the specified maximum) be paid out to Flightline in or towards satisfaction of any judgment which it may obtain in the action. That additional feature, he submits, is sufficient to place the instant case

g in the same category as cases where money is paid into court.

[40] As to Palmer v Carey, Mr Moss submits that the security created by the March order is not a security in the nature of an equitable assignment but is rather in the nature of what Professor Roy Goode in Commercial Law (2nd edn, 1995) pp 671–673 categorises as 'procedural securities'. Professor Goode includes in h that category the payment of money into court, whether in fulfilment of a condition of leave to defend or in satisfaction of the claimant's claim, or in compliance with an order for security for costs. Professor Goode goes on to contrast an order, such as a freezing order, which merely restrains the defendant from dealing with his assets without attaching them in any way and which creates j no proprietary rights.

[41] Mr Moss submits that the effect of the March order, as a matter of law, is to be determined without reference to the February order. Alternatively, if it be legitimate for this purpose to have regard to the terms of the February order, Mr Moss submits that it is by no means clear that the February order was not intended to create rights and obligations extending beyond the date of the adjourned hearing. He submits that, from a commercial point of view, there is good reason to suppose that in agreeing the terms of the February order the parties were intending that the moneys in the account should be available to satisfy any judgment which Flightline might obtain in the action. At all events, he submits that that is the only sensible commercial interpretation of the terms of the March order, and that the judge was right so to conclude.

[42] Mr Moss also points to the absence from both the February order and the March order of many of the detailed, but essential, provisions of the freezing order as originally granted on 16 January 2002, including in particular the power for the respondent to vary or discharge the order. He submits that the judge was right to conclude that had it been intended that the March order was intended to do no more than provide a substitute for the freezing order, the parties would have been likely to say so in clear terms.

CONCLUSIONS

[43] In Palmer v Carey [1926] AC 703, [1926] All ER Rep 650 a lender agreed to finance the activities of a trader in goods, on terms that the proceeds of sale of the goods be paid into an account in the name of the lender, and that the lender recoup himself on a monthly basis in respect of sums advanced, with the balance being released to the trader subject to a right for the lender to retain a sum representing an agreed share of the trader's profit. The trader subsequently became bankrupt. At the date of the bankruptcy, a substantial sum was owing to the lender in respect of sums advanced. The lender claimed security over goods and proceeds of sale in the hands of the trader. The Privy Council, reversing the decision of the High Court of Australia ((1924) 34 CLR 380) (Knox CJ dissenting), held that the lender had no such security. In the course of its judgment (delivered by Lord Wrenbury), the Privy Council said ([1926] AC 703 at 706–707, [1926] All ER Rep 650 at 651–652):

‘The law as to equitable assignment, as stated by Lord Truro in Rodick v. Gandell ((1852) 1 De GM & G 763, 42 ER 749), is this: “The extent of the principle to be deduced is that an agreement between a debtor and a creditor that the debt owing shall be paid out of a specific fund coming to the debtor, or an order given by a debtor to his creditor upon a person owing money or holding funds belonging to the giver of the order, directing such person to pay such funds to the creditor, will create a valid equitable charge upon such fund, in other words, will operate as an equitable assignment of the debts or fund to which the order refers.” An agreement for valuable consideration that a fund shall be applied in a particular way may found an injunction to restrain its application in another way. But if there be nothing more, such a stipulation will not amount to an equitable assignment. It is necessary to find, further, that an obligation has been imposed in favour of the creditor to pay the debt out of the fund. This is but an instance of a familiar doctrine of equity that a contract for valuable consideration to transfer or charge a subject matter passes a beneficial interest by way of property in that subject matter if the contract is one of which a Court of equity will decree specific performance.’ (Our emphasis.)

[44] The above statement of principle was adopted verbatim by the House of Lords in Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 449 at 453, [1982] AC 584 at 613 per Lord Wilberforce.

[45] The judgment in Palmer v Carey then turns to the provisions of the agreement between the lender and the trader in that case, and in particular the a provision in art 3 of the agreement that the proceeds of sale of the goods be paid into an account in the name of the lender. The judgment continues ([1926] AC 703 at 707, [1926] All ER Rep 650 at 652):

b 'Under art. 3, however, the proceeds are to be paid to the lender's credit at his bank. This gives the lender a most efficient hold to prevent the misapplication of the proceeds, but there is nothing in that article to give him
c 'a property by way of security or otherwise in the moneys of the borrower before or after he, the lender, has them in his charge.'

[46] The judgment goes on to express the agreement of the Privy Council with the following passage from the dissenting judgment of Knox CJ in the court below ((1924) 34 CLR 380 at 388):

c 'The words of the agreement on which the appellant relies are apt to express a contract by the bankrupt to apply the money in the purchase of goods, to sell those goods, and to pay the proceeds of the sale into the appellant's bank account, but I can see nothing in them to indicate that the d intention was to assign any interest in goods purchased by the bankrupt or to create either a charge over or a trust of such goods in favour of the appellant.'

[47] Although Palmer v Carey concerned contractual arrangements made between the parties out of court, in our judgment Lord Wrenbury's statement of principle applies directly to consent orders, such as the February order and the e March order, which embody terms agreed between the parties; and also indirectly, by analogy, to other court orders. Thus, the reason why a freezing order does not create a security right over the assets from time to time subject to it is, in my judgment, that a freezing order—without more—does not impose an obligation on the part of the respondent to satisfy any judgment debt out of those f assets. Rather, a freezing order provides what Lord Wrenbury described (in the passage quoted at [45], above) as 'a most efficient hold to prevent the misapplication [of those assets]'. As Lord Wrenbury makes clear, that is not enough to create a security right. On the other hand, cases in Professor Goode's category of 'procedural securities' are cases in which the clear purpose of the order is to afford a claimant an element of security in the satisfaction of his claim.
g Hence, by analogy with the principle stated by Lord Wrenbury, a security right is created.

[48] The question in the instant case, then, is whether one can spell out of the terms of the March order a provision (albeit not expressed in terms) to the effect that the company must satisfy any judgment obtained by Flightline (up to the h specified maximum of £3.325m) out of the moneys in the joint account; or, to put it the other way round, a provision to the effect that if Flightline is successful in obtaining a judgment in the action it is entitled to payment out of such moneys (or of so much thereof as is required to satisfy the judgment) as a matter of right.

[49] We find ourselves wholly unable to spell out of the March order any such j provision. Firstly, we can see nothing on the face of the March order (without at this stage bringing into account any background facts) to indicate that anything other than continuing interim protection of a 'freezing' nature was intended to be provided. In particular, the terms of the company's undertaking, as contained in the second schedule to the March order, seem to me to be entirely consistent with the continuance of interim protection of a 'freezing' nature until trial or further order. As Mr Moss accepted, the mere fact that the moneys in the account were under the control of the court does not serve to take the case out of the freezing order category. Secondly, when one takes account by way of background of the terms of the February order, the conclusion that the March order confers no security rights is in my judgment reinforced. We agree with Mr Pascoe that the February order plainly did not achieve anything more than the continuation of interim protection of a 'freezing' nature until the date of the adjourned hearing. a

[50] Nor are we persuaded that Mr Moss' reliance on the inclusion of the word 'escrow' in the title of the joint account has the significance which he seeks to give it. In our judgment there is no satisfactory basis for inferring (because there is no direct evidence about it) that the use of that word indicates that the parties for their part understood the March order to create a security right. In any event, as Mr Moss himself asserts, the question whether the March order created a security right is ultimately a question of law. b

[51] Equally, it seems to us to be nothing to the point that the freezing order as granted on 16 January 2002 does not contain the subparagraph in the standard form relating to the provision of security. c

[52] As to the figure of £3.325m which appears in the company's undertaking in the March order, as compared with the figure of £4.2m which appears in the February order, given that the March order represented a compromise of the interlocutory dispute (including the company's application to discharge the freezing order ab initio) we find it impossible to draw any relevant inference from the fact that the £4.2m was reduced to £3.325m. Nor does the background of the company's serious financial difficulties seem to us to afford any reliable indication as to whether the March order created a security right. d

[53] In respectful disagreement with the judge, therefore, we conclude that the March order did not confer any security right on Flightline and that the appeal should accordingly be allowed on the primary issue. e

- d Human rights – Public authority – ‘Core’ public authority – Whether non-governmental organisation could be regarded as ‘core’ public authority for purposes of human rights legislation – Human Rights Act 1998, s 6.

The defendants were, as freehold owners of certain rectorial land, the lay rectors of a parish. As such, they were under a common law obligation to repair the chancel of the parish church. The statutory power to enforce that obligation lay with the claimant parochial church council (PCC), a body corporate which formed part of the Church of England and whose functions included co-operating with the minister in promoting the Church’s mission within the parish. After the chancel fell into disrepair, the PCC served notices on the lay rectors under the Chancel Repairs Act 1932, calling on them to repair the chancel. They disputed their liability, and the PCC therefore brought proceedings against them to recover the estimated cost of the repairs. On the determination of a preliminary issue, the judge held that the lay rectors were liable. They appealed, relying on s 6(1)^a of the Human Rights Act 1998 which made it unlawful for a ‘public authority’ to act in a way that was incompatible with a right under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). Section 6(3)(b) provided that ‘public authority’ included any person certain of whose functions were functions of a public nature, but that extension did not apply to a person if the nature of the act in question was ‘private’. The Court of Appeal held that the PCC was a ‘core’ public authority (ie an authority which fell within s 6 without reference to sub-s (3)) since it formed part of the church by law established, and that in any event it was performing a function of a public nature when it was enforcing the lay rectors’ liability for the chancel repairs. The court further held that the PCC’s act in serving the notice was incompatible with convention rights of the lay rectors. Accordingly, their appeal was allowed. On the PCC’s appeal to the House of Lords, the issue arose, inter alia, as to whether a PCC could be a ‘core’ public authority given that (i) only the ‘victim’ of an infringement of convention rights could bring proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights or against a public

authority under the 1998 Act, and (ii) both the convention and the Act defined 'victim' as any person, 'non-governmental organisation' or group of individuals. a

Held – A PCC was not a 'core' public authority for the purposes of s 6 of the 1998 Act, and (Lord Scott dissenting) it did not become a public authority by virtue of sub-s (3)(b) when enforcing a lay rector's liability for chancel repairs. A person who would be regarded as a 'non-governmental organisation' within the meaning of the convention ought not to be regarded as a 'core' public authority for the purposes of s 6. That would deprive such an organisation of the rights enjoyed by the victims of acts which were incompatible with convention rights and had been made unlawful by s 6(1). The Church of England itself could not be said to be part of the government, and its legal framework as a church by law established did not lead to the conclusion that a PCC was a public authority. The PCC's general function was to carry out the religious mission of the Church in the parish, rather than to exercise any governmental power. Nor was it in any sense under the supervision of the state. Furthermore, the enforcement of liability for chancel repairs was a private rather than a public act. The nature of the act was to be found in the nature of the obligation that the PCC was seeking to enforce, namely a civil debt. The function which it was performing had nothing to do with the responsibilities owed to the public by the state. Accordingly (Lord Scott concurring), the appeal would be allowed (see [8], [13]–[17], [47], [58]–[64], [75], [86], [87], [89], [94], [129], [136], [156], [161], [166], [171], [173], below). b

Appeal

The claimant, the Parochial Church Council of Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley, Warwickshire, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 11 February 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, Robert Walker and Sedley LJ) on 17 May 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2001] 3 All ER 393, [2002] Ch 51) allowing an appeal by the defendants, Gail R Wallbank and Andrew David Wallbank, from the decision of Ferris J on 28 March 2000 ([2000] All ER (D) 419) whereby, on the determination of a preliminary issue, he held that the Wallbanks were liable for the cost of repairs to the chancel of the church of St John the Baptist, Aston Cantlow. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hope of Craighead. d

Charles George QC and Mark Hill (instructed by Winckworth Sherwood as agents for Rotherham & Co, Coventry) for the parochial church council. e

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

26 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered. g

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of all your Lordships. I too would allow this appeal. On some of the issues your Lordships have expressed different views. I shall state my own views without repeating the facts. h

[2] This case concerns one of the more arcane and unsatisfactory areas of property law: the liability of a lay rector, or lay impropiator, for the repair of the chancel of a church. The very language is redolent of a society long disappeared. The anachronistic, even capricious, nature of this ancient liability was recognised some years ago by the Law Commission: Liability for Chancel Repairs (Law Com No 152 (1985)). The Commission said (p 2 (para 1.5)): '... this relic of the past is ... no longer acceptable.' The Commission recommended its phased abolition. j

[3] In these proceedings Mr and Mrs Wallbank admitted that, apart from the Human Rights Act 1998, they have no defence to the claim made against them by a the Parochial Church Council (PCC) of the parish of Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley, Warwickshire. The House was not asked to consider whether the case of Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417 was correctly decided.

b [4] At first sight the Human Rights Act might seem to have nothing to do with the present case. The events giving rise to the litigation occurred, and the decision of Ferris J ([2000] All ER (D) 419) was given, before the Human Rights Act came into force. But the decision of the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2001] 3 All ER 393, [2002] Ch 51) was based on the provisions of the Human Rights Act, and this decision has wide financial implications for the Church of England, going far beyond the outcome of this particular case. The decision affects numerous PCCs and perhaps as many as one third of all parish churches. c The Church of England needs to know whether, as the Court of Appeal held, it is unlawful now for a PCC to enforce a lay rector's obligation to meet the cost of chancel repairs. Accordingly, in order to obtain the decision of the House on this point, the PCC conceded that the Human Rights Act applies in this case. This concession having been made by the PCC, no argument was addressed to d your Lordships' House on the question of law thus conceded. I express no view on this question.

[5] Assuming the Human Rights Act is applicable in this case, the overall question is whether the PCC's prosecution of proceedings against Mr and Mrs Wallbank is rendered unlawful by s 6 of the Human Rights Act as an act by e a public authority which is incompatible with a right under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act). In answering this question the initial step is to consider whether the PCC is 'a public authority'.

f [6] The expression 'public authority' is not defined in the Human Rights Act, nor is it a recognised term of art in English law, that is, an expression with a specific recognised meaning. The word 'public' is a term of uncertain import, used with many different shades of meaning: public policy, public rights of way, public property, public authority (in the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893), public nuisance, public house, public school, public company. So in the present case the statutory context is all important. As to that, the broad purpose sought g to be achieved by s 6(1) is not in doubt. The purpose is that those bodies for whose acts the state is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights shall in future be subject to a domestic law obligation not to act incompatibly with convention rights. If they act in breach of this legal obligation victims may henceforth obtain redress from the courts of this country. In future victims h should not need to travel to Strasbourg.

[7] Conformably with this purpose, the phrase 'a public authority' in s 6(1) is essentially a reference to a body whose nature is governmental in a broad sense of that expression. It is in respect of organisations of this nature that the government is answerable under the convention. Hence, under the Human Rights Act a body of this nature is required to act compatibly with convention j rights in everything it does. The most obvious examples are government departments, local authorities, the police and the armed forces. Behind the instinctive classification of these organisations as bodies whose nature is governmental lie factors such as the possession of special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest, and a statutory constitution: see the valuable article by Professor

Dawn Oliver 'The Frontiers of the State: Public Authorities and Public Functions under the Human Rights Act' [2000] PL 476. a

[8] A further, general point should be noted. One consequence of being a 'core' public authority, namely, an authority falling within s 6 without reference to s 6(3), is that the body in question does not itself enjoy convention rights. It is difficult to see how a core public authority could ever claim to be a victim of an infringement of convention rights. A core public authority seems inherently incapable of satisfying the convention description of a victim: 'any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals' (see art 34; my emphasis). Only victims of an unlawful act may bring proceedings under s 7 of the Human Rights Act, and the convention description of a victim has been incorporated into the Act, by s 7(7). This feature, that a core public authority is incapable of having convention rights of its own, is a matter to be borne in mind when considering whether or not a particular body is a core public authority. In itself this feature throws some light on how the expression 'public authority' should be understood and applied. It must always be relevant to consider whether Parliament can have intended that the body in question should have no convention rights. b

[9] In a modern developed state governmental functions extend far beyond maintenance of law and order and defence of the realm. Further, the manner in which wide-ranging governmental functions are discharged varies considerably. In the interests of efficiency and economy, and for other reasons, functions of a governmental nature are frequently discharged by non-governmental bodies. Sometimes this will be a consequence of privatisation, sometimes not. One obvious example is the running of prisons by commercial organisations. Another is the discharge of regulatory functions by organisations in the private sector, for instance, the Law Society. Section 6(3)(b) gathers this type of case into the embrace of s 6 by including within the phrase 'public authority' any person whose functions include 'functions of a public nature'. This extension of the expression 'public authority' does not apply to a person if the nature of the act in question is 'private'. c

[10] Again, the statute does not amplify what the expression 'public' and its counterpart 'private' mean in this context. But, here also, given the statutory context already mentioned and the repetition of the description 'public', essentially the contrast being drawn is between functions of a governmental nature and functions, or acts, which are not of that nature. I stress, however, that this is no more than a useful guide. The phrase used in the Act is public function, not governmental function. d

[11] Unlike a core public authority, a 'hybrid' public authority, exercising both public functions and non-public functions, is not absolutely disabled from having convention rights. A hybrid public authority is not a public authority in respect of an act of a private nature. Here again, as with s 6(1), this feature throws some light on the approach to be adopted when interpreting s 6(3)(b). Giving a generously wide scope to the expression 'public function' in s 6(3)(b) will further the statutory aim of promoting the observance of human rights values without depriving the bodies in question of the ability themselves to rely on convention rights when necessary. e

[12] What, then, is the touchstone to be used in deciding whether a function is public for this purpose? Clearly there is no single test of universal application. There cannot be, given the diverse nature of governmental functions and the variety of means by which these functions are discharged today. Factors to be f a taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service.

[13] Turning to the facts in the present case, I do not think PCCs are 'core' public authorities. Historically the Church of England has discharged an important and influential role in the life of this country. As the established Church it still has special links with central government. But the Church of England remains essentially a religious organisation. This is so even though some of the emanations of the Church discharge functions which may qualify as governmental. Church schools and the conduct of marriage services are two instances. The legislative powers of the General Synod of the Church of England are another. This should not be regarded as infecting the Church of England as a whole, or its emanations in general, with the character of a governmental organisation.

[14] As to PCCs, their constitution and functions lend no support to the view that they should be characterised as governmental organisations or, more precisely, in the language of the statute, public authorities. PCCs are established as corporate bodies under a Church measure, now the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956. For historical reasons this unique form of legislation, having the same force as a statute, is the way the Church of England governs its affairs. But the essential role of a PCC is to provide a formal means, prescribed by the Church of England, whereby ex officio and elected members of the local church promote the mission of the Church and discharge financial responsibilities in respect of their own parish church, including responsibilities regarding maintenance of the fabric of the building. This smacks of a Church body engaged in self-governance and promotion of its affairs. This is far removed from the type of body whose acts engage the responsibility of the state under the convention.

[15] The contrary conclusion, that the Church authorities in general and PCCs in particular are 'core' public authorities, would mean these bodies are not capable of being victims within the meaning of the Human Rights Act. Accordingly they are not able to complain of infringements of convention rights. That would be an extraordinary conclusion. The Human Rights Act goes out of its way, in s 13, to single out for express mention the exercise by religious organisations of the convention right of freedom of thought, conscience and religion. One would expect that these and other convention rights would be enjoyed by the Church of England as much as other religious bodies.

[16] I turn next to consider whether a PCC is a hybrid public authority. For this purpose it is not necessary to analyse each of the functions of a PCC and see if any of them is a public function. What matters is whether the particular act done by the PCC of which complaint is made is a private act as contrasted with the discharge of a public function. The impugned act is enforcement of Mr and Mrs Wallbank's liability, as lay rectors, for the repair of the chancel of the church of St John the Baptist at Aston Cantlow. As I see it, the only respect in which there is any 'public' involvement is that parishioners have certain rights to attend church services and in respect of marriage and burial services. To that extent the state of repair of the church building may be said to affect rights of the public. But I do not think this suffices to characterise actions taken by the PCC for the repair of the church as 'public'. If a PCC enters into a contract with a builder for the repair of the chancel arch, that could be hardly be described as a public act.

Likewise when a PCC enforces, in accordance with the provisions of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932, a burdensome incident attached to the ownership of certain pieces of land: there is nothing particularly 'public' about this. This is no more a public act than is the enforcement of a restrictive covenant of which Church land has the benefit. a

[17] For these reasons this appeal succeeds. A PCC is not a core public authority, nor does it become such by virtue of s 6(3)(b) when enforcing a lay rector's liability for chancel repairs. Accordingly the Human Rights Act affords lay rectors no relief from their liabilities. This conclusion should not be allowed to detract from the force of the recommendations, already mentioned, of the Law Commission. The need for reform has not lessened with the passage of time. b

[18] On this footing the other issues raised in this case do not call for decision. I prefer to express no view on the application of art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention or, more specifically, on the compatibility of the 1932 Act with Mr and Mrs Wallbank's convention right under that article. The latter was not the subject of discrete argument. c

[19] I add only that even if s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act is applicable in this type of case, and even if the provisions of the 1932 Act are incompatible with Mr and Mrs Wallbank's convention rights under art 1 of the First Protocol, even so the PCC would not be acting unlawfully in enforcing Mr and Mrs Wallbank's liability as lay rectors. Like ss 3(2) and 4(6), s 6(2) of the Human Rights Act is concerned to preserve the primacy, and legitimacy, of primary legislation. This is one of the basic principles of the Act. As noted in Grosz, Beatson and Duffy Human Rights: the 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000) p 72 (para 4-22) a public authority is not obliged to neutralise primary legislation by treating it as a dead letter. If a statutory provision cannot be rendered convention compliant by application of s 3(1), it remains lawful for a public authority, despite the incompatibility, to act so as to 'give effect to' that provision: see s 6(2)(b). Here, s 2 of the 1932 Act provides that if the defendant would have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court, the court shall give judgment for the cost of putting the chancel in repair. When a PCC acts pursuant to that provision it is acting within the scope of the exception set out in s 6(2)(b). d

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD. g

[20] My Lords, the village of Aston Cantlow lies about three miles to the north west of Stratford-upon-Avon. It has a long history. The parish church, St John the Baptist, stands on an ancient Saxon site. Two images of its exterior can be seen on the website Pictorial Images of Warwickshire, www.genuki.org.uk/big/eng/WAR/images. It is the church where Shakespeare's mother, Mary Arden, who lived at Wilmcote within the parish, married John Shakespeare. The earliest part of the present structure is the chancel which has been there since the late thirteenth century. It was built in the decorated style and contains a fine example of the use of flowing tracery: see Pevsner and Wedgwood The Buildings of England: Warwickshire (1965) pp 19, 75. As time went on the condition of the structure began to deteriorate, and it is now in need of repair. It has been in that state since at least 1990. h

[21] In January 1995, when this action began, it was estimated that the cost of the repairs to the chancel was £95,260.84. By that date the Parochial Church Council (PCC) had served a notice under the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 in the prescribed form on Mrs Wallbank in her capacity as lay rector calling upon her to j a repair the chancel. She disputed liability, so the PCC brought proceedings against her under s 2(2) of the 1932 Act. When the notice was served on 12 September 1994 it was thought that Mrs Wallbank was the sole freehold owner of Glebe Farm. In fact, as a result of her conveyance of the farm into their joint names in 1990, she is its joint owner together with Mr Wallbank. So a further notice was served on 23 January 1996 on both Mr and Mrs Wallbank and an application was made for Mr Wallbank to be joined as a defendant in the proceedings. Several years have gone by. The dispute between the parties has still not been resolved. The cost of the repairs must now greatly exceed the amount of the original estimate.

[22] On 17 February 2000 Ferris J heard argument on the question whether the liability of the lay rector to repair the chancel or otherwise to meet the cost of the repairs was unenforceable by reason of the Human Rights Act 1998 or otherwise. He had been asked to determine this question as a preliminary issue. On 28 March 2000 he answered the question in the negative. At the end of his judgment ([2000] All ER (D) 419) he observed that it had been posed in terms which would only be appropriate if the Act was already in force. The only provisions which were in force then were ss 18, 20 and 21(5): see s 22(2) of the Human Rights Act. By the time of the hearing in the Court of Appeal on 19 March 2001 the position had changed. The remaining provisions of the Human Rights Act were brought into force on 2 October 2000: see the Human Rights Act (Commencement No 2) Order 2000, SI 2000/1851. Mr and Mrs Wallbank were allowed to amend their notice of appeal so that the issues which they wished to raise could be properly pleaded. On 17 May 2001 the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2001] 3 All ER 393, [2002] Ch 51) held that the PCC was a public authority for the purposes of s 6 of the Human Rights Act. The court also held that the PCC's action in serving the notice on Mr and Mrs Wallbank was unlawful by reason of art 1 of the First Protocol of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act), read either alone or with art 14 of the convention.

[23] The circumstances in which Mr and Mrs Wallbank are said to be liable for the cost of the repairs have been helpfully described by my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote. I gratefully adopt what he has said about them. It is clear from his account that the liability of the lay impropiator to pay the cost of repairing the chancel has been part of ecclesiastical law for many centuries. As Wynn-Parry J explained in Chivers & Sons Ltd v Secretary of State for Air (Queens' College, Cambridge, Third Party) [1955] 2 All ER 607 at 609, [1955] Ch 585 at 593, it rests on the maxim, which has long been recognised, that he who has the profits of the benefice should bear the burden. But the questions about the scope and effect of the Human Rights Act which your Lordships have been asked to decide in this appeal, and on which I wish to concentrate, are of current interest and very considerable public importance. They raise issues whose significance extends far beyond the boundaries of the parish of Aston Cantlow.

[24] The principal human rights issues which arise are: (a) whether Mr and Mrs Wallbank can rely upon an alleged violation of their convention rights as a ground of appeal when both the act complained of and the decision which went against them at first instance took place before 2 October 2000 (the retrospectivity issue); (b) whether the PCC is a public authority for the purposes of s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act (the public authority issue); and (c) whether the act of the PCC in serving the notice under the 1932 Act on Mr and Mrs Wallbank was incompatible with their rights under art 1 of the First Protocol read either alone or in conjunction with art 14 of the convention (the incompatibility issue). a

THE RETROSPECTIVITY ISSUE

[25] When the case came before the Court of Appeal the PCC conceded that it was open to Mr and Mrs Wallbank to raise the question whether its act in serving the notice was unlawful under s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act by virtue of ss 7(1)(b) and 22(4) of that Act, notwithstanding that service of the notice predated the coming into force of those sections. The Court of Appeal accepted this concession, which they considered to have been rightly made ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [7]). Those were, of course, early days in the life of the Act. The cases of R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545, R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69 and R v Benjafield [2002] UKHL 2, [2002] 1 All ER 815, [2002] 2 WLR 235 had yet to come before your Lordships' House. In the light of what was said in those cases about the issue of retrospectivity the PCC gave notice in the statement of facts and issues of its intention to apply for leave to dispute the issue in the course of the hearing of this appeal. But in the PCC's written case it is stated that this contention is no longer being pursued. In the result, although the parties were told at the outset of the hearing that it should not be assumed that the House would necessarily proceed on the basis of this concession, the issue was not the subject of argument. b

[26] I have, nevertheless, given some thought to the question whether it would be appropriate to examine the issue whether the service of the notice was incompatible with Mr and Mrs Wallbank's convention rights. The question whether, and if so in what circumstances, effect should be given to the Human Rights Act where relevant events occurred before it came into force is far from easy. So I should like to take a moment or two to explain why I have come to the conclusion that the concession was properly made and that in this case Mr and Mrs Wallbank are entitled to claim in these proceedings that the PCC has acted in a way that is made unlawful by s 6(1) of the Act. e

[27] As Lord Woolf CJ observed in Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081 at [22], [2003] 3 All ER 943 at [22], [2002] QB 1334 at [22], there has been considerable uncertainty as to whether the Human Rights Act can apply retrospectively in situations where the conduct complained of occurred before the Act came into force. The position which we have reached so far can, I think, be summarised in this way. g

[28] The only provision in the Human Rights Act which gives retrospective effect to any of its provisions is s 22(4). It directs attention exclusively to that part of the Act which deals with the acts of public authorities: see ss 6–9. It has been said that its effect is to enable the Act to be used defensively against public authorities with retrospective effect but not offensively: see the annotations to the Act by the late Peter Duffy QC in Current Law Statutes (1998) vol 3. Section 22(4) states that s 7(1)(b) applies to proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place, but that otherwise sub-s (1)(b) does not apply to an act taking place before the coming into force of s 7. Section 7(1)(b) enables a person who claims that a public authority has acted in a way which is made unlawful by s 6(1) to rely on his convention rights in proceedings brought by or at the instigation of the public authority. Section 6(2)(a) provides that s 6(1) does not apply if as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation the authority could not have acted differently. h a [29] It has been held that acts of courts or tribunals which took place before 2 October 2000 which they were required to make by primary legislation and were made according to the meaning which was to be given to the legislation at that time are not affected by s 22(4): see R v Kansal (No 2) [2002] 1 All ER 257 at [84], Wainwright's case [2003] 3 All ER 943 at [29]–[36]. Section 3(2) states that the b obligation in s 3(1) to interpret legislation in a way that is compatible with convention rights applies to primary and secondary legislation whenever enacted. But the interpretative obligation in s 3(1) cannot be applied to invalidate a decision which was good at the time when it was made by changing retrospectively the meaning which the court or tribunal previously gave to that legislation. The same view has been taken where the claim relates to acts of c public authorities other than courts or tribunals. Here too it has been held that the Act cannot be relied upon retrospectively by introducing a right of privacy to make unlawful conduct which was lawful at the time when it took place: see Wainwright's case [2003] 3 All ER 943 at [40].

[30] In this case the act which s 6(1) is said to have made unlawful is the enforcement by the PCC of the liability for the cost of the repairs to the chancel.
d It is the enforcement of that liability that is said to be an unlawful interference with the personal property rights of Mr and Mrs Wallbank contrary to art 1 of the First Protocol. Service by the PCC of the notice on Mr and Mrs Wallbank under s 2(1) of the 1932 Act took place in September 1994, well before the coming into effect of the Human Rights Act. But the service of the notice e under that subsection was just the first step in the taking of proceedings under the 1932 Act to enforce the liability to repair. If, as has happened here, the chancel is not put in proper repair within a period of one month from the date when the notice to repair was served proceedings must be taken by the responsible authority to recover the sum required to put the chancel in proper repair by means of an order of the court: see s 2(2) of the 1932 Act. The final step f in the process is the giving by the court of judgment for the responsible authority for such sum as appears to it to represent the cost of putting the chancel in proper repair: see s 2(3). The arguments before Ferris J and in the Court of Appeal arose out of a direction that there should be trial of preliminary issues. The question which is before your Lordships relates to one of those issues. The proceedings are, in that sense, still at the preliminary stage. The stage of giving judgment g under s 2(3) has not yet been reached.

[31] If the only act of the PCC which was in issue in this case had been the service of the notice on Mr and Mrs Wallbank it would have difficult, in the light of what was decided in R v Lambert and R v Kansal, to say that that act, which was lawful at the time when the notice was served and was still lawful when the h preliminary issue was decided by Ferris J at first instance, had become unlawful following the coming into effect of the Human Rights Act. But the proceedings to give effect to that notice are still on foot. In this situation there is, in my opinion, no issue of retrospectivity. Mr and Mrs Wallbank do not need to rely on s 22(4). It is sufficient for their purpose to say that they wish to rely on their j convention right in the proceedings which the PCC are still taking against them with a view to having the notice enforced. This is something that they are entitled to do under s 7(1)(b).

[32] It should be emphasised that the situation which I have outlined avoids the problems which were discussed in R v Lambert and R v Kansal about extending s 22(4) to appeals. We are, of course, dealing in this case with an appeal against the decision of a court or tribunal: see s 7(6)(a). But the fact is that the appeal relates to a preliminary issue only. This means that the court has yet to reach the stage in these proceedings when effect can be given to the notice which the PCC have served. That still lies in the future. Section 7(6)(a) states that the expression 'legal proceedings' in s 7(1)(b) includes 'proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority'. The preliminary issue has been examined as part of these proceedings.

[33] The question whether the proceedings of which an examination of the preliminary issue forms part are 'legal proceedings' as so defined brings me to the next issue, which is whether the PCC is a public authority for the purposes of s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act.

THE PUBLIC AUTHORITY ISSUE

(a) Introduction

[34] Section 6(1) provides that it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right. The expression 'public authority' is not fully defined anywhere in the Human Rights Act. What the Act does instead is to address itself to some particular issues. In all other respects the expression has been left to bear its ordinary meaning according to the context in which it is used. Section 6(3) provides:

'In this section "public authority" includes—(a) a court or tribunal, and (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature, but does not include either House of Parliament or a person exercising functions in connection with proceedings in Parliament.'

Section 6(5) provides: 'In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private.'

[35] It is clear from these provisions that, for the purposes of this Act, public authorities fall into two distinct types or categories. Courts and tribunals, which are expressly included in the definition, can perhaps be said to constitute a third category but they can be left on one side for present purposes. The first category comprises those persons or bodies which are obviously public or 'standard' public authorities: see Clayton and Tomlinson The Law of Human Rights (2000) pp 189 (para 5.08). They were referred to in the course of the argument as 'core' public authorities. It appears to have been thought that no further description was needed as they obviously have the character of public authorities. In the Notes on Clauses which are quoted in Clayton and Tomlinson p 188 (para 5.06), it was explained that the legislation proceeds on the basis that some authorities are so obviously public authorities that it is not necessary to define them expressly. In other words, they are public authorities through and through. So s 6(5) does not apply to them. The second category comprises persons or bodies some of whose functions are of a public nature. They are described in Clayton and Tomlinson as 'functional' public authorities and were referred to in the argument as 'hybrid' public authorities. Section 6(5) applies to them, so in their case a distinction must be drawn between their public functions and the acts which they perform which are of a private nature.

[36] Skilfully drawn though these provisions are, they leave a great deal of open ground. There is room for doubt and for argument. It has been left to the courts to resolve these issues when they arise. It is plain that the Court of Appeal were being invited to enter into largely uncharted territory. As a result of their efforts we are better equipped as we set out on the same journey. We have the a benefit of their decision and of the criticisms that have been made of it. We must now see where all this leads us. First, it is necessary to examine what they did.

[37] The Court of Appeal ([2003] 1 All ER 393 at [29]) declined, rightly in my opinion, to look to Hansard for assistance. They rejected the argument that there was an ambiguity which brought this case within the scope of the limited exception which was described in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593. It is true that various attempts were made by ministers in both Houses to explain their approach to the application of the Bill to what it described as public authorities. That was understandable, as some concern was expressed about the implications of this aspect of the legislation. But it is not the ministers' words, uttered as they were on behalf of the executive, that must be referred to in order to understand what Parliament intended. It is the words used by Parliament that must be examined in order to understand and apply the legislation that it has enacted.

[38] The Court of Appeal were invited to hold that the test of what is a public authority for the purposes of s 6 was function-based. They rejected this proposition too. As Sir Andrew Morritt V-C delivering the judgment of the court pointed out, this may well be determinative as regards the 'hybrid' class of public authorities as defined by s 6(3)(b). But it does not follow that it governs the principal category of 'core' public authorities ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [33]). In the following paragraph he said that for this reason the decided cases on the amenability of bodies to judicial review, while plainly relevant, will not necessarily be determinative of a body's membership either of the principal or hybrid class of public authority. He noted that the authorities on judicial review, as they now stand, draw a conceptual line between functions of public governance and functions of mutual governance. He said that there was no surviving element of mutuality or mutual governance as between the impropiator and the church in the lay rector's modern liability for chancel repairs.

[39] Sir Andrew Morritt V-C set out the conclusions of the Court of Appeal on the public authority issue (at [35]):

'In our judgment it is inescapable, in these circumstances, that a PCC is a public authority. It is an authority in the sense that it possesses powers which private individuals do not possess to determine how others should act. Thus, in particular, its notice to repair has statutory force. It is public in the sense that it is created and empowered by law; that it forms part of the church by law established; and that its functions include the enforcement through the courts of a common law liability to maintain its chancels resting upon persons who need not be members of the church. If this were to be incorrect, the PCC would nevertheless, and for the same reasons, be a legal person certain of whose functions, chancel repairs among them, are functions of a public nature. It follows on either basis by virtue of s 6 that its acts, to be lawful, must be compatible with the rights set out in Sch 1 to the [Human Rights Act 1998].'

[40] The Court of Appeal, in reaching the conclusion that the PCC is a 'core' public authority, appears to have proceeded in this way: (1) the PCC is an authority because it possesses powers which private individuals do not possess to enforce the lay rector's liability; and (2) it is public because it is created and empowered by law, it forms part of the Church of England as the established Church and its functions include the enforcement of the liability on persons who need not be members of the Church. By a similar process of reasoning the Court of Appeal concluded that the PCC is in any event a person some of whose functions, including chancel repairs, are functions of a public nature. In their view the fact that the PCC has the power and duty to enforce the obligation on persons with whom it has no other relationship showed that it has the character of a public authority, or at least that it is performing a function of a public nature when it is enforcing this liability (see also [2001] 3 All ER 393 at [36]).

[41] This approach has the obvious merit of concentrating on the words of the statute. The words 'public' and 'authority' in s 6(1), 'functions of a public nature' in s 6(3)(b) and 'private' in s 6(5) are, of course, important. The word 'public' suggests that there are some persons which may be described as authorities that are nevertheless private and not public. The word 'authority' suggests that the person has regulatory or coercive powers given to it by statute or by the common law. The combination of these two words in the single unqualified phrase 'public authority' suggests that it is the nature of the person itself, not the functions which it may perform, that is determinative. Section 6(1) does not distinguish between public and private functions. It assumes that everything that a 'core' public authority does is a public function. It applies to everything that a person does in that capacity. This suggests that some care needs to be taken to limit this category to cases where it is clear that this overarching treatment is appropriate. The phrase 'functions of a public nature' in s 6(3), on the other hand, does not make that assumption. It requires a distinction to be drawn between functions which are public and those which are private. It has a much wider reach, and it is sensitive to the facts of each case. It is the function that the person is performing that is determinative of the question whether it is, for the purposes of that case, a 'hybrid' public authority. The question whether s 6(5) applies to a particular act depends on the nature of the act which is in question in each case.

[42] The absence of a more precise definition of the expression 'public authority' for the purposes of s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act may be contrasted with the way that expression is used in the devolution legislation for Scotland and Northern Ireland. Sections 88–90 of the Scotland Act 1998 deal with what that Act calls 'cross-border public authorities'. 'Scottish public authorities' are dealt with in Pt III of Sch 5. Definitions of these expressions are provided in s 88(5), which requires 'a cross-border public authority' to be specified by Order in Council and in s 126(1) which states that 'Scottish public authority' means any public body, public office or holder of such an office whose functions are exercisable only in or as regards Scotland. A list of public bodies was appended to the White Paper Scotland's Parliament (Cm 3658 (1997)): see also the note to s 88 of the Human Rights Act in Current Law Statutes (1998) vol 3. It included three nationalised industries, a group of tribunals, three statutory water authorities, health bodies and a large number of miscellaneous executive and advisory bodies. Sections 75 and 76 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 impose a duty on public authorities to promote equality of opportunity and prohibit discrimination in the carrying out of their functions. The expression 'public authority' for the purposes of each of these sections is defined in a way that appears to leave no room for doubt as to which departments, corporations or other bodies are included: see ss 75(3), 76(7).

[43] The Court of Appeal did not explore the significance of the distinction which is drawn in s 6 between 'core' and 'hybrid' public authorities. In their view the PCC, for the same reasons, fell into either category (see [2001] 3 All a ER 393 at [35]). But the width that can be given to the 'hybrid' category suggests that the purpose of the legislation would not be impeded if the scope to be given to the concept of a 'core' public authority were to be narrowed considerably from that indicated by the Court of Appeal.

b [44] There is one vital step that is missing from the Court of Appeal's analysis. It is not mentioned expressly in the Human Rights Act, but it is crucial to a proper understanding of the balance which ss 6–9 of the Act seek to strike between the position of public authorities on the one hand and private persons on the other. The purpose of these sections is to provide a remedial structure in domestic law for the rights guaranteed by the convention. It is the obligation of states which have ratified the convention to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms which it protects: see Young v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 38 at 52 (para 49). The source of this obligation is art 13. It was omitted from the articles mentioned in s 1(1) which defines the meaning of the expression 'the Convention rights', as the purpose of ss 6–9 was to fulfil the obligation which it sets out. But it provides the background against which one must examine the scheme which these sections provide.

d [45] The principle upon which the scheme proceeds is that actions by public authorities are unlawful if they are in breach of convention rights: see s 6(1). Effect is given to that principle in s 7. It enables anyone who is a victim of an act made unlawful by s 6(1) to obtain a remedy. The extent to which the scheme derives its inspiration from the convention is revealed by the definition of the word 'victim' which is set out in s 7(7). It provides:

e 'For the purposes of this section, a person is a victim of an unlawful act only if he would be a victim for the purposes of Article 34 of the Convention if proceedings were brought in the European Court of Human Rights in respect of that act.'

f Article 34 of the convention is in these terms:

g 'The Court may receive applications from any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals claiming to be the victim of a violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in the Convention or the protocols thereto. The High Contracting Parties undertake not to hinder in any way the effective exercise of this right.'

h [46] The reference to non-governmental organisations in art 34 provides an important guide as to the nature of those persons who, for the purposes of s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act and the remedial scheme which flows from it, are to be taken to be public authorities. Non-governmental organisations have the right of individual application to the European Court of Human Rights as victims if their convention rights have been violated. If the scheme to give effect to art 13 is to be followed through, they must be entitled to obtain a remedy for a violation of their convention rights under s 7 in respect of acts made unlawful by s 6.

j [47] The test as to whether a person or body is or is not a 'core' public authority for the purposes of s 6(1) is not capable of being defined precisely. But it can at least be said that a distinction should be drawn between those persons who, in convention terms, are governmental organisations on the one hand and those who are non-governmental organisations on the other. A person who would be regarded as a non-governmental organisation within the meaning of art 34 ought not to be regarded as a 'core' public authority for the purposes of s 6. That would deprive it of the rights enjoyed by the victims of acts which are incompatible with convention rights that are made unlawful by s 6(1). Professor Dawn Oliver 'The Frontiers of the State: Public Authorities and Public Functions under the Human Rights Act' [2000] PL 476 at 491–493 has observed that this would have serious implications. It would undermine the protections against state control which are the hallmarks of a liberal democracy.

[48] In Rothenthurm Commune v Switzerland (1988) 59 DR 251 the European Commission held that local government organisations such as the applicant commune which exercise public functions are clearly 'governmental organisations' as opposed to 'non-governmental organisations' within the meaning of art 25 (now art 34) of the convention, with the result that the commune which was complaining that proceedings for the expropriation of land for a military training area were in breach of their rights under art 6(1) could not bring an application under that article. In Ayuntamiento de Mula v Spain App No 55346/00 (1 February 2001, unreported), the European Court of Human Rights held that under the settled case law of the convention institutions local government organisations are public law bodies which perform official duties assigned to them by the constitution and by substantive law and are therefore quite clearly governmental organisations. It added this comment:

'In that connection, the court reiterates that in international law the expression "governmental organisations" cannot be held to refer only to the government or the central organs of the state. When powers are distributed along decentralised lines, it refers to any national authority which exercises public functions.'

[49] The phrase 'public functions' in this context is thus clearly linked to the functions and powers, whether centralised or distributed, of government. This point was developed more fully in Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1. The government of Greece argued that the applicant monasteries, which were challenging legislation which provided for the transfer of a large part of the monastic property to the Greek state, were not non-governmental organisations within the meaning of art 25 (now art 34) of the convention. It was pointed out that the monasteries were hierarchically integrated into the organic structure of the Greek Orthodox Church, that legal personality was attributed to the Church and its constituent parts in public law and that the Church and its institutions, which played a direct and active part in public administration, took administrative decisions whose lawfulness was subject to judicial review by the Supreme Administrative Court like those of any other public authority. Rejecting this argument, the court said (at 41 (para 49)):

'Like the Commission in its admissibility decision, the Court notes at the outset that the applicant monasteries do not exercise governmental powers. Section 39(1) of the Charter of the Greek Church describes the monasteries as ascetic religious institutions. Their objectives—essentially ecclesiastical and spiritual ones, but also cultural and social ones in some cases—are not such as to enable them to be classed with governmental organisations established for public administration purposes. From the classification as public law entities it may be inferred only that the legislature—on account of the special links between the monasteries and the State—wished to afford a them the same legal protection vis-à-vis third parties as was accorded to other public law entities. Furthermore, the monastery councils' only power consists in making rules concerning the organisation and furtherance of spiritual life and the internal administration of each monastery.'

b [50] The phrase 'governmental organisations established for public administration purposes' in the third sentence of the passage which I have quoted from the Holy Monasteries case is significant. It indicates that test of whether a person or body is a 'non-governmental organisation' within the meaning of art 34 of the convention is whether it was established with a view to public administration as part of the process of government. That too was the approach which was taken by the European Commission in Hautanemi v Sweden c (1996) 22 EHRR CD 155. At the relevant time the Church of Sweden and its member parishes were to be regarded as corporations of public law in the domestic legal order. It was held nevertheless that the applicant parish was a victim within the meaning of what was then art 25, on the ground that the Church and its member parishes could not be considered to have been exercising d governmental powers and the parish was a non-governmental organisation.

e [51] It can be seen from what was said in these cases that the convention institutions have developed their own jurisprudence as to the meaning which is to be given to the expression 'non-governmental organisation' in art 34. We must take that jurisprudence into account in determining any question which has arisen in connection with a convention right: see s 2(1) of the Human Rights Act.

f [52] The Court of Appeal left this jurisprudence out of account. They looked instead for guidance to cases about the amenability of bodies to judicial review, although they recognised that they were not necessarily determinative ([2001] 3 All ER at [34]). But, as Professor Oliver has pointed out g in her commentary on the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case, 'Chancel repairs and the Human Rights Act' [2001] PL 651, the decided cases on the amenability of bodies to judicial review have been made for purposes which have nothing to do with the liability of the state in international law. They cannot be regarded as determinative of a body's membership of the class of 'core' public authorities: see also Grosz, Beatson, Duffy Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000) p 61 (para 4-04). Nor can they be h regarded as determinative of the question whether a body falls within the 'hybrid' class. That is not to say that the case law on judicial review may not provide some assistance as to what does, and what does not, constitute a 'function of a public nature' within the meaning of s 6(3)(b). It may well be helpful. But the domestic case law must be examined in the light of the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court as to those bodies which engage the responsibility of the state for the purposes of the convention.

i [53] At first sight there is a close link between the question whether a person is a non-governmental organisation for the purposes of art 34 and the question j whether a person is a public authority against which the doctrine of the direct effect of directives operates under Community law: see art 249 EC (formerly art 189). Both concepts lie at the heart of the obligations of the state under international law. Individual applications for a violation of convention rights may be received under art 34 from 'any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals'. Direct effect exists only against the member state concerned 'and other public authorities': see ECSC v Acciaierie e Ferriere

Busseni SpA (in liq) Case C-221/88 [1990] ECR I-495 at 525 (para 23); Brent Directives: Rights and Remedies in English and Community Law (2001) pp 198–199 (para 15.11). a

[54] The types of organisations and bodies against whom the provisions of a directive could be relied on were discussed in Foster v British Gas plc Case C-188/89 [1990] 3 All ER 897 at 921–922, [1991] 1 QB 405 at 427, [1990] ECR I-3313 at 3348 (para 18). The court noted that it had been held in a series of cases that provisions of a directive could be relied on against organisations and bodies which were subject to the authority or control of the state or had special powers beyond those which result from the normal rules applicable to relations between individuals. Reference was made to a number of its decisions to illustrate this point. Its conclusions were set out ([1990] 3 All ER 897 at 922, [1991] 1 QB 405 at 427, [1990] ECR I-3313 at 3348–3349 (para 20)): b

‘It follows from the foregoing that a body, whatever its legal form, which has been made responsible, pursuant to a measure adopted by the state, for providing a public service under the control of the state and which has for that purpose special powers beyond those which result from the normal rules applicable in relations between individuals is included in any event among the bodies against which the provisions of a directive capable of having direct effect may be relied on.’ c

[55] This is a broad definition of the concept by which such bodies have come to be referred to as ‘emanations of the State’: e.g. Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135 at 161, [1987] QB 129 at 154, [1986] ECR 1651 at 1691 (para 56). It has been described as a starting point: see Doughty v Rolls-Royce plc [1992] 1 CMLR 1045 at 1058 per Mustill LJ. As Brent p 199, para 15.11, note 101 points out, the phrase ‘emanation of the State’ is an English legal concept derived from Gilbert v Trinity House Corp (1886) 17 QBD 795 which was later criticised by the courts as inappropriate and undefined. Whatever its value may be in the context of European Community law, however, it would be neither safe nor helpful to use this concept as a shorthand way of describing the test that must be applied to determine whether a person or body is a non-governmental organisation for the purposes of art 34 of the convention. There is no right of individual application to the European Court of Justice in European Community law. The phrase ‘non-governmental organisation’ has an autonomous meaning in convention law. d

(b) Is the PCC a public authority? e

[56] The general functions and powers of PCCs in the Church of England are set out in the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956. That was a measure passed by the National Assembly of the Church of England under the powers which were conferred on the National Assembly by the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act 1919. The National Assembly was renamed and reconstituted as the General Synod of the Church of England by the Synodical Government Measure 1969. Section 7 of the 1969 measure provides that the rules contained in Sch 3, which may be cited as the Church Representation Rules, are to have effect for the purpose of providing for the constitution and proceedings of diocesan and deanery synods and making further provision for the synodical government of the church. Part II of the Church Representation Rules provides for the holding of annual parochial f a church meetings at which parochial representatives of the laity to the PCC and the deanery synod are to take place. Rule 14 sets out the membership of the PCC. It includes the clergy, churchwardens, any persons on the roll of the parish who are members of any deanery or diocesan synod or the General Synod, elected representatives of the laity and co-opted members.

b [57] Section 2(1) of the 1956 measure provides that it shall be the duty of the minister, as defined in r 44(1) of the Church Representation Rules, and the PCC to consult together on matters of general concern and importance to the parish. Section 2(2) states that the functions of PCCs shall include, among other things, co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church, pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical and the consideration and discussion of matters concerning the Church of England or any other matters of religious or public interest other than the declaration of the doctrine of the Church on any question. Among the powers, duties and liabilities vested in PCCs by s 4 are those relating to the financial affairs of the church and the care, maintenance and preservation of its fabric. Section 2 of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 provides that, where a chancel is in need of repair, proceedings to enforce the liability to repair are to be taken by the responsible authority. c Section 4(1) of the 1932 Act provides that the expression '[r]esponsible authority' in relation to a chancel means the PCC of the parish in which the chancel is situate. d

[58] There is no doubt that PCCs are an essential part of the administration, on the authority of the General Synod, of the affairs of the Church of England. e The parish itself has been described as the basic building block of the Church and the PCC as the central forum for decision-making and discussion in relation to parish affairs: Mark Hill Ecclesiastical Law (2nd edn, 2001) pp 48–49 and 74 (paras 3.11 and 3.74). It is constituted by s 3 of the 1956 measure as a body corporate. It has statutory powers which it may exercise under s 2 of the 1932 Act against any person who appears to it to be liable to repair the chancel, f irrespective of whether that person is resident in the parish and is a member of the Church of England. In that context, perhaps, it may be said in a very loose sense to be a public rather than a private body.

[59] But none of these characteristics indicate that it is a governmental organisation, as that phrase is understood in the context of art 34 of the convention. g It plainly has nothing whatever to do with the process of either central or local government. It is not accountable to the general public for what it does. It receives no public funding, apart from occasional grants from English Heritage for the preservation of its historic buildings. In that respect it is in a position which is no different from that of any private individual. The h statutory powers which it has been given by the 1932 Act are not exercisable against the public generally or any class or group of persons which forms part of it. The purpose of that Act, as its long title indicates, was to abolish proceedings in ecclesiastical courts for enforcing the liability to repair. The only person against whom the liability may be enforced is the person who, in that j obscure phrase, 'would, but for the provisions of this Act, have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate Ecclesiastical Court in a cause of office promoted against him in that Court on the date when the notice was served' (see s 2(3); Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417 at 429 per Lord Hanworth MR).

[60] Then there is the fact that the PCC is part of the Church of England. The Court of Appeal said that it exemplifies the special status of the Church of which it forms part ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [32]). The fact that it forms part of the Church by law established showed, it was said (at [35]), that the PCC is a public authority. The implication of these observations is that other bodies such as diocesan and deanery synods and the General Synod itself fall into the same category. In my opinion however the legal framework of the Church of England as a Church by law established does not lead to this conclusion.

[61] The Church of England as a whole has no legal status or personality. There is no Act of Parliament that purports to establish it as the Church of England: Sir Lewis Dibdin Establishment in England: Essays on Church and State (1932) p 111. What establishment in law means is that the state has incorporated its law into the law of the realm as a branch of its general law. In Marshall v Graham, Bell v Graham [1907] 2 KB 112 at 126 Phillimore J said:

‘A Church which is established is not thereby made a department of the State. The process of establishment means that the State has accepted the Church as the religious body in its opinion truly teaching the Christian faith, and given to it a certain legal position, and to its decrees, if rendered under certain legal conditions, certain civil sanctions.’

The Church of England is identified with the state in other ways, the monarch being head of each: see Norman Doe The Legal Framework of the Church of England (1996) p 9. It has regulatory functions within its own sphere, but it cannot be said to be part of government. The state has not surrendered or delegated any of its functions or powers to the Church. None of the functions that the Church of England performs would have to be performed in its place by the state if the Church were to abdicate its responsibility: see R v Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of Great Britain and the Commonwealth, ex p Wachmann [1993] 2 All ER 249 at 254, [1992] 1 WLR 1036 at 1042 per Simon Brown J. The relationship which the state has with the Church of England is one of recognition, not of the devolution to it of any of the powers or functions of government.

[62] The decisions of the Strasbourg court in Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1 and Hautanemi v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR CD 155 support this approach. It is also worth noting that, while the two main churches in Germany (Roman Catholic and Lutheran) have public legal personality and are public authorities bound by the provisions of art 19(4) of the German constitution (Grundgesetz) or Basic Law which guarantees recourse to the court should any person's basic rights be violated by public authority, they are in general considered to be ‘non-governmental organisations’ within the meaning of art 34 of the convention. As such, they are entitled to avail themselves of, for example, the right to protection of property under art 1 of the First Protocol: Frowein and Peukert Kommentar zur Europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention (2nd edn, 1996) art 25, para 16. Maunz and Dürig Kommentar zum Grundgesetz (looseleaf) art 33, para 38 explain the position in this way:

‘Keine hoheitsrechtlichen Befugnisse nehmen die Amtsträger der Kirchen wahr, soweit sie nicht kraft staatlicher Ermächtigung (etwa in Kirchensteuangelegenheiten) tätig werden; die Kirchen sind, auch soweit sie öffentlich-rechtlichen Status haben, nicht Bestandteile der staatlichen Organisation.’

[Church officeholders do not exercise sovereign power so long as they are not acting by virtue of state empowerment (for example, in matters concerning

- a church taxes); the churches do not, even though they have public law status, form an integral part of the organisation of the state.] This reflects the view of the German Constitutional Court in its 1965 decision (BVerfGE 18, 385) that measures taken by a church relating to purely internal matters which do not reach out into the sphere of the state do not constitute acts of sovereign power. The churches are not, as we would put it, 'core' public authorities although they may be regarded as 'hybrid' public authorities for certain purposes.
- b [63] For these reasons I would hold that the PCC is not a 'core' public authority. As for the question whether it is a 'hybrid' public authority, I would prefer not to deal with it in the abstract. The answer must depend on the facts of each case. The issue with which your Lordships are concerned in this case relates to the functions of the PCC in the enforcement of a liability to effect repairs to the chancel. Section 6(5) of the Human Rights Act provides that a person is not a public authority by virtue only of sub-s (3) if the nature of the act which is alleged to be unlawful is private. The Court of Appeal said that the function of chancel repairs is of a public nature ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [35]). But the liability of the lay rector to repair the chancel is a burden which arises as a matter of private law from the ownership of glebe land.
- c [64] It is true, as Wynn-Parry J observed in Chivers & Sons Ltd v Secretary of State for Air (Queens' College, Cambridge, Third Party) [1955] 2 All ER 607 at 609, [1955] Ch 585 at 593, that the burden is imposed for the benefit of the parishioners. It may be said that, as the church is a historic building which is open to the public, it is in the public interest that these repairs should be carried out. It is also true that the liability to repair the chancel rests on persons who need not be members of the church and that there is, as the Court of Appeal observed (at [34]), no surviving element of mutuality or mutual governance between the church and the impropiator. But none of these factors leads to the conclusion that the PCC's act in seeking to enforce the lay rector's liability on behalf of the parishioners is a public rather than a private act. The nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce. It is seeking to enforce a civil debt. The function which it is performing has nothing to do with the responsibilities which are owed to the public by the state. I would hold that s 6(5) applies, and that in relation to this act the PCC is not for the purposes of s 6(1) a public authority.

THE INCOMPATIBILITY ISSUE

- [65] This issue does not arise if, as I would hold, the PCC is not for present purposes a public authority. But I should like to offer these brief comments on it, as I do not agree with the Court of Appeal's finding (at [38]–[46]) that Mr and Mrs Wallbank's right to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions under art 1 of the First Protocol, read either alone or with art 14 of the convention, has been violated.
- h

[66] Article 1 of the First Protocol provides:

- j 'Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law. The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties.’ a

Article 14 of the convention prohibits discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms which the convention sets forth.

[67] Article 1 of the First Protocol contains three distinct rules: see Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35 at 50 (para 61), James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 at 139–140 (para 37). The first rule is set out in the first sentence, which is of a general nature and enunciates the principle of the peaceful enjoyment of property. It then deals with two forms of interference with a person’s possessions by the state: deprivation of possessions which it subjects to certain conditions, and control of the use of property in accordance with the general interest. In each case a balance must be struck between the rights of the individual and the public interest to determine whether the interference was justified. These rules are not unconnected as, before considering whether the first rule has been complied with, the court must first determine whether the last two rules are applicable. As it was put in James v UK (at 139–140 (para 37)), the second and third rules are concerned with particular instances of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property. They should be construed in the light of the general principle enunciated in the first rule. b
d

[68] The Court of Appeal appear to have overlooked this guidance. They did not address the question whether Mr and Mrs Wallbank were being deprived of their possessions according to the second rule, and they did not deal with the question whether there was an interference with the first rule. They held that the liability to defray the cost of chancel repairs was levy upon the personal funds of Mr and Mrs Wallbank, that this was a form of taxation within the third rule in the second paragraph of art 1, and that it was arbitrary and disproportionate. They rejected the PCC’s argument the source of the liability was their ownership of Glebe Farm. They held ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [40]) that there was in this case an outside intervention by the general law which made ownership of the land a fiscal liability. e

[69] Ferris J said in his judgment that, if the law relating to chancel repairs was as he understood it to be (which he described as ‘the supposed rule’), it did not involve a deprivation of possessions. As he put it:

‘The argument for Mr and Mrs Wallbank seems to assume that the starting point is that they are to be regarded as the owners of Glebe Farm free from incumbrances or other burdensome incidents attached to the ownership of the land. But this is not in fact correct if the supposed rule represents the law. The liability to repair the chancel is, on that basis, one of the incidents of ownership of that part of Glebe Farm which consists of land allotted under the inclosure award in lieu of tithe or other rectorial property. It is, of course, an unusual incident because it does not amount to a charge on the land, is not limited to the value of the land and imposes a personal liability on the owner of the land. But in principle I do not find it possible to distinguish it from the liability which would attach to the owner of land which is purchased subject to a mortgage, restrictive covenant or other incumbrance created by a predecessor in title.’ g

He said that the case was quite different from that in which there was some kind of outside intervention in the form of taxation, compulsory purchase or control over the way in which the property can be used.

a [70] I prefer Ferris J's analysis to that of the Court of Appeal. The principle which we must follow was described in James v UK (at 139 (para 36)). We must confine our attention, as far as possible, to the concrete case which is before us. It must not be directed to the impact of the law relating to the enforcement of the chancel repair liability in the abstract, but to its impact as it affects Mr and Mrs Wallbank.

b [71] How then does the liability arise? It cannot be considered in isolation from the obligation that gives rise to it. That is the obligation which rests on the owner of rectorial land, not as a result of any outside intervention with the possession of the land by the state but as a matter of private law. The conveyance of Glebe Farm to Mrs Wallbank's parents in 1970 described the land as subject to the liability for the repair of the chancel mentioned in previous conveyances. Their deeds of gift to Mrs Wallbank in 1974 and 1986 also referred to the chancel repair liability. This is a burden on the land, just like any other burden that runs with the lands. It is, and has been at all times, within the scope of the property right which she acquired and among the various factors to be taken into account in determining its value. She could have divested herself of it at any time by disposing of the land to which it was attached. The enforcement of the liability under the general law is an incident of the property right which is now vested jointly in Mr and Mrs Wallbank. It is not, as the Court of Appeal said (at [40]), an outside intervention by way of a form of taxation.

e [72] I recognise that Mr and Mrs Wallbank may well need to draw on their personal funds to discharge the liability. But they are not being deprived of their possessions or being controlled in the use of their property, as those expressions must be understood in the light of the general principle of peaceful enjoyment set out in the first sentence of art 1 of the First Protocol. The liability is simply an incident of the ownership of the land which gives rise to it.

f The peaceful enjoyment of land involves the discharge of burdens which are attached to it as well as the enjoyment of its rights and privileges. I do not think that in this case the right which art 1 of the First Protocol guarantees, read alone or in conjunction with art 14 of the convention, is being violated.

CONCLUSION

g [73] The law relating to the liability for chancel repairs is open to criticism on various grounds. The liability has been described by the Law Commission as anachronistic and capricious in its application and as highly anomalous: Liability for Chancel Repairs (Law Com No 152 (1985)) p 7 (para 3.1); Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Consultative Document (1998) (Law Com No 254; h Cm 4027) pp 81–82 (para 5.37). The existence of the liability can be difficult to discover, as most lay rectories have become fragmented over the years as a result of the division and separate disposals of land: Transfer of Land, Liability for Chancel Repairs (1983) (Law Commission Working Paper No 86) pp 20–21 (para 2.29). The fact that it is a several liability may operate unfairly in cases where there is more than one lay rector and the person who is found liable is unable to recover a contribution from others who ought to have been found liable.

j [74] On the other hand it was noted in the 1983 Law Commission Working Paper that there were some 5,200 chancels for which there is a chancel repair liability. Not all of these cases involve individual landowners. About 800 are the liability of the Church Commissioners, 200 the liability of cathedrals and 200 the liability of educational foundations. Charitable donations may provide relief in some cases, while in others grants may be available from English Heritage. But there is no other source of private funding that can be relied upon, and there is no right of access to public funds. Unsatisfactory though the system may appear to be, there is no obvious alternative. Ferris J recognised in his judgment that the law relating to chancel repairs is capable of operating arbitrarily, harshly and unfairly. But he did not find any basis for declaring the law to be otherwise than it appeared to be on the authorities. a

[75] It is not open to us to resolve these problems judicially. All one can say is that the Human Rights Act does not provide a vehicle for doing so. I would allow the appeal and restore the order and determination made by Ferris J. b

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH.

[76] My Lords, it is admitted by the defendants that, apart from the Human Rights Act 1998, they are, as the joint owners of Glebe Farm, Aston Cantlow, and have been at all material times personally responsible for the repair of the chancel of the church of St John the Baptist Aston Cantlow and that, they having failed to repair the chancel, the Parochial Church Council (PCC) is entitled to a judgment against them under s 2(3) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 for such sum as represents the cost of putting the chancel into a proper state of repair. This is because the defendants, Mr and Mrs Wallbank, being liable to repair the chancel, would, but for the 1932 Act, have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by an ecclesiastical court. The obligation of the defendants is the obligation to repair. Under the 1932 Act the remedy of an order that the obligation be performed is no longer to be available and the monetary remedy is provided in lieu but the character of the obligation was left unchanged. c

[77] The obligation to repair is one which derives from the ownership of land to which the obligation is attached. The obligation runs with the land. The fifteenth and sixteenth century origins of this are helpfully explained in the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote. In the present case the obligation arose not from the receipt of tithes but as a result of an inclosure award of 1743 made under the private Act of Parliament of 1742. It is a personal obligation but only exists so long as the person in question is the owner of the land. Thus he acquires it by a voluntary act—the acquisition of the title to the land of which the obligation is an incident. He can divest himself of the obligation by a further voluntary act—the disposal of the land or, under s 52 of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Measure 1923, by redemption. At all the times material to this case, the obligation was categorised by s 70 of the Land Registration Act 1925 as an overriding interest. The person or persons who are under such an obligation are described, using the historical terminology, as the ‘lay rectors’ or the ‘lay impropiators’. d

[78] In fact the defendants knew that ownership of the land was believed to carry with it the obligation. It was referred to in all the title deeds and, in at least one conveyance, an express indemnity had been taken by the vendor. In other cases some special consideration might arise from the fact that the relevant landowner had acquired the title to the land without any notice of the existence, or possible existence, of the obligation. But that is not this case and it need not be discussed further. e

[79] The only defence now raised by the defendants to the claim of the PCC under the 1932 Act is based upon the Human Rights Act 1998 and/or the convention. The Human Rights Act had not come into force at the time when f a the defendants failed to carry out the relevant repairs, nor when the PCC served the notice required by s 2(1) of the 1932 Act, nor at the time when Ferris J ([2000] All ER (D) 419) tried the case and gave judgment for the PCC. He was formally trying two preliminary issues ordered by Master Bragge but, when he decided the human rights issue against the defendants, the defendants, having abandoned their case on the other issue, admitted that they had no defence to b the claim except as to quantum. He accordingly made a declaration of liability, ordered an inquiry as to quantum and ordered the defendants to pay to the claimants the sum found due on the inquiry. The question of quantum arose under s 2(3) of the 1932 Act: '[the] court ... shall give judgment ... for such sum as appears to the court to represent the cost of putting the chancel in proper repair'. The points which the defendants were taking on quantum were pleaded c in para 1 of the outline defence. The judgment of Ferris J was in English procedural law a final judgment. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal. By the time that the defendants' appeal was heard, the Human Rights Act had however come into force.

[80] This timetable raises again the question of the extent to which the d Human Rights Act has a retrospective effect, a question on which the Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER 393) did not express an opinion since no point was taken in that regard by the PCC. Your Lordships were not satisfied that this was necessarily correct; however it was clearly convenient and in the interest of both of the parties that the House should first hear the parties' arguments upon the points which the Court of Appeal did decide. I stress that the House has not heard
e any argument upon the question of the extent, if at all, to which the Act has retrospective effect. It is not appropriate that any view should be expressed on it in the present case. Anything said will not be authoritative. The retrospectivity point will arise for decision in other unrelated appeals and will then fall to be decided after full argument and due consideration. It is in any event not correct
f to approach that question on the basis that the judgment of Ferris J was undeterminative or merely interlocutory. In English procedural law, it was a final judgment which, unless reversed on appeal, determined the parties' rights and liabilities, subject only to quantum. I will accordingly proceed on the basis of assuming that the Human Rights Act applies to this case in accordance with the provisions of ss 22(4), 7(1)(b) and 6.

g [81] The structure of the defendants' argument under the Human Rights Act is that they have to establish three propositions. If they fail on any one of these, their defence fails. They are: (a) that the PCC is a public authority, the s 6(1), (3) and (5) point; and (b) that there has been a breach of art 1 of the First Protocol, the arts 1 and 14 point; and (c) that the exclusion in s 6(2) does not apply. Before h Ferris J only point (b) arose and he decided it in favour of the claimants. In the Court of Appeal all three points were decided in favour of the defendants.

[82] These were the questions of law raised on this appeal. They are questions which are of relevance not only to the present case but to many other cases or potential cases concerning the enforcement under the 1932 Act of the obligation
j to repair chancels. Other cases may, on their facts, raise special considerations not found in this case and, similarly, legal questions not dependent upon the Human Rights Act may arise. Your Lordships' decision of this appeal does not touch upon any of them. But I must expressly disassociate myself from any suggestion that there is a cap upon the monetary liability under s 2(3) of the 1932 Act or that any such point is presently open to the defendants upon the inquiry ordered by Ferris J as discussed in the opinion of my noble and learned friend

Lord Scott of Foscote, which I have had the privilege of reading in draft after I had prepared this opinion, together with his questioning of the correctness of the decision in Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417. The question was neither raised nor argued. There are contentious points which will arise if it ever is: does the cap apply where the express words of the 1932 Act are applicable? How does it apply to successive or continuing and cumulative breaches of the obligation to repair? Does the cap apply where the liability is not attributable to the ownership of a tithe rentcharge but simply to the ownership of land? If so, how does one assess what the cap should be? It is by no means clear that any of these questions should be answered in a way that could assist the defendants. But they have not been argued and I will say no more about them.

IS THE PCC A PUBLIC AUTHORITY?

[83] Historically PCCs did not exist. They were introduced by the Parochial Church Councils Measure 1921 as a body at parish level which would better enable the lay members of the congregation to be represented. It was agreed that at the material times the powers and functions of PCCs were defined by the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956. Section 2 (as amended) provided:

'General Functions of Council.—(1) It shall be the duty of the minister and the [PCC] to consult together on matters of general concern and importance to the parish.

(2) The functions of [PCCs] shall include—(a) co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church, pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical; (b) the consideration and discussions of matters concerning the Church of England or any other matters of religious or public interest, but not the declaration of the doctrine of the Church on any question; (c) making known and putting into effect any provision made by the diocesan synod or the deanery synod, but without prejudice to the powers of the council on any particular matter; (d) giving advice to the diocesan synod and the deanery synod on any matter referred to the council; (e) raising such matters as the council consider appropriate with the diocesan synod or deanery synod.

(3) In the exercise of its functions the [PCC] shall take into consideration any expression of opinion by any parochial church meeting.'

Section 3 provided that the PCC was to be a body corporate with perpetual succession. Section 4 made provision for the PCC as successor to certain other bodies to have the relevant powers of those bodies:

'(1) ... the council of every parish shall have ... (ii) The like powers duties and liabilities as, immediately before [1 July 1921], the churchwardens of such parish had with respect to—(a) The financial affairs of the church including the collection and administration of all moneys raised for church purposes and the keeping of accounts in relation to such affairs and moneys; (b) The care maintenance preservation and insurance of the fabric of the church and the goods and ornaments thereof; (c) The care and maintenance of any churchyard (open or closed), and the power of giving a certificate under the provisions of section eighteen of the Burial Act 1855 with the like powers as, immediately before [1 July 1921], were possessed by the churchwardens to recover the cost of maintaining a closed churchyard ...'

- a Of these powers, the most relevant to the present case are those in s 4(1)(ii)(b) but it is important to note that these are only those powers and duties which the churchwardens had and that the churchwardens did not have a duty to repair the fabric but only a duty to report its disrepair. As stated by Chancellor Richard Burn in the ninth edition of his work Ecclesiastical Law (1842) edited by Robert Phillimore (vol I, p 357):
- b 'And although churchwardens are not charged with the repairs of the chancel, yet they are charged with the supervisal thereof, to see that it be not permitted to dilapidate and fall into decay; and when any such dilapidations shall happen, if no care be taken to repair the same, they are to make presentation thereof at the next visitation.'
- c It was no doubt following this logic that the PCC were given the power (and correlative duty) in 1932 to bring the action to obtain a remedy for the failure of a lay rector to repair the chancel. (The changes later introduced by s 39 of the Endowment and Glebe Measure 1976 relating to incumbents of a benefice are not relevant to this case.)
- d [84] The PCC is thus the creature of a statutory provision by what was then the National Assembly of the Church of England. It has only those functions, duties and powers which have been conferred on it by that or other legislation. It is part of the structure known as the Church of England but the Church of England is not itself a legal entity. The legal entities are the various office-holders and various distinct bodies set up within that structure.
- e [85] The Human Rights Act and s 6 do not contain any complete or general definition of the term 'a public authority'. Section 6 does however contain a secondary definition in sub-ss (3)(b) and (5) as including, in respect of acts which are not of a private nature, persons (or bodies) certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature. This secondary category has been described as
- f 'hybrid' public authorities. It requires a twofold assessment, first of the body's functions, and secondly of the particular act in question. The body must be one of which at least some, but not all, of its functions are of a public nature. This leaves what by inference from sub-s (3)(b) is the primary category, ie a person or body all of whose functions are of a public nature. This category has conveniently been called by the commentators a 'core' public authority. For this
- g category, there is no second requirement; the section potentially applies to everything that they do regardless of whether it is an act of a private or public nature.
- [86] Is a PCC a 'core' public authority? The answer I would give to this question is that it is clearly not. Its functions, as identified above from the
- h relevant statutory provisions, clearly include matters which are concerned only with the pastoral and organisational concerns of the diocese and the congregation of believers in the parish. It acts in the sectional not the public interest. The most that can be said is that it is a creature of a Church measure having the force of a statute—but that is not suggested to be conclusive—and that some aspects
- j of the Church of England which is the 'established Church' are of wider general interest and not of importance to the congregation alone. Thus the priest ministering in the parish may have responsibilities that are certainly not public, such as the supervision of the liturgies used or advising about doctrine, but may have other responsibilities which are of a public nature, such as a responsibility for marriages and burials and the keeping of registers. But the PCC itself does not have such public responsibilities nor are its functions public; it is essentially a a domestic religious body. The fact that the Church of England is the established Church of England may mean that various bodies within that Church may as a result perform public functions. But it does not follow that PCCs themselves perform any such functions. Even the monasteries of the established Church in Greece, which has strong legal links with the state, such as the presence of representatives of the state on its governing body and direct financial links with the state, has been held not to be an emanation of the state for the purposes of the convention: see Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1. b

[87] The Court of Appeal reached a different conclusion. I do not find their reasoning satisfactory. Neither Parliamentary material nor references to the law of judicial review assist on this question. The relevant underlying principles are to be found in human rights law not in Community law nor in the administrative law of England and Wales. The Strasbourg jurisprudence has already been deployed in the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hope of Craighead and I need not repeat it. The relevant concept is the opposition of the 'victim' and a 'governmental body'. The former can make a complaint; the latter can only be the object of a complaint. The difference between them is that the latter has a governmental character and discharges governmental functions. If there is a need to find additional assistance in construing s 6 of the Human Rights Act, this is where it is to be found. The structure of the Act also supports the same conclusion. It is through s 7 and its reference to victims in s 7(1) and (7) that one gets from s 22(4) to s 6(1). Section 7 is drafted having regard to the Strasbourg jurisprudence; it would be inconsistent to construe s 6 in a manner opposed to that jurisprudence. The Court of Appeal's approach cannot be supported. c d e

[88] In my opinion it has not been established that PCCs in general nor this PCC in particular perform any function of a public or governmental nature. If it is to be said that they do, I am unaware what specifically it can be said is that function. The Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER at [34]) said that the recovery of money under s 2 of the 1932 Act was the function which made the PCC a public authority. This is to be contrasted with the statement (at [37]) that the 'power and, no doubt duty' to do so is a 'common law' power. The nature of the person's functions are not to be confused with the nature of the act complained of, as s 6 makes clear. But in neither case are they governmental in nature nor is the body itself inherently governmental. It follows that in my opinion the PCC was neither a 'core' nor a 'hybrid' public authority. On that basis the defence of Mr and Mrs Wallbank must fail. f g

[89] But, if I am wrong, and the PCC was a 'hybrid' public authority, the further question arises under s 6(5): is the nature of the relevant act private? The act is the enforcement of a civil liability. The liability is one which arises under private law and which is enforceable by the PCC as a civil debt by virtue of the 1932 Act. The 1932 Act did not alter the pre-existing law as to the obligations of lay impropriators. It is simply remedial (as the Court of Appeal recognised at [37]). Its purpose is to enable repairs to be done which the lay rector ought to have, but has not, himself carried out. It is argued that it is akin to a power of taxation. Whether or not it was once true in the sixteenth century that such a power existed, it was certainly not true in the twentieth century. Whatever the former obligations of lay impropriators may once have been, by the eighteenth century they were or had been converted into civil obligations. In the present case this occurred in 1743 as a result of an inclosure award made under a private h j

- a Act of Parliament of 1742 entitled: 'An Act for Dividing and Inclosing, Setting out and Allotting, certain Common Fields and Inclosures within the Manor and Parish of Aston Cantlow, in the County of Warwick.' In return for financial and proprietorial advantages then conferred upon them, the impropiators accepted the obligation to repair the chancel as and when the need arose. That is the private law obligation which is being enforced in the present action using the remedy provided in the 1932 Act.

- b [90] The 1932 Act is irrelevant unless and until the lay impropiator fails to perform his obligation to repair the chancel, a failure which may have occurred on a single occasion or may, as in the present case, have been a continuing and cumulative failure over a long period of time. The responsibility for repairing the chancel was since 1743 an incident of the ownership of certain particular parcels of land. When Mr and Mrs Wallbank acquired the title to that land they assumed that responsibility to repair and the consequent liability in default if they should fail to discharge it. This was not a responsibility and liability which they shared with the public in general; it was something which they had personally assumed voluntarily by a voluntary act of acquisition which at the time they apparently thought was advantageous to them. From the point of view of both the PCC and the Wallbanks, the transaction and its incident were private law, non-governmental, non-public activities and not of a public nature. Again, this conclusion is adverse to the Wallbanks' defence.

HAS THERE BEEN A BREACH OF ART 1 (AND ART 14)?

- e [91] Article 14 (discrimination) is not a free-standing provision but has to be read in conjunction with the recognition of the rights conferred by other articles. Therefore the material article is art 1 of the First Protocol which endorses the entitlement to the peaceful enjoyment of a person's possessions and prohibits depriving a person of his possessions, subject to certain qualifications. The word 'possessions' has been considered by the European Court of Human Rights, in particular in the cases of Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 and Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35. It applies to all forms of property and is the equivalent of 'assets'. But what is clear is that it does not extend to grant relief from liabilities incurred in accordance with the civil law. It may be that there are cases where the liability is merely a pretext or mechanism for depriving someone of their possessions by expropriation but that is not the case here. The liability is a private law liability which has arisen from the voluntary acts of the persons liable. They have no convention right to be relieved of that liability. Nor do they have a convention right to be relieved from the consequences of a bargain made, albeit some 200 years earlier, by their predecessors in title. They do not make any complaint under art 6 or complain about the fairness of these legal proceedings. They cannot complain that they are being discriminated against. The only reason why they are being sued is because they are the parties liable. This defence also fails. The submission that there should be a declaration of incompatibility likewise fails.

- j [92] For the sake of completeness, it was clear that at all material times both they and their predecessors in title knew of the responsibility to repair or at least that it was asserted that they would be responsible if they acquired the title to the relevant land, an assertion which they have now admitted to be correct subject only to the Human Rights Act. Further, they originally ran a case of waiver by the PCC which they have now accepted was rightly rejected. If they had had a legal defence it would have been recognised by the court and the action would have been dismissed. Their financial liability under the 1932 Act is not arbitrary. It arises from their failure to perform a civil private law obligation which they had voluntarily assumed. a

THE SECTION 6(2) POINT

[93] This point would only arise if I was wrong on all the preceding points. One therefore has to assume that the PCC is a public authority and the demand for payment is not of a private nature. In such circumstances, sub-s (2) creates an exception to the application of sub-s (1). The words of exception relevant to this case are 'the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce' provisions of primary legislation. The primary legislation is the 1932 Act. Incontrovertibly the PCC were seeking to give effect to and enforce provisions of that Act. On the above-stated assumption, the PCC's act in suing the Wallbanks comes squarely within the exception. Paragraph (b) of the subsection is to be contrasted with para (a) which is manifestly intended to cover cases where the public authority did not have any alternative but to act as it did (ie it was compelled to do so). Paragraph (b), on the other hand, covers situations where the public authority was empowered by legislation to act as it did and the intention of the legislation, whilst leaving open a measure of discretion, was that it should use the power provided. For some unstated reason, the Court of Appeal treated only para (a) as being relevant and this accounts for their mistaken decision on this point. b

CONCLUSION

[94] It follows that, far from making out all three of the necessary constituents in their defence, the defendants have made out none. Their defence accordingly fails and the appeal must be allowed. There is no need to consider the retrospectivity question. e

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

INTRODUCTION

[95] My Lords, the respondents, Mr and Mrs Wallbank, are the freehold owners of Glebe Farm, Aston Cantlow in Warwickshire. Glebe Farm, which consists of a farmhouse and about 179 acres of land, includes five fields amounting to just over 52 acres known, or formerly known, as Clanacre. The Clanacre fields, it is contended, were and remain rectorial property thereby constituting its owners for the time being lay rectors and subjecting them to the liability of paying for all and any necessary repairs to the chancel of St John the Baptist church, the parish church of Aston Cantlow. g

[96] The appellants, the Parochial Church Council (PCC) of Aston Cantlow are responsible for supervising the care, maintenance, preservation and insurance of the fabric of the church (see s 4(1)(ii)(b) of the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956) and have served notices on Mr and Mrs Wallbank requiring them to put the chancel in proper repair. The notices were served on 12 September 1994 and 23 January 1996 pursuant to s 2 of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932. The cost of the necessary repairs is put in the notices at £95,260 odd. Mr and Mrs Wallbank dispute their liability. This litigation has resulted. h

THE LAW ON CHANCEL REPAIRS

[97] A description, even a brief one, of the law on chancel repairs must, if it is to be comprehensible, start with mediaeval times when every parish had its parish priest, the 'rector'. The rector had, by virtue of his office, a number of

- a valuable proprietary rights which, collectively, constituted his 'rectory'. These rights included the profits of glebe land and tithes, usually one-tenth of the produce of land in the parish. Responsibility for the repair of the parish church was, absent some special custom to the contrary (see Bishop of Ely v Gibbons & Goody (1833) 4 Hag Ecc 156, 162 ER 1405), shared between the rector and the parishioners. The parishioners were responsible for repairing the part of the church where they sat, the western end of the church. The rector was responsible for repairing the chancel, the eastern end of the church. The rector's glebe land and tithes, the 'rectory', provided both for his maintenance and a fund from which he could pay for chancel repairs.

[98] The right of appointment to a rectory, the advowson, was an item of property transferable by conveyance and often in the hands of a lay person, typically the landowner who had built and endowed the church or his successors. But the appointee had to be a spiritual rector and, on appointment, would become entitled to the rectorial rights and subject to the chancel repair liability.

- [99] In the 300 years or so prior to the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII a great number of advowsons were acquired by monasteries. A monastery, having acquired an advowson, would almost invariably appoint itself the rector and thereby appropriate to itself the valuable rectorial rights, the rectory. It would, of course, be a spiritual rector. The parish would, however, need a parish priest. So the monastery would appoint a deputy, a vicar, to fulfil that role, usually allocating to the vicar some part of the rectorial tithes or glebe. It seems, interestingly, never to have been suggested that the vicar, by virtue of the allocation to him of some part of the rectory thereby became liable for chancel repairs. Vicarial tithes or vicarial glebe did not carry that liability which remained with the rector.
- e

- [100] On the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII the property of religious houses, including their advowsons and the rectories they had appropriated, were compulsorily sold, impropriated, to lay institutions, such as Oxford and Cambridge colleges, and individuals. The lay institutions and individuals who acquired the rectories became lay rectors, or lay impropiators (the terms are synonymous) and, as such, subject to the chancel repair liability. The lay rector may have, and usually had, also acquired the advowson and thereby become the patron and entitled to appoint the vicar of the parish. A vicar, thus appointed, was no longer a deputy but held office in his own right. The obligation to repair the chancel lay on the lay rector in that capacity and not as owner of the advowson.
- f
- g

- [101] The proprietary rights acquired by lay rectors would have included the rectorial glebe and the rectorial tithes. These rights could be alienated and divided up. Many rectorial tithes were extinguished under inclosure awards made pursuant to Inclosure Acts. Under these awards plots forming part of the common lands to be enclosed were allotted to lay rectors in lieu of their rectorial tithes. It is generally assumed that the allotted lands then took the place of the tithes as the lay rector's rectorial property (see the Law Commission's Working Paper No 86 Transfer of land, Liability for Chancel Repairs (1983) pp 8–9 (para 2.11)).
- h
- j

[102] Tithes, other than those extinguished under inclosure awards, were converted into tithe rentcharges under the Tithe Act 1836. Tithe rentcharges, unlike their predecessor tithes, were charged on the land in respect of which the tithe had been payable and attracted the same chancel repair liability as had been attracted by the predecessor tithes: see s 71 of the 1836 Act which subjected the rentcharges to 'the same liabilities and incidents as the like estate in the tithes commuted'. Over the next hundred years various further statutory changes were made until, finally, the Tithe Act 1936 abolished tithe rentcharges and replaced them with tithe redemption annuities. The annuities were payable to the government and the owners of the rentcharges received government stock in compensation for the extinction of their rights. a

[103] Section 31 of and Sch 7 to the 1936 Act dealt specifically with chancel repairs. As to liability for chancel repair arising from the ownership of tithe rentcharges (evidently on the footing that the tithe rentcharge had taken the place of the tithes as rectorial property) a part of the government stock to be issued in respect of that rentcharge was to go to the diocesan authority to provide for the cost of future repairs to the chancel and the cost of insuring against damage by fire (see s 31(2)). Subsections (3) and (4) of s 31 merit mention. They provided, in conjunction with s 21 of the 1936 Act and s 1 of the Tithe Act 1839, that where the tithe rentcharge and the land on which it was charged were in the same ownership, the rentcharge would be treated as abolished by merger but the land would be subject to the chancel repair liability 'to the extent of the value of ... the rent-charge' (see s 1 of the 1839 Act). The chancel repair liability of the lay rector became thereby limited to the value of the rectorial property, the rentcharge, from which his office of lay rector was derived. b

[104] It is clear that a lay rectorship and liability for chancel repair could attach to a person who had become owner of a part only of the rectorial property. That that is so is implicit in the decision of this House in Representative Body of the Church in Wales v Tithe Redemption Commission, Plymouth Estates Ltd v Tithe Redemption Commission [1944] 1 All ER 710, [1944] AC 228, the Welsh Commissioners case. The issue, which arose out of the disestablishment in 1914 of the Welsh Church, was whether tithe rentcharges which, until abolished by the 1936 Act, had become temporally vested in the Commissioner of Church Temporalities in Wales (the Welsh Commissioners) pending their transfer to the University of Wales under provisions in the Welsh Church Acts 1914 and 1919 had, while so vested, subjected the Welsh Commissioners to chancel repair liability. If the answer was Yes, government stock needed to be issued to the appropriate Welsh authority pursuant to the 1936 Act. Their Lordships held that the Welsh Commissioners, so long as they held the tithe rentcharges, were lay impropiators and accordingly under a chancel repair liability. The issue, which applied to a number of parishes in Wales, was examined by reference to a particular parish, Llanwit Major in Glamorgan. Tithe rentcharges valued at £481 7s 11d, representing rectorial property of the parish, were held by the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. Other tithe rentcharges, valued at £64 4s 2d and also representing rectorial property of the parish were held by a limited company, Plymouth Estates Ltd. Viscount Simon LC said ([1944] 1 All ER 710 at 713, [1944] AC 228 at 239) that 'Plymouth Estates, Ltd ... plainly and admittedly remain liable for chancel repair'. He described the obligation of a rector to repair the chancel as 'an obligation imposed by common law' ([1944] 1 All ER 710 at 713, [1944] AC 228 at 240 and see also [1944] 1 All ER 710 at 717, [1944] AC 228 at 247 per Lord Wright). Lord Porter expressed himself to the same effect. He said ([1944] 1 All ER 710 at 718, [1944] AC 228 at 249): 'Prima facie, therefore, if the tithe rentcharge gets into the hands of a lay impropiator at any time it is held subject to the liability to repair' and that 'impropiation exists where the property is in lay hands' (see [1944] 1 All ER 710 at 719, [1944] AC 228 at 250). e

[105] But although it must now be regarded as settled law that an individual who becomes the owner of rectorial property of a parish becomes liable for

- a chancel repair, there remain subsidiary issues which, in my opinion, are not settled. For example, the extent of the liability is not settled. Is the liability limited to the value of the rectorial profits the ownership of which has attracted the office of lay rector and the consequent chancel repair liability or is it unlimited in amount? I have already referred to the effect of s 31(3) and (4) of the 1936 Act whereby, by reference to s 21 of that Act and s 1 of the 1839 Act, the chancel
- b repair liability of a lay rector attributable to his ownership of a tithe rentcharge which had merged in the land on which it was charged was limited to the value of the rentcharge. In Walwyn v Awberry (1677) 2 Mod 254 a lay rector brought an action for trespass because the local bishop had sequestered his tithes on account of his failure to obey an admonition to repair the chancel of the parish church. The issue was whether sequestration was an available remedy. It was held that
- c it was not. Atkins J (at 258) who disagreed on the sequestration point, said that—‘it was agreed by all, that an impropiator is chargeable with the repairs of the chancel; but the charge was not personal but in regard of the profits of the impropriation ...’

- d This suggests that the liability is limited to the amount of the profits. A similar suggestion appears in the Report of the Chancel Repairs Committee presented by the Lord Chancellor to Parliament in May 1930 (Cmd 3571). The chancel repair liability was described (p 5 (para 4(a))) as—

- e ‘an obligation imposed by the Common Law of England, which annexes to the ownership of the rectory the duty of the rector to maintain the chancel of the church out of the profits of the rectory.’ (My emphasis.)

- f As to the position where the rectorial property has passed to several owners, the paragraph said: ‘... every several owner is, to the extent of the profits derived by him from his piece of the property, under the duty of maintaining the chancel ...’ (My emphasis.)

- [106] In Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417, however, the Court of Appeal decided otherwise. The defendants were lay rectors of the parish of Wickhambrook by virtue of ownership of rentcharge of £39 11s 9d per year, a sub-divided part of a tithe rentcharge of £120 per year. The
- g cost of the necessary chancel repairs was estimated to be £123 12s 6d. It was this sum that the PCC sought to recover from the defendants. It was proved at trial that the total sum actually received by the defendants from their ownership of the rentcharge was £50 odd. The trial judge, relying on passages in Phillimore’s Ecclesiastical Law (2nd edn, 1895), held (at 423) that it was necessary to prove that
- h the impropiator had received tithes or other profits belonging to the rectory sufficient to cover the cost of repair and, accordingly, that the PCC’s claim failed. He was reversed on appeal. Lord Hanworth MR after examining various reports of Walwyn v Awberry expressed the view (at 437) that the case was an unsatisfactory authority on which to found a limitation of a lay rector’s chancel
- j repair liability and concluded that ‘the liability of a lay impropiator is personal, and is not limited to the amount of his receipts from the tithe’. But he held that the defendants had a right of contribution from other owners of parts of the tithe rentcharge. Romer LJ agreed with Lord Hanworth MR, as too did Eve J who added (at 445) that ‘the result ... does not appear to me to be reasonable or just’.

[107] In Representative Body of the Church in Wales v Tithe Redemption Commission, Plymouth Estates Ltd v Tithe Redemption Commission [1944] 1 All ER 710

at 713, [1944] AC 228 at 239, Viscount Simon LC, having referred to the chancel repair liability of Plymouth Estates Ltd, said that—

‘[i]t is not necessary for the purposes of the present appeal to discuss the difficult question as to the extent of their possible responsibility, or as to whether Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v. Croxford was rightly decided.’

[108] Counsel before your Lordships have not argued whether the Wickhambrook case was or was not rightly decided. But if Mr and Mrs Wallbank are liable as lay rectors, the question whether their liability should be limited to the profits they have received from the rectorial property may be open to them. The point is certainly still open in this House.

[109] A further point of law that cannot, in my opinion, yet be regarded as settled is whether each and every alienation by a lay rector of impropriatorial assets of the rectory necessarily makes the alienee a co-lay rector and liable for chancel repairs. The point arose in Chivers & Sons Ltd v Secretary of State for Air (Queens' College, Cambridge, Third Party) [1955] 2 All ER 607 at 609, [1955] Ch 585 at 594 where Wynn-Parry J held that the liability to repair the chancel ‘is not a charge on the rectorial property, but a personal liability imposed on the owner or owners for the time being of the rectorial property’ and that ‘[i]f there is more than one owner, each is severally liable’. For reasons which will appear, this is not a point which can have any bearing on the present case but, none the less, the conclusion to which Wynn-Parry J came may be open to question. Is it really the case that on every disposition of any part of former rectorial property, no matter how small and no matter what may be the intentions of the parties, express or implied, regarding the assumption by the transferee of chancel repair liabilities, the transferee becomes willy-nilly by dint of inflexible legal principle a lay impropriator liable to chancel repairs? I doubt it.

THE CONVEYANCING HISTORY OF CLANACRE

[110] At the time of the Inclosure Act 1742 and the award of 1743, under which the common lands of Aston Cantlow were enclosed, Lord Brooke was the lay impropriator of the rectory of the parish church of Aston Cantlow. A recital to the Act so states. It appears from another recital to the Act that Lord Brooke was the owner of tithes and it appears from the terms of the award that the impropriated property included glebe land.

[111] Under the award Lord Brooke was allotted Clanacre. It was described as ‘one plot lying in Aston Cantlow ... called Clanacre combining (containing) ... fifty two Acres two roods and twenty one perches’. Details of its boundaries were given so that there could be no doubt as to the identity of what had been allotted.

[112] It is unclear from the extract of the award contained in the papers before your Lordships on account of what rectorial rights Clanacre was allotted. It may have been allotted on account of Lord Brooke’s tithes or it may have been allotted on account of glebe comprised in the common lands that were being enclosed. But it is not in dispute that one way or another Clanacre became, by substitution, rectorial property. Certainly all Lord Brooke’s tithes over the common lands were extinguished by the Act and the award.

[113] At some time between 1743 and 1875 Lord Brooke, or his successors, sold Clanacre together with the rest of what later became Glebe Farm. Whether a the sale was of all Lord Brooke's impropriated property or of only part of it is not apparent from the papers in evidence in the case.

[114] The first readable conveyance dealing with Clanacre is a conveyance of 21 October 1918 under which the vendor, Thomas Wood, conveyed to two purchasers, both with the surname Terry, Glebe Farm and its 179-odd acres including the 52-odd Clanacre acres. The habendum to the conveyance says that
b the purchasers were to hold the land—

‘in fee simple in equal shares as tenants in common subject primarily and in priority to the other hereditaments charged therewith to the repairs of the Chancel of Aston Church.’

c The ‘subject to’ provision indicates the strong likelihood that the vendor, Thomas Wood, who must have been a lay impropriator, was selling part of the rectorial property but retaining other parts. It seems to me unlikely, given the content of this provision, that Mr and Mrs Wallbank could succeed in claiming from Thomas Wood or his successors a contribution towards any chancel repairing liability that rests on them by virtue of their ownership of Clanacre.

d [115] In 1970 Mr and Mrs Coulton, Mrs Wallbank's parents, purchased Glebe Farm and the 179 acres from Herbert Terry & Sons Ltd, no doubt the successors of the 1918 Terry purchasers. Clause 2 of the conveyance to the Coultons said that the property was conveyed—

e ‘subject to the liability for the repair of the Chancel of Aston Church ... so far as the same affects the property hereby conveyed and is still subsisting and capable of being enforced.’

f And under two deeds of gift dated respectively 21 March 1974 and 1 May 1986 Glebe Farm and the bulk of the 179 acres, including all the Clanacre fields, were conveyed to Mrs Wallbank by her parents. Mrs Wallbank later placed the property in the joint names of herself and her husband.

[116] It is plain from this conveyancing history that Mr and Mrs Wallbank acquired Glebe Farm, including Clanacre, with the knowledge that ownership might carry with it a liability to pay for repairs to the chancel of the parish church.

g THE CHANCEL REPAIRS ACT 1932

[117] The 1932 Act was passed in consequence of the inadequacies of enforcement procedure revealed by litigation between Hauxton PCC and a Mr Stevens. Pre-1932 the enforcement of chancel repair liability was primarily a matter for ecclesiastical courts. Proceedings for the issue of an admonition requiring the alleged lay rector to carry out the repairs had to be issued in the consistory court. It had been established by dicta in, if not by the ratio of, Walwyn v Awberry (1677) 2 Mod 254 that ordinary civil law enforcement procedures were not available. If the consistory court issued the admonition and it was not obeyed, the next step would be either a decree of excommunication or a transfer of the proceedings to the High Court in order for proceedings for h committal for contempt of court to be brought, or both. The unfortunate j Mr Stevens, having unsuccessfully disputed his liability, ignored the admonition issued by the consistory court. He ended up in prison for contempt under a committal order made in the King's Bench Division. He obtained his release only on undertaking to carry out the requisite repairs.

[118] Such a disproportionate remedy was obviously unsatisfactory and s 2 of the 1932 Act authorised PCCs to serve notices to repair on individuals alleged to be liable for chancel repairs. If such a notice is not complied with, the PCC can commence proceedings in the ordinary courts to recover the sum required to put the chancel in proper repair. The court, if satisfied that the defendant would, but for the 1932 Act, 'have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court', can give judgment against the defendant for the sum representing the cost of the necessary repairs. The judgment would be enforceable like any other money judgment. Hence the notices served by the PCC on Mr and Mrs Wallbank and the litigation that followed Mr and Mrs Wallbank's denial of liability.

THE LITIGATION

[119] The pleadings in the case confirmed that there was a dispute as to Mr and Mrs Wallbank's liability to bear the cost of the chancel repairs. On 29 September 1999 the case came before Master Bragge on what I take to have been a summons for directions. On this summons Master Bragge directed that two preliminary issues be tried. Each related to contentions by Mr and Mrs Wallbank as to why they were not liable. One of these contentions was abandoned at trial. The other is the issue that has found its way to your Lordships' House. But before reciting its terms it is important to notice an important concession made by Mr Wallbank, who appeared in person, and on the basis of which the master directed the trial of the preliminary issues. The concession is recorded in the order in the following terms:

'And upon the second defendant on his own behalf and on that of the first defendant stating that he agreed and accepted that the defendants (and each of them) as the joint freeholders of Glebe Farm Aston Cantlow Warwickshire are and at all material times have been the lay rector and are personally liable for the repair of the chancel of the Church of St John the Baptist Aston Cantlow Warwickshire ("the Church") if and to the extent that the liability is enforceable and/or exists by reason of the preliminary issues particularised below.'

This concession very greatly reduced the number of issues relating to chancel repair liability that Mr and Mrs Wallbank could raise.

[120] The preliminary issue that was, and is, persisted in was subsequently amended and in its amended form is as follows:

'Whether having regard to the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights, a co-rector is liable to repair the chancel of the church or otherwise to meet the costs of the said repairs by reason of the provisions of the 1932 Act and the common law.'

[121] The preliminary issue was tried before Ferris J ([2000] All ER (D) 419). It was tried after the Human Rights Act 1998 had been passed but before 2 October 2000, the date on which the Act was to come into effect. In his judgment Ferris J described the argument addressed to him by counsel for Mr and Mrs Wallbank as having two main elements, namely:

'(i) that English law is not yet settled in deciding that a lay rector is liable for chancel repairs, at any rate where the rectorial property owned by that lay rector consists of part only of a larger parcel of land allotted under an inclosure award in lieu of tithes or other rectorial property; and (ii) that it should be decided that such a lay rector is not liable because to hold to the a contrary would involve a contravention of one or more of the rights declared by the convention.'

b [122] I find some difficulty in reconciling the first argument with Mr Wallbank's concession as recited in Master Bragge's order. That, perhaps, does not matter because Ferris J, following Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417 and Chivers & Sons Ltd v Secretary of State for Air (Queens' College, Cambridge, Third Party) [1955] 2 All ER 607, [1955] Ch 585 held that it was settled law that an individual who had come into ownership of part only of the rectorial property became liable to the full burden of the chancel repair liability. In the Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [15]), Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, relying on the same authorities, agreed and held, in addition, that c the liability 'is not limited or proportioned to the value or fruits of the benefice: its sole measure is the cost of necessary repairs'. This was what had been held in the Wickhambrook case, a case by which the Court of Appeal in the present case was bound. This is not a point which has been argued before your Lordships in the present appeal nor, in my opinion, is it a point which arises under the preliminary issue. It is a point that may re-emerge if the quantum of the cost of d repairs for which the Wallbanks are liable has to be litigated. For the present I want to say no more about it than Viscount Simon LC said in Representative Body of the Church in Wales v Tithe Redemption Commission, Plymouth Estates Ltd v Tithe Redemption Commission [1944] 1 All ER 710, [1944] AC 228, namely, that it is a difficult question and that whether the Wickhambrook case was rightly decided is e open to debate at least in this House.

[123] As to the Chivers & Sons point (see [2001] 3 All ER 393 at [16] per Sir Andrew Morritt V-C) it cannot avail the Wallbanks. The 1918 conveyance plainly intended to make the Terrys, the transferees, co-rectors. Otherwise there would have been no mention of the chancel repair liability.

f [124] As to the second argument for the Wallbanks to which Ferris J referred, the argument based on the Human Rights Act, the judge held that there was no breach of art 1 of the First Protocol. The Wallbanks' liability to repair the chancel was an incident of their ownership of the Clanacre fields and the enforcement of that liability by those entitled to enforce it could not be regarded as a deprivation of their possessions. Their possessions, he pointed out, were always liable to such g enforcement. Ferris J, therefore, answered in the negative the question posed in the preliminary issue.

[125] The Court of Appeal disagreed with Ferris J on the Human Rights Act point. They held, first, that the PCC was a core 'public authority' within the meaning of that expression in s 6 of the Act. Section 6(1) provides: 'It is unlawful h for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right.' They held, alternatively, that the PCC's function in enforcing against the Wallbanks their chancel repair liability was a function 'of a public nature'. Section 6(3)(b) provides that the expression 'public authority' includes 'any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature' and s 6(5) says: j 'In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private.'

[126] Having reached conclusions under which the PCC's attempts to enforce the chancel repair liability against the Wallbanks were acts of a public authority for s 6 purposes, the question was whether the enforcement was incompatible with a convention right. The Court of Appeal first addressed itself to art 1 of the First Protocol and held that the liability to defray the cost of chancel repairs was

'inescapably' a form of taxation. The reasoning ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [40]) was that 'a private individual who has no necessary connection with the church [was being] required by law to pay money to a public authority for its upkeep'. The Court of Appeal (at [44]) identified in Strasbourg jurisprudence a requirement that 'the legitimate aim of taxation in the public interest must be pursued by means which are not completely arbitrary or out of all proportion to their purpose', held (at [45]) that the liability for chancel repair was a tax which operated entirely arbitrarily 'first because the land to which it attaches, now shorn of any connection with the rectory, does not differ relevantly from any other freehold land, and secondly because the liability may arise at any time and be ... in almost any amount', and held that the 'tax' accordingly violated art 1 of the First Protocol.

[127] The Court of Appeal held, also, that the way in which the chancel repair liability operated discriminated, impermissibly and in breach of art 14, between the Wallbanks, who were subject to the liability, and other landowners in the parish who were not.

[128] The following issues therefore arise for decision on this appeal. (1) Is the PCC a 'core' public authority for the purposes of s 6 of the Human Rights Act? (2) If the PCC is not a core public authority, is its function in enforcing chancel repair liability a function 'of a public nature'? (3) If the PCC's enforcement of chancel repair liability is a function of a public nature, does the enforcement infringe art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention? (4) Or does it infringe art 14 of the convention?

IS THE PCC A CORE PUBLIC AUTHORITY?

[129] I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry. Each has concluded that a PCC is not a core public authority. I am in complete agreement with their reasons for coming to that conclusion and cannot usefully add to them. I, too, would hold that a PCC is not a core public authority.

IS THE ENFORCEMENT OF CHANCEL REPAIR LIABILITY A FUNCTION OF A PUBLIC NATURE?

[130] On this issue my noble and learned friends have come to the conclusion that the nature of enforcement of chancel repair liability is private. I have found this a difficult question but at the end have come to the opposite conclusion. I agree with Lord Hope that the answer to the question, whether an authority, not being a 'core' public authority, is, when exercising a particular function, exercising a function of a public nature, must depend upon the facts of the particular case (see [63], above). The important facts and matters relevant to the question in the present case seem to me, in no particular order of importance, to be the following. (1) The parish church is a church of the Church of England, a church by law established. (2) It is a church to which the Anglican public are entitled to have recourse, regardless of whether they are practising members of the church, for marriage, for baptism of their children, for weddings, for funerals and burial, and perhaps for other purposes as well. (3) Members of other denominations, or even other religions, are, if parishioners, entitled to burial in the parish churchyard. (4) The church is, therefore, a public building. It is not a private building from which the public can lawfully be excluded at the whim of the owner. (5) The PCC is corporate and its functions are charitable. Its members have the status of charity trustees. Charitable trusts are public trusts, not private ones. (6) A decision by a PCC to enforce a chancel repairing liability a is a decision taken in the interests of the parishioners as a whole. It is not taken in pursuit of any private interests. If it were so taken, it would I think be impeachable by judicial review.

[131] Lord Hope has said that the liability of the lay rector to repair the chancel arises as a matter of private law from the ownership of glebe land (see [35], above). I would respectfully question whether the adjective 'private' is apt.

b In Representative Body of the Church in Wales v Tithe Redemption Commission, Plymouth Estates Ltd v Tithe Redemption Commission [1944] 1 All ER 710, [1944] AC 228 at 234 Sir Walter Monckton KC for the appellants in his submissions to their Lordships commented on the fact that the Welsh Church Act 1914 had made no express provision for a tribunal to take the place of the consistory court in enforcing chancel repair and put to their Lordships that '[p]erhaps the c Attorney-General might have dealt with the matter as a public right'. There was no recorded dissent and I respectfully suggest that Sir Walter's comment was soundly based. The liability of a lay rector is a personal liability arising from his ownership of impropriated property and is imposed by common law (see [1944] 1 All ER 710 at 713, [1944] AC 228 at 240 per Viscount Simon LC). But obligations

d imposed by common law are not necessarily private law obligations. Whether they are so or not must depend on those to whom they are owed. The chancel repair obligations are not owed to private individuals. Private individuals cannot release them. Section 52 of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Measure 1923 provided a procedure whereby lay rectors liable for chancel repairs could compound their liability and thereby obtain a release from it. The procedure

e required there to be consultation with the PCC of the parish, the obtaining of approval from the diocesan dilapidations board and payment of the requisite sum to the diocesan authority. The sum paid becomes trust money (see sub-s (5)). These provisions have an unmistakable public law flavour to them. The chancel repair obligations resting on a lay rector are not, in my opinion, private law

f obligations.

[132] In my opinion, therefore, the question posed under this issue should be answered in the affirmative. It follows, if that is right, that in enforcing chancel repair liability, a PCC must not act in a manner incompatible with a convention right. Is enforcement of chancel repair liability against Mr and Mrs Wallbank an infringement of their rights under art 1 of the First Protocol?

g [133] The terms of art 1 have been set out by Lord Hope in [66], above. I need not repeat that exercise. The question is whether the enforcement of the chancel repair liability constitutes a deprivation of the lay rector's possessions. The Court of Appeal prayed in aid the analogy of taxation in order to justify the proposition that the relevant deprivation was of the Wallbanks' funds. It was their personal

h funds of which they were to be deprived, not Glebe Farm. For my part, although I disagree with the categorisation of the liability as a form of taxation (see [2001] 3 All ER 393 at [40]) I would accept the analysis. The enforcement of the liability is indeed an attack on the Wallbanks' personal funds but it does not on that account infringe art 1 any more than a claim to enforce any other pecuniary

j liability does so. It is here, perhaps, that the taxation analogy does become relevant. Taxation is a levy imposed by a state, or perhaps by some core public authority authorised by the state to impose the levy, either on the public generally or on some identified section of the public. In Black's Law Dictionary (6th edn, 1990) p 1457, 'tax' is described as '[a] charge by the government', as '[a] pecuniary burden laid upon individuals or property to support the government, and [being] a payment exacted by legislative authority' and whose '[e]ssential characteristics ... are that it is not a voluntary payment or donation, but an enforced contribution, exacted pursuant to legislative authority'. It may be that the obligation imposed on parishioners by the common law to pay tithes to the rector of the parish could, although not imposed by government or by the legislature, reasonably be regarded as an obligation to pay a tax. But the obligation of the recipient of the tithes to repair the chancel of the parish church could not, in my opinion, be so described. When tithe rentcharge took the place of tithes, the obligation to pay the tithe rentcharge might similarly have been regarded as an obligation of a taxation character. But the obligation to repair the chancel of the church resting on the recipient of the tithe rentcharge could not be so described. It remained a quid pro quo for the receipt of the tithe rentcharge. The substitution under an inclosure award of land for tithes could no more have changed the nature of the obligation to repair the church chancel than the substitution of tithe rentcharge for tithes could have done. The taxation analogy drawn by the Court of Appeal is, in my respectful opinion, misplaced.

[134] The chancel repair liability satisfies, in my opinion, the requirements of the art 1 exception: it is a liability created by the common law, it operates in the narrow public interest of the parishioners in the parish concerned and in the general public interest in the maintenance of churches. It is created by common law and is subject to the incidents attached to it by common law. And in the case of Mr and Mrs Wallbank they acquired the rectorial property and became lay rectors with full knowledge of the potential liability for chancel repair that that acquisition would carry with it. I can see no infringement of (or incompatibility with) art 1 produced by the actions of the PCC in enforcing that liability.

[135] Nor, in my opinion, do Mr and Mrs Wallbank have any case of infringement of art 14. The comparators for art 14 purposes cannot possibly be persons who are not lay rectors. A person who is sued for £1000 that he owes is not discriminated against for art 14 purposes because people who do not owe £1000 are not similarly sued. A person who builds in breach of planning permission and has proceedings taken against him by the local planning authority is not discriminated against for art 14 purposes because a person who builds and has obtained planning permission is not sued. The comparators are not apt. The apt comparator in the present case would be a co-lay rector who was liable for chancel repairs to the Aston Cantlow church but on whom no 1932 Act notice had been served. There is no case here of art 14 discrimination.

[136] For these reasons I would allow the appeal and restore the declaration and order made by Ferris J.

[137] A final point before your Lordships was whether, if the PCC's enforcement of the chancel repair liability had constituted an infringement of Mr and Mrs Wallbank's convention rights, the PCC could have relied on s 6(2)(a) or (b) of the Human Rights Act. As to (a), it was contended that, as a result of s 2 of the 1932 Act, the PCC could not have done otherwise than enforce the chancel repair liability. In my opinion, this contention could not be sustained. Section 2 confers a power. It does not impose a mandatory duty. The PCC could have decided not to enforce the repairing obligation. They could have so decided for a number of different reasons which, in particular factual situations, might have had weight. They might, for example, have recommended the deconsecration of the church and its sale for conversion into a dwelling. They might have taken into account excessive hardship to Mr and Mrs Wallbank in having to find £95,000. Trustees are not always obliged to be Scrooge. Section 2 is not, in my opinion, a provision of primary legislation capable of engaging s 6(2)(a) of the

- a Human Rights Act. As to (b), it is not s 2 of the 1932 Act that produces the alleged incompatibility with convention rights. Section 2 merely provides enforcement machinery for the obligation created by the common law. If s 2 had never been enacted the allegedly convention-infringing obligation to pay for chancel repairs would still have been present. None the less, if the imposition by the common law of the obligation constitutes an infringement of convention rights so, too, the use of s 2 for the purpose of enforcement would constitute an infringement. So I respectfully agree with my learned friends Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough that the PCC would be entitled to rely on s 6(2)(b).

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

- c [138] My Lords, in 1986 Mrs Gail Wallbank became the owner of the freehold of Glebe Farm near the village of Aston Cantlow in Warwickshire. Four years later she conveyed the property into the joint names of herself and her husband. As owners of Glebe Farm Mr and Mrs Wallbank are the lay rectors or impropriators of the parish church and, as such, potentially liable to pay the cost of repairs to the chancel. By 1990 the chancel was in disrepair. At that time the Parochial Church Council (PCC) did not know about the conveyance into joint names and accordingly it simply asked Mrs Wallbank to pay for the repairs. She disputed the liability. In 1994 the PCC, as the responsible authority, served notice on Mrs Wallbank under s 2(1) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932, calling on her to repair the chancel. When she still refused to do so, the PCC began these proceedings under s 2(2) of the 1932 Act to recover over £95,000, the estimated cost of the repairs. Subsequently, the PCC joined Mr Wallbank as a defendant.

- e [139] My noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote has described the origins and development of the liability for chancel repairs as well as the way in which that liability attaches to the owners of Glebe Farm. The law as it applies today can scarcely be regarded as satisfactory and may well cause real hardship to lay rectors who are called on to pay the cost of repairs to the chancel. Not surprisingly, the Law Commission have made proposals for the abolition of the liability over a period of time: Liability for Chancel Repairs (Law Com No 152 (1985)). Not altogether surprisingly either, Parliament has not yet acted on those proposals since abolition without compensation would cause significant financial harm to many ancient parish churches throughout England. This case highlights both aspects of the problem.

- g [140] Mr and Mrs Wallbank do not now dispute that, absent the Human Rights Act 1998, they would be liable to pay the reasonable cost of the necessary repairs to the chancel. They defend the proceedings, however, on the basis that the PCC is a 'public authority' which has acted unlawfully in terms of s 6(1) of the Human Rights Act by requiring them to pay the sum in question and so interfering with their peaceful enjoyment of their possessions in contravention of art 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act).

- j [141] The demand for payment was made and the action begun long before the Human Rights Act was even thought of. And indeed Ferris J heard argument and delivered judgment at first instance some months before the Act came into force ([2000] All ER (D) 419). By the time of the hearing in the Court of Appeal the Act was in force and the PCC conceded that, by virtue of ss 7(1)(b) and 22(4), Mr and Mrs Wallbank were entitled to rely on their convention right. In their judgment delivered by Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, the Court of Appeal accepted the concession ([2001] EWCA 713 at [7], [2001] 3 All ER 393 at [7], [2002] Ch 51 at [7]). In its written case in this House the PCC indicated an intention to withdraw the concession. When the appeal opened, however, Mr George QC indicated that he did not intend to argue the point. This may have been, in part at least, because the Church authorities are anxious to have the substantial issue resolved. In these circumstances the House heard no argument on what the cases show to be a difficult area of the law. I therefore prefer to express no view on the point.

[142] Differing from the decision of Ferris J, the Court of Appeal disposed of the case by holding that the liability of Mr and Mrs Wallbank, as lay rectors, to meet the cost of the chancel repairs was unenforceable by reason of the Human Rights Act. In that way the Court of Appeal lifted the burden from lay rectors like Mr and Mrs Wallbank, albeit at the expense of PCCs like the one at Aston Cantlow. The question for the House is whether the Court of Appeal were right to take this momentous step on the basis of the Human Rights Act.

[143] In reaching their conclusion the Court of Appeal held that the PCC was indeed a 'public authority' in terms of s 6 of the Human Rights Act. While a number of other issues were argued in the hearing of the appeal to your Lordships' House, none of them arises unless the PCC is indeed to be regarded as a public authority for this purpose.

[144] Section 6 provides inter alia:

'(1) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right ...

(3) In this section "public authority" includes ... (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature ...

(5) In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection 3(b) if the nature of the act is private.'

The use of the word 'includes' in sub-s (3) shows that there are public authorities other than persons only certain of whose functions are of a public nature. So there must be persons who are public authorities because all their functions are of a public nature. These are sometimes referred to as 'core' public authorities, as opposed to 'hybrid' authorities, only certain of whose functions are public and some of whose acts may be private in nature. In view of my overall conclusion on the appeal I have not found it necessary on this occasion to explore the significance of the distinction between the two kinds of public authorities.

[145] In deciding that the PCC was to be regarded as a public authority, the Court of Appeal first noted that in the area of judicial review the cases at present draw a conceptual line between functions of public governance and functions of mutual governance. But the Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [34]) could detect no surviving element of mutuality or mutual governance as between the impropiator and the church in the modern liability for chancel repairs: the relationship in which the function arose was created by a rule of law and a state of fact which were independent of the volition of either of them. In the hearing before the House Mr George did not argue the contrary. The Court of Appeal continued (at [35]):

'In our judgment it is inescapable, in these circumstances, that a PCC is a public authority. It is an authority in the sense that it possesses powers which private individuals do not possess to determine how others should act. Thus, in particular, its notice to repair has statutory force. It is public in the sense

- a that it is created and empowered by law; that it forms part of the church by law established; and that its functions include the enforcement through the courts of a common law liability to maintain its chancels resting upon persons who need not be members of the church. If this were to be incorrect, the PCC would nevertheless, and for the same reasons, be a legal person certain of whose functions, chancel repairs among them, are functions of a public nature. It follows on either basis by virtue of s 6 that its acts, to be lawful, must be compatible with the rights set out in Sch 1 to the [Human Rights Act 1998].’
- b

The Court of Appeal’s main conclusion therefore was that the PCC was a core public authority. Alternatively, it was a hybrid authority, some of whose functions were public—among them enforcing the impropiators’ obligation to pay for chancel repairs.

- c [146] There is no doubt that, in terms of s 2(1) of the 1932 Act, the PCC is an authority—more precisely, ‘the responsible authority’. For present purposes, however, the question is whether the PCC should be regarded as a public authority in terms of s 6. Parliament has chosen to use a composite phrase ‘public authority’. There are therefore distinct dangers in interpreting it by breaking it down and examining the two components separately. Be that as it may, the Court of Appeal considered each of the two elements in turn.

- e [147] They first held that the PCC was an ‘authority’ for purposes of s 6 because it had powers which private individuals do not possess to determine how others should act—the relevant example being its power to serve a notice to repair which has statutory force. That is a somewhat imprecise criterion for identifying an authority, however. When a police officer arrests an offender, his act is that of a public ‘authority’ irrespective of whether or not the arrest is one that a private citizen could have effected. Moreover Parliament can, if it wishes, invest private individuals with quite remarkable powers over their fellow citizens. For instance, s 391 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, now repealed, provided:
- f

- g ‘It shall be lawful for any householder, personally or by his servant, or by a constable of police, to require any street musician or singer to depart from the neighbourhood of the house of such householder; and every person who shall continue to sound or play any instrument, or sing in any street, at any time after being so required to depart, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings.’

- h A paterfamilias standing in evening dress at the entrance to his New Town residence could address an order to an organ-grinder to depart from the vicinity, or his butler could issue it from the top of the area steps. In either event, the organ-grinder would commit an offence under the section if he continued to play in the street. But if, instead, they had summoned a constable who had issued the same instruction with exactly the same effect, he would unquestionably have been an ‘authority’—and indeed a ‘public authority’. The existence or non-existence of the equivalent statutory power in the householder and his servant would not be germane to the constable’s status. So the fact that no individual possesses the power to issue a statutory repair notice with specific effects on the lay rector cannot in itself be sufficient to show that the PCC is to be regarded as an authority for the purposes of s 6.
- j

[148] The Court of Appeal drew attention to three features which they thought pointed to the PCC being a 'public' authority for purposes of s 6: the PCC is created and empowered by law; it forms part of the church by law established and its functions include the enforcement through the courts of a common law liability to maintain the chancel resting upon persons who need not be members of the Church. a

[149] It is necessary to look a little more closely at the Court of Appeal's observation that the PCC 'is created and empowered by law'. The origins of PCCs can be traced back to the movement that began in the nineteenth century for greater self-government and better representation of the laity in the Church of England. Part of the problem was that, while the Convocations of Canterbury and York could pass canons which were binding on the clergy, any wider legislation had to be by Act of Parliament and Parliament passed only relatively few of the Acts for which the Church asked. In 1916 a special committee set up to look into the question recommended the formation of a Church Council with power to legislate on ecclesiastical matters. Eventually, after further work by another committee, the necessary scheme was approved by the Convocations of Canterbury and York. Both Convocations adopted identical addresses which were presented to King George V on 10 May 1919. The text is to be found in the Acts of the Upper and Lower Houses, Convocation of Canterbury, 6 May 1919, Upper House, Official Year Book of the Church of England 1920, p 193. Attached to the addresses was an appendix (Official Year Book of the Church of England 1921, p 16) setting out the constitution of what was now called the National Assembly of the Church of England. Paragraph 17 of the constitution provided that, before entering on any other legislative business, the National Assembly should make further provision for the self-government of the Church by passing through the assembly two measures, the second being to confer 'upon the Parochial Church Councils constituted under the Schedule to this Constitution such powers as the Assembly may determine'. b

[150] The necessary machinery for giving assembly measures legal effect was created later that year when Parliament passed the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act 1919. Under s 4, measures passed by the National Assembly and submitted to the Ecclesiastical Committee of Parliament would, on being approved and receiving the Royal Assent, have the force and effect of an Act of Parliament. In accordance with that procedure, the National Assembly proceeded to pass the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1921. The preamble duly records that the measure was passed to fulfil a requirement of the constitution of the assembly to— f

'make further provision for the self-government of the Church by passing through the Assembly Measures inter alia for conferring on the Parochial Church Councils constituted under the Schedule to such Constitution such powers as the Assembly may determine.' g

[151] As the preamble shows, just like the National Assembly itself, the PCCs were actually constituted when the scheme, comprising the constitution of the assembly and the schedule of rules for the representation of the laity, was approved by the Convocations of Canterbury and York. The function of the 1921 measure was, accordingly, not to constitute or 'create' the PCCs but to confer powers on them. The same division survives today. The rules for the representation of the laity, including those relating to PCCs, are to be found in Sch 3 to the Synodical Government Measure 1969, while the powers of PCCs are j a now in the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956. Like s 3 of the 1921 measure, s 3 of the 1956 measure provides for the PCC to be a body corporate. Section 2 of the 1921 measure made it 'the primary duty of the council in every parish to co-operate with the incumbent in the initiation and development of Church work both within the parish and outside', while s 2 of the 1956 measure, which was inserted by s 6 of the 1969 measure, confers rather more elaborate general functions on the PCC. I come back to that section shortly.

[152] On closer examination, therefore, the process by which the PCCs were constituted and received their powers is really very different from the way in which a public body such as the Equal Opportunities Commission is created and given its powers by statute. In a case of that kind, the fact that the body owes both its existence and its powers to statute may well indicate that it has been called into existence to carry out some function that relates to the government of the country in a broad sense. By contrast, the PCCs were not constituted by statute but by the Church. They then became bodies corporate and received their powers not by virtue of an Act of Parliament but by virtue of an assembly measure, having the force and effect of an Act of Parliament. These factors suggest that, in reality, PCCs were constituted by the Church to carry out functions to be determined by the National Assembly, later the General Synod, of the Church.

[153] The Court of Appeal pointed next to the PCC being part of the Church by law established. In his submissions on behalf of Mr and Mrs Wallbank Mr Beloff QC embellished this argument. The Church of England—with Her Majesty the Queen at its head, with bishops appointed by the Queen on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, with the legislation of General Synod receiving the Royal Assent and having the force and effect of an Act of Parliament and with the civil power being available to enforce the judgments of its courts—was so woven into the fabric of the state that it should be regarded as a core public authority for purposes of s 6. Then, since 'the parish is the basic building block of the church' (Mark Hill Ecclesiastical Law (2nd edn, 2001) p 74), the PCC too should be regarded as a core public authority—whatever might be its precise functions in terms of s 2 of the 1956 measure.

[154] I would reject that argument. In this case the House is not concerned with any theological doctrine of establishment such as gave rise to one of the issues in General Assembly of Free Church of Scotland v Lord Overtoun, Macalister v Young [1904] AC 515. Mr Beloff's argument centred, rather, on the general position of the Church of England in English law. The juridical nature of the Church is, notoriously, somewhat amorphous. The Church has been described as 'an organised operative institution' or as 'the quasi corporate institution which carries on the work' of the Church of England: see Re Barnes, Simpson v Barnes (1922) [1930] 2 Ch 80n at 81. Whether or not such an institution itself could ever count as a public authority in terms of s 6, I see no basis upon which a body within the Church, which would not otherwise be regarded as a public authority, could be impliedly invested with that character simply by reason of being part of the wider institution.

[155] On the other hand, the 1956 measure passed by the National Assembly of the Church casts light on the nature of the functions of a PCC. Under s 2(1) its duty is to consult with the minister on matters of general concern and importance to the parish. By s 2(2) the PCC's general functions include:

(a) co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church, pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical; (b) the consideration and discussions of matters concerning the Church of England or any other matters of religious or public interest, but not the declaration of the doctrine of the Church on any question; (c) making known and putting into effect any provision made by the diocesan synod or the deanery synod, but without prejudice to the powers of the council on any particular matter; (d) giving advice to the diocesan synod and the deanery synod on any matter referred to the council; (e) raising such matters as the council consider appropriate with the diocesan synod or deanery synod.'

In addition to these general functions, by virtue of s 4 the PCC is given powers, duties and liabilities which formerly vested in the churchwardens. These focus very much on the parish church and its affairs. In particular, under s 4(1)(b) the PCC has powers, duties and liabilities with respect to the care, maintenance, preservation and insurance of the fabric of the church and of its goods and ornaments. By s 7(ii) the PCC has power to levy and collect a voluntary church rate for any purpose connected with the affairs of the parish church.

[156] The key to the role of the PCC lies in the first of its general functions: co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church. Its other more particular functions are to be seen as ways of carrying out this general function. The mission of the Church is a religious mission, distinct from the secular mission of government, whether central or local. Founding on scriptural and other recognised authority, the Church seeks to serve the purposes of God, not those of the government carried on by the modern equivalents of Caesar and his proconsuls. This is true even though the Church of England has certain important links with the state. Those links, which do not include any funding of the Church by the government, give the Church a unique position but they do not mean that it is a department of state: see Marshall v Graham, Bell v Graham [1907] 2 KB 112 at 126 per Phillimore J. In so far as the ties are intended to assist the Church, it is to accomplish the Church's own mission, not the aims and objectives of the government of the United Kingdom. The PCC exists to carry forward the Church's mission at the local level.

[157] Against that background the adjective 'private' is not perhaps the one that springs most readily to mind to describe the functions of a PCC in the Church of England either generally or as compared, for instance, with those of a church council in the Methodist Church. It might therefore be tempting to conclude that the PCC's functions must be 'public' and that the PCC must itself be a 'public' authority for the purposes of the Human Rights Act. At this point it becomes necessary to look more closely at the meaning of the composite expression 'public authority' in s 6. This in turn takes one back behind the Act to the convention itself.

[158] The 'High Contracting Parties' to the convention were 'the governments signatory' to the convention, more particularly 'the governments of European countries' having certain common characteristics. In the fourth recital to the convention they reaffirmed their profound belief in those rights and freedoms which are the foundation of justice and peace in the world and which are best maintained by a common understanding and observance of the human rights upon which they depend. The governments gave concrete expression to the beliefs and aspirations recorded in the recitals by undertaking in art 1 to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms set out in s 1 a of the convention. It can reasonably be inferred from the terms of the recitals and art 1 that the freedoms, and the rights on which they depend, relate to the powers and responsibilities of the governments which are parties to the convention.

[159] That inference is confirmed by art 34 which provides that the European Court of Human Rights—

b ‘may receive applications from any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals claiming to be the victim of a violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in the Convention or the protocols thereto. The High Contracting Parties undertake not to hinder in any way the effective exercise of this right.’

c I respectfully agree with the Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER 393 at [33]), that, taken together, arts 1 and 34 assume the existence of a state which stands distinct from persons, groups and non-governmental organisations. I would go further: the reference in art 1 to the rights and freedoms defined in s 1 of the convention only makes sense if the state in question is exercising a range of functions which are, in a broad sense, governmental—and to which the rights and freedoms in s 1 d can therefore relate. Long ago, the functions of government were usually confined to defending the realm and keeping the peace. Nowadays, in addition, they commonly cover such matters as education, health and the environment. The exact range of governmental power will vary, of course, from state to state, depending on the history of the particular state and the political philosophy of its government. Similarly, the distribution of governmental power will depend on e the constitutional arrangements of the individual states. In some, the central government will retain most functions, in others power will be shared on some kind of federal system, while, in most at least, some functions will be allotted to local or community bodies. Irrespective of these and other possible permutations, under art 1 of the convention the states parties are responsible for f securing that all bodies exercising governmental power within their jurisdiction respect the relevant rights and freedoms. This approach underlies the admissibility decision of the Fourth Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights in Ayuntamiento de Mula v Spain App No 55346/00 (1 February 2001, unreported).

g [160] The obligation under art 1 has bound the United Kingdom ever since the convention came into force. Since 1966 individuals have been able to bring proceedings in Strasbourg to ensure that the United Kingdom complies with that obligation. Prima facie, therefore, when Parliament enacted the Human Rights Act ‘to give further effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights’, the intention was to make provision in our
h domestic law to ensure that the bodies carrying out the functions of government in the United Kingdom observed the rights and freedoms set out in the convention. Parliament chose to bring this about by enacting inter alia s 6(1), which makes it unlawful for ‘a public authority’ to act in a way that is incompatible with a convention right. A purposive construction of that section
j accordingly indicates that the essential characteristic of a public authority is that it carries out a function of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg organs.

[161] Mr Beloff accepted, of course, that, in order to achieve the government’s declared aim of bringing rights home, in the legislation which it placed before Parliament the term ‘public authority’ must have been intended to include all bodies that carry out a function of government that would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom in Strasbourg. But, he said, that was simply a minimum. The government and, more particularly, Parliament could well have intended to go further and to include other public bodies, even though their acts would not engage the international responsibility of the United Kingdom. It would therefore be wrong to limit the scope of 'public authority' in s 6 to bodies exercising a governmental function of the state, however loosely defined. Mr Beloff could not point to any authoritative statement showing that Parliament had intended the Human Rights Act to have this wider effect. But he argued that, if Parliament had meant to limit the legislation to bodies carrying out a function of government, the natural thing would have been to use some such term as 'a governmental authority' or 'a governmental organisation'—which would mirror the term 'non-governmental organisation' to be found in art 34 of the convention. That was how the draftsman of the Act had proceeded in s 7(7) when he provided that a person was to be a 'victim' of an unlawful act for the purposes of the section only if he would have been a victim for the purposes of art 34 in proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights in respect of that act. Not only had the draftsman not adopted a similar approach in s 6(1): when an attempt had been made to amend the Bill so as to align the domestic test with the test adopted by the European Court in interpreting the convention, the government had opposed it and the amendment had failed.

[162] I see no proper basis for referring to Hansard as an aid to construing the term 'public authority' in s 6. But it appears that, in advancing this particular argument, Mr Beloff had in mind the amendments moved by Mr Edward Leigh MP and discussed by the Home Secretary during the Commons committee stage of the Bill (314 HC Official Report (6th series) cols 400, 418–425, 432–433). Since the convention is concerned with the obligations of the governments of the states parties, it does not define the domestic bodies whose acts engage the liability of those governments. Moreover, the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court on the point is not extensive. A definition of the relevant public bodies in the Human Rights Act by reference to the approach of the Strasbourg court would therefore not have been particularly workable. Keith J made much the same point in relation to the Hong Kong Bill of Rights in Hong Kong Polytechnic University v Next Magazine Publishing Ltd [1996] 2 HKLR 260 at 264. According to the Home Secretary, because of these problems and in an attempt to replicate the situation under the convention, the government chose the term 'public authority' to indicate that the body concerned was to be sufficiently public to engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom. If—contrary to my view—the House could properly derive assistance from the fate of these amendments, it would lie in the confirmation that, in promoting the Bill, the government intended to give people rights in domestic law against the same bodies as would engage the liability of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg court.

[163] In the present case the question therefore comes to be whether a PCC is a public authority in the sense that it carries out, either generally or on the relevant occasion, the kind of public function of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg organs. It so happens that there are two cases from Strasbourg dealing with the position of churches in this regard. They suggest that, in general, church authorities should not be treated as public authorities in this sense.

[164] The first case is Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1. On the basis of various provisions of the convention, including art 1 of the First Protocol, the

- a* applicant monasteries challenged a Greek statute which changed the rules of administration of their patrimony and provided for the transfer of a large part of their estate to the Greek state. The links between the Greek Orthodox Church and the Greek state were particularly close. In Greek law the Holy Monasteries were public law entities that could be founded, merged or dissolved by means of a decree of the President of Greece. Another public law entity, under the supervision of the ministry of education and religious affairs, was responsible for managing the property belonging to the monasteries. In these circumstances the Greek government stated, as a preliminary objection to the Holy Monasteries' application, that they were not a non-governmental organisation which could make an application as a victim in terms of art 25(1) (now art 34) of the convention. Repelling that objection, the European Court of Human Rights held
- c* (at 41 (para 49)):

- 'Like the Commission in its admissibility decision, the Court notes at the outset that the applicant monasteries do not exercise governmental powers. Section 39(1) of the Charter of the Greek Church describes the monasteries as ascetic religious institutions. Their objectives—essentially ecclesiastical and spiritual ones, but also cultural and social ones in some cases—are not such as to enable them to be classed with governmental organisations established for public administration purposes. From the classification as public law entities it may be inferred only that the legislature—on account of the special links between the monasteries and the State—wished to afford them the same legal protection vis-à-vis third parties as was accorded to other public law entities. Furthermore, the monastery councils' only power consists in making rules concerning the organisation and furtherance of spiritual life and the internal administration of each monastery. The monasteries come under the spiritual supervision of the local archbishop, not under the supervision of the State, and they are accordingly entities distinct from the State, of which they are completely independent. The applicant monasteries are therefore to be regarded as non-governmental organisations within the meaning of Article 25 of the Convention.'

- While the positions of the Holy Monasteries and of a PCC are scarcely comparable, the judgment of the European Court is important for its reasoning that the nature of the objectives of the monasteries was not such that they could be classed with 'governmental organisations established for public administration purposes'. The court also attached importance to the fact that the monasteries came under the spiritual supervision of the local archbishop rather than under the supervision of the state, as an indication that they were entities distinct from the state.

- [165] In Hautanemi v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR CD 155 the applicants were members of a parish of the Church of Sweden who complained of a violation of art 9 of the convention because the Assembly of the Church of Sweden had prohibited the use of the liturgy of the Finnish Evangelical-Lutheran Church in their parish. Under reference to the judgment in the Holy Monasteries case, the European Commission recalled art 25(1) (now art 34) of the convention and observed (at 155):
- j*

'at the relevant time the Church of Sweden and its member parishes were to be regarded as corporations of public law. Since these religious bodies cannot be considered to have been exercising governmental powers, the Church of Sweden and notably the applicant parish can nevertheless be regarded as "non-governmental organisations" within the meaning of Article 25(1).^a

Having held that, as members of the parish, the applicants could be regarded as victims in terms of art 25(1), the Commission added (at 156):

'The Commission has just found that, for the purposes of Article 25 of the Convention, the Church of Sweden and its member parishes are to be regarded as "non-governmental organisations". It follows that the respondent State cannot be held responsible for the alleged violation of the applicants' freedom of religion resulting from the decision of the Church Assembly ... There has thus been no State interference with that freedom.'^b

[166] In the light of these decisions what matters is that the PCC's general function is to carry out the religious mission of the Church in the parish, rather than to exercise any governmental power. Moreover, the PCC is not in any sense under the supervision of the state: under s 9 of the 1956 measure it is the bishop who has certain powers in relation to the PCC's activities. In these circumstances the fact that the PCC is constituted as a body corporate under the 1956 measure is irrelevant. For these reasons, in respectful disagreement with the Court of Appeal, I consider that the PCC is not a core public authority for purposes of s 6 of the Act.^d

[167] This conclusion finds further support in the treatment of certain churches in relation to art 19(4) of the German constitution or Grundgesetz. That article provides that, if any person's rights are infringed by 'public power' ('öffentliche Gewalt'), recourse to the courts is open to him. The history of relations between Church and state in Germany is, of course, very different from the history of that relationship in any part of the United Kingdom. In Germany it has culminated in a declaration that there is to be no state Church (art 137(1) of the Weimar constitution incorporated by art 140 of the constitution). This important difference must not be overlooked. Nevertheless, as permitted by art 137, certain churches are constituted as public law corporations. In general, domestic public law entities are regarded as exercising public power in terms of art 19(4), whereas natural persons and private law associations are not. Despite this, because of their particular (religious) mission which does not derive from the state, the churches that are public law corporations are treated differently from other public law corporations that are organically integrated into the state. 'Church power is indeed public, but not state power' ('ist kirchliche Gewalt zwar öffentliche, aber nicht staatliche Gewalt'): see BVerwGE 18, 385, 386–387; BVerwGE 25, 226, 228–229. So, in relation to these churches, the Administrative Court interprets the phrase 'public power' in art 19(4) as being equivalent to 'state power'. Since within their own sphere the churches do not exercise state power, even if they exercise public power, the art 19(4) guarantee does not apply. Despite the rather different context, this interpretation of 'public power' tends to confirm the interpretation of 'public authority' in s 6 which I prefer. Moreover, due allowance having been made for the particular position of the Church of England, the reasoning of the Administrative Court also tends to confirm that the mere fact that s 3 of the 1956 measure makes every PCC a body corporate does not carry with it any necessary implication that the PCC should, on that account alone, be regarded as a public authority for the purposes of s 6.^e
^g
^h

a [168] Of course, if the churches in Germany go outside their own unique sphere and undertake state functions, for example, in running schools, the constitutional guarantee in art 19(4) applies to them: BVerfGE 18, 385, 387—388; BVerfGE 25, 226, 229. In much the same way, for example, a Church of England body which was entrusted, as part of its responsibilities, with running a school or other educational establishment might find that it had stepped over into the sphere of governmental functions and was, in that respect, to be regarded as a public authority for purposes of s 6(1).

b [169] The Court of Appeal did indeed consider that, even if they were wrong in holding that PCCs are core public authorities, a PCC should be regarded as a public authority when enforcing the common law obligation of lay rectors, who need not be members of the Church, to maintain the chancel of the parish church. Mr Beloff reinforced this argument by pointing both to the duty of the minister under the relevant canons to hold certain services in the parish church and to the widespread belief, whether particularly well-founded or not, that any resident of a parish was entitled to be married in the church. These were indications of the public role of the parish church and, accordingly, of the public nature of the PCC's function in relation to the maintenance of the fabric of the church so that the minister could perform those public duties there. Enforcing the lay rectors' obligation was part of that public function.

c [170] For the most part, in performing his duties and conducting the prescribed services, the minister is simply carrying out part of the mission of the Church, not any governmental function of the state. On the other hand, when in the course of his pastoral duties the minister marries a couple in the parish church, he may be carrying out a governmental function in a broad sense and so may be regarded as a public authority for purposes of the Human Rights Act. In performing its duties in relation to the maintenance of the fabric of the church so that services may take place there, the PCC is doing its part to help the minister discharge his pastoral and evangelistic duties. The PCC may be acting in the public interest, in a general sense, but it is still carrying out a church rather than a governmental function. That remains the case even although, from time to time, when performing one of his pastoral duties—conducting a marriage service in the church—the minister himself may act as a public authority.

d [171] Moreover, the fact that, as part of its responsibilities in relation to the maintenance of the church fabric, the PCC may have to enforce a common law obligation against a lay rector who happens not to be a member of the Church can hardly transform the PCC into a public authority. Indeed, the very term 'lay rector' is a reminder that the common law obligation which the PCC is enforcing is the last remnant of a set of more complex rights and liabilities that were ecclesiastical in origin. As Ferris J held, today the liability to repair the chancel can be regarded as one of the incidents of ownership of rectorial property:

e 'It is, of course, an unusual incident because it does not amount to a charge on the land, is not limited to the value of the land and imposes a personal liability on the owner of the land. But in principle I do not find it possible to distinguish it from the liability which would attach to the owner of land which is purchased subject to a mortgage, restrictive covenant or other incumbrance created by a predecessor in title.'

f I respectfully agree. There is nothing in the nature of the obligation itself, or in the means or purpose of its enforcement, that would lead to the conclusion that the PCC of Aston Cantlow is exercising a governmental function, however broadly defined, when it enforces the lay rectors' obligation to pay for chancel repairs. Therefore, even when it is enforcing that obligation, the PCC is not to be regarded as a public authority for the purposes of s 6 of the Human Rights Act. a [172] I should add that I agree with the observations of my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, in the final paragraph of his speech.

[173] For these reasons I would allow the appeal and make the order proposed by Lord Scott of Foscote. b

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
SIMON BROWN, WALLER AND KAY LJJ

c Immigration – Appeal – Decision relating to person’s entitlement to enter or remain in United Kingdom – Approach to appeal in which proportionality in issue – Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 65.

The appellant was a citizen of Nigeria who had entered the United Kingdom in 1990 and remained after her visa had expired. She had two children, born in 1999 and 2000, whose father was a British citizen. He was married with three other children. The appellant’s children were maintained by their father who saw them regularly. They were emotionally dependent upon him and he was a stable influence in their lives. If the appellant and her children were returned to Nigeria their relationship with him would end. The Secretary of State decided to issue and serve removal directions on the appellant. She appealed under s 65^a of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 which provided that a person alleging that an authority had, in taking any decision under the Immigration Acts relating to that person’s entitlement to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, acted ‘in breach of his human rights’ might appeal to an adjudicator against that decision. Paragraph 21^b of Sch 4 to the 1999 Act provided, inter alia, that on an appeal to him the adjudicator had to allow the appeal if he considered that the decision or action against which the appeal was brought was ‘not in accordance with the law. In 2002 the adjudicator allowed her appeal, finding that the removal of the appellant and her two dependent children was an interference with her right to family life under art 8^c of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) which was disproportionate to the legitimate aim of preserving the integrity of immigration control. The Secretary of State appealed to the Immigration Appeal Tribunal, who reinstated his decision to issue and serve removal directions. The appellant appealed. On appeal two issues arose: (i) what was the correct approach to an appeal under s 65 of the 1999 Act; and (ii) whether the tribunal had been entitled to have regarded the decision to return the appellant and her children to Nigeria as striking a fair balance between the relevant interests.

Held – Where the essential facts were not in doubt or dispute, the adjudicator’s task on a human rights appeal under s 65 of the 1999 Act was to determine whether the decision under appeal was properly one within the decision-maker's discretion, namely that it was a decision which could reasonably be regarded as proportionate and as striking a fair balance between the competing interests in play. If it were, then the adjudicator could not characterise it as a decision 'not in accordance with the law' and so, even if he personally would have preferred the balance to have been struck differently, he could not substitute his preference for the decision in fact taken. However, there would be occasions where it could properly be said that the decision reached by the Secretary of State was outside the range of permissible responses open to him, in that the balance struck was simply wrong. The instant case was such an occasion. The tribunal had not been entitled to have regarded the Secretary of State's decision to return the appellant and her children to Nigeria as striking a fair balance between the competing interests in play. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed, the decision of the tribunal set aside and the decision of the adjudicator reinstated (see [20], [25], [27]–[30], below).

Appeal

The appellant, Blessing Edore, appealed with permission granted by Latham LJ from the decision of the Immigration and Appeal Tribunal on 29 January 2003 allowing the appeal of the Secretary of State for the Home Department from the decision of Mrs Frudd, a special adjudicator, allowing the appeal of the appellant from the decision of the Secretary of State to return her with her dependent children to her country of citizenship. The facts are set out in the judgment of Simon Brown LJ.

- a Sibghat Ullah Kadri QC and Satvinder Juss (instructed by Ikie Solicitors) for the appellant.
Ashley Underwood QC (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Cur adv vult

- b 23 May 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

SIMON BROWN LJ.

- c [1] Ms Blessing Edore, the appellant, is a citizen of Nigeria now aged 39. She has been in this country since her illegal entry here in 1990. She has two young children fathered by a married man, Mr Okadiebo, a British citizen with a wife and three older children, also living here. It is the appellant's case that to return her to Nigeria as the Secretary of State proposes would infringe her (and her children's) right to family life under art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).
d The Secretary of State contends to the contrary that the appellant's return is necessary and proportionate in the interests of effective immigration control.

- e [2] On 20 June 2002, on the appellant's appeal under s 65 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, a special adjudicator, Mrs Frudd, allowed the appeal: she found that 'removal of the appellant and her two dependent children would be disproportionate to the aim of preserving the integrity of immigration control pursuant to art 8 of the [European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)]'.

- f [3] On 29 January 2003 the Immigration Appeal Tribunal (the IAT) allowed the Secretary of State's appeal and reinstated his decision to issue and serve removal directions.

[4] The appellant now appeals to this court with permission granted by Latham LJ in these terms:

- g 'It seems to me that this court should take the opportunity to consider the starred appeal of Noruwa v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (3 July 2001, unreported) and the way in which adjudicators and the tribunal should approach appeals in which proportionality is in issue.'

- h [5] Essentially two questions arise on the appeal: first, as suggested by Latham LJ, what approach should the independent appellate authorities bring to bear on a s 65 appeal arising, as commonly such appeals do, in circumstances such as exist here. More particularly, if there is room for two views as to whether, in ordering the appellant's removal, the Secretary of State has acted proportionately and struck a fair balance between the competing interests in play, are the j appellate authorities bound to dismiss the appeal or can they, if they prefer, substitute for the Secretary of State's decision one more favourable to the appellant? This first question is plainly one of some general importance. The second question arising is whether, whatever may be held to be the correct approach to its jurisdiction, the IAT was right on the facts of this particular case to have upheld the Secretary of State's decision to return the appellant and her children to Nigeria.

[6] Before addressing either question it is convenient first to sketch in the facts of the case, noting as I do so that these have never been the subject of dispute. a

[7] The appellant entered the UK on 11 September 1990 on a visa valid for only 24 hours. In 1996 she met Mr Okadiegbo, an accountant by profession. He had just been naturalised and, as she knew, was a married man with three children, the eldest, Michael, being profoundly deaf. The appellant and Mr Okadiegbo planned a family and began to spend virtually every weekend together. After miscarrying several times in 1997 and 1998, on 29 May 1999 she bore him a son; and on 11 October 2000, a daughter. He supports the family by giving her £200 per week for her council house rent and for the children's upkeep. He also buys them clothes and toys. She herself works as a cleaner, claiming family allowance but no other benefits. The children see their father every Saturday without fail. The love between them is mutual. He telephones the appellant every day and sometimes sees her and the children during the week. Were the appellant and her children to be returned to Nigeria their relationship with Mr Okadiegbo would end. He could not and would not leave his marriage to live with the appellant. He loves all his five children equally. He feels particularly responsible for Michael. His wife is aware of his relationship with the appellant and has indicated that if he were ever to seek a divorce she would make it as difficult as possible for him to see the three children of the marriage. b

[8] Having recorded the facts essentially as I have just sought to summarise them, the adjudicator continued:

'38. The two children are maintained by Mr Okadiegbo in the United Kingdom, but more importantly they appear to be dependent upon him emotionally as their father. He sees them regularly every week, at least once a week and is part of their lives. Even though they are still a tender age, he is a stable influence remaining in daily contact with them and their mother ... I find as a fact that there are substantial "family ties" in this case and these children should not suffer because their father is in a complicated position with his wife and three children from his marriage. e

39. Consequently I am satisfied that there would be an interference with the right to respect of private life and family life were the appellant and her children sent to Nigeria ...

42. I am conscious of the fact that the appellant has flouted immigration control and has had a relationship with a man who still lives with his wife and three children which has led to the birth of two children whilst her immigration status was uncertain. Against this I have to balance the facts of this particular case in terms of the interests of the appellant and her family. There is clearly a balance of public interest and private interest to be considered. g

43. Having considered all of the evidence in this matter I find that it would be disproportionate in this particular instance to return the appellant to Nigeria together with her two dependent young children because of the severe effects which it would have upon the appellant and more particularly her two children who were born in the United Kingdom.' i

[9] I turn now to the IAT's determination by which it concluded, first, that the interference with family life involved in returning the appellant and her children to Nigeria flowed rather from the father's decision not to live with them there rather than the Secretary of State's decision to return them and, secondly, that in any event the removal of the appellant and her two children to Nigeria would be a proportionate. Let me at once set out the most directly relevant passages from the IAT's decision:

'19. ... [T]here is an interference if the children's father will not go to Nigeria but there is not if he is prepared to go. We do not accept in these circumstances that the interference follows automatically from the Secretary of State's decision; it follows naturally from the father's decision.

b 20. Given that what the adjudicator found were substantial family ties, she also found that there would be an interference of the right to private life and family life were the appellant and her children sent to Nigeria. This finding was only open to the adjudicator if she took no proper account of the father's choice, and we consider this was an error. We find on the particular facts of this unusual case that what would be the operative interference with family life in Nigeria is the father's choice to remain in the United Kingdom. Absent the father's decision, there is no free-standing insurmountable obstacle to family life in Nigeria ...

c 29. We differ from the adjudicator in her assessment of proportionality. In our view proportionality is not solely a question of fact, but is essentially a question of law, based on the facts.

d 30. In this particular case the applicant came to the United Kingdom illegally and has made an application for asylum which has failed. Late in the day she makes an application to stay on the basis of a potential breach of her human rights and at all stages she has known of the precarious nature of her immigration status.

e 31. There is no proper reasoning in the adjudicator's determination for the conclusion that the applicant's children's would be adversely affected by removal, but we accept what must be inherent in looking at the facts that the children would be going to a country where they were not born and have, we assume, never visited ...

f 33. There is a lack of any proper evidence before the adjudicator relating to the actual impact upon the children if they did have to live in Nigeria.

34. The family unit in question is not long-established in the United Kingdom.

g 35. We take the view that the removal of the applicant and her two children to Nigeria would be proportionate.'

[10] I turn now to the first issue arising here: what is the correct approach to an appeal under s 65 of the 1999 Act?

h [11] Clearly the starting point must be the statutory language in which the appeal jurisdiction is conferred on the adjudicator. So far as material s 65 provides:

j '(1) A person who alleges that an authority has, in taking any decision under the Immigration Acts relating to that person's entitlement to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, acted in breach of his human rights may appeal to an adjudicator against that decision ...

(2) For the purposes of this Part ... (b) an authority acts in breach of a person's human rights if he acts, or fails to act, in relation to that other person in a way which is made unlawful by section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998.

(3) Subsections (4) and (5) apply if, in proceedings before an adjudicator or the Immigration Appeal Tribunal on an appeal, a question arises as to whether an authority has, in taking any decision under the Immigration Acts relating to the appellant's entitlement to enter or remain in the United Kingdom ... acted in breach of the appellant's human rights ... a

(5) If the ... adjudicator, or the Tribunal, decides that the authority concerned ... (b) acted in breach of the appellant's human rights, the appeal may be allowed on that ground.'

[12] Section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 provides: b

'It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right.'

[13] Paragraph 21 of Sch 4 to the 1999 Act, under the heading 'Determination of Appeals', provides (so far as material): c

'(1) On an appeal to him under [the relevant Part], an adjudicator must allow the appeal if he considers—(a) that the decision or action against which the appeal is brought was not in accordance with the law or with any immigration rules applicable to the case, or (b) if the decision or action involved the exercise of a discretion by the Secretary of State or an officer, that the discretion should have been exercised differently, but otherwise must dismiss the appeal ... d

(3) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1), the adjudicator may review any determination of a question of fact on which the decision or action was based.'

[14] Paragraph 22(2) of Sch 4 provides that: e

'The Tribunal may affirm the determination or make any other determination which the adjudicator could have made.'

[15] The effect of these provisions taken together is that a person may appeal to the adjudicator in respect of an immigration decision which he alleges is incompatible with his convention rights and, if the adjudicator finds the alleged breach established, his appeal will be allowed, otherwise it will be dismissed. The fundamental question, therefore, is: does the decision under appeal infringe a convention right? f

[16] Latham LJ referred in his grant of permission to 'the starred appeal of Noruwu'—a decision of the IAT (no 00/TH/2345) (3 July 2001, unreported) (presided over by Mr Ockleton, the deputy president)). Rather, however, than attempt any prolonged examination of that rather difficult determination, I am able instead to turn immediately to a recent decision of Moses J in R (on the application of Ala) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 521 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 283 (Mar) which for my part I have found enormously helpful on the very question we are now addressing, the nature of the adjudicator's jurisdiction on a s 65 appeal. So helpful is it, indeed, that I propose to cite the relevant part of the judgment in its entirety, pausing only to note, first, that the proposal there was to remove the applicant to Germany under the Convention determining the State responsible for examining Applications for Asylum lodged in one of the Member States of the European Communities (Dublin; TS 72 (1997); Cm 3806) for the determination of his asylum claim (and any entry clearance application he might then make) and, secondly, that the challenge was in fact to the Secretary of State's decision to certify the alleged art 8 breach as manifestly unfounded under s 72(2)(a) of the 1999 Act: g a [37] ... If the only question is whether the balance between the need for effective immigration control and the undisputed family circumstances of a claimant should have been struck in favour of the claimant, is it open to an adjudicator to substitute his own decision for that of the Secretary of State?

b [38] The solution to the question is to be found, not in the nature of an adjudicator's jurisdiction but in the nature of the issue to be determined on appeal. The issue before an adjudicator would be whether the Secretary of State has acted in breach of the appellant's human rights (see s 65(3) and (5)(b) of the 1999 Act). In the instant case the statutory question posed to the adjudicator by s 65(2)(b), (3) and (5)(b) of the 1999 Act is whether the Secretary of State has, in ordering the removal of the claimant, acted in breach of the claimant's rights enshrined in art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

c [39] The Secretary of State's decision that the claimant should be returned to Germany for the determination of his asylum claim is an interference with his rights under art 8(1). There is no dispute but that the Secretary of State's decision was taken in pursuance of a legitimate aim, namely effective immigration control. The issue is whether the Secretary of State's decision was a proportionate response to the question whether such removal was justified in this particular case. The obligation upon the Secretary of State to act in a proportionate manner required him to strike a fair balance between the legitimate aim of immigration control and the claimant's rights under art 8. In R (on the application of Samaroo) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Sezek) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1139 at [24], [2001] UKHRR 1150 at [24]. Dyson LJ emphasised (at [26]):

f "The striking of a fair balance lies at the heart of proportionality. In Sporrong v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35 (para 69), the court said: "The court must determine whether a fair balance was struck between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental right ... The search for this balance is inherent in the whole of the Convention."

g [40] The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights recognises that art 8 affords the decision maker, the Secretary of State, a "discretionary area of judgment" in striking the balance fairly between the conflicting interests of a claimant's right to respect for family life and effective immigration control. The Court of Appeal cited (at [29]) with approval Thomas J's recognition of the discretionary area of judgment in the context of art 8. Dyson LJ said (at [35]):

h "... the function of the court in a case such as this is to decide whether the Secretary of State has struck the balance fairly between the conflicting interests of Mr Samaroo's right to respect of his family life on the one hand and the prevention of crime and disorder on the other. In reaching its decision the court must recognise and allow to the Secretary of State a discretionary area of judgment."

"In my judgment, in a case such as this, the Court should undoubtedly give a significant margin of discretion to the decision of the Secretary of State.

The convention right engaged is not absolute. The right to respect for family life is not regarded as a right which requires a high degree of constitutional protection. It is true that the issues are not technical as economic and social issues often are. But the court does not have expertise in judging how effective a deterrent is a policy of defaulting foreign nationals who have been convicted of serious drug trafficking offences once they have served their sentences.”

[41] It is true that this is not a case of deportation following a conviction (in Samaroo's case of drug offences). But it is a case where the Secretary of State is bound to be better placed to take a wider overall view as to what is needed to ensure that immigration control is effective.

[42] It must be recalled that in Samaroo's case the Court of Appeal was concerned, not with the appellate jurisdiction of an adjudicator but with the role of the court on an application for judicial review. The adjudicator is not exercising the residual jurisdiction of judicial review. Still less is he in the position of the European Court of Human Rights which affords member states a margin of appreciation when considering whether a high contracting party is in breach of its treaty obligations under the convention. The essential question is whether an adjudicator is entitled to substitute his own decision as to where the balance fairly lies.

[43] The answer is to be found, in my view, in the recognition, acknowledged both by the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Appeal, that the convention itself, in the context of art 8, affords the decision-maker, the Secretary of State, a discretionary area of judgment. The test of proportionality posed by art 8(2) is whether the decision-maker has struck a fair balance. That test is not affected by the concept of margin of appreciation to be applied by the European Court of Human Rights nor by the nature of the Administrative Court's jurisdiction. As Dyson LJ pointed out (at [24]):

“The court has clearly said that the issue for it is to determine whether the deportation struck a fair balance between the relevant interests. That is what proportionality requires. In my view, the margin of appreciation does not affect the nature of the test to be applied or the question to be asked.”

Similarly the question to be asked by an adjudicator, the test to be applied by him, in determining whether the Secretary of State has acted in breach of the claimant's rights under art 8, remains the same as the test to be deployed by the Administrative Court or the European Court of Human Rights itself.

[44] It is the convention itself and, in particular, the concept of proportionality which confers upon the decision-maker a margin of discretion in deciding where the balance should be struck between the interests of an individual and the interests of the community. A decision-maker may fairly reach one of two opposite conclusions, one in favour of a claimant the other in favour of his removal. Of neither could it be said that the balance had been struck unfairly. In such circumstances, the mere fact that an alternative but favourable decision could reasonably have been reached will not lead to the conclusion that the decision maker has acted in breach of the claimant's human rights. Such a breach will only occur where the decision is outwith the range of reasonable responses to the question as to where a fair balance lies between the conflicting interests.

a Once it is accepted that the balance could be struck fairly either way, the Secretary of State cannot be regarded as having infringed the claimant's art 8 rights by concluding that he should be removed.

b [45] So to conclude is not to categorise the adjudicator's appellate function as limited to review. It merely recognises that the decision of the Secretary of State in relation to art 8 cannot be said to have infringed the claimant's rights merely because a different view as to where the balance should fairly be struck might have been reached.

c [46] This is not a recognition of an exercise of a discretion by the Secretary of State within the meaning of para 21(1)(b) of Sch 4 to the 1999 Act. The ground of appeal under s 65 is not that the Secretary of State's discretion should have been exercised differently but that the Secretary of State has acted in breach of the claimant's human rights enshrined in art 8. The concept of a discretionary area of judgment describes no more than an area within which two reasonable albeit opposite conclusions may fairly be reached.

d [47] Accordingly I conclude that an adjudicator, on an appeal based upon art 8, where there is no issue of fact, is concerned only with the question whether the Secretary of State has struck a fair balance between the need for effective immigration control and the claimant's rights under art 8. In order to answer that question he is concerned only with the issue whether the decision of the Secretary of State is outwith the range of reasonable responses. This conclusion has the merit of support from a starred decision of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal in Noruwa v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (3 July 2001, unreported). There was much debate before me as to what appeared to be two conflicting paragraphs within that decision in paras 47 and 54. But it is plain from another decision, not cited before me in Baah [2002] UK IAT 05998 (para 39) chaired by the same deputy president, that the IAT's conclusion was the same as my own.

[17] I have already described the IAT's decision in Noruwa's case as somewhat difficult. The following brief citations will illustrate why:

g '47 ... So far as the human rights element of the claim is concerned, the appellate authority will be concerned with whether the decision is shown to have been one which was outside the range of permissible responses ...

h 54. If an appellant claims that a decision was disproportionate, that is a matter which he is entitled to bring to the appellate authority and which the authority must determine. In doing so the authority will examine all relevant material (going both to law and to the facts) and will reach its own conclusion. This is a genuine appeal, not merely a review of whether the respondent's conclusion on proportionality was open to him. If the authority reaches the conclusion that the decision was disproportionate, that is the end of the matter: the decision was unlawful and the appeal must be allowed ...

j 56. In particular, the fact that an argument based on proportionality has been raised and has failed (because the decision was not outside the allowable area of discretion) does not of itself allow an adjudicator or the tribunal to intervene in the exercise of a discretion. Nor does it of itself allow the adjudicator or the tribunal to substitute its own discretion for that of the respondent. That power only arises where the original decision involves the exercise of a discretion.'

[18] With regard to that final paragraph, the IAT had already stated in para 49, rightly to my mind: 'The issue of proportionality is a matter of judgment and balance, but not of itself a matter of discretion.'

[19] In so far as some tension may be thought to arise between paras 47 and 56 on the one hand and para 54 on the other, Mr Ockleton's view was subsequently made plain, as Moses J pointed out in the IAT's decision in Baah [2002] UK IAT 05998 (para 39):

'The question for us is whether or not the respondent's decision is lawful under s 6(1): that is to say whether it is proportionate. It is not open to us to substitute our own decision if the decision was within the allowable area of discretion allowed to the respondent.'

[20] For my part I find Moses J's analysis in R (on the application of Ala) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 521 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 283 (Mar) entirely convincing and in the result conclude that, in cases like the present where the essential facts are not in doubt or dispute, the adjudicator's task on a human rights appeal under s 65 is to determine whether the decision under appeal (ex hypothesi a decision unfavourable to the appellant) was properly one within the decision-maker's discretion, ie was a decision which could reasonably be regarded as proportionate and as striking a fair balance between the competing interests in play. If it was, then the adjudicator cannot characterise it as a decision 'not in accordance with the law' and so, even if he personally would have preferred the balance to have been struck differently (ie in the appellant's favour), he cannot substitute his preference for the decision in fact taken.

[21] In B v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2000] Imm AR 478 at 486 (para 36) Sedley LJ, giving the leading judgment in this court, said:

'I have no doubt that the Home Secretary's view that deportation was nevertheless merited was legitimately open to him ... But our public law ... now has to accommodate and give effect to the requirements of EU law and, through EU law [this was before the coming into force of the Human Rights Act 1998] of the European Convention. It means making up our own minds about the proportionality of a public law measure—not simply deciding whether the Home Secretary's or the Tribunal's view of it is lawful and rational.'

[22] I myself said (at 488 (para 47)):

'It was common ground before us that proportionality involves a question of law and that, on a statutory appeal of this nature, the court is required to form its own view on whether the test is satisfied, although, of course, in doing so it will give such deference to the Tribunal's decision as appropriately recognises their advantage in having heard the evidence. This task is, of course, both different from and more onerous than that undertaken by the court when applying the conventional Wednesbury approach [see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223]. It would not be proper for us to say that we disagree with the Tribunal's conclusion on proportionality but that, since there is clearly room for two views and their view cannot be stigmatised as irrational, we cannot interfere. Rather, if our view differs from the Tribunal's, then we are bound to say so and to allow the appeal, substituting our decision for theirs.'

a Ward LJ expressly agreed with both judgments.

[23] In Noruwa v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (3 July 2001, unreported) the IAT considered B's case in the light of three later Court of Appeal authorities concerning the judicial review of decisions by the Secretary of State to remove individuals from the United Kingdom: R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 840, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Isiko [2001] 1 FCR 633 and R (on the application of Samaroo) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Sezek) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1139, [2001] UKHRR 1150 (although the latter case had not by then reached the Court of Appeal) and concluded that B's case had proceeded on the basis of a concession and should not be followed in so far as it indicated that the question of proportionality was a question of law. For my part I now readily accept that it is unhelpful to characterise the question of proportionality as one of law and certainly the approach which we adopted in B's case appears to me irreconcilable with that which by the terms of s 65 Parliament has now dictated independent appellate authorities must take towards appeals from removal directions made by the Secretary of State and his officers. It is perhaps worth pointing out that B's case was decided at a time when, under s 15(1)(a) and (7)(a) of the Immigration Act 1971, a decision to deport, as there, on the ground that such deportation was conducive to the public good was appealable directly to the IAT on the merits.

[24] Having resolved the first issue in favour of the respondent I turn now to the second question arising on the appeal: was the IAT entitled on the facts of this case to have regarded the Secretary of State's decision to return the appellant and her children to Nigeria as striking a fair balance between the competing interests in play?

[25] This question I can deal with altogether more briefly. In my judgment it was not. Although the IAT allowed the appeal against the adjudicator's decision on two separate grounds, Mr Underwood QC very fairly recognises that neither ground is sustainable, at any rate by reference to the reasoning given. That the removal of the appellant and her children to Nigeria would interfere with their art 8(1) rights is surely plain and indisputable and Mr Underwood does not seek to support the approach taken in paras 19 and 20 of the IAT's determination (see [9], above). As for the IAT's view that removal here would be proportionate, the tribunal seems to have allowed the appeal from the adjudicator's contrary view on the basis (see para 31 of its determination) that '[t]here is no proper reasoning in the adjudicator's determination for the conclusion that the applicant's children would be adversely affected by removal'. I simply cannot follow that reasoning. On the contrary, the adjudicator seems to me to have explained perfectly plainly how the children would be adversely affected: they are 'emotionally dependent' upon their father who provides 'a stable influence' in their lives; if sent to Nigeria they would be permanently deprived of his love and support. What clearer or more convincing reasoning could one have for not imposing this separation upon them?

[26] I recognise, of course, the flagrancy of the appellant's breach of immigration control and the precariousness of her presence in the UK whilst she was creating this new 'family'. So too did the adjudicator: see para 42 of her determination set out at [8], above. I recognise also the need for effective immigration control. In the highly unusual circumstances of this case, however, it seems to me that there really is only room for one view as to how the balance between these competing interests should be struck and that is the view taken by the adjudicator who, of course, heard all the evidence in the case.

[27] Mr Kadri QC asked rhetorically during the course of his submissions on the first part of the case what was the point of having a right of appeal under s 65 if the appellate authorities' jurisdiction is as relatively restricted as Moses J found in R (on the application of Ala) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 521 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 283 (Mar) and as I for my part would hold it to be. The outcome to the present appeal surely provides the answer to that question. There will be occasions when it can properly be said that the decision reached by the Secretary of State was outside the range of permissible responses open to him, when in other words the balance struck by the Secretary of State is simply wrong. There may not be many such occasions but to my mind this certainly was one of them.

[28] I would accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decision of the IAT and reinstate that of the adjudicator.

London Borough Council
[2003] EWCA Civ 927

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
WARD, WALLER AND DYSON LJJ
6 MARCH, 4 JULY 2003

c Housing – Homeless person – Duty of housing authority to provide accommodation – Appeals procedure – Scope of discretion of housing authority to extend time for request for review of decision as to duty owed to applicant – Whether applicant entitled to make repeated applications for extension of time – Housing Act 1996, s 202(3).

d In response to an application by the claimant, under Pt VII of the Housing Act 1996, for housing assistance as a homeless person, the defendant local housing authority concluded that she was intentionally homeless on the basis of eviction for persistent rent arrears (the initial decision). Under s 202^a of the 1996 Act, the claimant had the right to request a review of that decision. Subsection (3) provided that such a request had to be made within 21 days or such longer period as the authority might allow. The claimant made no request for a review within the 21-day period, but some months later made a formal request
e for an extension of time for a review. After that request was rejected, she made a request for a further review of the initial decision, relying on a medical report which concluded that she had not made herself intentionally homeless because her disturbed mental state had rendered her unable to manage her affairs in any meaningful way. The authority rejected that request, stating, inter alia, that f the new material had not persuaded it that any review would have good prospects of success. The claimant sought permission to apply for judicial review of that decision, but the judge refused permission. She applied to the Court of Appeal for permission to appeal, contending, inter alia, that the officer charged with deciding whether to extend time should only have regard to whether new information was material. In dealing with that submission, the Court of Appeal g considered the scope of an authority's discretion, under s 202(3), to extend time for review. It also considered whether the claimant had been entitled to make repeated applications for an extension of time.

h Held – (1) The discretion to extend time for a review conferred by s 202(3) of the 1996 Act was unfettered in the sense that Parliament had not stipulated, as it often did, the factors to be taken into account in the exercise of the discretion which it conferred. In the absence of such a statutory checklist, the discretion was wide, but it could only be validly exercised for reasons relevant to the achievement of the purpose which the discretion was intended to serve. In j Pt VII of the 1996 Act, Parliament had laid down a clear scheme which provided the means of ensuring that a local housing authority fulfilled its duty to homeless persons. The purpose was, therefore, to lay down the procedures and time limits to enable the orderly management by the authority of its precious supply of housing, but also to enable it, if appropriate, to grant an indulgence to the homeless person on as important a matter as his or her housing, where a claim for review might be deserving enough to override the failure to act in time, and so keep the door open for further assistance. Even though the length of the delay and reasons for it were often balanced against the prospect of success, it was possible to envisage circumstances in which an authority could rationally and properly conclude that even a short delay for which there was a good explanation was not good enough to justify an extension of time for a review. Conversely, the authority could rationally and properly decide to grant an extension of time where there had been a long delay for which no explanation had been provided. Delay and prospects of success did not always have to be balanced against each other. An authority was entitled to reach a decision without forming a provisional view of the underlying merits of the case if, in all the circumstances, it thought it reasonable to do so. Given the wide ambit of the discretion, the decision of the authority in the instant case could not be impugned on the basis that no authority, acting reasonably, could have taken the prospects of success to be a relevant and appropriate factor for their consideration, nor was the decision perverse or irrational (see [46], [48], [49], [51], [52], below).

(2) A housing authority was not bound to entertain a succession of applications for review or for extensions of time for review given that Parliament had circumscribed the applicant's right to seek them, but it could choose to entertain such requests as a matter of its discretion. That extra-statutory discretion, however, was likely to be held to be close to absolute. In so far as the local authority in the instant case had been exercising such a discretion, it was even further beyond challenge by judicial review than a decision taken under s 202(3) of the 1996 Act. Accordingly, though permission to appeal would be granted, the appeal itself would be dismissed (see [36], [59], [60], below); R v Westminster City Council, ex p Ellioua (1998) 31 HLR 440 and Demetri v Westminster City Council [2000] 1 WLR 772 applied.

Application for permission to appeal

- b The claimant, C, applied for permission to appeal from the decision of Maurice Kay J on 12 August 2002 refusing her permission to apply for judicial review of the decision of the defendant local housing authority, Lewisham London Borough Council, on 4 March 2002 declining to exercise its discretion to extend time for her to request a review of the authority's decision of 24 January 2001 that she was intentionally homeless. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Cur adv vult

- d 4 July 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

WARD LJ.

[1] This is the judgment of the court to which each of the members of the court has contributed.

- e THE CLAIMANT'S UNHAPPY CIRCUMSTANCES

- [2] The claimant whom we shall identify under her initials, MC, is a young woman aged 24 years. She has had a sad and troubled life. When aged only 15 she was forced by a boyfriend to have sexual intercourse with him against her will. It was a traumatic event. It was compounded about a year later when she suffered a brutal attack at the hands of a so-called family friend who raped her in her parents' home. This time the police were involved but she was too unwell to give evidence. She had begun to suffer depression and in May 1996 attempted suicide by taking an overdose of paracetamol leading to her admission to the Lewisham Hospital as a result. She received some psychiatric care but only for a short period. All of these events led to a deterioration of her relationship with her parents and she determined to leave home.

- g [3] Thus it was that in about August 1997 the respondent local authority granted her a tenancy of a bed-sit flat in Catford, London SE6. Arrears of rent began to build up during the first year of that tenancy. From time to time she was in employment but it was not regular. She was unable to pay her gas, electricity and telephone bills and incurred debt to catalogue companies. When not employed she failed to claim housing benefit and the arrears began to grow and she was warned that the local authority would be forced to serve notice seeking possession but she took no action upon that warning.

- j [4] Meanwhile in 1998 she had met a young man and hoped to have a stable relationship with him. When she became pregnant, he left her and she was very distressed. During this time attempts were made to resolve the housing problem but all efforts made by the local authority came to nought because the claimant failed to attend meetings and failed to comply with arrangements to pay her rent. Eventually proceedings were taken against her in the county court leading to a suspended order for possession being made in February 1999 but she failed to make the rent payments and payments towards arrears which the court ordered.

[5] Her baby was born on 22 September 1999. At the end of November 1999 she was given a date for eviction which was postponed to give her a last opportunity to submit claims for income support and housing benefit. She did not do so and on 13 April 2000 she was evicted from her flat. a

[6] Initially she stayed with her parents then moved in with a sister. Eventually she was granted accommodation at a hostel with a mother and baby unit where she prospered. b

[7] She applied under Pt VII of the Housing Act 1996 as a homeless person and the local authority embarked upon their statutory duty to make such inquiries as were necessary to satisfy themselves whether she was eligible for assistance. c

[8] Nearly a year had elapsed after her eviction when on 24 January 2001 the Homeless Persons Unit of the London Borough of Lewisham informed the applicant in writing that they had concluded that she was eligible for assistance and had priority need but concluded under s 191 of the 1996 Act that she had become homeless intentionally. In coming to that conclusion the acting senior housing adviser wrote: d

‘I have taken into consideration other information you provided about your well-being, you stated that you were drinking and that you were suffering depression. Investigations have shown that there is no evidence that you were depressed or being treated for this and there is no evidence to suggest that your overdose was a suicide attempt. By your own mitigation you did not seek any treatment for your drinking problem and you stated that this is where your money was being spent, again on investigation we have no evidence of your alcohol problem. You also stated that you were raped, while I appreciate this traumatic assault on you must have been devastating, all of this took place when you were 16 years old in 1994, well before your being given a tenancy, and at the time of the rape you were referred for counselling and to the Child Guidance Unit of which you never kept to the appointment. Your case has now been concluded that you are intentionally homeless ... on the basis of eviction for persistent rent arrears. This is seen to be a deliberate act, and causation of homelessness.’ e

The letter concluded: f

‘You have the right to request a review of this decision. If you wish to do so, please forward your appeal or representations in writing to the Advice Service Manager Mr Peter Jones within 21 days of this notification stating your reasons for requesting a review.’ g

[9] The applicant was vague as to her response to that letter and it is not at all clear what approaches she made to the local authority or what she said when she did approach them. She did see her general practitioner who wrote a letter dated 8 February 2001 setting out the history of the two assaults upon her and saying: h

‘Since then she has been more vulnerable and emotionally labile. From the records I can see that on 13th May 1996 she attend Casualty at Lewisham Hospital having taken an overdose of Paracetamol tablets. The blood test did show an abnormal level of Paracetamol and therefore she was kept under observation and given a follow up appointment later on and was also referred to see a psychiatrist for her emotional problems. Both these j a incidents have left a scar on her life and periodically she gets depressed and a feeling of guilt complex. I do not think she will ever recover fully to her normal self.'

b For some reason or other, possibly lack of money to pay the doctor's fee, she did not collect that report for months. On 25 April she wrote to Mr Jones sending him a copy of that letter and asking to make an urgent appointment 'to see you as my situation is now desperate'. For one reason or another it took until 16 July for her to attend on the Homeless Persons Unit seeking help because she had been asked to leave her parents' home. Her plea for help, which was treated as a fresh application for housing assistance, not a review, was rejected.

c [10] In their letter dated 18 July 2001 the local authority explained:

d 'During the interview you were advised that since the date of your initial application and our decision letter dated 24th January 2001 there has been no material change to your circumstances as the information you provided had already been assessed in your homeless application of 10th April 2000 neither had there been any intervening period of settled accommodation therefore the original decision still stood. Your decision letter advised you of your right to request a review within 21 days from the date of that letter however, you did not exercise your right to a review within the time period advised. You were advised at our interview that as the homelessness service were unable to assist that you should contact the Children and Families Team within the Social Services Department for further assistance ... Please be advised that at this time the Homelessness Unit cannot be of any further assistance.'

f [11] The applicant consulted solicitors and they wrote on her behalf on 31 August 2001 making a formal request to extend the time for a review of the decision of 24 January 2001 on the ground that her age and mental state were such that she was not able properly to deal with her affairs such as completing housing benefit claim forms. In that letter the solicitors explained that the applicant was still unwell and extremely vulnerable, having 'great difficulty in coping with everyday life'. Her failure to explain the lapse in time between her consulting her general practitioner and forwarding his report to the local authority was said to show that her inability to deal with matters was continuing. The solicitors reserved the right to submit further medical evidence once notified that the council agreed to an out-of-time review. No doubt with that in mind they also arranged an appointment for her with Dr Michael Browne, a consultant psychiatrist.

h THE CLAIM FOR JUDICIAL REVIEW AND THE UNUSUAL ENSUING EVENTS

[12] On 18 October 2001 the claimant issued her claim for judicial review. The nature of her challenge was expressed to be against—

j 'the decision of the respondent dated 18 July 2001 not to extend the time limit for the applicant to request a review of the respondent's decision dated 24 January 2001 that she is intentionally homeless (pursuant to s 191 of the Housing Act 1996), pursuant to its power to do so, s 202(3) of the 1996 Act.'

[13] The local authority eventually responded to the applicant's solicitor's letter of 31 August. There is confusion about the date of that response which inexplicably is sometimes referred to as having been dated 15 October, and sometimes as dated 25 October 2001, even though the copy before us bears the date 'November 9'. In it Mr Jones wrote:

'I have now gone through the papers and given fresh consideration to the matters raised in your letter of 31st August, and I regret to inform you that the authority here will not be conducting a review out of time of the decision of 24th January 2001, and adheres to the view expressed in the letter of 18th July 2001 that the authority has discharged its duty to Ms C., and is under no further duty, either to make enquiries, or to review the original decision in your client's current circumstances.'

Several reasons were given. The first was that there was no proper explanation for the delay in requesting a review and no proper explanation for the delay in not submitting the further medical report until 25 April. Secondly Mr Jones explained that their own inquiries made of the applicant's case did not support her contentions. Consideration was given to the general practitioner's letter—

'but it is in no way compelling evidence that Ms C has problems attending to the administrative affairs in her life. Given the events that occurred in Ms C's teens, I would have thought it self evident that Ms C may not "recover fully to her normal self", but there is no causal link drawn between these events and an inability to cope with financial and administrative matters, and the doctor's letter does not link these matters in any way.'

[14] On 2 January 2002 Mr Jack Beatson QC sitting as an additional judge of the High Court dismissed the application for permission to apply for judicial review of 18 July decision observing that:

'No arguable case that Lewisham's decision not to extend the time limit for the claimant to request a review of its decision that she was intentionally homeless is impugnable on public law grounds.'

On the next day the applicant sought an oral hearing and the matter was listed for 11 February 2002.

[15] On 24 January 2002 the applicant's solicitors wrote to the legal department of the local authority enclosing a copy of the report prepared by Dr Browne. This report had in fact been written three months earlier on 19 October 2001. He recounted the history he had taken from the applicant. He expressed the opinion that:

'This young woman though not mentally ill in the clinical or formal sense has in my opinion quite significant personality problems in that she is unusually anxious and to some extent unstable. Some of these problems undoubtedly stem from the two unfortunate episodes related above, i.e. the two rapes. It seems fair to say that these have cast a dark shadow on her life and have caused a psychiatric/psychological mental state amounting to something near to post-traumatic stress disorder. It is my opinion that this led to her leading a disjointed and chaotic lifestyle during which she drank to excess and because of which she was unable to think straight and to keep her affairs in order ... As a result of my examination and having thought carefully about the matter, I am of the opinion that this young woman did not make herself intentionally homeless as alleged by Lewisham Council.'

a I believe that her disturbed mental state rendered her unable to manage her affairs in any meaningful way over that period.'

b The solicitors emphasised the causal link between her psychiatric/psychological problems and her inability to manage her own affairs. The applicant's solicitors wrote formally to request a review of the decision of 24 January 2001 'in the light of the new evidence provided, i.e. Doctor Browne's report'. They invited the local authority to treat it either as a review under s 202 of the 1996 Act or as a new application. They wrote: 'If your clients are prepared to agree to the above course of action, we are instructed to agree to withdraw the application for judicial review with no order for costs.'

c [16] The legal department wrote the next day, 25 January 2002 that the housing department would consider the report but that their initial response was that the fresh evidence did not justify a fresh application. They observed that the evidence did not seem to touch the decision under review, namely that of 18 July, because Dr Browne gave no particular information about the applicant's state of mind after the January decision and leading up to the July decision. In any event d it was said that the history had already been taken into consideration. There was some challenge to Dr Browne's expertise as to what does or does not constitute 'intentionality' for the purposes of the homelessness rules and they sought further information about this.

e [17] Ms C's solicitors' response is interesting in the light of the submissions developed before us. They wrote on 1 February 2002:

f 'In our submission the two most important factors that a local authority should have regard to when considering the exercise of their discretion whether to permit an out of time review are (i) the merits of the original decision, having regard to the degree to which it is undermined by any fresh evidence/representations, and (ii) the reasons why the conducting of a review was not agreed within the 21 day time period.'

g They expressed the view that Dr Browne's report constituted fresh evidence of sufficient probity to cast serious doubt over the local authority's decision of 24 January 2001, especially because it did establish the causal link between the loss of the accommodation and her psychological problems.

[18] The applicant then amended her claim to add a challenge to the decision of '25th October 2001' and to suggest that the letter of 25 January 2002 was reviewable on the basis that it was an omission to take a relevant decision.

h [19] It was that amended application which came before Maurice Kay J on the afternoon of 11 February and for some 20 minutes on the following morning. In his skeleton argument on behalf of the applicant, Mr Jamie Burton submitted as follows:

j '25. Under s 202(3) of the Housing Act 1996 the respondent has a discretion to extend the time for requesting a review of a decision beyond 21 days. When exercising its discretion the authority must take account of all material considerations and must not act irrationally.

26. It is submitted that when considering a request for a late review a local authority should have regard to both: (i) the reasons why the review request has been made out of time; and (ii) the merits of the applicant's case in relation to the validity of the decision under review, having regard to any further representations/evidence the applicant may or may not provide.

27. Furthermore it is submitted that where the challenge on the merits is strong the lesser the requirement that any delay in requesting a review be incurred reasonably, as the authority should be loath to permit a clearly erroneous decision to stand. Equally where the explanation for any delay is suitably exculpatory then the merits should not overly concern the authority as prima facie every applicant has the right to a review of the decision irrespective of the merits.' a

Mr Ranjit Bhowe submitted in his written argument that s 202(3) created a very broad procedural discretion and save for the most obvious of cases the court should not intervene (cf R v Brighton and Hove BC, ex p Nacion (1999) 11 Admin LR 472). He also dealt with the amended case that no decision had been taken in response to the request of 24 January 2002 and he submitted: b

'13. It is accepted (for the purposes of this application) that where a local authority has decided not to extend time under s 202(3) it may nevertheless be called upon to reconsider that decision, in the light of further representations made. Any challenge to its decision would be a matter for this court, but again on grounds of perversity (assessed in the light of the fact that it had already fully considered the s 202(3) exercise).' c

He went on, however, to set out on his client's express instructions, the reasons why the council did not consider that the report of Dr Browne should cause it to conclude any differently on whether or not to extend time and he set out their thinking. d

[20] On 12 February 2002 Maurice Kay J ordered that: e

'(i) Permission be refused in relation to the decisions of 18 July 2001 and 15 October. (ii) Deferred consideration of the local authority's position post Dr Browne's report for 28 days. (iii) The local authority reach and formulate its decision and provide reasons for it within 21 days. (iv) At the end of the 28-day period written submissions should be sent to Maurice Kay J at this court confined to the issue of whatever is decided and reasoned. Written submissions to begin with the counsel for the claimant putting in writing what he has to say about the situation followed within 48 hours by submissions from counsel for the defendant.' f

We have no transcript of those proceedings and no transcript of the judgment. What is significant, however, is the fact that there is no appeal against that order and there is, thus, no longer any challenge to the decision either of 18 July or of 15/25 October 2001. g

[21] The local authority duly considered the request made to them in the light of Dr Browne's report. On 4 March 2002 Mr Jones wrote: h

'As stated at the hearing, having considered all of the new material presented, the council is not willing to reverse its decision not to extend the time within which Ms C might seek a s. 202 review of the original decision of 24th January 2001 that Ms C is intentionally homeless. Nor is the council willing to undertake any other sort of extra statutory review. Many of the reasons for my conclusion are set out in the council's skeleton argument, which was compiled on my instructions. However for the purposes of completeness I set out my reasoning in full which should be read in conjunction with my first decision not to extend time of 25th October 2001.' i

a 'I remain of the view that no proper explanation has been provided for the failure to seek a review, nor the failure to supply [the general practitioner's] letter until 25th April 2001 (when on Ms C's account she had it in early March 2001). I have approached your request by seeing whether any of the new matters put forward are sufficiently compelling in your client's favour to b 'suggest any review would have a good chance of success and that that should take precedence over my conclusion of there being no good reason for the failure to review in time. I have first considered the report of Doctor Browne. I do not find the report particularly compelling. I have found it to be generalised, non-date specific, and based almost entirely on what Ms C c has told him.'

He went on to point out that the relevant period was when the rent arrears arose, principally in 1999 to April 2000. He took the view that whereas incapacity, for example old age, mental illness or handicap, would be a good reason that word suggested that more was required than 'being simply depressed or having difficulties coping. The test is a high one'. He pointed out Dr Browne did not
d focus on the particular periods during which the arrears arose. He agreed that the applicant was having 'a very difficult time' in the aftermath of the assaults upon her leading to her being admitted to hospital in May 1996 but he pointed out that was more than a year before the tenancy was even granted. He pointed out that she did pay the rent from time to time and that things really e began to go wrong only in 1999. She obtained housing benefit and had to hold down employment for long periods suggesting some ability to manage her affairs. He concluded:

f 'Overall, in assessing the merits aspect of this decision, nothing that Doctor Browne has said causes me to consider that any review would have good prospects of success. Whilst I would naturally have regard to his report on any review, the amount of weight to be placed upon it would be limited. I also note that he does not deal with Ms C's mental state in the period when she should have applied for the review, or put forward any opinion to explain her failure.'

g [23] He went on to deal with detailed complaints about her earnings and her ability to pay the rent. He pointed out that the council had contacted her GP but was referred to his partner in his absence on holiday. The council had also telephoned Lewisham Hospital. In the result:

h 'Overall, I regret to inform you that I stand by my decision of 25th October 2001. I do not consider that anything you have now put forward should cause me to reach a different conclusion. I continue to conclude that the original s. 184 decision was correct, and that any review as might take place would not stand a good prospect of success. Indeed, even if I had concluded that there were good prospects I would still have borne very much in mind
j the wholesale failure to review in time, the delay there had been, and the fact that I have already once given the application for extension a full consideration. Therefore I decline to exercise my discretion in your client's favour.'

[24] As directed by the judge, Mr Jamie Burton put in further lengthy submissions to counter each of the reasons given by the local authority for example as to her late request for a review of the January 2001 decision, the calculation in her earnings and the criticisms made of Dr Browne's report. As to the approach taken by the local authority counsel submitted that: a '... medical evidence stating that C was incapable of managing her affairs presents a prima facie case that she was so incapable and can only be rejected by reference to other medical evidence and reasons why it is preferable to that disclosed by C ... Therefore in the absence of evidence which contradicts that of Dr Browne it is not open to D to lawfully conclude that C would not have strong prospects of success on a review.' b

[25] In addition to advancing his submissions on the decision letter, Mr Burton sought to introduce fresh evidence from Dr Browne set out in a report dated 14 March 2002. In that skeleton argument Mr Burton said: c

'In order to assist the defendant reach the correct decision on the merits of the claimant's request the claimant has been to see Dr Browne for a second time in order that he could address some of the concerns raised by the defendant in its decision letter. He has produced a report dated 14 March 2002. Had these issues been explored within the defendant's duty to conduct inquiries pursuant to s 184 of the Housing Act 1996 then it is submitted that its concerns would have been met in this way, namely by further reference to the opinion of Dr Browne.' d

In that report he dealt with her difficulties over the whole period saying among other things: e

'Irrespective of whether she worked or not, it remains a fact in my opinion that she has instabilities and frailties of personality which surfaced over the period in question and which make her clearly in my eyes a person in need of help with her daily affairs ... Again, in the period in early 2001, when she was late in making an appeal, the information I have is that this was due to her state of acute distress due to losing her place in a hostel but more importantly as a reflection of her enduring frail mental capacity to deal with such crises.' f

[26] In his response Mr Ranjit Bhowse set out 'the relevant principles' as follows: g

'6. The defendant continues to rely on the submissions made in the skeleton argument (dated 11 February 2002) at paras 2–6, which demonstrate that the discretion to consider a review out of time is a procedural discretion of exceptional width, the exercise of which this court should very rarely intervene in. So long as there is some consideration of material factors, any decision is unimpeachable (save on Wednesbury grounds) [see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223]. h

7. Furthermore, this court, in assessing the lawfulness of the defendant's (second) decision not to extend time, is not conducting for itself any s 202 review. Nor is it required to analyse whether the original s 184 determination was flawed in the Lumley sense. That, however, is precisely what the claimant's further submissions invite the court to do. j

8. In reality it would really only be if this court concluded—on a perusal of the papers—that (i) any review was highly likely to succeed and (ii) the a reasons for not seeking a review were entirely explicable, that it might intervene. That is not this case.'

[27] We add the emphasis because Mr Bhose was anxious to point out that he was not suggesting that the test to be applied was that (i) the review had to be highly likely to succeed or (ii) the reason had to be explicable. As the discretion was wide and unfettered, it was only in those circumstances that the court would b interfere with the decision.

[28] As for Dr Browne's further report Mr Bhose said:

'The defendant has not considered the further report of Dr Browne, and nor should the court. The defendant's position on her further application for an extension of time is as set out in the letter of 4 March 2002. There must come a time when there is some finality to litigation, and a finality to what c the defendant may, in its discretion need to consider. That time has been reached.'

[29] On 12 August 2002 Maurice Kay J gave his reasons in writing as follows:

d 'I have considered the written submissions of the parties in relation to the decision of London Borough of Lewisham set out in the letter dated 4 March 2002. I refuse permission to apply for judicial review. When I deferred further consideration of 12 February 2002 it was solely to enable Lewisham to provide a reasoned decision in writing. That they have done, and, in my e view, it is not arguably susceptible to challenge. In this application, which I have allowed to extend beyond the date of the lodging of the claim form, I am not willing to extend it further to embrace evidence subsequent to 4 March 2002. Essentially, I am refusing permission in relation to the decision of 4 March 2002 for the reasons set out in the respondent's written submissions which were received in the Administrative Court office on 19
f March 2002.'

THE APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION TO APPEAL

[30] When rejecting the application for permission to appeal on paper, Buxton LJ said:

g 'The judge was concerned with the standard to be applied by the court before it intervenes in a procedural decision by the local authority involving a high degree of discretion in relation to a matter in respect of which the applicant is in mercy. He was right to accept a demanding standard in relation to prospects of success, not least in order to avoid investigation of a h preliminary and procedural issue degenerating into a trial of the original decision. The council's ruling on the application for an extension could have been different, but it cannot be said that it was not open to it on the material.
It was also open to it to refuse to take into account the second report of Dr Browne in view of the time at which it was filed. No separate point arises under the convention. Article 6 of the European Convention for the j Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) provides for reasonable procedural control of access to the court or tribunal, provided it is exercised in a judicial manner, which condition was fulfilled here.'

[31] On renewing the application for permission before Mummery and Rix LJ, Mr Burton submitted that there was an error of law by the council in requiring that the review requested out of time should have a 'good prospect of success'. His submission, which was illustrated by reference to a number of authorities, was that there was a lower threshold test for the exercise of that discretion, a test which Mr Burton described as that of 'materiality'. Material matters were put forward for the consideration of the council, which had previously not received consideration. He also submitted the decision was Wednesbury unreasonable. Mummery LJ concluded that:

'... although I am not in a position to say that this application has a real prospect of success, I am satisfied that there is a matter here which should be argued before the full court. As Mr Burton pointed out, there has been no decided case on the exercise of this discretion. There is a possible point of principle as to what is the proper threshold for deciding whether or not to exercise the discretion.'

Rix LJ agreed and the matter was stood over for a hearing before us on notice to the respondent.

COUNSELS' SUBMISSIONS

[32] Mr Jan Luba QC now appears for the applicant and we are indebted to him as ever for his cogent submissions. His first and main submission is that the application raises an important issue which he defines in these terms:

'What is the correct approach to be taken by a local housing authority, in the exercise of its discretion, when presented with a request from a homeless person that it review an adverse original decision where (i) the 21-day period for seeking a review "as of right" under s 202(2) of the Housing Act 1996 has expired and (ii) the homeless person relies on new material relevant to an important issue in the original decision.'

We should add that a similar question arises in a third situation, which is the actual situation before us, namely where the homeless person makes a further request for a review of the original decision out of time, his or her first request under s 202(3) already having been refused.

[33] Mr Luba submits in summary that the exercise of discretion must be conducted in a principled way. He accepts that if the applicant is late and the nature of the request is that he or she wishes the original decision to be reconsidered on the same or essentially the same material, then it may well be an appropriate approach to require that (i) some good explanation for the delay is advanced and/or (ii) some plain or obvious error in the original decision be identified before an authority agrees to undertake the review. He submits, however, that the position is different where the applicant is submitting fresh evidence which 'shakes the foundation of' or even 'goes to' the original decision. Since a review is conducted by another officer under an established procedure which requires all the material before him to be considered afresh, it is wrong for whomsoever has to decide whether to extend time and permit that review to form any appraisal of the merit of the fresh evidence. The decision-maker must not usurp the function of the reviewer and must always bear in mind that the review will be conducted on the basis of any evidence including any further evidence that is then put before the reviewer. The sole test for the decision-maker is whether the fresh evidence is material to the original decision. The 1996 Act is there to protect the homeless and must be construed and implemented in a benign way.

a [34] As the second issue in the appeal he submits that if the approach of the decision-maker is held to be correct, his conclusion reached on the available material was perverse in the Wednesbury sense. The third and quite discrete issue is that the judge was wrong to reject Dr Browne's second report.

b [35] In response Mr Bhowse whose submissions were presented with equally admirable conciseness, argued that where the decision-maker had to decide whether or not to extend time for a review then it was always incumbent upon him or her to have regard on the one hand to the length of and reasons for the delay and, on the other hand, to the prospects of success of the review. He submits that there is a balance to be struck so that if delay is short and excusable, then the merits need not be great whereas if the delay is lengthy and inexcusable, then a good case on the merits needs to be established. As to the alternative submissions, he simply says the decision was well reasoned and the further report tendered far too late.

GRANTING PERMISSION TO APPEAL

d [36] Having heard those arguments for a day, we conclude that it is proper to grant permission to appeal and to deal with the appeal on the basis of those submissions.

THE STATUTORY BACKGROUND

e [37] The statutory framework imposed by Pt VII of the 1996 Act must be borne in mind. Section 184 places the local housing authority under a duty to make such inquiries as are necessary to satisfy themselves whether an applicant for housing assistance is eligible for that assistance and if so what duty if any is owed to him. Only a limited duty is owed to whomsoever has become homeless intentionally as defined in s 191 to be—

f 'if he deliberately does or fails to do anything in consequence of which he ceases to occupy accommodation which is available for his occupation and which it would have been reasonable for him to continue to occupy.'

g It was and is the applicant's case that her state of mind during the period of her tenancy had been such that her failure to pay her rent could not fairly be described as 'deliberate'.

h [38] Before the 1996 Act a dissatisfied applicant could either seek a judicial review of the unfavourable decision or invite the housing authority voluntarily to reconsider their earlier decision. As McCullough J observed in R v London Borough of Tower Hamlets, ex p Saber (1991) 24 HLR 611 at 621:

j 'It is not uncommon, after a decision has been reached that an applicant for housing under Part III of the Act became intentionally homeless, for a request to be made to reconsider the decision in the light of additional material or argument. Such a request is not the equivalent of a reapplication and does not cast on the housing authority the duties imposed when an application under Part III is made. It is otherwise if there has meanwhile been a material change of circumstances ... The housing authority has, however, a discretion to accede to the request. A decision not to reconsider the original decision is clearly reviewable on ordinary Wednesbury principles. I do not accept that some more stringent criteria (referred to in argument as super Wednesbury) can apply ... It may well therefore be that a challenge to a decision not to reconsider will infrequently succeed. Each case will of course fall to be considered on its own facts.’ a

[39] A plethora of applications for judicial review was no doubt perceived to be a mischief in need of cure. The 1996 Act for the first time provided by s 202 a statutory right to require an authority to review an earlier adverse decision. Section 202, so far as is material, provides as follows: b

‘(1) An applicant has the right to request a review of ... (b) any decision of a local housing authority as to what duty (if any) is owed to him ...

(2) There is no right to request a review of the decision reached on an earlier review.

(3) A request for review must be made before the end of the period of 21 c days beginning with the day on which he is notified of the authority’s decision or such longer period as the authority may in writing allow.

(4) On a request being duly made to them, the authority or authorities concerned shall review their decision.’

[40] Section 203 sets out the procedure on a review. It is prescribed by regulations and quite elaborate safeguards are in place to ensure that the dissatisfied applicant has a fair consideration of his or her review. The decision on the review must be reasoned and notified in writing which must include notice to the applicant of his right to appeal to a county court on a point of law and of the period within which such an appeal must be made. d

[41] Section 204 provides for that appeal as follows: e

‘(1) If an applicant who has requested a review under section 202—(a) is dissatisfied with the decision on the review, or (b) is not notified of the decision on the review within the time prescribed under section 203, he may appeal to the county court on any point of law arising from the decision or, f as the case may be, the original decision.’

(2) An appeal must be brought within 21 days of his being notified of the decision ...’

The full rigour of this stark time limit has been modified by an amendment made by the Homelessness Act 2002 which has inserted sub-s (2A) as follows: g

‘(2A) The court may give permission for an appeal to be brought after the end of the period allowed by subsection (2), but only if it is satisfied—
(a) where permission is sought before the end of that period, that there is a good reason for the applicant to be unable to bring the appeal in time; h
(b) where permission is sought after that time, that there was a good reason for the applicant’s failure to bring the appeal in time and for any delay in applying for permission ...’

[42] It is plain from the clear terms of s 202(4) that if the application for a review is made within the 21-day time limit, the applicant is entitled to the fresh j consideration of his or her case whether or not fresh evidence is available to bolster it, or whether or not there has been any material change in the circumstances since the decision was taken. The entitlement is for a fresh consideration by a more senior officer and it can bring advantages of an oral hearing and representation at it. It can be a significant protection for the homeless. h

- a [43] If the 21-day time limit has expired, then the applicant is at mercy and the local housing authority have a discretion whether or not to extend time. This appeal raises questions as to how that discretion was exercised.

THE MAIN ISSUE: EXERCISE OF A DISCRETION TO EXTEND TIME FOR REVIEW PURSUANT TO SECTION 202(3)

- b [44] Having posed the question for our consideration to be to rule on the proper approach to be taken by a local housing authority in exercising that discretion, Mr Luba submits that the discretion must be exercised in a principled way. We would agree, but that, of course, begs the question of what the proper principles are. One can say this with confidence. The decision must not be made in bad faith or capriciously for improper motives. The decision must not be taken only in rigidly defined situations since that would involve an unlawful fetter on the discretionary power given by the 1996 Act. The decision must be taken responsibly in furtherance of, and not in excess of, the statutory power having regard to the statutory purpose and policy. It must be taken reasonably as explained in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223.

- d [45] It is not necessary to go further than that. The questions before us boil down to (i) whether the decision-maker had regard to matters which were irrelevant and, (ii) whether, assuming the local housing authority have kept within the four corners of the matters they ought to have considered, they have come to a conclusion which was irrational or perverse being so unreasonable that no reasonable authority could ever have come to it.

- e [46] The discretion conferred by s 202(3) is unfettered in the sense that Parliament has not stipulated, as it often does, the factors to be taken into account in the exercise of the discretion which it confers. In the absence of such a statutory checklist, the discretion is wide. The question is: how wide? The answer is given by Lord Bridge of Harwich in Tower Hamlets London BC v Chetnik Developments Ltd [1988] 1 All ER 961 at 967, [1988] 1 AC 858 at 873:

- g 'Thus, before deciding whether a discretion has been exercised for good or bad reasons, the court must first construe the enactment by which the discretion is conferred. Some statutory discretions may be so wide that they can, for practical purposes, only be challenged if shown to have been exercised irrationally or in bad faith. But if the purpose which the discretion is intended to serve is clear, the discretion can only be validly exercised for reasons relevant to the achievement of that purpose.'

- h [47] That calls for an examination of Pt VII of the 1996 Act. The main building blocks of the statutory scheme are these. (1) The local housing authority must inquire into the application for housing assistance and must notify their decision in writing informing the applicant of his right to request a review and the time within which to seek it (see s 184(1), (3) and (5)). (2) If a review is requested in time and therefore 'duly made', a review must be afforded in accordance with the prescribed procedure (see ss 202(4) and 203). (3) If the request is not made within 21 days, then the local housing authority may allow a longer time (see s 202(3)) and, by inference, if time is extended, the authority must review their original decision. (4) The authority must inform the applicant of the decision, of his right of appeal and the time for the appeal (see s 203(4) and (5)). (5) There is an appeal but there is no right to request a review of an earlier review (see s 202(2)). (6) The right of appeal is given against the decision which was taken on the statutory review provided for by ss 202 and 203. (7) As originally devised, the appeal had to be brought within 21 days with no power to extend time but the 2002 amendment now gives the county court discretion to do so if good reason is shown for the failure to apply in time and for the ensuing delay. (8) The appeal is on a point of law only.

[48] It seems to us that Parliament was laying down a clear scheme which provided the means of ensuring that the local housing authority fulfils its duty to the homeless persons. The purpose was, therefore, to lay down the procedures and time limits to enable the orderly management by the local housing authority of its precious supply of housing but also to enable it, if it is appropriate, to grant an indulgence to the homeless person on as important a matter as his or her housing where a claim for review may be deserving enough to override the failure to act in time and so keep the door open for further assistance. Even within those parameters, one must always remember, as Lord Donaldson of Lynton MR said in R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex p Guinness plc [1989] 1 All ER 509 at 512, [1990] 1 QB 146 at 159:

‘Irrationality, at least in the sense of failing to take account of relevant factors or taking account of irrelevant factors, is a difficult concept in the context of a body which is itself charged with the duty of making a judgment on what is and what is not relevant, although clearly a theoretical scenario could be constructed in which the panel acted on the basis of considerations which on any view must have been irrelevant or ignored something which on any view must have been relevant.’

[49] When the decision-maker comes to balance the factors he is entitled to place in the scales, it is well settled, as Lord Keith of Kinkaid said in Tesco Stores Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 2 All ER 636 at 642, [1995] 1 WLR 759 at 764:

‘... it is entirely for the decision-maker to attribute to the relevant consideration such weight as he thinks fit, and the courts will not interfere unless he has acted unreasonably in the Wednesbury sense (see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223).’

Thus, even though the length of delay and reasons for it are often balanced against the prospect of success, it is possible to envisage circumstances in which an authority can rationally and properly conclude that even short delay for which there is a good explanation is not good enough to justify an extension of time for review. The authority might, for example, conclude that the case is so hopeless that a review would serve no useful purpose. Conversely, the authority could rationally and properly decide to grant an extension of time where there has been a long delay for which no explanation has been provided. Thus, the authority might take the view that the applicant has a powerful case on the merits and that it is able to take a relatively relaxed view when dealing with applications for an extension of time. Delay and prospects of success do not always have to be balanced against each other. An authority is entitled to reach a decision without forming a provisional view of the underlying merits of the case if, in all the circumstances, it thinks it reasonable for it to do so. It may, for example, reasonably take the view that, in the light of the length of the extension of time that is required and the poverty of the explanation, if any, for the delay, it can

- a reasonably and properly refuse the application without any consideration of the merits at all.

THE FACTORS TREATED AS RELEVANT TO THIS DECISION

- b [50] In our case the principal factors taken into account were twofold. First the lack of proper explanation both for the failure to seek a review in time and for the late supply of medical evidence. Mr Luba does not seek to suggest this was an improper factor to take into account. It was plainly a most relevant consideration. Secondly, and this is the subject of Mr Luba's attack, the new material was not thought to be sufficiently compelling to suggest a good chance of success. Mr Luba contends that since the decision on review is taken by a wholly different officer, the officer charged with deciding whether to extend time or not should only have regard to whether or not the new information was material. We reject this argument for three reasons. (1) Forming a provisional view of the eventual outcome of the case is a regular feature of the exercise of judicial discretion in allied circumstances and it cannot be unreasonable for an administrative discretion to treat prospects of success as a relevant consideration to be put into the scales before striking the ultimate balance. It may reasonably be thought to be a proper counterweight to delay. It may perfectly properly be thought to be important to assess whether the case sought to be advanced on review has no real prospects of success and is hopeless, or that it is arguable even if the prospect of success is less than 50%, or that it has a seriously good chance of prevailing. (2) The reasonableness of taking account of prospects of success is all the stronger given the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the decision-maker to determine the criteria by which he approaches his task. (3) The materiality of the fresh evidence can, therefore, perfectly reasonably be treated as an aspect of assessing the prospects of success. The decision-maker may bear in mind that if time is extended the ultimate decision is taken by another person in accordance with the regulated procedure for review but that does not mean that the decision-maker may not assess the strength of the case that will be laid before the reviewing officer if, in all the circumstances of the case, it is appropriate to do so.

- g [51] Given the wide ambit of discretion conferred on the local housing authority, we are, totally satisfied that the decision of 4 March 2002 cannot be impugned on the basis that no authority, acting reasonably, could have taken the prospects of success to be a relevant and appropriate factor for their consideration. Mr Luba's main submission must fail.

THE SECOND ISSUE: THE RATIONALITY OF THE DECISION TO REFUSE TO EXTEND TIME

- h [52] The decision reached by Mr Jones on 4 March 2002 was well and sufficiently reasoned and, given the wide scope he had for weighing matters in the scales he had to hold, and given our judgment that he did not have regard to irrelevant factors, the conclusion he reached was an eminently reasonable one. The argument that it was perverse or irrational is simply unsustainable.

j THE THIRD ISSUE: ADMITTING FRESH EVIDENCE

[53] Maurice Kay J was right to refuse to extend the indulgence of the court any further to embrace evidence subsequent to 4 March 2002 and in effect force the housing department to entertain a third application to extend time for review. There was no adequate explanation for the failure to produce Dr Browne's second report any earlier. It was too late to seek to introduce matters which in many cases were well over a year old. Too many bites had already been taken out of this cherry. Enough was enough. a [54] That might be enough to dispose of this appeal save that during the course of the argument it became apparent to us that s 202(3) of the 1996 Act might no longer be in play, in which case quite different considerations might prevail. It seemed to us arguable that the statutory scheme set out in Pt VII permitted only one application for review and only one application to extend time. b

EXTRA-STATUTORY DISCRETION

[55] Since the facts are quite complicated it is worth summarising what has happened. The s 184 decision was taken on 24 January 2001. The applicant failed to seek a review in time. Her July application was treated as a fresh application. She formally requested an extension of time for a review on 31 August but that was rejected on 15/25 October and the correctness of that decision is no longer challenged. That was the application to which s 202(3) applied. The letter of 24 January 2002 was a request for a further review of the January 2001 decision. That fell outside the statutory scheme. The decision taken on 4 March 2002 in response to that application has to be judged in that light. c
d

[56] If and in so far as the applicant was seeking to review the October decision as a decision 'reached on an earlier review', she had no right to do so (see s 202(2)). We accept, however, that a refusal to extend time might arguably be something different from a decision reached on an earlier review on the basis that the refusal to extend time has precluded any decision by way of review. Thus what she was seeking was a second chance to seek a review of the January 2001 decision. Although this is not expressly covered by s 202, we wondered in the course of the argument whether she was in fact entitled to make repeated applications for extensions of time. It was not a matter which counsel had come prepared to argue but we have been greatly assisted by Mr Luba's placing before us two decisions of this court which bear somewhat upon the point. e

[57] In R v Westminster City Council, ex p Ellioua (1998) 31 HLR 440, this court refused a renewed application to move for judicial review of a refusal by the local housing authority to conduct a review of their decision. There had been a full and proper review of the s 184 decision but no appeal against the decision taken on review. Instead the applicant on advice sought a further review of the original decision because it had been based on a mistaken view of the facts. Judge LJ held (at 444): g

'In my judgment the express exclusion [by s 202(2)] of any such right [to request a review of the decision reached on an earlier review] does not have the effect of precluding the authority from reconsidering the decision if it is minded to do so ... although it was open to the authority to do so, they were not required to carry out this further re-review, and they refused to accede to the application.' h

On the facts of that case he held that a judicial review based entirely on errors of law was inappropriate given the existing remedy of an appeal to the county court where the same errors could have been canvassed. Robert Walker and Peter Gibson LJ agreed. j

[58] In Demetri v Westminster City Council [2000] 1 WLR 772 the Court of Appeal was considering an appeal from the decision of the county court judge striking out the appeal made to him under s 204 of the 1996 Act. There, there had a been a review followed by a request to reconsider that decision taken on that review. The housing authority agreed to reconsider but then confirmed its previous decision. The unsuccessful applicant was out of the then strict 21-day time limit for appealing against the first review decision and so sought to appeal the reconsidered decision within time. Douglas Brown J held (at 778):

b ‘In my judgment, this appeal must fail. There is no doubt that a council in its discretion can decide to reconsider or review a review decision formerly given under section 202(1). This was an appropriate case for this council to do so where it was being represented to it that on the original review some material argument had not been considered.’

c He held, however, that the appeal to the county court lay only against the original decision made on review, not against the reconsideration of that decision.

[59] Whilst reminding ourselves that we have not heard full argument on these matters, we none the less feel able to say that we are in agreement with those judgments. It seems to us to follow that a housing authority is not bound to entertain a succession of applications for review or for extensions of time for review given that Parliament has circumscribed the applicant’s right to seek them. The scheme envisages only one review, or, if the 21-day time limit has expired, one application to extend time for review. That is not to say that a local authority may not choose as a matter of their discretion to entertain such a request for a further review or a further extension of time. This may be granted for sound pragmatic policy reasons to prevent the kind of roundabout applications to which Mr Luba referred, where the disappointed applicant simply goes to the neighbouring housing authority with the result that, if successful, the matter is referred back to the first authority. The authority may choose to reconsider matters of fact or new matters of fact which would lie outside the scope of an appeal to the county court. These are, however, decisions of good housing management and this extra-statutory discretion of the local housing authority is likely to be held to be close to being absolute. An attempt judicially to review a refusal to consider such a further indulgence is likely to receive the same treatment as was meted out in R v Brighton and Hove BC, ex p Nacion (1999) 11 Admin LR 472 at 475–476 where Tuckey LJ held:

h ‘It is only in a very exceptional case that there will really be any reasonable prospect of interesting the court by way of judicial review to interfere with the exercise of the very broad discretion which the council have, bearing in mind that they exercise it, knowing the circumstances of the applicants, the range and availability of accommodation in their area ...’

j Lord Woolf MR (at 477) was of like mind, saying: ‘... I have difficulty in envisaging cases where application for judicial review will be appropriate.’

[60] Upon a proper view of the facts this is exactly such a case. In so far as the local housing authority was exercising such an extra-statutory discretion—and Mr Jones contemplated that he was—he was fully entitled to cry, ‘Hold, enough’. In fact, as we have seen, he gave full reasons why his department was not prepared to accede to the request. This decision is even further beyond challenge by judicial review than a decision taken under s 202(3).

CONCLUSION

[61] We all have some sympathy for this unhappy young lady but we are bound to dismiss her appeal. So much time has passed since the crucial decision of 24 January 2001 that she may now perhaps be able to make a fresh application for assistance based upon her present circumstances. That, of course, is a matter between her and the housing department.

Permission to appeal granted, but appeal dismissed.

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
PETER GIBSON, TUCKEY LJ AND NELSON J
2 MAY, 17 JUNE 2003

c Costs – Order for costs – Indemnity costs – Power to award indemnity costs where defendant failing to beat claimant’s Pt 36 offer – Offer including terms as to costs – Offer waiving interest uplift on damages and costs – Whether part of Pt 36 offer relating to waiver to be taken into account when deciding whether judgment was more advantageous than proposals contained in offer – Whether refusal of offer attracting exercise of court’s discretion to make order on indemnity basis – CPR 36.21, 44.3.

d When judgment was given in the Court of Appeal awarding the claimant $US227,400 in a claim for damages (the court below having awarded only $US115,800), the claimant was awarded its costs of the trial on the indemnity basis and interest at 3% over the prime rate, in the light of two offers under CPR Pt 36 made before trial. It fell to be determined whether the court should accede to the claimant’s submission that, in the light of a third Pt 36 offer made before the hearing of the appeal, whereby the claimant offered to accept $US227,400 plus the costs of the trial on the indemnity basis but waiving any interest uplift on both the damages and the costs awarded, it should be awarded its costs of the appeal on the indemnity basis pursuant to CPR 36.21^a or, if that were inapplicable, pursuant to the court’s general discretion on costs under CPR 44.3.

e The claimant submitted that costs should be awarded on the indemnity basis under CPR 36.21 because the defendant had been held liable for more than the claimant had proposed in its third Pt 36 offer, or that it had secured a judgment which was more advantageous to it than its proposal in that offer, and that in each case the concession offered relating to interest represented a discount agreed to be about $US12,000 on the footing of the uplift of 3% over the prime rate.

f It further contended that an award of interest, unlike costs, related directly to the substantive liability claimed, and that the award of interest formed part of the measure of the claimant’s loss.

g

Held – (1) Although the award of interest formed part of the defendant’s liability in a way that the award of costs did not, the relevant concession offered by the claimant related solely to uplift interest, ie interest over the ordinary rate. The court could award uplift interest only if the conditions of CPR 36.21(1) were satisfied. Thus, while the provisions of Pt 36 expressly contemplated that a Pt 36 offer might include an offer as to interest, and while the court was directed by CPR 36.21(4) to make an order as to interest in accordance with CPR 36.21(2) unless it considered it unjust to do so, the draftsman of the rule could not have contemplated that uplift interest should be any part of the offer to be taken into account in determining the applicability of the rule (see [9], below); Mitchell v James [2003] 2 All ER 1064 applied.

a Rule 36.21 is set out at [4], below

(2) The court had a wide discretion under CPR 44.3, though that discretion had to be exercised taking account of the matters to which the court was required to have regard. The fact that the claimant had offered by a Pt 36 offer to accept as much as it was awarded was plainly an important factor, but so was the fact that the offer had been made on appeal, the court below having awarded a lesser sum. The defendant had not acted unreasonably in seeking to resist the appeal nor had its conduct of the appeal been in any way improper. The instant case was not one of those rare cases in which the refusal of a settlement offer would attract, under CPR Pt 44, not merely an adverse order for costs, but an order on the indemnity rather than the standard basis. Accordingly, the defendant would be directed to pay the claimant's costs of the appeal on the standard basis (see [12], [13], below); Kiam v MGN Ltd (No 2) [2002] 2 All ER 242 applied.

Application for costs

The appellants, Ali Reza-Delta Transport Co Ltd, applied for costs of their appeal following the award by the Court of Appeal on 2 May 2003 ([2003] EWCA Civ 684, [2003] 2 All ER (Comm) 269) of damages of $US227,400 in place of the original award of $US115,800 made against the respondents, United Arab Shipping Co SAG. Cur adv vult

17 June 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

PETER GIBSON LJ.

[1] When judgment was given in this court on 2 May 2003 ([2003] EWCA Civ 684, [2003] 2 All ER (Comm) 269) awarding the successful appellants $US227,400 in place of the judge's award of $US115,800, we were informed by Mr Karia for the appellants that they had made three Pt 36 offers. It is common ground that in the light of this court's judgment the appellants did better than both their first two offers made before trial, and accordingly this court awarded the appellants their costs of the trial on the indemnity basis and interest at 3% over the prime rate. The third offer was made on 10 March 2003, when the appellants offered to accept $US227,400 plus the costs of the trial on the a indemnity basis but waiving any interest uplift on both the damages and the costs awarded.

[2] The only question outstanding is whether this court should accede to the appellants' submission that it is on the indemnity basis that they should be awarded their costs of the appeal pursuant to CPR 36.21, or, if that is inapplicable, pursuant to r 44.3. That submission is opposed by the respondents.

b They say that this court should award the appellants their costs of the appeal on the standard basis.

[3] We drew the attention of counsel to the decision of this court in Mitchell v James [2002] EWCA Civ 997, [2003] 2 All ER 1064 and allowed them to make submissions in writing on the applicability, if any, of what was said in that case to the present case. This judgment is written in the light of the helpful written submissions which we have received from each side.

c [4] Rule 36.21 is in this form:

'Costs and other consequences where claimant does better than he proposed in his Part 36 offer

d (1) This rule applies where at trial—(a) a defendant is held liable for more; or (b) the judgment against a defendant is more advantageous to the claimant, than the proposals contained in a claimant's Part 36 offer.

e (2) The court may order interest on the whole or part of any sum of money (excluding interest) awarded to the claimant at a rate not exceeding 10% above base rate for some or all of the period starting with the latest date on which the defendant could have accepted the offer without needing the permission of the court.

f (3) The court may also order that the claimant is entitled to—(a) his costs on the indemnity basis from the latest date when the defendant could have accepted the offer without needing the permission of the court; and (b) interest on those costs at a rate not exceeding 10% above base rate.

(4) Where this rule applies, the court will make the orders referred to in paragraphs (2) and (3) unless it considers it unjust to do so.'

g [5] In Mitchell's case the relevant offer was one whereby the claimants offered to accept payment of a specified sum and, amongst other terms, each party was to bear his own costs. Park J had held at the end of the trial that the claimants' case succeeded and that the defendants should pay the claimants' costs. He further held that the requirements of r 36.21(1) were not satisfied and so he ordered costs to be paid on the standard basis. On appeal this court concluded that terms as to costs were not intended to be included in Pt 36 offers. In a judgment with which Potter LJ and Sir Murray Stuart-Smith agreed, Peter Gibson LJ gave the following reasons for that conclusion:

j '[30] First, r 36.14 is worded as applicable whenever a claimant's Pt 36 offer is accepted without needing the permission of the court. It does not say "unless a claimant's Part 36 offer indicates to the contrary" (r 36.22(1)) or other wording to indicate that the parties can agree otherwise. Similarly, para 7.2 of the Practice Direction indicates that on acceptance of the Pt 36 offer "the costs consequences set out in rule ... 36.14 will then come into effect." So too in a case where the court's permission is needed for the defendants to accept a Pt 36 offer, if permission is given, para 7.5 envisages that the court may order that the costs consequences set out in r 36.14 will apply. These provisions are inconsistent with a term as to costs being part of the Pt 36 offer. a

[31] Second, r 36.21 is applicable where at trial either a defendant is “held liable” for more, or “the judgment” against a defendant is more advantageous to the claimant, than the offer. The words “held liable” and “the judgment” both appear to me to connote what the trial judge holds or decides on the substantive issues in the case as distinct from the ancillary issue of costs to be determined after the substantive issues are decided. b
Mr Brunner accepted that that was so in relation to “held liable”, though not in relation to “judgment”. For my part, I cannot see why there should be such a difference.

[32] Third, the rule is intended to apply universally at the end of the trial when the judge is required to make an order for costs. Save in a case where the judge can make a summary assessment or the rare case where the costs at that point are agreed, there will have been no assessment of the costs, the figure for which would therefore be uncertain. Yet the rule contemplates that merely by reference to that for which the defendant is held liable or by reference to the judgment the judge will be able to decide whether r 36.21 c applies because the defendant has been held liable for more, or the judgment against a defendant is more advantageous, than the offer. I find it hard to believe that the draftsman contemplated that a Pt 36 offer is one which includes a term as to costs, so that the judge might have to evaluate the quantum of his costs order. That is normally the function of a costs judge, not the trial judge. d

[33] Fourth, there would be a real risk of abuse if a term as to costs could be included in a Pt 36 order. Every well-advised claimant would make a Pt 36 offer containing the terms sought in his claim plus an offer as to costs in the hope that if he succeeded in his substantive claim he would obtain indemnity costs in place of the ordinary award of costs on the standard e basis. Merely to win on his substantive claim and to obtain an order for costs under the general rule (see CPR 44.3(2)) will cause r 36.21 to be applicable, so that the court “will” make the orders referred to in r 36.21(2) and (3) unless it considers it unjust to do so. Injustice in the eyes of the court is therefore the only basis on which the court could refuse to make f an order for indemnity costs and interest. That does not confer a general discretion on the court. g

[6] Mr Karia’s primary submission is that costs should be awarded on the indemnity basis under r 36.21 because the respondents have been held liable for more than the appellants proposed in their offer of 10 March 2003 or the appellants have secured a judgment which is more advantageous to them than they proposed in that offer. In each case, he says, the concession offered relating to interest represents a discount now agreed to be about $US12,000 on the footing of the uplift of 3% over the prime rate. h

[7] Mr Karia distinguishes Mitchell’s case on the ground that it related to an offer on costs, whereas the present case relates to an offer on interest. He points out that the award of interest, unlike costs, relates directly to the substantive liability claimed and he prays in aid of the remarks of Lord Wright in Dredger Liesbosch (owners) v Steamship Edison (owners) [1933] AC 449 at 468, sub nom The Edison [1933] All ER Rep 144 at 162 that interest represents ‘damages for the loss of the use of the money representing the lost vessel’—in the present case the i a equivalent is the equipment the subject of the appellants' claim—'as from the date of the loss until payment'. He therefore says that the award of interest forms part of the measure of the appellants' loss. Further, he argues that none of the reasons which impelled this court to its conclusion in Mitchell's case apply to the present case. He draws attention to the fact that some of the provisions of the rules and the Pt 36 Practice Direction on which this court

b relied do not apply to the award of interest, and he submits that the financial effect of concessions involving interest will be immediately apparent at the time the court determines the principal sum and interest rate to be awarded. He also says that there is no real risk of abuse. Finally, he relies on some general policy considerations, arguing that parties should be encouraged to accept reasonable settlement offers when to do so would result in them being better off
c and in saving court time. He urges us to take a broad commercial view and to apply a purposive approach to construing r 36.21.

[8] Mr Diwan for the respondents submits that the offer did not satisfy the requirements of r 36.21(1), because the appellants only offered to accept what they were claiming, and the offer of a concession on the interest uplift was
d irrelevant. He says that in the same way that concessions as to costs are not to be taken into account in assessing whether or not a claimant has done better than his Pt 36 offer, so concessions as to uplift interest should also be left out of account. Accordingly he contends that the respondents have been held liable for as much as, but not more than, what the appellants proposed in their offer and the judgment against the respondents is the same as, but not more advantageous
e than, those proposals. He argues that parts of the reasoning of this court in Mitchell's case are directly applicable to the question of uplift interest for the following reasons: (1) the words 'held liable' and 'the judgment' in r 36.21(1) relate to what the court decides on the substantive issue as distinct from ancillary issues such as costs; a fortiori the issue of whether to award uplift
f interest is an ancillary matter entirely within the discretion of the court and consequent upon comparing the liability or judgment with the Pt 36 offer and is no part of the court's determination of the substantive issue; (2) there is a risk of abuse in claimants making concessions not on the substantive claim but on ancillary matters such as uplift interest, and by offering to accept ordinary interest claimants bargain with something to which they are not entitled and which is g entirely within the court's discretion; (3) this court's reasoning in Mitchell's case was that r 36.21 was intended to apply universally at the end of the trial when the court is required to make an order for costs and that the rule contemplates that the court, merely by reference to that for which the defendant is held liable or by reference to the judgment of the court, will be able to discern whether r 36.21
h applies; that cannot be done in the case of uplift interest the award of which depends on whether the claimant has done better than he proposed in his Pt 36 offer.

[9] In our judgment, the submissions of Mr Diwan are to be preferred. We accept that the award of interest forms part of the defendant's liability in a way
j that the award of costs does not; but the relevant concession offered by the appellants related solely to uplift interest, that is to say interest over the ordinary rate. The court can award uplift interest only if the conditions of r 36.21(1) are satisfied. Thus while the provisions of Pt 36 expressly contemplate that a Pt 36 offer may include an offer as to interest (see r 36.22), and while the court is directed by r 36.21(4) to make an order as to interest in accordance with r 36.21(2) unless it considers it unjust to do so, the draftsman of the rule cannot have contemplated that uplift interest should be any part of the offer to be taken into account in determining the applicability of the rule. a

[10] We turn next to Mr Karia's alternative submission that the court should exercise its discretion under r 44.3 to award costs of the appeal on the indemnity basis, having regard to paras (4) and (5) of that rule. By r 44.3(4) the court is required to have regard to all the circumstances, including the conduct of the parties and any admissible offer to settle made by a party and drawn to the court's attention, whether or not made in accordance with Pt 36. Mr Karia suggests that as a matter of substance and reality the appellants won and did better than their offer, and he argues that the respondents misinterpreted the evidence of the expert, Mr Gibbons, and did so as a way of seeking to avoid the inevitable success of the appellants' appeal. He relies on the view expressed in Foskett The Law and Practice of Compromise (5th edn, 2002) n 30 to para 23.11, on r 36.21(1): b

'The word "more" is used in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of this rule. It follows that, strictly speaking r. 36.21 would not become engaged if the claimant merely matched his offer at trial. However, such an offer would clearly be seen to have been a reasonable one in the light of the result of the trial and one that the defendant ought to have accepted. Given that the court has power to award indemnity costs where a party has behaved unreasonably, and has the power to award interest at such a rate as it considers just (see Petrotrade Inc v Texaco Ltd ([2001] 4 All ER 853, [2002] 1 WLR 947)), there would be no reason why orders similar to those contemplated in paragraphs (2) and (3) should not be made in this situation.' c

[11] Mr Diwan submits that in resisting the appeal the respondents' conduct does not deserve the court's disapproval and was not so unreasonable as to justify costs being awarded against them on the indemnity basis. d

[12] It is not in dispute that we have a wide discretion under r 44.3, though one which we must exercise taking account of the matters to which we are required to have regard. The fact that the appellants offered by a Pt 36 offer to accept as much as they were awarded is plainly an important factor, but so is the fact that the offer was made on the appeal, the court below having awarded a lesser sum. We do not think that the respondents acted unreasonably in seeking to resist the appeal nor was their conduct of the appeal in any way improper. In Kiam v MGN Ltd (No 2) [2002] EWCA Civ 66, [2002] 2 All ER 242, [2002] 1 WLR 2810 Simon Brown LJ, with whom Waller and Sedley LJ agreed, after citing from the Petrotrade case, said: e

'[12] I for my part understand the court there to have been deciding no more than that conduct, albeit falling short of misconduct deserving of moral condemnation, can be so unreasonable as to justify an order for indemnity costs. With that I respectfully agree. To my mind, however, such conduct would need to be unreasonable to a high degree; unreasonable in this context certainly does not mean merely wrong or misguided in hindsight. An indemnity costs order made under Pt 44 (unlike one made under Pt 36) does, I think, carry at least some stigma. It is of its nature penal rather than exhortatory. f

[13] It follows from all this that in my judgment it will be a rare case indeed where the refusal of a settlement offer will attract under Pt 44 not g a merely an adverse order for costs, but an order on an indemnity rather than standard basis.'

[13] In our judgment, having regard to all the circumstances, we do not regard this case as one of those rare cases. We therefore direct that the respondents pay the appellants' costs of the appeal on the standard basis.

b Order accordingly.

Thames Water Utilities Ltd v Hampstead Homes (London) Ltd

[2002] EWCA Civ 1487

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

MAY LJ AND BODEY J

8 OCTOBER 2002

Water supply – Supply of water for domestic purposes – Premises never previously connected to supply of water for domestic purposes – Two buildings connected to supply of water converted into 109 flats – Whether flats premises never previously connected to supply of water for domestic purposes – Water Industry Act 1991, s 146(2).

The defendant developers owned two office blocks which were connected to the water mains and public sewers. Each received a supply of water for domestic purposes. The developers converted the buildings into 109 flats, and asked the claimant water and sewerage undertaker to supply service pipe connections for each of the flats. The undertaker installed two new water service pipe connections, one at each of the two premises. Those were main supplies to the buildings as a whole rather than supplies to the individual flats. Although there was no physical change to the main connection with the public sewer, each of the flats was connected internally to the existing main sewer into the public sewage system. Under s 146(2)(a)^a of the Water Industry Act 1991, an undertaker was entitled to charge for the connection to a water supply of 'premises' which had never at any previous time been connected to a supply of water provided for domestic purposes by a water undertaker. Subsection (2)(b) contained a similar provision in respect of connection to a public sewer. The undertaker made a charge, but the developers refused to pay. In subsequent proceedings brought by the undertaker for recovery of the charge, the judge regarded the premises as the two buildings as a whole rather than each of the individual new flats, and held that the two buildings were premises that had previously been connected to a water supply and a sewer. Accordingly, he dismissed the claim. On the undertaker's appeal, the Court of Appeal considered the purpose and scope of s 146(2).

Held – Section 146(2) of the 1991 Act was concerned with the connection to the water and sewerage systems of premises which had not previously been so connected, and included new premises which were likely to place an additional burden on the system as a whole. Where existing buildings were converted, it was a question of fact and degree whether the result was, or included, the construction and connection of premises which had never previously been connected, or whether the conversion retained the identity of premises which existed and were connected before the conversion took place. In the instant case, the 109 flats were new premises which had never previously been connected, and the undertaker had been entitled to make a charge for each of them under s 146(2). The appeal would therefore be allowed (see [37]–[40], below).

Appeal

- e The claimants, Thames Water Utilities Ltd, appealed with permission of Judge Catlin from his decision in the Reading County Court on 17 October 2001 dismissing their claim against the defendants, Hampstead Homes Ltd, for statutory fixed charges of £42,790.32, allegedly payable under s 146(2) of the Water Industry Act 1991 as a result of the connection of water and sewerage services made at the defendants' request. The facts are set out in the judgment of May LJ.

James Watson QC (instructed by Peter Taylor, Reading) for the claimants.
The defendants were not represented.

g MAY LJ.

[1] This is an appeal from a decision of Judge Catlin sitting in the Reading County Court on 17 October 2001, when he gave his decision, and subsequently handed down written reasons on 23 November 2001. He dismissed the appellants' claim for £42,790.32 under s 146(2)(a) and (b) of the Water Industry Act 1991. The issue which the appeal raises is of some importance to the water industry and to building developers. Judge Catlin, recognising this, gave permission to appeal.

- j [2] The claimants, Thames Water Utilities Ltd, are a water undertaker and sewerage undertaker appointed under s 6 of the 1991 Act. The defendants are building developers. The claimants' claim form simply states that their claim was for infrastructure charges to the value of £42,790.32. The particulars of claim stated that the claim was for the statutory fixed charges payable as a result of the connection of water and sewerage services made at the defendants' request, details of which it was said had been delivered.

[3] A short form defence asserted that infrastructure charges can only be levied on premises that were never previously connected to a water main or to a public sewer. Boss House, it was said, was a warehouse with ancillary offices which received water and sewerage services for domestic purposes. The entire building was a single demise. The disputed charges were being levied on premises that were previously connected and therefore exempt from the statutory charging provision. Therefore the charges which the claimants sought to recover were invalid. The defence went on to make subsidiary lesser submissions, including contesting the level of infrastructure charges claimed.

[4] The claim was heard by Judge Catlin on an agreed statement of facts, supported by the unchallenged witness statement of Robert Movell. The facts, so far as it is necessary to relate them, are as follows. The claim relates to land owned by the defendants and known as 227–229 Tooley Street and Boss House, Lafone Street, Southwark, London SE1. In 1996 or 1997 the defendants converted two office blocks, one at each of these addresses, into 109 flats. The Tooley Street block originally comprised ground floor and first, second, third and fourth floors. The Boss House block was similar but with a basement floor. The defendants added one floor to the Tooley Street block and two floors to Boss House. The original buildings were connected to the water mains. Each received a supply of water for domestic purposes. The Boss House building fronting on to Queen Street was connected by a 4-inch diameter service pipe. A 6-inch diameter supply pipe connected the building fronting Tooley Street. Each of the original buildings were connected to the public sewers.

[5] On 15 September 1995 the defendants' agent wrote to the claimants making an application for the supply of service connections for each of these buildings. The application form for Tooley Street stated that the number of service pipe connections required was 59. The application form for Boss House stated that the number of service pipe connections required was 50. That in total made the 109 flats with which the appeal is concerned. The claimants, having received the application forms, provided a quotation. The quotation had three sums of money, making up a total of £52,898.88. The first two of those sums were each amounts of £23,432 for what was referred to as infrastructure charge for sewerage and water respectively. The third amount was under the heading 'design estimate' and the amount quoted was £6,034.88. Although design estimate was not particularly well explained in the quotation, it was understood to be a charge for making service pipe connections for the water supply. What in fact happened was that the claimants put in two 125-mm new water service pipe connections, one at each of the two premises. Those, needless to say, were mains supplies to the buildings as a whole and not in that form supplies to the individual flats. Mr Watson QC tells us that there was no physical change to the main connection with the public sewer, but that what in practice happened was that each of the new 109 flats was connected internally to the existing main sewer into the public sewage system. The amount of the quotation for infrastructure charges was subsequently reduced by negotiation and became the £42,790.32 which was claimed in these proceedings.

[6] Robert Movell explained in his witness statement the industry understanding of infrastructure charges and their purpose. He explained how in principle they are calculated and explained how they were calculated in the present case. He said:

'The principle of infrastructure charges is to obtain a contribution from builders and developers to the capital investment that is required by water a and sewerage undertakers to develop the public water and sewerage systems to meet the demands placed on those systems from new development.'

[7] Section 146 of the 1991 Act has to be seen and understood in its context. The 1991 Act has in s 1 provision for the appointment of an officer known as the Director General of Water Services who has functions to perform under the Act. Sections 2, 3, 4 and 5 are general sections making provision for general duties in respect of the water industry, for general environmental and recreational duties, for environmental duties with respect to sites of special interest, and for codes of practice with respect to environmental and recreational duties. Part II of the Act, which begins with s 6, concerns the appointment of relevant undertakers. Section 6(1) provides that a company may be appointed by the Secretary of State or with his authorisation by the Director to be the water undertaker or sewerage undertaker for any area of England and Wales. It was under that provision that the claimants in these proceedings were appointed. Section 6(2) provides:

d 'Without prejudice to the obligation of a company holding an appointment under this Chapter to comply with the conditions of its appointment, the appointment of a company to be the water undertaker or sewerage undertaker for any area shall have the effect, while the appointment remains in force—of ...'

e requiring that company to undertake certain specified obligations in relation to water and sewerage, which I need not set out in detail. It will be seen that there is reference there to the obligation of an appointed company to comply with conditions of its appointment. It will be necessary to return later to those conditions.

f [8] Part III is concerned with water supply. Chapter II is concerned with supply duties, and relevantly to this appeal s 45 contains a duty to make a connection with a water main. Subsection (1) provides:

g 'Subject to the following provisions of this section and to sections 46 and 47 below, it shall be the duty of a water undertaker (in accordance with section 51 below) to make a connection under this section where the owner or occupier of any premises which—(a) consists in the whole or any part of a building; or (b) are premises on which any person is proposing to erect any building or part of a building, serves a notice on the undertaker requiring it, for the purpose of providing a supply of water for domestic purposes to that building or part of a building, to connect a service pipe to those premises with one of the undertaker's water mains.'

h [9] Subsection (2):

'Where a notice has been served for the purposes of this section, the duty imposed by subsection (1) above shall be a duty, at the expense of the person serving the notice, to make the connection required by the notice if ...'

j [10] There are certain conditions set out. Subsection (6) provides:

'Where a water undertaker carries out any works which it is its duty under this section to carry out at another person's expense, the undertaker shall be entitled to recover from that person an amount equal to the expenses reasonably incurred by the undertaker in carrying out the works.'

[11] So in that section one finds a duty in appropriate circumstances upon the water undertaker to make a water connection and the power to charge for doing so. Similar, if rather more complicated provisions, appear later in the statute in relation to sewerage undertakers, in particular in ss 98, 106 and 107. It is not necessary to refer to the detail of those sections for the purpose of this judgment.

[12] We then come to Pt V of the 1991 Act. Chapter I is concerned with charges. Section 142(1), under the side heading 'Powers of undertakers to charge', provides:

'Subject to the following provisions of this Chapter, the powers of every relevant undertaker shall include power—(a) to fix charges for any services provided in the course of carrying out its functions and, in the case of a sewerage undertaker, charges to be paid in connection with the carrying out of its trade effluent functions; and (b) to demand and recover charges fixed under this section from any persons to whom the undertaker provides services or in relation to whom it carries out trade effluent functions.'

[13] Subsection (4) provides:

'Except in so far as this Chapter otherwise provides, a relevant undertaker may fix charges under this section by reference to such matters, and may adopt such methods and principles for the calculation and imposition of the charges, as appear to the undertaker to be appropriate.'

[14] Pausing there for one moment, that is evidently a subsection which gives the undertakers a fairly wide discretion as to the fixing and calculation of their charges. It is a subsection which, as will appear, is qualified by at least one subsequent section of the Chapter. It is also qualified in practice by the Office of Water Services and the Director General insisting on compliance with conditions of appointment which the undertakers have been subjected to by virtue of s 6 of the 1991 Act to which I have referred.

[15] Section 143 makes provision for charges schemes. Section 143A provides for regulations as to the provisions to be included in charges schemes. Section 144 provides for liability of occupiers for charges. Section 144A provides for the right of the consumer to elect charging by reference to volume. Section 144B places restrictions on the undertakers' powers to require fixing of charges by reference to volume. Section 145 was repealed in 1999 and is not relevant to this appeal. Then we come to s 146. Subsection (1) provides:

'Subject to subsection (2) below, nothing in this Chapter or in any other enactment shall entitle any relevant undertaker to fix, demand or recover an initial charge for its becoming, or for its taking steps for the purpose of becoming—(a) the person who provides a supply of water for domestic purposes to any premises; or (b) the person who provides sewerage services for the purposes of the drainage for domestic sewerage purposes of any premises.'

[16] Subsection (2)—the critical subsection for the purpose of this appeal:

'Subject to subsection (3) below, nothing in subsection (1) above or in any other enactment shall be construed as prohibiting the fixing, demand or recovery by a relevant undertaker of—(a) a charge for the connection to a water supply of premises which have never at any previous time (whether before or after the coming into force of the restriction contained in this

- a section) been connected to a supply of water provided for domestic purposes by a water undertaker or by any other authority or body which at that time provided supplies of water in the course of carrying out functions under any enactment; or (b) a charge for the connection to a public sewer of premises which have never at any previous time (whether before or after the coming into force of the restriction contained in this section) been connected to a
- b sewer used for the drainage for domestic sewerage purposes of those premises by a sewerage undertaker or by any other authority or body which at that time provided sewerage services in the course of carrying out functions under any enactment.'

- c [17] Speaking in general therefore, undertakers may make charges which include: (a) charges for the cost of making physical connections (s 45(6) is an example of this); (b) periodic charges for supply (those are obvious charges with which we are all familiar); and (c) charges under s 146(2) whose ambit is the subject of these proceedings.

- d [18] Judge Catlin considered a number of authorities. These included Thames Water Utilities Ltd v Shepherd Bush Housing Association (5 November 1996, unreported), a decision of Judge Holden, to which I shall refer briefly later in this judgment; and a decision of Mr John Goldring QC sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court in Thames Water Utilities Ltd v Bursar, Magdalen College, Oxford (30 June 1999, unreported). I shall refer to that case later in this judgment. Judge Catlin reckoned that the Magdalen College case was distinguishable from the
- e present case but he considered that details of the statutory framework, regulatory background and infrastructure charges set out in Mr Goldring's judgment were correct.

[19] Having set out the facts of the present case and referred to the principal statutory provisions, Judge Catlin made his finding in these terms:

- f 'I find that the buildings which contained offices were connected to water and sewerage and that the existing building containing flats is connected to water and sewerage. Both these buildings are within the meaning of the word "premises" in s 146(2). Again I accept and adopt the reasons set out in the Magdalen College case. Where that case is to be distinguished on its facts
- g to the present case is that in my judgment the present buildings cannot be regarded as new buildings, these buildings have in my judgment previously been connected to a water supply and a sewer.'

- [20] Judge Catlin went on to find, although the relevance of this finding is not entirely clear to his judgment, that the claimants did not make the connections to the individual 109 flats. I do not think that it has been suggested that they did. In
- h essence, Judge Catlin decided that these were not premises which came within the exception in s 146(2) to the charging exemption because they had been previously connected to water and sewerage services. In doing so, he was plainly regarding the premises as the two buildings as a whole, the existing office
- j buildings, and was not, as had been submitted to him on behalf of the claimant, regarding the premises as each of the individual 109 new flats.

[21] The main ground of appeal in substance is that Judge Catlin misinterpreted the word 'premises' in s 146(2) and misapplied that section to the facts of this case. He should have regarded each of the 109 flats as premises within the subsection, those premises never previously having been connected to a supply of water or to a sewer used for domestic drainage purposes.

[22] The defendants originally opposed the appeal. They supported Judge Catlin's judgment with a written skeleton argument prepared by counsel and a respondent's notice seeking to uphold the decision on the additional ground that the charges made were not within what was authorised in the statute anyway. This morning the court was told that the parties had in part reached a compromise. The effect of the compromise is that they have compromised the financial consequences of this judgment, both as to payment and as to costs, whatever the outcome of the appeal. In these circumstances, the defendants have not been represented before the court today. The appeal in that sense is unopposed but the claimants seek a reasoned decision reversing, as they submit, the decision of Judge Catlin on the ground that it is an important point for the claimant and for the industry as a whole.

[23] The decision of Mr Goldring QC, as he was, in the Magdalen College case concerned again a claim by Thames Water Utilities in relation to buildings constructed within the grounds of Magdalen College, Oxford on land which had previously been used for squash courts and a building called the Back Lodge. Each of those buildings had been connected for domestic purposes to the claimants' water supply and public sewer. The college demolished the squash courts and the lodge and replaced them with two halls of residence. It applied for water and sewerage connections but contested the claimants' claim for infrastructure charges or, more accurately, for a charge under s 146(2). Mr Goldring set out the statutory provisions in rather greater detail than I have. He then said, under the heading 'Infrastructure charge':

'The phrase does not appear in the Act. It does appear in a number of documents which have been drawn to my attention. Although helpful in understanding the general position, none of the documents has statutory force. If the 1991 Act does not provide for infrastructure charges, none of the documents I am about to refer to can provide a basis to claim them.'

[24] He went on to refer to the claimants' deed of appointment under what was then the Water Act 1989. He made reference to conditions of appointment, including condition C, which has been referred to again in the context of the present appeal. Mr Goldring had a section in his judgment about the debate in the House of Lords and made references to Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593. He did not think it necessary to take the Hansard references into account. Under the heading 'The first issue. Is Thames Water entitled to infrastructure charges?', he said:

'(1) Sections 45 and 46 entitle Thames Water to claim expenses incurred in making connections. In addition, Parliament gave the water and sewerage undertaker the power, within specified circumstances, to make charges. It gave the undertaker a broad discretion in setting them. (2) Section 142(1) gives the undertaker the power to fix, demand and recover charges. Section 142(2)(a) provides that the power shall be exercised, among other things, in accordance with a charges scheme under s 143. Section 143(4) permits the undertaker to take into account the circumstances of a particular case. Section 142(4) provides the undertaker with a very wide discretion in setting those charges. Section 146 limits the circumstances in which the charges can be made. They cannot be made for taking steps to become or becoming an undertaker (s 146(1)). They can be made for connection of premises which have never previously been connected (s 146(2)). (3) The a limits set upon the undertaker in fixing the charges are specified in the provisions. Provided the undertaker acts within those limits, it can set charges and decide the factors it wishes to take into account. Although infrastructure issues are not specifically mentioned as a factor, I can see no reason at all why they should not be. The provisions do not prevent it.

b There is nothing surprising in a water undertaker wishing, in setting its charges, to take into account such matters as capital investment and its general capacity to provide connections. (4) Parliament intended that the consumer should be protected by the regulatory framework set out in the Act. This is to provide the balance between the undertaker's need to impose charges to enable it adequately to finance its statutory functions and the protection of the consumer. This case has demonstrated an example of the c Director General acting to protect the consumer. He required undertakings to lower their charges. (5) It comes to this. Parliament conferred and must have intended to confer a wide discretion on the water undertaker in setting its charges. It intended to protect the consumer by regulation. The undertaker can take such issues as the infrastructure into account when d setting those charges. Thames Water did that here. It has followed the charges scheme approved by the Director. If the charges claimed are in accordance with s 146(2) of the 1991 Act, they are recoverable.'

[25] He went on to deal with the second issue which was whether the infrastructure charges sought in that case were recoverable. He set out briefly the e opposing cases of the parties. Thames Water's case was that the construction of the word 'premises' is perfectly simple. It is a matter of common sense. It is to be construed having regard to the context in which it is found. Here, it was submitted that the new buildings were plainly premises which have never been connected to a water supply or sewer. They could not have been. They were not built. The College's case included that 'premises' within the 1991 Act meant

f more than buildings. It meant the premises shown and described in the rating list; that is to say, the university college and premises. There was no subdivision of that. The word 'premises' is capable of meaning a building or part of a building when the Act specifically so provides. Otherwise it should be given its natural meaning. On the basis of that definition these premises, it was submitted, had

g previously been connected.

[26] Mr Goldring considered those submissions in some detail and in conclusion he rejected the case on behalf of the College. He said:

'(1) The meaning of "premises" in s 146(2) is on its face and in its context quite straightforward. It is being used, not in a technical sense, but a natural and ordinary way. It relates to buildings in the way Miss Baxendale submits.

h (2) The halls of residence are new buildings. By definition, they are premises which have never previously been connected to a water supply or a sewer. (3) What Parliament intended is clear. It was to permit the undertaker to charge in respect of buildings never previously connected.'

j [27] It was the first two sentences at least of that brief conclusion to which Judge Catlin referred in the present case in support of his conclusion that in the present case the buildings were premises which had previously been connected to the water and the sewerage services.

[28] The decision to which Judge Catlin also referred of United Utilities Water plc v Albany Homes Ltd (9 November 2001, unreported) was a decision in the West London County Court by Judge Cowell. Its facts bear some similarities to those in the present case. Judge Cowell introduced his judgment in these terms:

‘United Utilities Water plc, a water and sewerage undertaker for the North West, claims in this action an “infrastructure charge” of £23,072.16 from the defendant, Albany Homes Ltd, which in about 1998 purchased property in Cobourg Street, Manchester, known as Stonebridge House. It was an old textile mill or warehouse; but, whichever it was, the water supplied to it was not used in any manufacturing process, but was used for domestic purposes within the meaning of the legislation I shall mention.’

[29] Judge Cowell went on to recount that the building was gutted inside and some of the peripheral walls remained. The building as it now was after the development was a block of 42 flats which contained 30% more floor space than the original building. The defendant had made an application for water supply, asking for a new supply for 42 flats with a preferred size of connection of 110 mm. During the works pipe works, soil pipes and gutters were removed from the original building and then a water pipe was put through the wall into the pavement. The claimants, the water undertaking, made the connection and installed a meter inside the building to serve the whole building and approved all of that by its inspector. Nothing was done outside the building to connect into the sewerage system. The new system installed inside the building was connected to the old system at some point inside. On those facts a former textile mill or warehouse, having water and sewerage services for domestic purposes, was converted into 42 flats and a new water supply main was installed to connect to the building. The judge referred to the Magdalen College case. He found Mr Goldring’s judgment very helpful. He said that he was bound to follow it. But if he was not bound to do so, he had no reason to disagree with it. He observed that s 146(2) does not refer to a building but to premises never at any previous time connected. He said that the use of the word ‘premises’ in ss 41 and 45 showed that ‘premises’ may in the context of the Act consist of a part of a building. He then said:

‘Therefore even if the word might in some contexts have a wider meaning I do not think the word in s 146(2) should have a different meaning from that in ss 41 and 45. It seems to me therefore that each one of the flats, being a part of a building, is something, properly to be described as “premises”, never at any previous time connected. Each flat, the premises, was simply not there in 1998 and before. The purpose of the development was to create 42 of them so that each could be separately sold or let as individual premises, and not to sell or let identifiable parts of the old mill building as it used to stand with its floor and rooms before it was gutted. I am therefore satisfied that the claimant has established that the 42 flats are each premises never at any previous time connected.’

[30] He then said of the Magdalen College case that it seemed to him that it was sufficient for the purpose of deciding that case for the judge to have stated that Parliament intended to permit the undertaker to charge in respect of buildings never previously connected.

[31] Judge Cowell was referred to Judge Catlin’s decision in the present case. He referred to written submissions before him made by the defendants that premises must be equated with buildings. He did not accept that submission. He a said: 'Premises in the sections of the Act I have referred to cannot exist without a building, but are not in my judgment to be equated with buildings.'

[32] He went on:

b 'It seems to me therefore that the existence of the same building is not conclusive of the question whether the premises are new so as never previously to have been connected, and that it is only a factor in deciding whether the premises after works have been done to the building are new so as never previously to have been connected. For example, if the building is not demolished and the existing floors are simply let out separately as self-contained units it would probably not be correct to regard any one floor as premises never at any previous time connected. The more each floor was altered in layout or design or in its capacity to use the water and sewerage systems the more readily could it be said that new premises had been created which had never at any previous time been connected.'

d [33] The one other previous decision to which I shall refer is a decision of Judge Holden sitting in the Brentford County Court in Thames Water Utilities Ltd v Shepherd Bush Housing Association (5 November 1996, unreported). It is not necessary to recount the facts of that case. Suffice it to refer to a single paragraph in the judge's judgment. He said:

e 'Section 146(2)(b) inter alia allows ... an undertaking to make a connection charge ie a charge "for" the connection to a public sewer of premises which have never at any previous time been connected to a sewer for the drainage of domestic sewerage purposes. A connection charge arises notwithstanding the fact that connection might be made by the developers and not the defendants. It is the acceptance of that sewerage into the undertaking system which is material. In my judgment a connection of the services is in itself the provision of services. I do not see that it matters if such a service is described as being an "infrastructure charge". Such an expression is not used in the primary legislation.'

f [34] I say straightaway that in my judgment Mr Goldring's analysis of the structure of the Act, so far as relevant for present purposes, was correct. I agree with the analysis undertaken by Judge Cowell and with his application of it to the facts of his case. I agree with the paragraph from Judge Holden's judgment that I have just read.

g [35] Mr Watson on behalf of the claimants submits that Judge Catlin in the present case misinterpreted s 146(2). He submits that he appears to have read the passage in Mr Goldring's judgment out of context as defining the word 'premises' as synonymous with and limited to buildings. He submits that the statute uses the word 'premises' in a flexible way in various places, thus illustrating that its meaning has to be derived from its particular context. The meaning may not be inflexibly the same every time that it is used. He submits that Judge Cowell was correct and that Judge Catlin in the present case was not.

j [36] I take into account the written submissions lodged on behalf of the defendants in support of Judge Catlin's judgment but it is not necessary, I think, to refer to them in detail. In my judgment, the interpretation of s 146(2) has to be considered not only by reference to the word 'premises' but also by reference to the use there of the word 'connection'. 'Premises' is an ordinary word whose precise meaning is to be derived from its context. It is to be noted that neither

'premises' nor 'connection' or 'connected' are defined in the definition section of this Act, s 219. 'Premises', it seem to me, will usually include buildings but may not be limited to buildings and might in some circumstances refer to a place with few or no buildings on it. Premises may in its context also consist of a part of a larger building. A garden centre or a builder's merchant may have premises which include one or more buildings but the premises may extend to the larger site used for the keeping of plants or bricks and sand. A garden centre might conceivably have premises with no buildings on it at all. The premises of a farming business might consist of a group of farm buildings but it would be a somewhat strange context perhaps, though not impossible, which included 100 acres of fields as part of the farm premises. The premises of a large corporation might in context consist of the entirety of a large office block. The premises of a small firm or company might consist of one or two rooms on an upper floor of a much larger building. In the general context of the supply of water and sewerage services premises are likely to include buildings or parts of buildings to which the water is supplied and from which the sewage is taken away. There are a number of references to premises in various other sections of this statute. Those include, but are not perhaps limited to, ss 41, 45, 52 and 64. These show that in this statute the expression 'premises' is used in various contexts with various contextual shades of meaning.

[37] In my judgment, as I have said, the relevant meaning of s 146(2)(a) and (b) is to be derived not only from the use of the word 'premises' but from its use in the context of the word 'connection'. The full relevant expression is—

'a charge for the connection to a water supply of premises which have never at any previous time ... been connected to a supply of water provided for domestic purposes by a water undertaker ...'

I think that the heading of s 146 may be misleading. At first blush, it appears to refer to the making of a physical connection so that the charge would be a charge for doing so. But the undertaker does not have to go to s 146(2) to be able to charge the costs of the physical connection. Section 45(6) provides the power to make such charge for water and ss 106 and 107 do so also for sewerage. Section 146(2) is concerned, I think, with the connection to the water and sewerage systems of premises which have not previously been so connected and must include new premises which are likely to place an additional burden on the system as a whole. If the premises are in this sense new premises, there is I think no need to establish positively that there will be a volumetric additional burden. It may be taken that in the round there will be. The section applies to a new housing development on what was formerly an unoccupied site. It would probably not apply to a modest alteration to an existing house which did not constitute the building of new premises. Where existing buildings are converted, it will be a question of fact and degree whether the result is or includes the construction and connection of premises which have never previously been connected, or whether the conversion retains the identity of premises which existed and were connected before the conversion took place. Judge Cowell gave an example of such in his decision to which I have referred.

[38] On the facts of the present case the 109 flats were new premises which had never previously been connected and the claimants were entitled to make a charge for each of them under s 146(2). Although the expression 'infrastructure charge' does not appear in the statute, I am satisfied that the charge to which s 146(2) refers is in the nature of a contribution to the capital and maintenance

- a* cost of providing services, subject to the additional demand which the connection of premises not previously connected must in general generate. I reach this conclusion without reference to Hansard or to condition C of the claimants' conditions of appointment. Mr Watson did not persuade me that condition C was properly available as an aid to construing s 146(2) but it is not necessary for me to decide.
- b* [39] For these reasons I would allow the appeal and invite Mr Watson to address us as to the form of any order that should be made.

BODEY J.

[40] I agree with the judgment just delivered. There is nothing which I can usefully add.

28 NOVEMBER 2002

Landlord and tenant – Business premises – Notice by landlord to terminate tenancy – Tenant giving counter-notice erroneously indicating willingness to give up possession – Tenant giving second counter-notice within prescribed period correctly indicating unwillingness to give up possession – Whether first counter-notice binding – Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, ss 25, 29(2).

The claimant tenant's lease was governed by the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. His landlord served him with a notice under s 25^a of the 1954 Act as a prerequisite to terminating the tenancy. Section 25(5) provided that such a notice was not to have effect unless it required the tenant, within two months after the giving of the notice, to notify the landlord in writing whether or not at the date of termination the tenant would be willing to give up possession. If a tenant applied to the court for a new tenancy in consequence of a landlord's s 25 notice, s 29(2)^b precluded the court from entertaining the application unless the tenant had 'duly' notified the landlord that he would not be willing to give up possession. The tenant served a positive counter-notice on the landlord, indicating his willingness to give up possession of the premises on the termination date. However, the notice, which was in pre-printed form, had been filled in wrongly by the tenant's solicitor, and the tenant had instead intended to give a negative counter-notice, stating that he would not be willing to give up possession. The error was detected, and the tenant served a negative counter-notice within two months of the receipt of the landlord's notice. Relying on that second counter-notice, he issued proceedings in the county court claiming a new tenancy. The judge struck out his claim on the basis that a positive counter-notice to a landlord's s 25 notice was irrevocable and that accordingly the tenant was bound by his first counter-notice. The tenant appealed.

Held – A positive counter-notice to a landlord's notice under s 25 of the 1954 Act was not always irrevocable. Section 29(2) of the Act was satisfied if, within the two-month period, thus giving proper emphasis to the word 'duly', a notice had been given, stating that a tenant would not be willing at the date of termination to give up possession. However, in any case where the tenant had made a positive representation, it would be a question whether he was in fact entitled to resile from the positive notice which had been given in answer to the landlord's s 25 notice. It was open to the court to determine that in all the circumstances it was wrong for a tenant to seek to substitute a new statement of his intention for the purposes of s 29(2), but each such case was to be dealt with on its own merits. In the instant case, the tenant had been entitled to give a second notice, and

g Appeal

The claimant, Walbert Pennycook, appealed with the permission of Judge Cox from his decision in the Lambeth County Court on 9 July 2002 striking out his claim under s 24(1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 seeking the grant of a new tenancy of business premises at 130 Railton Road, London SE24 by the defendant landlord, Shaws (EAL) Ltd. The facts are set out in the judgment.

PUMFREY J.

- j [1] This is an appeal from an order by Judge Cox sitting at the Lambeth County Court whereby he struck out proceedings for a new tenancy commenced by Mr Walbert Pennycook in respect of premises at 130 Railton Road, London SE24. The premises in question are principally a barber shop and, I believe, a floor over.

[2] Mr Pennycook was the tenant under a lease for ten years of the premises granted by the then landlord, Mayshore Property Co Ltd, on 27 March 1991. The demise was for a period of ten years from 25 March 1989. Towards the end of the contractual term, Mr Pennycook entered into some inconclusive negotiations with the landlord in respect of a purchase of the freehold of the premises, and even gave a tenant's notice under Pt II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 in respect of which the necessary proceedings were not commenced in time. The history which gives rise to the present proceedings starts with a landlord's notice which was served on Mr Pennycook on 8 November 2001 pursuant to s 25 of the 1954 Act. On 4 December 2001, Mr Pennycook served a counter-notice. This counter-notice was served on a form printed by the well-known law stationers, Oyez, headed 'Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 sections 25(5) and 29(2)' and is entitled 'Tenant's counter-notice as to willingness to give up possession of business premises'. After reciting the essential features of the landlord's notice, the pro forma continues, against a marginal note 6, 'Delete if tenant does not wish to apply for a new tenancy, see note 3' with the following: 'Take notice that I/We will [not] be willing to give up possession of the property comprised in the tenancy on that date.'

[3] Mr Pennycook's solicitor, Mr Alfonso Constantine Wynter, sets out in his witness statement the circumstances in which this notice came to be given. He says that he perused the papers when he was instructed by Mr Pennycook on 4 December 2002 and he prepared the counter-notice, and he says that he typed it, and at the same time he instructed a surveyor to act for Mr Pennycook in negotiations of the terms for a new lease. It was the surveyor who detected the error in the counter-notice, since he received a letter from Mr Wynter telling him that Mr Pennycook wished to renew the lease and was going to instruct Mr Wynter to apply to the court for a new lease unless terms could be agreed with the landlord.

[4] This evidence, at its lowest, strongly suggests that Mr Wynter made a grave error in the completion of the form and completed it contrary to his instructions (but I say no more about that at this stage), since the two-month period for a counter-notice to the landlord's notice had, when Mr Wynter gave the defective notice, another month to run. As soon as the surveyor detected the error and notified Mr Wynter of it on 2 January 2002, Mr Wynter on 4 January 2002 gave a further notice, this time in the correct form. Purportedly pursuant to that notice, Mr Pennycook issued his claim in the Lambeth County Court for a new tenancy and the claim was struck out by Judge Cox on 9 July 2002.

[5] The relevant provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 are, as follows. By s 24(1):

'A tenancy to which this Part of this Act applies shall not come to an end unless terminated in accordance with the provisions of this Part of this Act; and, subject to the provisions of section twenty-nine of this Act, the tenant under such a tenancy may apply to the court for a new tenancy—(a) if the landlord has given notice under section 25 of this Act to terminate the tenancy, or (b) if the tenant has made a request for a new tenancy in accordance with section twenty-six of this Act.'

[6] Section 25, as is well known, sets out the prerequisites for the termination of a tenancy by the landlord. The notice to be given by the landlord to the tenant must be in the prescribed form and must specify the date at which the tenancy is to come to an end, which is defined as the date of termination. The section concerns itself both with the permitted range of dates of termination and prescribes by sub-s (4) that subject to the provisions of sub-s (3)—

- a 'a notice under the section shall not specify a date of termination earlier than the date on which apart from this part of this Act the tenancy would have come to an end by effluxion of time.'

[7] By sub-s (5)—

- b 'A notice under this section shall not have effect unless it requires the tenant, within two months after the giving of the notice, to notify the landlord in writing whether or not, at the date of termination, the tenant will be willing to give up possession of the property comprised in the tenancy.'

- c The landlord's notice being on a pre-printed form, as one would expect, complied with this requirement and Mr Pennycook availed himself of the opportunity provided to notify the landlord, first that he would be willing to give up possession, and second that he would not.

[8] By s 29—

- d '(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, on an application under subsection (1) of section twenty-four of this Act for a new tenancy the court shall make an order for the grant of a tenancy comprising such property, at such rent and on such other terms, as are hereinafter provided.

- e (2) Where such an application is made in consequence of a notice given by the landlord under section twenty-five of this Act, it shall not be entertained unless the tenant has duly notified the landlord that he will not be willing at the date of termination to give up possession of the property comprised in the tenancy.

- f (3) No application under subsection (1) of section twenty-four of this Act shall be entertained unless it is made not less than two nor more than four months after the giving of the landlord's notice under section twenty-five of this Act or, as the case may be, after the making of the tenant's request for a new tenancy.'

- g [9] There is no doubt that Mr Pennycook's application to the county court satisfied sub-s (3) of s 29; the question is whether it satisfied the requirements of sub-s (2). In approaching this question, the learned judge relied upon the decision of Brightman J in Re 14 Grafton Street, London W1, De Haviland (Antiques) Ltd v Centrovincial Estates (Mayfair) Ltd [1971] 2 All ER 1, [1971] Ch 935. This was a case in which the tenant sought compensation under the Part of the 1954 Act as amended by the Law of Property Act 1969, an amendment which came into effect during the currency of the two-month period permitted for the tenant's notice. The headnote sets out the determinations of Brightman J as follows ([1971] Ch 935):

- j '... that in order to be entitled to compensation for disturbance a tenant must, first, have served a counter notice on the landlord under section 29(2) of the Act of 1954, stating that he was unwilling to vacate the premises and secondly, under section 37(1) of the Act (before amendment), he must have applied to the court for a new tenancy; that a counter notice which expressed willingness to quit was irrevocable; and that, accordingly, after October 13, the tenants could not give a notice of unwillingness to quit and had lost their right to apply to the court and the landlords, in turn, had acquired an indefeasible right to obtain possession on April 1, 1970, without paying compensation.'

[10] It is important in this case to observe the material dates. The notice to terminate the tenancy was given on 1 April 1970, the notice being given on 27 September 1969. The tenants gave what was subsequently described as a positive counter-notice, that is to say, a notice indicating their intention to vacate the premises, on 13 October 1969. On 22 October 1969, the royal assent was given to the amending statute which came into effect on 1 January 1970 and the tenants inquired about compensation on 11 February 1970. The two-month period from service of the notice therefore expired somewhere around about 27 November 1969.

[11] Brightman J first interpreted the expression 'duly notified' in s 29(2), which I have read, as meaning a notification within two months after the giving by the landlord of a s 25 notice. He said that that is made clear by the wording of s 25(5), which I have also read, and if I may respectfully say so, I respectfully agree.

[12] He then turned to the scheme of the statutory provisions, in a passage which I should read out in full ([1971] 2 All ER 1 at 5–7, [1971] Ch 935 at 942–944):

'It appears to be the scheme of the Act that a landlord's notice under s 25 shall be followed by a notification by the tenant either that he is willing or that he is not willing to give up possession on the date of termination specified in the landlord's notice. For convenience, I refer to such a notification by the tenant as a positive or a negative counter-notice, according to whether the tenant is or is not agreeable to the landlord's demand. A negative counter-notice is a condition precedent to an application by the tenant to the court: see s 29(2). An application by the tenant to the court was, prior to the 1969 Act, a condition precedent to the tenant's becoming entitled to compensation for disturbance. It is therefore hard to see how it can ever have been to a tenant's financial advantage to serve a positive counter-notice. Before the 1969 Act the result can only have been to deprive the tenant of the chance of obtaining compensation. Indeed, no counsel was able to suggest what practical function is performed by a positive counter-notice, except an act of courtesy to the landlord. On 22 October 1969 the Law of Property Act 1969 received the royal assent. Part I of the Act is headed: "AMENDMENT OF PART II OF THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT 1954". Section 11 of the Act amends s 37(1) of the 1954 Act by inserting new words. Section 37(1) as amended is set out in Sch 1 to the 1969 Act; the additional words follow the words "of that subsection" and provide: "or where no other ground is specified in the landlord's notice under section 25 of this Act or, as the case may be under section 26(6) thereof, than those specified in the said paragraphs (e), (f) and (g) and either no application under the said section 24 is made or such an application is withdrawn." The effect, therefore, of the amendment was to entitle the tenant to obtain compensation notwithstanding the absence of an application to the court. Section 31(2) of the 1969 Act provided that the parts of the Act relevant to this application should come into force on 1 January 1970. On 11 February 1970 the tenants' solicitors wrote to the landlords' solicitors: "Further to the Notice to Determine [the tenants'] Lease of the above premises [the tenants] now [propose] to leave approximately at the end of February. In the circumstances, will you kindly let us know what arrangements are being made regarding compensation payable under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 as amended by the Law of Property Act

1969." The landlords' s 25 notice had been sent with a letter dated 26 September and it is common ground that this notice should be treated as "given" on 27 September. The position therefore, on that day, was that 26 or 27 November (I assume 27 November without so deciding) was the last day available to the tenants for serving a negative counter-notice as a prelude to an application by the tenants to the court for an order for the grant of a new tenancy. In fact, as I have mentioned, the tenants' solicitors on 13 October had written a letter which the landlords accepted as, and which I hold to have been, a notification by the tenants within the meaning of s 25(5) of the 1954 Act that on 1 April 1970 they would be willing to give up possession of the property. There was some discussion, unsupported by authority as I was told none existed, whether the tenants could, on or before 27 November, have revoked their positive counter-notice and given the negative counter-notice required by s 29(2) to enable proceedings to be taken. In my view the purpose of s 25(5) is to introduce an element of certainty into the relationship between the landlord and the tenant. A tenant is not bound to serve a negative counter-notice before the end of the two month period allowed to him. He may pause for that period of time while he makes up his mind. If however he does serve a positive counter-notice during the two month period, I think that he must abide by what he has done. If that were not the case, the positive counter-notice would serve no purpose whatever compared with complete inaction, for in either case the landlord would not know where he stood until the end of the two month period. If a positive counter-notice is revocable, the tenant serving the same would be able to serve a negative counter-notice right up to the end of the two month period. If on the other hand the tenant does nothing, he may likewise serve a negative counter-notice right up to the end of the two month period. It follows that a positive counter-notice would be wholly devoid of any function, even that of courtesy, if it were revocable at the will of the tenant. I therefore conclude that a positive counter-notice is irrevocable; and that in this case the tenants ceased to be able to serve a negative counter-notice after 13 October 1969 and that they then lost their right to apply to the court for an order for the grant of a new tenancy. I have not overlooked the fact that the Act of 1954 is not expressed to impose on the tenant an obligation to serve a notice of either description within the two month period. All that the Act does is to impose on the landlord, as a condition of a valid s 25 notice, the obligation of informing the tenant that he is required to serve a notice one way or the other within the two month period, and to place the tenant under a disability if he fails to serve a negative counter-notice. In my view, however, it is a necessary implication from s 25(5) that a tenant is under a statutory obligation to serve notice one way or the other within the two month period, although I accept that there is no sanction imposed on him for ignoring that obligation, except his inability to apply to the court. In these circumstances the position in my view was as follows. On 14 October 1969, ie about eight days before the Law of Property Act 1969 received the royal assent, the landlords had an indefeasible right to recover possession on 1 April 1970 without payment of compensation, if I am correct in my conclusion that the tenants were precluded from withdrawing their letter of 13 October and from serving a negative counter-notice.'

[13] The learned judge, having quoted the material passage in Brightman J's judgment relating to the revocability of the positive counter-notice, said:

'On the face of it, that passage from the judgment of Brightman J, concludes the issue in this case. If that passage is binding upon me and is good law, then it is perfectly clear in the circumstances of the case that whatever the circumstances in which the positive notice was given it is binding upon the tenant and it has brought to an end the tenancy. Mr Geldart, who has said everything that could be said on behalf of the claimant in these proceedings, has sought to distinguish Re 14 Grafton Street on a number of bases.'

And he sets out the arguments of counsel and it appears from the transcript that the learned county court judge concluded that the judgment of Brightman J was binding upon him and that he had no hesitation in following it. He accordingly struck out these proceedings.

[14] I think that it may be helpful, in considering the judgment of Brightman J, to examine the passage which I have quoted at length, in a little more detail than did the learned judge. Brightman J was unable to identify any practical function which was performed by a positive counter-notice except to act as an act of courtesy to the landlord. That being so, it is at first sight surprising that the effect of serving such notice is to preclude the tenant in all circumstances from giving a negative counter-notice within the two-month statutory period. I say in all the circumstances, since it is easy to envisage circumstances in which it would be wrong to permit a tenant to resile from a positive counter-notice. But I am concerned with the question whether in every case it is impossible to do that. Brightman J's reasoning on this question is found in the passage beginning with the words: 'The landlords' s 25 notice had been sent with a letter dated 26 September [1969] ...' (see [1971] 2 All ER 1 at 6, [1971] Ch 935 at 943).

[15] The stages in the argument commence with the words:

'There was some discussion, unsupported by authority as I was told none existed, as to whether the tenants could, on or before November 27 [which, it will be recalled is the expiry date of the two-month period], have revoked their positive counter-notice and given the negative counter-notice required by s 29(2) to enable proceedings to be taken.'

The crucial passage then follows ([1971] 2 All ER 1 at 6, [1971] Ch 935 at 943-944):

'In my view the purpose of s 25(5) is to introduce an element of certainty into the relationship between the landlord and the tenant. A tenant is not bound to serve a negative counter-notice before the end of the two month period allowed to him. He may pause for that period of time while he makes up his mind. If however he does serve a positive counter-notice during the two month period, I think that he must abide by what he has done. If that were not the case, the positive counter-notice would serve no purpose whatever compared with complete inaction, for in either case the landlord would not know where he stood until the end of the two month period. If a positive counter-notice is revocable, the tenant serving the same would be able to serve a negative counter-notice right up to the end of the two month period. If on the other hand the tenant does nothing, he may likewise serve a negative counter-notice right up to the end of the two month period. It follows the positive counter-notice would be wholly devoid of any function, a even that of courtesy, if it were revocable at the will of the tenant. I therefore conclude that a positive counter-notice is irrevocable ...'

[16] I approach this passage with all the respect which is owing from me to a judge of great experience and authority in this field. I would, however, respectfully doubt whether the 'therefore' in the words, 'I therefore conclude that a positive counter-notice is irrevocable' in fact indicates a logical conclusion from the premises. It seems to me that it is a possible view that a positive counter-notice is not devoid of any function including that of courtesy if the tenant gives it, and thereafter it is acted upon by the landlord. If, however, there is no (to use a shorthand expression) 'change of position' on the part of the landlord in reliance upon the serving of a positive counter-notice, I do not, as presently advised, understand why it is necessary to conclude that the counter-notice is irrevocable. Mr Vickery, who appeared on behalf of the landlord in the present case, suggested a number of reasons why that should be so. He pointed to the symmetrical nature of the provisions of the statute relating first of all to landlord's notices under s 25 and secondly to the tenant's notice under s 26. He pointed out, correctly, that if a landlord gives a counter-notice, as is permitted under s 26(6), it is well settled that the grounds of opposition set out in such a notice are, like the grounds of opposition specified in the landlord's notice under s 25, unamendable and irrevocable. He submits that to treat the tenant's counter-notice under s 25(5), albeit it appears to have no other legal effect, as revocable, introduces an anomaly in the scheme of the 1954 Act which must be doubtful in view of the irrevocability of the other notices.

[17] Mr Vickery submitted further that there is a good reason for treating a tenant's positive counter-notice as irrevocable. If the only question, he says, is whether in all the circumstances it is fair to allow the tenant to resile from a positive counter-notice, then an undesirable species of satellite litigation is introduced into a well-understood, well-circumscribed, kind of application made all the time in the county court and well understood by all involved. He says that it is thoroughly undesirable to introduce into this well-understood system a possibility of satellite disputes as to the validity of tenants' negative notices if previously positive notices have been given and the tenant has for some reason or other changed its mind.

[18] I see the force of these submissions. However, I am not satisfied that in point of fact the circumstances arising here are likely as a practical matter to arise at all frequently. There can be little doubt that there is no question of a change of mind here, but a simple error on the part of the solicitor. Second, I cannot see why, in the ordinary course, a tenant will give a positive notice unless quite satisfied that it does indeed intend to give up possession at the end of the notice period. I am not satisfied that positive counter-notices are such a common phenomenon in any event that it is necessary to consider the risks involved from the point of view of the proper administration of justice in permitting, in a proper case, a negative counter-notice to be substituted for a positive counter-notice already given. So although I freely accept the possibilities to which Mr Vickery referred, I doubt very much whether in point of fact they amount to a cogent objection to the construction of the relevant provisions, which I prefer. The construction which I prefer is that s 29(2) is satisfied if in point of fact within the two-month period, thus giving proper emphasis to the word 'duly', a notice stating that the tenant will not be willing at the date of termination to give up possession, has in point of fact been given.

[19] I do not believe that this construction is precluded by the judgment of Brightman J, since in that case although Brightman J says in the passage which I have quoted that the landlords had an indefeasible right to recover possession on 1 April 1970 without payment of compensation, Brightman J is considering the indefeasible right of landlords having regard to the ability of the tenants to give a negative counter-notice after 13 October. It is to be observed that in that case no negative counter-notice was in fact given. The point, therefore, did not arise and the tenants took no steps to raise the question until after the expiry of the two-month period. I do not think it can be seriously contended that the two-month period is in any way extensible, and it would follow, therefore, that after the expiry of the two-month period the landlord's right became indefeasible whether or not during the period from 13 October to 27 November there had been a contingent right in the tenants to revoke their original positive notice. Accordingly, it does not seem to me that this determination was essential to the decision of Brightman J, but if that is a wrong analysis I would, to the extent that I have indicated, very respectfully disagree with the generality of what he said.

[20] It follows that in my view this appeal ought to succeed on the grounds that the tenant was entitled to give a second notice and that s 29(2) was potentially satisfied. However, it seems to me that in any case where the tenant has made a positive representation, it will be a question whether it is in fact entitled to resile from the positive notice which is given in answer to a s 25 notice given by the landlord. I say no more about that in this case, save to say that it must be open to the court to determine that in all the circumstances it is wrong for a tenant to seek to substitute a new statement of his intention for the purposes of s 29(2), but each such case must be dealt with on its own merits. I would accordingly allow this appeal on this ground.

[21] I should add that the learned judge granted permission to appeal only upon certain arguments which were addressed to him and addressed to me in far greater detail in writing by Mr Geldart and Mr Vickery, on points arising under the Human Rights Act 1998, under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950, and in particular the First Protocol to the convention. These arguments raised points of what seemed to me to be very great difficulty. I have deliberately abstained from hearing the oral argument and from considering these points in detail. I have come to the conclusion without considering the human rights points. The learned judge gave permission to appeal only upon the human rights points, but Mr Vickery has realistically accepted that, first of all it would be difficult to resist an application for permission to appeal out of time on the ground upon which I have decided the appeal also, and also I think that the investigation of the effect of Brightman J's decision is a necessary prerequisite to the application of the principles articulated in the 1998 Act. For these reasons therefore I shall allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.
